Coaſt of Kent which we call the Downs, the Thames Mouth, Harwich, Yarmouth, Hull, &c. and that the Train'd-Bands all along the maritime Counties ſhould meet in Arms upon a Signal given to defend the ſaid Parts, and do their beſt to prevent the Enemy's Landing. And if the Enemy did land, to lay all the Country waſte round about, and to ſpoil all things that might be of any uſe to them, that ſo they might find no Food but what they brought with them on their Shoulders. And to buſy the Enemy night and day with continual Alarms, ſo as to give them no Reſt: but not to put it to the Hazard of a Battle, till more Commanders with their Companies were come up to them. Of which Commanders they nominated one in every Shire to have the chief Command and Conduct. I think it needleſs to relate particularly what inland Shires they aſſign'd to aid this and that Coaſt, what Numbers, what Arms, and what manner of Fight they agreed upon.

And about the Papiſts at home.

In this troubleſome Seaſon, ſome beat it many times into the Queen's Head, that the Spaniards abroad were not ſo much to be feared, as the Papiſts at home; for the Spaniards would not attempt any Hoſtility againſt England, but upon Confidence of Help from them: and that therefore, for better Security, the Heads of that Party were, upon ſome Pretence or other, to be taken off; alledging the Example of King Henry VIII, when the Emperor and the French King, by the Inſtigation of the Pope, were ready to invade England; for as ſoon as he had put to death the Marqueſs of Exeter, the Lord Montacute, Edward Nevil, and others, whom he ſuſpected to favour their Enterprize, their Expedition preſently was daſh'd. But the Queen, diſliking this as cruel Counſel, thought it ſufficient to commit ſome of the Papiſts, and thoſe not of the chief, to Cuſtody, at Wisbeach in the Fens. And having her Eyes and Mind every way, ſhe by frequent Letters excited and quicken'd the Parliament, who were not aſleep the while. Sir William Fitz-Williams, Lord-Deputy of Ireland, ſhe directed what he ſhould do. The King of Scots ſhe put in mind by her Friends in Scotland, and by Meſſengers, to be very wary of the Papiſts and the Spaniſh Faction. But he, not ignorant how great a Tempeſt and Deſtruction hung over his head, was of his own accord forward and careful, and, according to his continual good Affection to the true Religion and the Queen, had already refuſed to give Audience to the Biſhop of Dumblane, (who was ſent from the Pope) and had procured a Confederacy to be enter'd into by the Proteſtants of Scotland, for reſiſting the Spaniards: and he himſelf marching in Perſon with an Army into Annandale, forced Maxwell's Camp, who, contrary to his Faith given, was return'd out of Spain into Scotland, and favour'd the Spaniard's Deſigns, took him and threw him into Priſon, declar'd the Spaniards Enemies, and made Preparation againſt them with great Chearfulneſs and Alacrity.

K. of Scots Alacrity againſt the Spaniard.

Treaty of Peace in the mean time.

Amidſt theſe great Preparations for War by both Parties, Projects for Peace are not quite laid aſide. Two Years before, when the Prince of Parma had conſider'd with himſelf how difficult a matter it would be to bring the Low-Country-War to an Iſſue, as long as it was cheriſh'd with daily Supplies from the Queen, had dealt ſeriouſly by Letters, with the Help of Sir James a Croftes, one of the Privy-Council, a Man very deſirous of Peace, Andrew van Loe, a Netherlander, and others, that there might be a Treaty of Peace, he being impower'd thereto by the King of Spain. The Queen fearing leſt this were done politickly underhand to break off the Amity betwixt her and the Confederate Provinces, and to allure them cunningly to the Spaniard, deferr'd the matter a while. But now, to divert the War which threatned on both ſides, ſhe reſolv'd to treat of Peace, but with the Sword in her Hand: neither indeed was the Prince of Parma againſt it.

1588. Ann. 31.

In the Month of February, therefore, Commiſſioners were ſent into Flanders, viz. Henry Earl of Derby, William Brook Lord Cobham, Sir James a Croftes, Comptroller of the Queen's Houſhold, Valentine Dale and John Rogers, Doctors of Law: who being receiv'd in the Prince's Name with all Courteſy and Civility, ſent Dale preſently to him, to underſtand his Mind about the Place of Meeting, and to ſee his Commiſſion from the King of Spain. He appointed the Place near Oſtend, not in Oſtend itſelf, which was now held by the Engliſh againſt the King: and as for his Commiſſion, he promis'd it ſhould be ſhew'd 'em when they met. But he wiſh'd they would haſten the matter, leſt any thing ſhould happen in the mean time which might hinder the Treaty of Peace. But Richardot ſaid plainly and expreſly, That he knew not what might be attempted in the mean time againſt England. Not long after, Rogers was ſent to the Prince by the Queen's expreſs Command, to underſtand for certain, whether there were any Deſign for invading England, as he and Richardot ſeem'd of late to give Hints of. He affirm'd, that he never had the leaſt Thought of invading England, ſince he deſired the Negotiation might be haſtned; and was ſomewhat angry with Richardot, who deny'd that any ſuch Words had fallen from them.

On the 12th Day of April, there met with the Engliſh Commiſſioners in Tents near Oſtend, Count Aremberg, Champigny, Richardot, Mas a Doctor, and Garnier, ſent as Commiſſioners from the Prince of Parma; who voluntarily gave the Engliſh Commiſſioners the Precedency and upper Hand both in going and ſitting. They affirming that the Prince had ſufficient Power and Commiſſion to treat of a Peace, the Engliſh propounded, that a Truce might firſt be concluded on. The other deny'd it, becauſe it would be damageable and prejudicial to the Spaniard, (who had been at the Charge of maintaining a powerful Army for now full ſix Months) in caſe a Peace ſhould not be agreed upon. The Engliſh inſiſted, that a Truce was promis'd before they came into the Low-Countries. They on the other ſide acknowledg'd, that a Truce was promis'd ſix Months before, but not accepted; and that it was not in the Queen's Power to make a Truce for the Hollanders and Zealanders, who daily attempted Acts of Hoſtility. The Engliſh urged that the Truce might be general, for all the Queen's Dominions and the Kingdom of Scotland. They refuſed to grant it for any more than four Towns only in the Netherlands, which were in the Queen's Hands; that is to ſay, Oſtend, Fluſhing, Bergen-op-Zoom, and Brill; and that only during the Treaty and twenty days after; and upon ſuch Terms, as it ſhould be lawful in the mean time for the Queen of England to invade Spain, and for the Spaniard to invade England out of Spain and the Low-Countries.

Engliſh Propoſals and Spaniards Anſwer.

Whilſt the time was ſpent and ſquander'd away from day to day, in arguing about the Truce and the Place of Treaty, which at length was appointed to be at Borbourg, Sir James a Croftes, out of his ſingular Affection to Peace, made a Journey to Bruſſels, without acquainting the reſt of the Commiſſioners, and there propounded certain Articles in private; for which he was afterwards, upon Leiceſter's Accuſation, impriſon'd; tho' in the Judgment of the reſt of the Commiſſioners, sioners, the said Articles were not to be mislik'd: but Commissioners must not pass the Limits of their Commission. At last, when the English Commissioners could by no means get from them that there should be an absolute Cessation of Arms, nor see the Prince of Parma's Commission to treat of Peace, they propos'd these things following.

1588. Ann. 31.

Other Proposals of the English.

'That the ancient Leagues betwixt the Kings of England and the Dukes of Burgundy might 'be renew'd and confirm'd. That all the Netherlanders might fully enjoy their Privileges, and 'serve God with Liberty of Conscience. That 'the Spaniards and foreign Soldiers might be re-'mov'd out of the Netherlands, so as neither the 'Netherlanders, nor the bordering Countries, 'might have cause to fear them. Which things 'if they might be granted, the Queen would 'condescend to reasonable Conditions concerning 'those Towns in the Netherlands, which she then 'had in Possession, (that it might appear that it 'was not for her own Advantage, but for the 'necessary Defence as well of the Netherlands as 'of herself, that she had taken up Arms) provi-'ded the Money which was due to her from 'thence might be repay'd.'

Their Answer.

They answer'd, 'That there would be no 'Difficulty in renewing the ancient Leagues, 'when they should once come to a friendly Con-'ference together about the same. That there 'was no reason why foreign Princes should take 'Care of the Netherlanders Privileges, which 'were most freely and bountifully granted not 'only to the Provinces and Towns that were 'reconciled, but even to those also which were 'reduced by Force of Arms. And for foreign 'Soldiers, they were retain'd upon urgent Ne-'cessity, as long as Holland, England, and France 'were in Arms. As for those four Towns, that 'had been taken from the King, and the Repay-'ment of the Money which the Queen had ex-'pended, the Spaniard might in reason demand 'as many thousands of Ducats to be repaid him 'by the Queen, as he had disburs'd upon the 'Low-Country-War, from the time that she first 'supported the revolting Netherlanders, and took 'them into her Protection.'

Expostulation with the Prince of Parma about a Book of Allen's.

About this time Dale, by the Queen's Command, went to the Prince of Parma, and mildly expostulated with him about a Book lately set forth by Cardinal Allen, an Englishman, wherein he exhorted the Nobility and People of England and Ireland to join with the Spanish Forces under the Conduct of the Prince of Parma, to execute the Sentence of Pope Sixtus Quintus, publish'd already by Bull, against the Queen of England, whereby she was declared an Heretick, Illegitimate, and tax'd of Cruelty against Mary Queen of Scots, &c. and her Subjects commanded to aid the Prince of Parma against her. (And indeed there were a great Number of these Bulls and Books printed at Antwerp, to be dispers'd all over England.) The Duke deny'd 'that ever he saw 'any such Book or Bull, neither did he undertake 'any thing upon the Pope's Account; but his 'own Prince he must obey. As for the Queen 'of England, he had so high an Esteem of her for 'her Royal Vertues, that next to the King his 'Master, he honour'd her above all, and desired 'to do her Service. That he had persuaded his 'King to condescend to this Treaty of Peace, 'which would be more advantagious for the Eng-'lish than for the Spaniards. For if the Spaniards 'be overcome, they will soon repair their Loss; 'but if you (said he) be once vanquish'd, your 'Kingdom is quite lost by it.' To whom Dale reply'd, Our Queen is provided of Strength sufficient to defend her Kingdom; and you yourself in your Wisdom may judge, that a Kingdom cannot easily be won by the Fortune of one Battle, seeing the King of Spain has not yet been able, after so long a War, to recover his ancient Inheritance in the Netherlands. Be it so, (said the Duke) these things are in the Hand and Disposal of the Almighty.

1588. Ann. 31.

The Commissioners continued their Proposals, Answers and Replies to one another, and still spun as it were the same Thread over again.

Other Demands of the English, and Spaniards Answers.

The English urging that a Toleration of Religion might be granted to the Confederate Provinces, at least for two Years; it was answer'd, As the Spaniard demanded it not for the English Catholicks, so they hoped the Queen was so prudent as not to desire any thing which should be against the Honour, Oath and Conscience of the Spaniard. When they demanded the Money due from the States of Brabant; they answer'd, That it was lent without the King's Knowledge or Leave: but when the Accounts were cast up, how much the said Money was, and how much the King had disburs'd about the War, it would soon be known who had most due to them. With such Answers as these they dally'd with the English, till the Spanish Fleet was come upon the Coast of England, and the Thundring of the Ordnance was heard from the Sea. And then they receiv'd a safe Conduct from the Prince of Parma, (who had in the mean time drawn down all his Forces to the Sea-side) and were honourably conducted by his Commissioners to the Borders near Calais.

Treaty broke off.

Thus came this Treaty to nothing, which at first was begun by the Queen (as the wiser sort have thought) to divert the Spanish Fleet; and continued by the Spaniard, purposely to surprize England at unawares and unprovided. So as they seem'd on both sides to sow the Fox's Skin to the Lion's.

Spanish Armada.

The said Spanish Fleet, being the best furnish'd with Men, Munition, and all manner of Provision, of any that ever the Ocean saw, and call'd by the arrogant Name of Invincible, consisted of 130 Ships: In which were 19290 Soldiers, 8350 Mariners, 2080 Galley-Slaves, and 2630 great Ordnance.

Its Commanders.

Don Alphonso Perez de Gusman, Duke of Medina Sidonia, had the principal Command thereof; (for Don Antonio Columna, Duke of Paliano, and the Marquess of Sancta Cruce, to whom this Command was formerly design'd, died both of them while the Fleet was rigging) and under him John Martinez de Recalde, an experienced Seaman.

It sets sail. Is dispers'd.

On the 29th of May, the Fleet set sail out of the River Tayo, and while it bent its Course towards the Groyne in Gallicia, it was totally scatter'd and dispers'd by an hideous Tempest, so that with much ado it met again together some few days after, at the Groyne and other Harbours thereabouts: three Gallies being convey'd into France, by the Policy of David Guinn, an English Slave, and the Treachery of the Turkish Rovers. It was reported to be so weather-beaten and distress'd, that the Queen was verily persuaded that this Fleet was not to be look'd for this year; and Secretary Walsingham wrote to the Lord-Admiral to send back four of the biggest Ships, as if the War were now at an end. The Lord-Admiral did not easily believe it, and therefore humbly desired that nothing might be rashly credited in so weighty a matter, and that he might retain the Ships with him, tho' it were at his own Cost and Charges. And taking the Benefit of a favourable Wind, he set sail toward Spain, to surprize the Enemy's weather-beaten Ships in their Harbours. When he was not far from the Coast of Spain, the Wind came about into the South, and he thereupon (who was commanded to defend the Coast of England, fearing lest with 1588. Ann. 31. the same Wind they might arrive in England undiscover'd) return'd to Plymouth.

the

Puts to Sea again. With the same Wind the Duke of Medina set sail with his whole Fleet from the Groyne the 12th day of July, according to the Account of the Julian Year: and after a day or two he sent Roderico Telie before into the Low-Countries, to advertise the Prince of Parma of the Coming of the Fleet, and to tell him what was best to be done. For he had Orders to join with the Prince of Parma's Forces and Shipping, and to conduct 'em under the Protection of his Fleet into England, and withal to send the Land-Forces ashore at the Thames Mouth. And now will I give a brief Account, out of the most credible Relations, as well of the Spaniards as of our own Countrymen, what was done every day in this Expedition, that the Truth may the more plainly appear.

On the 16th day there was a great Calm, and a thick Fog till Noon: then the North-East Wind blew very strongly, and presently after the West Wind, till Midnight, and then the East-South-East Wind; insomuch as the Spanish Fleet being dispersed thereby, was hardly gather'd together again till it came within sight of England on the 19th day. English Fleet puts to Sea. Upon which day the Lord-Admiral of England, being certainly inform'd by Flemming, the Captain of a Pinnace, that the Spanish Fleet was enter'd into the British Sea, (which the Seamen ordinarily call the Channel,) and was seen near the Point call'd the Lizard, tow'd out the English Fleet into the main Sea, not without great Difficulty, the Wind blowing stiffly into the Haven, but indeed with singular Diligence and Industry, and with admirable Alacrity of the Seamen, whom he encouraged at their Halser-Work, assisting them and the common Soldiers in the doing of it in Person.

The next day the English discover'd the Spanish Fleet with lofty Turrets like Castles, in Front like a Half-Moon, the Wings thereof spreading out about the Length of seven Miles, sailing very slowly, tho' with full Sails, the Winds being as it were tired with carrying them, and the Ocean groaning under the Weight of 'em; which they willingly suffer'd to pass by, that they might chase them in the Rear with a fore-right Wind.

On the 21st of July, the Lord-Admiral of England, sending a Pinnace before, call'd the Defiance, 1st Fight. denouncing War by discharging her Ordnance; and presently his own Ship, call'd the Ark-Royal, thunder'd thick and furiously upon the Admiral (as he thought) of the Spaniards, (but it was Alphonso de Leva's Ship.) Soon after, Drake, Hawkins, and Forbisher play'd stoutly with their Ordnance upon the hindmost Squadron, which was commanded by Recalde, who labour'd all he could to stay his Men from flying to the main Fleet, till such time as his own Ship being much batter'd with Shot, and now grown unserviceable, he was fain himself, with much ado, to retreat thither also. At which time the Duke of Medina gather'd together his Fleet, which was scatter'd this way and that way; and, hoisting more Sail, held on his Course with what Speed he could. Agility of the English Ships. Neither could he do any other, seeing both the Wind favour'd the English, and their Ships would turn about with incredible Celerity and Nimbleness, which way soever they pleased, to charge, wind, and tack about again. And now had they maintain'd a smart Fight for the space of two Hours, when the Lord-Admiral thought not good to continue it any longer, because forty of his Ships were not yet come in, being scarce got out of the Haven.

The Night following, the St. Katharine, a Spanish Ship, having received much Damage in the Fight, was brought into the midst of the Fleet, in order to be repair'd; and a vast Ship of Biscay, belonging to Oquenda, and having the King's Treasurer on board, was designedly set on fire, by some Gun-powder laid for that purpose by a Dutch Gunner, who had receiv'd some ill Treatment: But the Flame was happily extinguish'd by some Vessels that came in seasonably to its Relief; among which a Galleon (the Master of her Don Pedro de Valdez) fell foul of another Ship, and sprung her Foremast; so that being left behind, by reason the Night was so dark, and the Sea ran so high, that no Succour could come to her, she was taken by Drake, who sent Valdez to Dartmouth, and distributed the Cash found in her, as a Booty to his Men. Don Pedro de Valdez taken. Drake was order'd to carry a Lantern that Night, but fail'd to do it, having at the same time in chase five German Merchant-Men, which he took to be Enemies. This occasion'd almost all the English Fleet to lie by, because they could not discover the Light; nor did he or the rest of the Fleet get sight of the Lord-Admiral, till the next Evening following; for he, with two Ships more, viz. the Bear and the Mary-Rose, stood after the Spanish Fleet, all the Night before. The Duke spent this whole Day in disposing his Fleet into the best Order, and commanded Alphonso de Leva to bring the first and the last Squadron together; then he appointed every particular Ship his proper Station, according to the Platform agreed on in Spain, and made it Death for any one to abandon his Post. Glich an Ensign was dispatch'd to the Prince of Parma, to acquaint him with the State of the Navy; and Oquenda's Ship was turned loose to Sea, her Cargo being first taken out and dispos'd of into other Vessels: The very same day she was taken by the English, with about fifty Sailors, wretchedly bruised and burnt, and carry'd into Weymouth Harbour. Oquenda's Ship taken.

On the 23th of this Month, the Spaniards, very early in the Morning, took the Advantage of a Northerly Wind, and bore down upon the English, who soon tack'd about and stood Westward. Both Fleets strove hard for some time to get to the Windward, and then prepared for the Engagement. It was managed with Confusion enough, and various Success. The English on the one hand rescu'd some Ships of London, that were surrounded by the Spaniards; and the Spaniards on the other as bravely brought off Recalde, when he was in equal Danger. The great Guns on both sides rattled like so many Peals of Thunder; but the Spaniards Shot flew for the most part over the Heads of the English, without doing Execution; Cock being the only Englishman that died bravely in the midst of his Enemies in a Ship of his own. The Reason of this was, that the English Ships being far less than the Enemy's, made the Attack with more Quickness and Agility; and when they had given a Broadside, they presently sheer'd off to a convenient Distance, and levell'd their Shot so directly at the bigger and more unweildy Ships of the Spaniards, as seldom to miss their Aim; tho' the Lord-Admiral did not think it safe or proper to grapple with them, as some advised, with much more Heat than Discretion; L. Admiral's Care. because that the Enemy's Fleet carry'd a considerable Army within their Sides, whereas ours had no such Advantage. Besides, their Ships far exceeded ours in Number and Bulk, and were much stronger and higher built; insomuch that their Men having the Opportunity to ply us from such lofty Hatches, must inevitably destroy those that were obliged, as it were, to fight beneath them: And he easily foresaw likewise, that the Damage and Disgrace of a total Defeat would weigh much heavier than the Advantage of a Victory, should he happen to compass

1588. Ann. 31. compaſs it; ſince, if he were vanquiſh'd, 'twould much endanger the Safety of the whole Kingdom; but if he got the better, he could obtain no more than the naked Credit of putting a Fleet to Diſorder, and baffling an Enemy.

On the 24th Day of the Month, there was a Ceſſation on both ſides, and the Lord-Admiral ſent ſome of his ſmaller Veſſels to the neareſt of the Engliſh Harbours, to fetch a Supply of Powder and Ammunition; then he divided the Fleet into four Squadrons, the firſt of which he commanded himſelf, the ſecond he committed to Drake, the third to Hawkins, and the fourth to Forbiſher. He likewiſe ſingled out of the main Fleet ſome ſmaller Veſſels to begin the Attack on all ſides at once, in the very dead of the Night; but a Calm happening, ſpoil'd his Deſign.

3d Fight. On the 25th, being St. James's Day, the Saint Anne, a Galleon of Portugal, not being able to keep up with the Fleet, was taken by ſome Engliſh Ships, and Leva with Don Diego Telles Enriques attempted to reſcue her with three Galeaſſes; but were ſo warmly received by the Lord-Admiral himſelf, and the Lord Thomas Howard in the Golden-Lion, who by reaſon of the Calm, had their Ships tow'd along with Boats, that the Galleon was got off with much ado, and not without ſome Loſs. However from that time the Galleaſſes durſt not venture any new Engagement.

Different Accounts thereof. The Spaniards reported, 'That the Engliſh did at 'the ſame time miſerably batter the Spaniſh Ad'miral who lay in the Rear, with their great 'Guns, and that they came ſo near her, as to 'ſlay many of her Men, and ſhoot her Main'Maſt by the Board; but Mexia and Recalde 'came up ſeaſonably enough to beat off the Eng'liſh; That after this the Spaniſh Admiral, with 'the Aſſiſtance of Recalde and others, fell upon 'the Engliſh Admiral, who made his Eſcape, by 'the Advantage of the Wind's chopping about. 'That the Spaniards from that time gave over the 'Chaſe, and keeping on their Courſe, diſpatch'd 'a Meſſenger to Parma, to deſire him to join the 'King's Armada with his own Squadron as ſoon 'as poſſible, and to ſend withal ſome great Shot 'for the uſe of the main Fleet.' This was altogether a Secret to the Engliſh, who give this Account of the matter: 'That they tore down the 'Lantern from one of the Spaniſh Ships, robbed 'another of her Bowſprit, and did a conſiderable 'Damage to a third: That the Nonpareil and the 'Mary-Roſe held a ſmall Fight with the Spaniards, 'and that ſome other Ships retriev'd the Triumph, 'when ſhe was in great Danger.' Thus have we very different Accounts of the ſame Action, from thoſe who were preſent on the ſpot, and made their Reports, every Man according to his own Obſervation.

Knights created at Sea. The next Day, the Lord-Admiral knighted the Lord Thomas Howard, the Lord Sheffeld, Roger Townſend, John Hawkins, and Martin Forbiſher, in Conſideration of their good Service; and a Reſolution was taken not to attack the Enemy from that time forward, till they came to the Britiſh Frith, or the Streights of Calais; where the Lord Henry Seymour and Sir Will. Winter expected their Arrival. Thus the Spaniſh Fleet ſailed forward with a fair and ſoft Gale at South-Weſt and by South, and the Engliſh chaſed them cloſe at the Heels. But ſo far was this Invincible Armada from alarming the Sea-Coaſts with any frightful Ap-

Noblemen and Gentlemen join the Fleet. prehenſions, that the Engliſh Gentry of the younger ſort enter'd themſelves Volunteers, and taking leave of their Parents, Wives, and Children, did, with incredible Chearfulneſs, hire Ships at their own Charge; and, in pure Love to their Country, join'd the grand Fleet in vaſt Numbers; amongſt whom were the Earls of Oxford, Northumberland and Cumberland, Thomas and Robert Cecil, Henry Brooke, Charles Blunt, Walter Raleigh, William Hatton, Robert Cary, Ambroſe Willoughby, Thomas Gerard, Arthur Gorges, and ſeveral others of good Quality.

On the 27th of this Month, the Spaniſh Fleet came to an Anchor before Calais; their Pilots having acquainted them, that if they ventur'd any farther, there was ſome Danger that the Force of the Current might drive 'em away into the Northern Channel. Not far from them came likewiſe the Engliſh Admiral to an Anchor, and lay within ſhot of their Ships. The Engliſh Fleet conſiſted by this time of 140 Sail; all of 'em Ships of Force, and very tite and nimble Sailors, and eaſily manageable upon a Tack. But however, the main Brunt of the Engagement lay not upon more than 15 or 16 of 'em. The Spaniards, as they had frequently done before, preſſed the Duke of Parma by one Meſſenger after another, to ſend away forty Fly-boats, without which they could not well engage the Engliſh, by reaſon of the unweildy Bulk of the Spaniſh Veſſels, and the Lightneſs and Activity of the Engliſh. They intreated him likewiſe, with great Earneſtneſs, to put aboard his whole Army, which the Spaniſh Fleet would be ſure to guard, according to the Reſolutions already taken, till it was landed in England. But it ſeems he was not ready, and ſo could not anſwer their Summons. His flat-bottom'd Boats, which were fram'd for the Channel, were all leaky, his Proviſions not ready, and his Sailors, who had been hitherto kept together againſt their wills, had made a ſhift to give him the ſlip, and get away. Beſides, ſeveral Men of War belonging to Holland and Zealand, block'd up the very Mouth of the Harbours of Dunkirk and Newport, from whence alone he could put to Sea; and ſo well were they furniſh'd with great Guns and ſmall Arms, that he could not poſſibly get from ſhore, without running a very palpable Hazard of his Life. However, being a ſtout and experienced Soldier, he left no Method unattempted, out of an eager Deſire of aſſiſting towards the Conqueſt of England.

Spaniſh Fleet anchors.

Prince of Parma ſent for.

But Queen Elizabeth, by a wiſe Precaution, baffled all his Attempts, and daſh'd the forward Hopes of the Spaniard all at once: For, by her Majeſty's Orders, the Lord-Admiral got ready eight of his worſt Ships the very Day after the Spaniards came to an Anchor; and having beſtow'd upon them a good Plenty of Pitch, Tar, and Roſin, and lin'd 'em well with Brimſtone and other combuſtible Matter, they ſent 'em before the Wind, in the dead time of the Night, under the Conduct of Young and Prowſe, into the midſt of the Spaniſh Fleet: The Approach of which was no ſooner diſcover'd by the Spaniards, and the prodigious Blaze which the Fire made all the Sea over, but they ſuſpecting that theſe Fire-Ships were big with other Engines of Slaughter, beſides the deſtructive Element that ſhew'd itſelf without, began to raiſe a moſt hideous Clamour, Cut your Cables, and get up your Anchors! and in a panick Fright put to Sea with all the Confuſion and Precipitancy imaginable. One of the Fleet (a large Galleaſs) having broken her Rudder, floated up and down before the Wind; and the next Day making for Calais in a very piteous Plight, ſhe at laſt ſtruck upon the Sands, and after a ſmart, long, and doubtful Engagement, was taken by Amias Preſton, Thomas Gerard, and Harvey. The Captain of her, Don Hugo de Moncada, being firſt ſlain, and the Soldiers and Rowers either drown'd, or put to the Sword; the Engliſh pillaged a great Quantity of Gold which ſhe had on board, and the Ship and Guns fell to the Governor of Calais.

Fireſhips ſent among the Spaniards.

A Galleaſs taken; Moncada ſlain.

The

1588. Ann. 31.

The Spaniards reported, that the Duke, upon the Approach of the Fire-ships, order'd the whole Fleet to weigh Anchor and stand to Sea, but that when the Danger was over, every Ship should return to her Station. This is what he did himself, and he likewise discharg'd a great Gun as a Signal to the rest to do as he did: The Report however was heard but by very few, by reason their Fears had dispersed them at that rate, that some of them ventur'd out to the main Ocean, and others sail'd up the Shallows of Flanders.

4th Engagement. In the mean time Drake and Fenner play'd briskly with their Cannon upon the Spanish Fleet, as it was rendezvouzing over against Graveling. They were not long after join'd by Fenton, Southwell, Beeston, Cross, Riman, and in a little while by the Lord-Admiral himself, the Lord Thomas Howard, and the Lord Sheffield. The Duke Leva, Oquendo, Recalde, and the rest, got clear of the Shallows with much ado, and stood the Brunt as well as they could, but had the better part of their Ships miserably torn, and in several places shot through. The Galleon of St. Matthew, under the Command of Don Diego Piementelli (as she came to the Relief of Don Francisco de Toledo in the St. Philip, which had received great Damage from Seimour and Winter's Shot, and after being driven almost as far as Ostend, had been as roughly treated by the Zelanders, and was at length made a Prize by some Ships of Flushing) was at last taken herself, and the whole Spanish Fleet closely ply'd, and in great Distress for the space of a whole Day.

St. Philip and St. Matthew taken.

On the last Day of the Month, the Wind blew hard at North-West early in the Morning, and the Spanish Fleet attempting to get back again to the Streights of Calais, was driven toward Zeland. The English then gave over the Chace, because, in the Spaniards Opinion, they perceived them making haste enough to their own Destruction. For the Wind lying at the West-North-West Point, could not chuse but force 'em on the Shoals and Sands on the Coast of Zeland. But the Wind happening to come about in a little time to South-West and by West, they went before the Wind, and having got off the Shoals, in the Evening a Council of War was held: The general Resolution was to return into Spain by the Northern Channel; for they wanted many necessary Provisions, especially great Shot: their Ships were wretchedly torn and batter'd, and they had no Hopes at all that the Prince of Parma would come and join them. Being now therefore clear of Danger in the Main Ocean, they steer'd Northward, and the English Fleet renewed the Chace after them. Now and then the Spanish Fleet slacken'd their Sail, and seem'd to tarry for the coming up of the English; so that 'twas generally thought their Fleet would tack about and return home.

The Spaniards fly Northward.

Q. Eliz. visits her Camp at Tilbury.

About this time Queen Elizabeth was pleased to take a View of her Army and Camp at Tilbury; and as she rode through the Troops drawn up on both sides of her, sometimes with a martial Pace and Posture, at other times more like her Sex and herself. 'Tis scarce to be thought what a Spirit of Bravery she infused into the Officers and Soldiers by her Presence and Direction.

On the very Day the last Engagement was between the two Fleets, the Prince of Parma, having paid his Addresses to our Lady of Hall, came to Dunkirk, tho' something of the latest; for which reason the Spaniards receiv'd him in a very reproachful manner, as if out of some By-regards to Queen Elizabeth, he had on purpose slipt so fair an Occasion of doing Wonders for the Service of his Country. The Duke, to appease this Storm, punish'd those who had the Charge of Victualling his Fleet; tho' in the mean time he could not but secretly laugh at the sawcy and insolent Brags of the Spaniards, whom he had heard talking at this vain rate, 'That wherever 'they turn'd their Sails, a most certain Victory 'waited upon their Course, and that the English 'would not have Courage enough to look them 'in the Face.'

And 'tis certain, that Don Bernardine de Mendoza was so ridiculous as to print a lying Poem in France, which proclaim'd the Triumph before the Victory was obtain'd. However, to block up Parma, so that he might not get out of Dunkirk, the Lord-Admiral order'd the Lord Henry Seimour and the Dutch to keep a very strict Eye upon the Coast of Flanders, whilst he himself pursued the Spaniards on the other side of Edinburgh Frith, anciently called Bodotria. For some Suspicions there were, that they design'd to betake themselves to the King of Scots, who was already provok'd to an high rate for his Mother's Death. Certain it is, that Ashby, the Queen's Ambassador in Scotland, the better to keep him in Temper, made him, this Month, very considerable Offers, viz. That he should be created a Duke of England, with a yearly Salary of 5000 Pounds to maintain the Title: That he should have a Guard maintain'd at the Queen's Charge, besides some other Advantages. Whether this was done out of private Humour or by publick Authority, I can neither tell, nor will stand to examine in this place: However the Blame lay at his door, and the Propositions were never made good.

Parma block't up at Dunkirk.

Offers made to [illegible]

But the Spaniards having now laid aside all the Thoughts and Hopes of returning to attempt the English; and perceiving their main Safety lay in their Flight, made no stay or stop at any Port whatever. And thus this mighty Armada, which had been three whole Years fitting out, and at a vast Expence, met in one Month's time with several Attacks, and was at last routed, with a vast Slaughter on their side, and but a very few of the English missing, and not one Ship lost, except that small Vessel of Cock's, it happening that the Enemy's Shot flew too high to do the English Ships any great Damage. When therefore the Spanish Fleet had taken a large Compass round Britain, by the Coasts of Scotland, the Orcades and Ireland, and had weather'd many Storms, and suffer'd as many Wrecks and Blows, and all the Inconveniences of War and Weather, it made a shift to get home again, laden with nothing but Shame and Dishonour. This occasion'd the coining of several kinds of Money and Medals, some in Memory of the Victory, with the Device of a Fleet flying under full Sail, and this Inscription, Venit, vidit, fugit; i. e. It came, it saw, and fled. Others were stamp'd in Honour of the Queen, with Fire-ships, and a Fleet all in Hurry and Confusion, with this Motto, Dux Fœmina Facti, i. e. A Woman manag'd the Design. Certain it is, that several of their Ships perish'd in their Flight, being cast away on the Coasts of Scotland and Ireland, and that above 700 Soldiers were cast on shore in Scotland, who by the Prince of Parma's Mediation with the King of Scots, and with Queen Elizabeth's Permission, were sent over about a Year after into the Low-Countries. As for those who had the ill Fortune to be drove upon the Irish Shore, they met with the most barbarous Treatment; for some of 'em were butcher'd by the wild Irish, and the rest put to the Sword by the Lord-Deputy; who fearing that they might join with the Irish Malecontents, and observing that Bingham, Governour of Connaught, treated them with more Gentleness than he had several times order'd him to do, upon their Surrender, he forth-forthwith dispatched Fowle, Deputy-Marshal, to execute his Orders; who first dislodged 'em from the Places where they lay concealed, and then executed about 200 of 'em. But this Rigour the Queen condemn'd and complain'd of as too extreme. However the rest being terrify'd by this way of Proceeding, tho' they were sick and half famish'd, yet chose to trust themselves to their shatter'd Barks, and the Mercy of the Seas, and so were many of 'em a Sacrifice to the Waves.

Medals coin'd in Memory of the Victory.

1588. Ann. 31.

Spaniards blame the Prince of Parma.

The Spaniards, who got safe home, laid their Disparagement on the Prince of Parma's Negligence, and in some measure on the too nice Obsequiousness expressed on their side in making a Scruple of receding in the least from their Instructions: For their Orders ran, not to make any Attempt before the Prince of Parma's Fleet had join'd theirs, and there was not an inch of discretionary Liberty lodg'd in their Hands; had things been managed at another rate, they made their Boasts that the English Fleet could never escape being seized in their Harbours. And in truth it became a Dispute among Persons skill'd in the Discipline of War, Whether Orders were not to be sacredly observed, whatever the Issue proved, lest otherwise Authority should lose its Force, and its proper Fruit too, Obedience? 'Twas likewise controverted, Whether upon urgent Occasions, Men might not qualify or enlarge their Commissions, or suit 'em to the present Exigency, according as fresh Accidents arose, lest otherwise good Occasions were let slip, and Matters of Importance quite dash'd thro' an unseasonable Neglect. The King of Spain, for his part, bore the Defeat with a Patience that became him; and being sensible there was a Providence in it, he ordered a general Thanksgiving all over his Kingdom, to God and the Saints, that it was no greater; and shewed moreover a most extraordinary Tenderness in the Relief of the distressed Soldiers and Seamen.

K. of Spain returns Thanks to God.

So did Q. Elizabeth.

Queen Elizabeth did likewise appoint a publick Form of Prayer and Thanksgiving to be used throughout the whole Kingdom, and she was pleased to pass herself in a triumphant manner, and with a most splendid Retinue of Noblemen and others, thro the Streets of London, which on this Occasion were hung with blue Cloth; (the City-Companies being drawn up on both sides the Way with their Banners) she was carried in a Chariot with a Pair of Horses (Coaches being at that time but little in use) to St. Paul's Church, (where the Standards and Colours taken from the Enemy were hung up) and there she returned Thanks to God, and heard a Sermon proper to the Occasion.

The Lord-Admiral had a Pension settled on him for his great piece of Service, and he and his Officers had the Honour of being consider'd by the Queen as Persons born for the Preservation of their Country. She was likewise pleased to use the Freedom of saluting the other Commanders by their Names, whenever they happen'd to come in her sight, in consideration of their high and particular Merits; (a Reward as glorious as they were capable of desiring) and for the poor and disabled Seamen, on those she bestowed handsome Pensions. The Learned both at home and abroad congratulated this happy Victory with Transports of real Joy, and expressed the Triumphs of their Hearts in Poems wrote in all Languages upon this Subject.

She commends her Officers.

Publick Joy augmented by Sir Ro. Sidney.

This general Satisfaction receiv'd a farther Increase on Sir Robert Sidney's Return out of Scotland, who assured the Queen, that the King of Scots stood firm to her Interests, and would defend and assert those of the Protestant Religion. This Gentleman was sent over to him, when the Spanish Fleet lay cruising on the Coasts of Britain, on purpose to compliment him for his Respects towards the Queen, and to return him Thanks on that account, as likewise to acknowledge his generous and cheerful Adhesion to the Common Cause; and to give him Assurance of the like Assistance on her Majesty's part, should the Spaniards attempt to land in Scotland. He was moreover to remonstrate to him, how eagerly the King of Spain thirsted after the Acquisition of all Britain, and what Diligence he had used with his Holiness to get him excommunicated, and by that means to deprive him at once of the present Possession of the Crown of Scotland, and of his Title likewise to that of England in Reversion. Nor was he to conceal the menacing Expressions thunder'd out against him by Mendoza and the Pope's Nuncio, and that he could not therefore arm himself with too much Precaution against the Arts and Machinations of the Papists in Scotland. At this I cannot but mention, by the by, a pleasant Remark of the young King, viz. That he expected no other Favour at the Spaniards hands, than what Polyphemus promised Ulysses, That when he had devoured all the rest, he would reserve him for the last morsel.

A pleasant Saying of the K. of Scots.

The E. of Leicester's Death.

Nor did the Death of Leicester (however sadly the Queen resented it) put any stop to the Current of the publick Joy, who died on the 4th of September, on his way to Killingworth, of a continued Fever. He was the fifth Son of John Duke of Northumberland, and one of the Privy-Chamber to King Edward. Queen Mary restor'd him and his Brothers and Sisters to their Blood and Privilege, and made him Master of the English Ordnance at the Siege of St. Quintins: And in Queen Elizabeth's Reign (who loved him at such a rate, as if a secret Conjunction of their Planets had form'd as mysterious a Sympathy between their Souls) he was made Master of the Horse, honour'd with the Orders of St. George and St. Michael, chosen one of the Privy-Council, made Lord-Steward of her Majesty's Houshold, Chancellor of the University of Oxford, Ranger of the Forests on this side the River Trent, Lieutenant and Captain-General of the English Forces in the Low-Countries, and this Year advanced to be General of the English Forces against the Spaniards: Nor did he in the last Declension and Period of his Life, drop the Hopes of new Honours and Advancements, by the Accession of the high Character of acting as the Queen's Lieutenant in the Government of England and Ireland. Nay, this he had so far secured, as that the Letters-Patents were already drawn; but Burghley and Hatton put a stop to the matter, and the Queen saw in time the great Hazard of entrusting so large a share of her own Prerogative into the hands of a single Person.

His Titles and Places.

His Character.

He was reputed a most compleat Courtier; was a Person of exact Neatness, a generous Patron of Arts and Arms, and one that knew how to nick a Juncture, and manage a Turn to his best Advantage. Besides, he was of a Temper pleasant and popular, very shy and reserved to his suspected Enemies, had in his youthful Days been very complaisant to the Ladies, and when he grew almost past it, expressed a strange Fondness for Marriage. But as he prefer'd those two great Subjects of Envy, Power and Greatness, to solid Vertue; so did he of course draw upon himself the Malice and Reproach of inferior Persons, and could not avoid the Insults of libelling Pens, and infamous and false Reflections, even when he seem'd to be Fortune's and his Queen's chief Favourite. In a word, the Croud caress'd him in publick with flattering Commendations, but in private they used quite another Language.

1588. Ann. 31.

His Goods sold.

And whereas he was a Debtor to the Crown, his Effects were difpofed of at a publick Sale: For however gentle the Queen might fhew herfelf in other refpects, yet did fhe very rarely remit what was owing to her Treafury.

Parma befieges Bergen-op-Zome.

The Prince of Parma, tho' he had loft his Aim of making a Defcent into England, yet that he might purchafe fome degree of Honour with that powerful Army which had been raifed againft England, and that he might at the fame time open a Paffage into Zeland, and fecure Brabant from hoftile Incurfions, he laid fiege to Bergen upon the River Zome, a Town of Brabant, which Nature had fortified by an happy Situation, and Art by ftrong Works round about, and which had a Garrifon in it, confifting of Englifh for the moft part. But this Project was likewife defeated by the timely Vigilance of the Lord Willoughby, and the ftout Refiftance of the Garrifon: For tho' during the Heat of the Siege, there arofe as vain a Diffention between them, fome adhering to Sir William Drury, who was made Governour of the Town by the General, the Lord Willoughby; and fome fiding with Morgan, who had received the fame Commiffion from the Queen's Hands: Neverthelefs they buried their Differences in the common Safety, and by feveral brave Repulfes, frequent Sallies, and other well-apply'd Arts of War, made a fhift to give the Enemy fuch a warm Entertainment, that four hundred of them being kill'd outright, taken Prifoners, or drowned, (the fame Perfons having been trapann'd by Grimftone and Redhead, who pretended themfelves Revolters, by fpecious Oaths and fair Promifes, into a Bulwark of the Town) the Prince of Parma quitted all his Hopes of blocking up the Harbour, or winning the Town; and fo the Winter approaching, and Provifions growing fcarce, he e'en broke up the Siege, after it had been carried on for two Months. And that true Courage might not want its due Reward or Diftinction, the L. Willoughby confer'd the Honour of Knighthood on Sir Francis Vere, whofe Fame commenced from this Siege; as alfo on Sir Tho. Knolles, Sir Nicolas Parker, and Sir John Pooly, in regard to their good Conduct and Bravery.

Breaks up the Siege.

The Infolency of Diffenters.

Now was England harrafs'd, not only with foreign Wars, but difturb'd with Schifmaticks, thofe domeftick Enemies; (for War is always the Nurfe and Midwife of Church-Confufions) and certainly there never was a time, when the Difcipline of the Church was run down with fuch a fawcy Pertnefs, and the Authority of her Officers fo rudely and bafely infulted. For the Queen refufing (as indeed fhe was confiftent, and always the fame) to liften to any Changes in Religion, or encourage thofe new Modellers, whofe Defign fhe believ'd to be no other, than to wound her Royal Prerogative thro' the Sides of the Hierarchy, fome who had a profound Veneration for the Geneva Platform of Church-Difcipline, imagin'd there was no furer or nearer way for erecting it in England, than by loudly railing againft the Englifh Forms and Rites, and rendering the Names of Bifhop and Prelate as odious as they could to the common People. Their firft Effay therefore was, to put out fcurrilous Pamphlets againft Church-Order and Prelacy; the Titles whereof were Martin-mar-Prelate, Minerals, Diotrephes, A Demonftration of Difcipline, &c. Thefe Libels were ftuff'd with fuch an Heap of fcandalous and virulent Abufes, that the Authors of them appear'd rather to have learnt their Language from Billinfgate, than to fpeak the Senfe of any Chriftian Community: Yet it feems Perry and Udall, the chief Scribblers, were of the Miniftry; and another of 'em, Job Throckmorton, was a Man of Learning, and Mafter of a very facetious and fatyrical Vein. Their grand Patrons and Abettors were Sir Richard Knightly and Wigfton, Perfons in other refpects fober and pious, but drawn into the Party by fome Inftruments, that were to make a private Market by them. However the Knights had a pretty round Fine laid on them in the Star-Chamber; but the Archbifhop of Canterbury was fo generoufly good-natur'd as to procure a Remiffion of it at her Majefty's Hands.

Scurrilous Pamphlets againft the Church of England.

1588. Ann. 31.

Presbyterians began to fhew themfelves.

Whilft thefe Engines were employ'd in railing at the Church of England Liturgy, and bringing the Geneva-Model into its Place, fome of their Affociates took the Boldnefs to practife it in private Affemblies, in fpite of the Laws and Conftitution; nay they went fo far as to hold Synodical Conventions, and draw Presbytery into a Scheme. On this account were Tho. Cartwright, Edmund Snape, Andrew King, Budlow, Payne, and fome others of the fame Religious Brotherhood, call'd before their Superiours; but fome of the Party, glowing with a fond Zeal for their Teachers, endeavour'd to refcue them from the hands of Authority. With what a ftrange Petulancy and fullen Haughtinefs thefe Congregational Teachers managed themfelves, maugre all the Tendernefs and prudent Forbearance of the Archbifhop, I leave to the Obfervation of Ecclefiaftical Writers, whofe proper Province it is.

By this time, that black Storm which threaten'd from the Spanifh Quarter, was happily blown over; but fome Remains of it feem'd to have been diffipated thorow Ireland and Scotland; tho' the moft violent Tempeft of all blew from England, and fell afterwards upon Spain, as fhall be fhewn anon. For Ireland, the Troubles and Commotions which fprang up there, did in fome meafure owe their Rife to the Mif-conduct of the Lord-Deputy Sir William Fitz-Williams, amongft other Caufes, who made too ftrict Searches, and rigorous Demand of thofe Wrecks of Spanifh Goods, which were caft afhoare; and on that account went fo far as to commit fome Perfons to Prifon, as Favourers of the Spaniards.

The beginning of a Rebellion in Ireland.

Daniel Rogers, who was fome time ago fent into Denmark, to condole the Death of Frederick II. and to fettle the fame good Correfpondence with his Son and Succeffor, began his Negotiation with the Regents of the Realm, with thefe Propofals: 'That no Danes might be permitted to 'affift the Enemy againft the Queen of England. 'That no Arrefts of Ships might be allowed 'within the Streight of Denmark (call'd the 'Sound) for private Men's Faults. That the Ifland Fifhing-Trade, which was, by the ancient 'Treaty, to be renew'd by a frefh Grant, every 'feven Years, might not be ftopp'd or prevented 'on any new Defign or Pretence whatever. 'That the Englifh fhould pay no Cuftoms within 'the Sound, except on their Return from the 'Baltick, and that in the ufual Coin of Denmark. 'That the Owners of Ships fhould not fuffer a'ny Detriment, through the ill Dealings of the 'feveral Mafters and Pilots. That all Bales of 'Cloth might be free from any Impoft upon 'em, 'and that the Cuftom call'd Laft-gelt might be 'remitted to the Englifh.' But in refpect of the King's Minority, the Difpatch of this Bufinefs was deferr'd till another time; for the Danes were at prefent out of humour with the Englifh, for failing into Ruffia, not through the Sound, but by the Coafts of Norway, Finmark, Lapland, Scrickfinnia, and Biarmia. But Boris Theodorides who fucceeded Theodore Joannides in the Empire of Ruffia, who died about the beginning of this Year, did all he could to countenance and encourage the Englifh; and omitted no good Offices, which might ingratiate and recommend him to the Queen of England.

An Embaffy into Denmark.

Ruffian kind to the Englifh.

ELIZABETH,

Anno 1589.

Queen of ENGLAND.

BOOK IV.

The Two and Thirtieth Year of her Reign.

1589. Ann. 32.

THE Spaniards, after the unhappy and disgraceful Disappointment of their Expedition against England, to patch up the Reputation they had lost, and to keep the English from attempting a Descent on any Part of the Spanish Dominions, they took up a new Resolution of invading England by the way of Scotland: And in the Conduct of this Secret, the principal Agent employ'd by them was Robert Bruce, a Priest, with Chrichton and Hayes, both Jesuits, who found no Difficulty in bringing over to their sides the Earls of Huntly, Arrol, and Crawford, Men bigotted to the Romish Persuasion, as likewise Bothwel, the Son of John Prior of Coldingham, the natural Son of James the fifth King of Scots, a Man of unsteddy Principles, with a great many more. The Substance of the Plot was, That they should in the first place seize on the Person of the King, and then bring in a foreign Power to re-establish the Romish Religion, and invade England in pretended Revenge of the Queen of Scots Death. The Arguments used for summoning the Mob together, were of this sort: 'That the King was 'kept in Custody against his own Consent by 'the Lord-Chancellor Maitland, and the English 'Party: That the English, who had lately took off 'the King's Mother's Head in a very unwarrant-'able way, were at that very time levying For-'ces to destroy the Scotch Nobility: That on the 'other side, they took up Arms at the King's 'own Desire and Sollicitation, to set him free 'from his Jaylor, the Chancellor, and their Coun-'try from that Ruin that threaten'd it.' The King being one Day gone an Hunting, received the very same Day Messages, one upon the heels of another, That Bothwel, on the one hand, appear'd with several Troops raised from the Borders; and Huntly, on the other, with a very powerful Army from the North. Hereupon a Proclamation was issued out, to declare them Traitors; and the King's faithful Subjects were summoned in, all that were above Sixteen and under Sixty. This so frighted Bothwel, that his Gang forsook him, and himself slunk home as well as he could: But Huntly proceeded so far as to seize Glamis, the Captain of the King's Guard, between whom and himself there was a most inveterate profess'd Enmity.

Commotions in Scotland.

Queen Elizabeth, who judged the English equally concern'd with the Scots to quash this Attempt of the Spaniards, used all possible Arts with her Friends in Scotland that her Coin or good Sense could supply, to induce the King to put an end to these Disorders. He was very sensible of his Danger, and marched to encounter Huntly; who being arrived as far as the Bridge on the River Dee, with a potent Army, and hearing of the King's Approach, set Glamis at liberty, and retired to his own House called Strathbolgy, situated amongst the rocky Mountains; whither being closely pursued by the King, who endured the Fatigue of the March, the Want of Provisions, and the Inclemency of the Season, beyond what might be expected from so green an Age; he first offer'd to surrender himself, provided his Life and Estate might be secure, and not long after yielded on Discretion, when he found no Conditions were like to be offer'd him. The King, without hearing one Word of Apology, commanded him to Prison; but soon after order'd his Release; and to the great Commendation of his Clemency, was pleased to pardon both him and his Adherents, upon their humble Submission.

1589. Ann. 32.

Huntly taken.

The very same Month these Things were acting in Scotland against the Spanish Faction there, was Philip Howard, Earl of Arundel (who was, as I have said, sent to the Tower three Years before on suspicion of being too well inclin'd to Spain) arraign'd in Westminster-Hall, and tried by his Peers, before Henry Earl of Derby, who was created Lord-High-Steward of England on this particular Occasion.

The Persons summoned to attend this Trial, were these following Peers.

Arundel's Trial.

William Cecil Lord Burleigh, Lord-High-Treasurer of England.
William Lord Marquess of Winchester.
Edward Earl of Oxford, Lord-Great-Chamberlain of England.
Henry Earl of Kent.
Henry Earl of Sussex.
Henry Earl of Pembroke.
Edward Earl of Hertford.
Henry Earl of Lincoln.
The Lord Hunsdon.
The Lord Willoughby of Eresly.
The Lord Morley.
The Lord Cobham.
The Lord Grey.
The Lord Darcy of the North.

1589. Ann. 32.

The Lord Sands.
The Lord Wentworth.
The Lord Rich.
The Lord Willoughby of Parham.
The Lord North.
The Lord St. John of Bletnesho.
The Lord Buckhurst.
The Lord La-Ware. And
The Lord Norris.

Being order'd to hold up his Hand, he did so, and moreover used this Expression, Behold here a clean Hand, and an honest Heart! The Heads of his Impeachment were much the same with those mention'd before, Ann. 1586. viz. 'That he held a very strict Intimacy and Correspondence with Cardinal Allen, Parsons the Jesuit, and other Conspirators, who attempted the Ruin of their Prince and Country, by stirring up Foreigners and the Queen's natural Subjects to bring in Popery, to the total Destruction of both: That he had engaged by Letters convey'd by Weston, alias Burges, a Priest, to assist the said Cardinal in advancing the Catholick Cause, and to that purpose had design'd to withdraw privately out of the Kingdom: That he was privy to the Bull of Sixtus Quintus, which dethroned the Queen, and made over her Dominions to the Spaniard: That when he was a Prisoner in the Tower, he had caused Mass to be said for the happy Success of the Spanish Armada, and had himself composed a special Prayer on that Occasion.'

Heads of his Charge.

Being demanded to answer, Whether he was Guilty, or Not Guilty? he turned himself to the Court and Judges, and made these Challenges one after another, Whether such a Number of Articles might lawfully be put into one and the same Impeachment? They answer'd in the Affirmative. Then he demanded, Whether presumptive Arguments bore any Weight in an Indictment? He was answer'd, That he might except against them as far as he pleas'd. Another Demand was, Whether he could stand accus'd of those things charged to be Treason in the 13th of Queen Elizabeth, after the Time limited in the said Act? They then promised him, he should not be try'd upon any other Law or Act of High-Treason, but an ancient one of Edward III. In the last place, he demanded, If that were a fair Indictment, which fail'd grosly as to Circumstances both of Place and Time? The Answer was, That these things signified little, if the Matter of Fact were proved. After this, being ask'd a second time, Whether he were Guilty, or Not? he answer'd, Not Guilty, and submitted himself to God and his Peers; but desired them to spare his Memory, which was impair'd by his Imprisonment, and ill Health, and not to over-charge it with too much Variety.

Puckering, the Queen's Serjeant at Law, open'd the first Part of the Charge, viz. That Cardinal Allen having engag'd with the Jesuits and others against his Prince and Country, upon which account he was banish'd the Kingdom; yet he the said Earl had kept up a Correspondence with him by Letters, and had expresly written to him to advance the Catholick Interest, which by a fair and modest Construction, was a plain inviting of him to invade England. The Earl made Answer, That all he intended by it, was the Promotion of that Faith, by the Accession of new Proselytes. Popham, the Queen's Attorney-General, endeavour'd to prove, by the Confessions of Savage, Throckmorton, and Babington, that this could not possibly be understood of a free Conversion upon the Strength of Argument; but of a Publick Invasion by Force of Arms. Shuttleworth, a Serjeant at Law, made it appear out of the Form of the Proclamations put out against the Jesuits and Seminary Priests, on what Designs they were sent into England: That they were Traitors, he proved from the Earl's own Words; who, upon the hearing of Valenger's Cause in the Star-Chamber, in relation to a scandalous Libel of his, said publickly, That an hearty Papist could not but be as thorow a Traitor. But for all this, Men of this very Principle were among the Earl's greatest Intimates. 'Twas urged moreover, That he had espoused the Faith of the Romish Church, and became of Consequence a Subject to the Romish See; but this he flatly deny'd, and demanded that any Evidence might be produced to prove him a professed Catholick. He acknowledged indeed, that he had in some Instances made Burges his Confessor; whereupon it was debated, That none were admitted to the Sacraments of the Church of Rome, but such as were reconciled to her Doctrine and Worship; but he was admitted by Gratley, a Priest, and therefore a Papist before, at least in his Heart. This Popham labour'd to prove from his own Letters, and that he intended likewise to withdraw beyond Sea; That he was an absolute Creature of Cardinal Allen, and conform'd entirely to his Measures; for which he was guilty of High-Treason. He then produced Gratley's and Morgan's Letters to the Queen of Scots, and made from thence this Inference, That the Earl owed his Change in Religion more to Sourness and Spleen, than to Conscience and Conviction. Then was produced an Emblematical Piece found in the Earl's Cabinet, which had on one side an Hand shaking a Serpent into the Fire, with this Motto, If God be with us, who shall be against us? And on the other, a Lion Rampant, without Claws, and with this Inscription, Yet a Lion. He moreover added, That the Earl designing to quit the Kingdom, was persuaded by the Cardinal to alter his Purpose, as being a Person likely to do the Church of Rome more service by his Stay in England, than his Departure thence; That in a Letter to the Queen, the Earl had reflected severely on the Justice of the Laws, in reference to the Sentence of Death denounced against his Grand-Father and Father; That the Queen of Scots had recommended him to Babington, as the great Patron of the Catholick Interest; That Allen had owned that the aforesaid Bull was procured by the Applications of a Person of Figure in England; which could be no other than the Earl, because no one Nobleman besides, was so intimate with Allen as himself, and whom therefore Allen must needs know to be ill-affected to his Country, by what he had heard pass before in the Star-Chamber. Then were read also the Confessions of the Lord William, the Earl's Brother, with those of his Sister, the Lady Margaret, and his own Letters, when he had Thoughts of leaving the Kingdom. And this gave occasion to magnify the Queen's Clemency afresh, who would not suffer him (at that very time) to be examin'd on an Article of Treason, but barely on a Point of Contempt. To these Charges the Earl answer'd in the gross, 'That as for the Picture, 'twas a Trifle presented him by his Man: That indeed he had promised to assist the Cardinal in the Promotion of the Catholick Faith, but never at the Expence of his Prince and Country: That what he had written in relation to the Sentence of his Grand-Father and Father, was extant upon Record, and so any one might read it: That he was not at all concerned in what the Cardinal or the Queen of Scots might write about him, since he stood clear as to Fact: That it was impossible to restrain other Mens Pens: That he had indeed some Design of acting under the Prince of Parma, in the 1589. *Ann.*32.

'the Wars abroad, since the Rigour of the Laws 'against Catholicks made it not safe for him to 'stay at home: That the Attorney had managed 'the Letters and Confessions, at the same rate 'that Spiders do Flowers; that is, suck'd all the 'Poison out of them: but he, for his part, was 'able to extract out of them something more use-'ful, might he be permitted to see them.' Then were read Allen's Letters to the Queen of Scots, with those of the Bishop of Ross, about invading England, that very Year he design'd to quit it; and the Bull of Sixtus Quintus, and several Remarks made on Allen's Memorial to the English, printed at Antwerp the Year before. He was likewise charged with having assumed this Title, Philip Duke of Norfolk, which was found among his Papers; and it was Allen's Advice, that he should in some degree mend his Title. These things were brought against him as Convictions of Treason before his Imprisonment. Egerton, the Sollicitor-General, having summ'd up and repeated the Particulars of the Charge, proceeded upon a threefold Distinction of Time, viz. 'Be-'fore the Arrival of the Spanish Fleet; at the In-'stant of its coming; and after it fled: And 'that he had been guilty of Treason since his 'Confinement: Before the Fleet appeared, he 'had been guilty of Treason, in wishing it hap-'py Success; when it was arrived, in making a 'Form of Prayer suitable to his Wishes, and 'causing the Mass of the Holy Ghost to be said, 'and a Course of Devotions to be used for 24 'Hours together: And then when the Fleet was 'gone, in lamenting its Defeat with all the 'Marks of an extraordinary Sorrow; as if he 'had fix'd his last Hope, and best Confidence, in 'the Spanish Armada, which was fitted out with 'a Design to ruin his Prince and Country.' These Particulars were all made out against him by Sir Tho. Gerard Kt. Will. Shelley, condemn'd for Treason, Ann. 1586. Bennet, a Popish Priest, and some other Prisoners. He then mutter'd in a broken and imperfect kind of Tone, That the Prayers he made, and the Masses he perform'd, were in order to deprecate a Massacre he had heard was design'd against the Catholicks. Gerard's Evidence he roundly deny'd; and as he adjured him to declare nothing but the Truth, and represented before him the dreadful Solemnity of the last Day, he so terrified and scared the Evidence, that he hardly was able to speak one Word to the purpose. Bennet's Attestations he endeavour'd to invalidate, as being a Man of a tarnish'd Reputation, and who had contradicted himself in his Confessions. The rest he taxed as Persons impeach'd, and Prisoners, and Men likewise of a loose and profligate Character; who were far from deserving Credit, and who might be suspected to have the Liberty of using his Conversation with a Design to ensnare him in the Querks of the Law. Having received a Check for this, as too indecent and bold a Challenge upon the Evidence for the Queen, at the Solicitor's Motion, an ancient Law of Richard II. was read, whereby it was declared, That the Crown of England was under the Command of none but God alone, and that the Bishop of Rome had no manner of Authority over it. It now growing towards Night, and nothing being produced farther against him, the Earl was order'd to withdraw: He threw himself wholly upon the Judgment of his Peers, protesting his Obedience to the Queen, and heartily praying they might come to such an Issue, as might be most for the Glory of God, the Safety of the Queen, and the Integrity of their own Honour and Conscience. They then went aside, and held a Debate, which lasted an Hour, and in Points of Law they consulted the Opinion of the Judges and Serjeants. Being returned to their Seats, the Clerk of the Crown demanded of them, Whether the Earl were Guilty or Not? At which every one of 'em, putting his Hand to his Breast, as the Custom was, declared upon his Honour and Conscience, that he was Guilty. Then being asked if he had any thing farther to say, why Sentence of Death should not pass upon him? he only said the same Words which his Father had done before him, in the same Place, God's Will be done. Sentence being pronounced, he desired leave to speak with his Wife, and that he might see his young Son, who was born since his Confinement; that he might have the Liberty to speak with his Stewards, who had the Accounts of his Estate, and that his Debts might be discharged. He likewise humbly desired the Queen would take his young Son into her Favour and Patronage. Then the Lord-Steward brake his Staff, the Badge of his Place; and the Earl was carry'd back to the Tower, the Ax being carry'd before him, with the Edge towards him. There were a great many that most heartily lamented the untimely Fall of this young Nobleman, (for he was not above 33 Years of Age at the most) and as many on the other side were ready to cry up the Queen's Wisdom and Caution, who by this Example had struck a kind of Terror into the more powerful Part of the Romish Faction. The Queen after all gave him his Life, and was well enough satisfy'd in having lessen'd the Power of so considerable a Man, and one who was so great a Bulwark of the Catholick Cause.

1589. *Ann.*32.

Earl of Arundel condemn'd.

His Life is saved.

When she had shewn this Example of Terrour at home, to make herself equally feared abroad, and pursue the Victory which Providence had given her over the Spaniards; the Queen conceiving it to be both more safe and honourable to attack the Enemy, than to stand an Assault from them, suffer'd a Fleet to put to Sea, upon an Expedition against Spain. This Sir John Norris and Sir Francis Drake did generously and frankly undertake, at their own and some other private Mens Charge, and with very little Expence to the Queen's Purse, except the fitting out of a few Men of War; for indeed they were fully convinced that the Power of Spain lay rather in common Fancy and Opinion, than in any real Strength they were Masters of. The Agreement between them was this, That whatever Prizes they took, should be shared among 'em by a fair and equal Dividend. But it happen'd that there came not in so many to this Expedition, as was expected. The States added some Ships, altho' they were at present displeased with the English, because Wingfield, Governour of Gertruydenburgh, and the English Garrison of that Place, had betray'd the Town to the Spaniard. The Fleet was reckon'd to consist of 11000 Soldiers, and 1500 Sailors. Don Antonio, the Bastard, Prior of Crato, with a few Portuguese, join'd them; for he, it seems, laying Claim to the Crown of Spain, by a popular Election, (for by the Laws of that Kingdom Bastards are not excluded) had made the English mighty Promises, hoping, we may suppose, to recover the Kingdom, by the Help of these Forces, the Revolt of the Portuguese from the Spaniard, and the Assistance of Muley Hamet, King of Morocco.

An Expedition into Spain:

On what Terms, and at whose Expence.

In April they sail'd from Plimouth, and arrived five Days after at the Groyne in Gallicia (call'd by the Ancients Flavia Brigantum) without any Opposition whatever. In their Passage towards the lower Town they received some Damage by several Shot, which plaid on them from an huge Vessel and two Gallies in the Harbour; till they were obliged to quit their Station, through the warm Groyne attack'd.

1589. Ann. 32. warm Salutes of some great Pieces planted on the Shore. The Day following, they made an Assault on the lower Town in three Places at the same time, Unton and Brett assisting the Attack from the Land with 300 Men; and Sir Richard Wingfield and Sampson with 500 on the other side. They were at first roughly received by the Enemy, and once or twice beat from the Walls, as they attempted to scale them; but the other Forces made their way into the Town in the mean time, with little or no Loss. The Spaniards presently threw down their Arms, and got away, by the nearest and best known Avenues, to the Upper Town. They that were in the great Ship made a shift to get ashore, having first set her on fire: she burnt two Days together, and most of her Guns being too full charged, burst in pieces with a most frightful Noise. The Ammunition and Provision lodged there for a new Expedition against England, were carried on board the English Ships.

Higher Town assaulted in vain.

From thence they marched to the Upper Town, which Sir John Norris observing to be situated on a Rock, not capable of mining, except in one Place; he ordered a Mine to be dug there, and on the other side made a Breach in the Walls with his great Cannon, resolving to storm it on both sides at once: But it proved fruitless, by reason the fire broke out of the Mine on the outside of the Walls. The Pioneers then carried on the Mine farther under the Walls; and setting fire to the Powder, blew up one Part of the Bulwark, which falling some time before the other Part sunk, maim'd several of the English with the Fall. The rest, scared by this unexpected Accident, forsook their Commanders; whilst on the other side, they who made the Attack at the Breach, wanting a secure Footing, because the Rubbish gave way under them, were obliged to retire with a considerable Loss.

Spaniards come to its Relief.

About this time Norris received a most certain Intelligence, that the Conde di Andrada had got some Forces together at the Bridge of Burges, and that the Conde Altimira was upon his March with some Recruits; and that they intended to besiege the English in the Lower Town, or to cut off their Retreat to their Ships: He, supposing it the best way to prevent them, march'd against them with ten Companies. The Van was commanded by Edward Norris and William Sidney, the main Body by Norris himself, with Medkerck a Dutchman; and the Rear by Henry Norris, Huntley and Brett. The Spaniards attack'd 'em on this side the Bridge; but being beaten back by the Courage of the English, they quitted their Lines, and left the English a free and easy Passage over the River; who pursued them so hotly, that they fled in the utmost Confusion, and were slain three Miles together. After this the English burnt and plunder'd the Villages; and in two Days return'd again to their Ships, without any Disturbance.

Are beat.

Earl of Essex joins the English.

As they sail'd for Portugal, the Wind happening to be in their Teeth, Robert Earl of Essex fell in with them. He was a young Gentleman, who partly from a Thirst of Glory, partly out of Hatred to the Spaniards, and Pity to Don Antonio, had quitted the Pleasures of a Court, to try his Fortune at Sea, without the Queen's Leave or Approbation, and had look'd out for the Fleet a long time. He could never hope to gain the Queen's Consent to this Expedition; because she was mighty averse from suffering any Persons of the first Quality to run so great an Hazard: However, he flatter'd himself with the Honour of commanding in chief, by reason several of the Colonels and Captains had been obliged to his Brother for their Preferment. The second Day after, the Sea being very rough, they arrived at Penicha, a Town of Portugal, and became Masters of it, with the Loss of a few Men only, who were drown'd as they were getting ashore; and the Inhabitants flying at the same time, the Castle surrender'd to Don Antonio. From hence all the Foot, under the Command of Sir John Norris, march'd as fast as they could by Land to Lisbon, which lay about sixty Miles from thence; and Drake promised to follow with the Fleet up the River Tayo. In their Passage they call'd a Council of War at Torres Vedras, and resolv'd to encamp on the East-side of the City, to prevent the Arrival of any Succours from Spain, and to facilitate the Portuguese's Access to their King. After six Days March, they came to the Western Suburbs of Lisbon, call'd St. Katharine's, without the least Opposition; where they made some stay, contrary to their former Resolutions, and cast their Eyes on none but a few unarm'd People, who saluted them ever and anon with a God save King Antonio! For Albert of Austria, their Governour, had before this totally disarm'd the Portuguese. The next Day, as the English, who were sick and fatigued with their long March, were giving themselves some Ease and Refreshment, the Spanish Garison made a Sally, and Brett, with his Party, sustain'd the Brunt with a great deal of Bravery; till some of the English and Portuguese coming in to his Relief, drove them back into the City, Essex himself following them to the very Gates: Yet Brett, Carsey, and Carr, brave Commanders, and some common Soldiers, were slain. When they had been here two Days, without any Hope of the Defection of the Portuguese, as Don Antonio had vainly promised himself, and boasted to others; and the King of Morocco failing, at the same time, to send them the Supplies he had promised; whereas on the other side, Recruits came in from the Eastern Parts, the Sickness raged more and more in the Army, Provision and Powder grew scarce, and Drake fail'd to supply 'em with Cannon for Battery; the English mov'd off, and took their March towards Cascais, taking away nothing out of the Suburbs, which were well stock'd with foreign Wares; lest they should by that means alienate the Affections of the Portuguese. As they retir'd to this small Town, lying on the Mouth of the Tayo, the Spaniards pursued them with a very slow Pace, and did not so much as cut off any of their Rear. Drake, who in the mean time had taken Cascais, was very much blamed, the English charging their Disappointment upon his Cowardice entirely, for that he did not follow with the Fleet, according to his Promise. He excused it from the Impossibility of the thing, there being no Passage thro' the Channel of Alcacava, by reason of the Shoals and Sands; and had he gone directly by the Port of St. Julian's, which was defended with 50 Pieces of Cannon, and had a great many Gallies riding in it, with their Heads towards him, he had then exposed the Fleet to a most palpable Hazard; nor could they have hoped for any thing but Destruction, should the Enemies Ships have been brought down upon him in the mean time as he lay at the Mouth of the Tayo. And had the Fleet miscarry'd by this Conduct, he made it appear, that the Army too must have undergone the same Fate. The Castle of Cascais was now surrender'd on Articles, and a great part of it blown up; and to make themselves some amends for their Expence, the English seized about sixty Hulks belonging to the Hans-Towns of Germany, laden with Wheat, and all manner of Naval Stores, to equip out a new Fleet against England. These Vessels had sailed round by the Orcades, the Hebrides, and the Coast of Ireland, and made a tedious and dangerous Voyage, to escape falling into the English Lisbon besieged.

English withdraw their Forces.

Castle of Cascais taken.

1589. Ann. 32. English Hand; notwithstanding the Queen had given Warning before, by her Royal Letters, that the Hans-Towns should carry no warlike Provisions into Spain or Portugal, on pain of losing their Ships and Cargo. The English set sail from thence (Don Antonio not being able to detain them longer) and burnt Vigo, a Town on the Coasts, quite deserted by its Inhabitants. Having pillaged the Country all about, they return'd into England with 150 Pieces of great Ordnance, and a very rich Booty; Part of which was divided among the Seamen, who began to mutiny, but could not satisfy them. Most Men were of Opinion, that the English hereby answer'd all Points both of Revenge and Honour, having in so short a Compass of Time taken one Town by Storm, made a glorious Assault upon another, driven before them a very potent Army, landed their Forces in four several Places, march'd seven days together in Order of Battle, and with Colours flying, through the Enemies Country, attack'd a strong and flourishing City with a small Handful of Men, and lodg'd for 3 Nights in the Suburbs of it. Beside that, they beat the Enemy back to the very Gates, after they had made a Sally; took two Castles lying on the Sea, and spoil'd the Enemy of all their Stores and Ammunition. However there were others, who thought all this was no manner of Equivalent for the Damages sustain'd in this Enterprize; the Loss of Soldiers and Seamen, by Sickness alone, amounting to 6000. But most certain it is, that England was so far a Gainer by this Expedition, as from that time to apprehend no Incursions from Spain, but rather to grow more warm and animated against that Country. Whether this Sickness seiz'd the English, through their immoderate Use of the Wine and Fruit of the Country, or the Intemperance of the Climate, or all together, has occasion'd various Disputes: And it has been observ'd, that hitherto all the Expeditions made into Spain by Land, have prov'd fatal to the English: Witness that of John of Gaunt D. of Lancaster, about the Year 1386; wherein perish'd 10000 out of 20000: As likewise that of the Marquess of Dorset, in the Year 1512, in which there died 1000 out of 10000, in a very short time, of a pestilential Disease; and that in the hithermost Parts of Spain. But the learned have made this Remark, that Armies marching from South to North, grow more hardy, according as the inward Heat is either evaporated or compress'd by the outward Air, so that they have justify'd the Observation of Vitruvius, viz. That they which are transplanted from cold Countries to hot, cannot bear the Change; but are in some measure melted down from their Firmness and Strength; whereas those that remove from warm Countries Northward, are so far from impairing their Health by this Alteration, that they grow more strong and hardy.

The Hanse-Towns began now to vend their Complaints not without some menacing Resentments for the Seizure of their Hulks, which they took to be an Infringment of their ancient Privileges. The Queen's answer was, 'That she had given them a Caution, not to assist the Enemies of England with any manner of warlike Provisions; and that since they had transported such Provisions, she had lawfully intercepted 'em, and was oblig'd to do as she did, unless she would connive at the Ruin of herself and People: That Privileges founded on private Laws only, are neither to be pleaded nor granted in bar to the publick Safety, which is the supreme Law. Nay, That in the Privilege granted by King Edward III. to the Hanse-Towns, it was expresly provided, That they should not import any Commodities into the Dominions of any of the profess'd Enemies of England. That their Goods had many times been stopt and arrested, for supplying the French with Provisions during the War between France and England: Nor had this been done by the English only, but (on the very same grounds) by Charles V. the Kings of Sweden, Denmark, Poland, and not long since by the Prince of Orange; and all this without any violation of the Laws of Nations. That a Neutrality is so to be manag'd, that in lending Assistance to one side, the other shall receive no Damage. That it became not private Cities and Towns to threaten crown'd Heads; and that for her own part, she fear'd not the Menaces of the most potent Princes, much less of particular Cities; and as for the just Rights and Privileges belonging to States that were Neighbours, she would take care to observe them, punctually with all the World.'

Answer to the Hans-Towns.

Nor did she fail in this Particular; for she not only assisted the King of Navarre, when he was intangl'd in a dangerous and difficult War, with Money and other military Provisions, but sent over Sir Thomas Bodley to support or encourage the French King, when his Affairs seem'd to be in a very desperate Condition. For (if we may be allow'd to look a little back in a small but necessary Digression) when the Duke of Anjou the King's Brother died without Issue, at the same time the King had no Children, nor was he likely to have any, so that the Kingdom descended of course to the King of Navarre, and after him to the Prince of Conde, both of 'em profess'd Protestants.

Q. assists the K. of Navarre.

Hereupon the Popish Princes of France, with the privity of the Pope and the King of Spain, entred into a private and dangerous Treaty, call'd The Holy League; wherein, under pretence of asserting the Catholick Cause, they attempted to ruin the King, by raising in the Peoples Minds a Jealousy and Disaffection towards him through their evil Insinuations; as also to crush the Reform'd Religion, by cutting off the Succession of the lawful Heir. The Parties concern'd in this Conspiracy took all of 'em an Oath, That they would suffer no Man to be King of France, who ever had, or should hereafter profess any other than the Catholick Religion: Nor would they accept of any, who had been educated in any other Persuasion, tho' he should abjure it, lest upon his accession to the Throne, he should overthrow the old Religion, &c. That all this tended to the Exclusion of Navarre and his Cousin Conde, no Man made the least doubt. However, this League began to be made more publick, and to gather Ground in all Parts of the Kingdom, making its way by these gradual Advances. The Duke of Guise, the Head of this Faction, was wonderfully cry'd up and caress'd by the common People and Ecclesiasticks, who rated him above the King himself, as the great Bulwark of Popery, and the chief Thorn in the Side of the Protestants; and all this because he stoutly defended Poictiers against the Protestants in his youthful Days, routed the German-Horse which Alençon had summon'd in as Recruits, and but a little before put to flight a numerous Army of the German-Horse under the Command of the Baron Dohna.

The Duke, when he came to Paris, rais'd such a Tumult there, that the King himself was forced to leave the City, to summon a Convention at Blois; to subscribe to this Association for extirpating all Protestants by an Edict of July, and to proclaim the Duke of Guise Grand Commander of the French Militia; in confirmation of which, and in token of mutual Sincerity, they receiv'd receiv'd the Holy Communion together. However 'twas not long before he cauſed him to be baſely ſtabb'd within the Court-Walls, and his Brother the Cardinal to be ſtrangl'd ſome time after! For in truth he ſtood in fear of him, as a Creature whom he had render'd Formidable, by advancing him to ſuch an Height, that the Laws could not reach him, and he ſuſpected moreover that his Ambition would carry him beyond what was juſt and reaſonable, if he were not already perſuaded that the Duke had laid Snares for his Life, and that there was no other way left to ſecure his Royal Perſon and Prerogative, but by this violent Remedy. The Duke of Guiſe's Son, the Cardinal of Bourbon, and as many of the Conſpirators as he could apprehend, were committed to Priſon. Whereupon there aroſe ſuch mighty Diſorders through all France, that like a Body in Convulſions, that fair and flouriſhing Kingdom was ready to break aſunder. For the People, having now got above the Magiſtrates, ranſack'd the King's Palace at Paris; and the ſeveral Cities of the Nation were differently inclin'd to a Democracy, Ariſtocracy, or Oligarchy; but moſt of 'em declar'd downright againſt Monarchy.

1589. Ann. 32.

Duke of Guiſe ſtabb'd.

Others impriſon'd.

Confuſion in France.

The Conſpirators ſet up a new Synod, and order'd a new Seal for the diſpatch and confirmation of Buſineſs, aſſum'd a kind of Regal Authority, poſſeſs'd themſelves of the Forts and Caſtles, nay of intire Provinces, ſeiz'd on the Crown-Revenues, and invited the Spaniards out of the Netherlands to come in to their Aſſiſtance. In the mean time four of the principal Parliaments of France approv'd of what was done, and the Eccleſiaſticks ſerv'd for Trumpeters of Rebellion againſt their Prince: So that the King was forc'd to fly to the Proteſtants for Relief, whom he had not long ſince incens'd and provok'd. But the Cabal eaſily broke theſe meaſures, and by a moſt notorious Act of Villany, got him murder'd by the Hands of James Clement a Monk. The King of Navarre, whom the King had declar'd at his death his right and lawful Succeſſor, was excluded the Throne by Proclamation, as an Heretick profeſs'd, and one that brought an hoſtile Army of Foreigners into the Kingdom. However, agree they could not whom they ſhould have for their King. Charles Duke of Mayne, Brother to the late Duke of Guiſe, made ſome Pretenſions to the Crown for the great and eminent Services perform'd by him againſt the Proteſtants: And for that the chief Cities had tender'd him their Homage and Allegiance. Beſides, the Cardinal of Bourbon was under Confinement: who, being an infirm Man, and in Orders, could never make himſelf acceptable to ſo warlike a Nation, as France was; beſides, ſhould they make him King, they would Ipſo facto eſtabliſh the Title of the Houſe of Bourbon, and renew the antiquated Claim of the Uncle againſt the Nephew. Others were of opinion, that the Duke of Lorain, or one of his Children, ought to be advanced to the Throne, which would be but the reſtoring of a Family to its juſt Right, which had been heretofore wrongfully depriv'd of the Crown of France by Hugh Capet. 'Twas thought too, that the King of Spain would countenance the Riſe of this Houſe, and readily beſtow his Daughter on any Branch hereof, that ſhould be elected to the Kingdom. Others were ready to nominate the Duke of Savoy, who was Son to the French King's Daughter, and Son-in-law to the King of Spain, beſides a valiant Prince, and a Neighbour. Nor were there ſome wanting, who were for complimenting the King of Spain with the Government, as indeed the moſt conſiderable Prince of all. However, the far greater part, out of a pretence of Juſtice and ſeeming Regard at leaſt to the Merits of the Cauſe, inclin'd to the Cardinal of Bourbon, who was by one degree nearer of Kin to the murder'd King, than his Nephew of Navarre, and one who had been a great Sufferer for the Catholick Cauſe, whom it was not difficult, they thought, to free from his Confinement, and he might then prove an happy Inſtrument of uniting the Catholicks, to the total Suppreſſion of the Proteſtants, and that, without being beholden to any foreign Aid or Aſſiſtance whatever. To this opinion they all ſubſcrib'd, chiefly at the Inſtigation of Mendoza the Spaniſh Ambaſſador; who thought that by this means his Maſter the King of Spain might have the eaſier acceſs to the Throne of France. Thus was the Cardinal of Bourbon proclaim'd King of France, and Monies ſtampt with his Effigies, and the Title of Charles X. The Duke de Mayne was likewiſe proclaim'd Lieutenant-General of the Crown of France, who preſently levied what Forces he could from all Parts, and ſet up his Standard againſt Navarre, (who was alſo, and on good Grounds, declar'd King by his Party, and lay now at Diep, a Sea-Port of Normandy) aſſuredly promiſing himſelf, that he ſhould either take him Priſoner, or elſe force him to quit France.

French K. murder'd.

Differ about the choice of a King.

1589. Ann. 32.

The Cardinal of Bourbon proclaim'd King.

Navarre in danger.

The King of Navarre being reduc'd to this Extremity, encamp'd with his Forces near the Town, and diſpatch'd into England Monſieur Beavoir de Noclé, and ſoon after him Buby and Buzenvall, to requeſt ſome Succours from the Queen, and to deſire a League Offenſive and Defenſive. The Queen, that ſhe might not be wanting to a Prince of the ſame Perſuaſion, and ſo conſiderable for his Bravery, in ſo tickliſh and critical a Juncture; and fearing likewiſe the Revolt of the Germans and Switzers, that took his Pay, ſent him a preſent Supply of 22000 Pounds in Engliſh Gold, (a Sum which he profeſs'd he had never ſeen together ever before) and furniſh'd him alſo with Arms and 4000 Men under the Command of Peregrine Lord Willoughby, who had Commanded in the Low-Countries after Leiceſter's remove, with great Applauſe and Commendation. She made Sir Thomas Wilford afterwards Marſhal, and Sir John Boroughs, Sir Thomas Drury, and Sir Thomas Baskervill, Knights, Colonels, and readily gave 'em a Month's Pay beforehand. Hereupon the Conſpirators, who had a little before receiv'd an unexpected Defeat, and were put to flight by the King in the Battel of Arques, being now quite out of Heart and Hopes, got away the very day before the Engliſh arriv'd. The King being ſtrengthen'd by theſe Supplies, march'd directly towards Paris. The Engliſh and Switzers being order'd to Aſſault that Part of the Town which lies between St. Marcellus's Gate and the Sein, brake through the Trenches, and gain'd the Outworks, and advanc'd as far as St. Victor's Gate, which they were very near making themſelves Maſters of: But the King not believing it poſſible to win ſo great a City with ſo ſmall a Force, and being not willing to expoſe it to the Inſolence of the Soldiers, ſince he had Hopes it would declare for him at the long run; and the D. de Main, not being by any Arts to be drawn out to venture a Battel, the Siege was broke up, and the Army retir'd. From thence they march'd to Eſtampes, and Willoughby was left behind with the Engliſh to block up the Paſſage of the oppoſite Party, till the Town and Caſtle were ſurrender'd to him. After this Vendoſme was taken by Storm, and the whole County of that Name which had been formerly (to mention it by the by) confer'd by way of Grant on Robert Willoughby

Q. Eliz. aſſiſts him.

The Service of the Engliſh.

by

1589. Ann. 32.

by Governor of Normandy, for his great and fignal Services, by Henry V. At this time likewife the Englifh were very ferviceable to the King in the Reduction of Mans, Alenzon, Falais, Luxon, and Honfleur; when after the Fatigue of a long Winter's Expedition, and a March of about 500 Miles, they were disbanded with great Commendations for their good Service; and all that were left of them, return'd home to England. There died by Sicknefs Hunnings and Stubs, who (as I faid before) loft his right Hand for writing a Book againft the Duke of Anjou's Marriage with the Queen, but was very much lamented after his death. Sir William Drury, a very fine Gentleman, was kill'd in a Duel by Sir John Boroughs, on this occafion; That being Knight of the Garter, he claim'd Precedency of Boroughs, who was the younger Son of a Baron, contrary to the Order of Heraldry obferv'd amongft the Nobility of England.

They return.

The Queen was concern'd at the difcharging the Englifh, and fo was the King too, when both of 'em came to be certainly inform'd, that the King of Spain had private Aims upon the Crown of France. For, it feems, he had made a Propofal in the Convention of the Leaguers, by the Commendator Morea John de Taxis, That in confideration of the great Expence he had been at in relieving them with fuch vaft Recruits and Supplies, he might be proclaim'd the Protector of the Catholicks in France, with the fame Authority which he holds in Naples and Sicily, to confer by Proxy what Offices he fhould think fit, both Civil and Spiritual, all over France, which the Pope's Nuncio, Cardinal Cajetan, earneftly preffing at the fame time, it wrought a great many Frenchmen, otherwife ftanch and true to the Catholick Intereft, into a Difaffection and Diflike of thefe Proceedings.

Q. Eliz. recommends a Match to the King of Scots.

As Queen Elizabeth defir'd nothing more than to fettle Navarre in the Throne of France; fo had fhe of late a mighty inclination to advance a Match between his Sifter, the Lady Katharine, and the King of Scots: For indeed both thefe things appear'd highly requifite, in order to baffle the Attempts of the Papifts againft the Proteftants. But things did not anfwer her Expectation; for that Lady was a little advanc'd in Years, and had but a fmall Portion, which the King her Brother, being drain'd by the Wars, was not like to increafe: And whereas formerly the King of Scots had frequently confulted with Queen Elizabeth about the choice of a Wife, and fhe had appear'd loofe and remifs in the matter, the Scots began to fufpect, and give out publickly, That the Englifh were jealous of the Honour as well as the Off-fpring of their Prince, for fear he fhould avenge the Death of his Mother; as well as that they wanted the Opportunity of excluding him from the Succeffion of England. The Queen, as foon as fhe heard this, advis'd the King in the firft place to choofe a Wife agreeable to himfelf, and not altogether unacceptable to his People, and fuch a one as might confent to the holding a good Correfpondence with England, without bringing him under terms of Sufpicion.

He marries Ann of Denmark.

The King, having above a Year before placed his Affections on Ann the Daughter of Frederick II. King of Denmark, (whom Queen Elizabeth liked extremely well) the Marriage was confummated by Proxy, and the Royal Solemnities perform'd this Year in Auguft, through the happy Mediation of the Earl-Marfhal, in a fet and particular Form ufed on thefe Occafions. But as fhe was on her Voyage to Scotland, fhe was driven back by difmal Storms into Norway, before fhe had got half over; and her Fleet fo miferably beaten and fhatter'd with the Weather, that 'twas not in a Condition to put to Sea again. The King therefore, after having firft confulted Queen Elizabeth, who had fent over feveral valuable Prefents towards the more fplendid Celebration of the Marriage, went himfelf over to Norway in October, which was a very cold Seafon, on purpofe to confummate the Marriage in Perfon within the Year, as the States of the Kingdom had refolv'd, and the King oblig'd himfelf by Oath. This he happily effected, and ftaid in that Country till the May following, having not met with a fit Opportunity to return fooner.

He goes to Norway.

There were fome who were fo wife as to attribute thefe Storms to the power of Magick and Enchantments, becaufe 'twas obferv'd the Winds were more furious and bluftring, the Waters higher and more enrag'd, and the Gufts fhorter and more frequent, than what are generally produc'd by natural Caufes. And becaufe, as they thought, the Dæmons, who are petty Princes of the Air, have a more uncontrolable Range in thefe Northern Countries, which are rude and heathenifh, than any where elfe. And to corroborate this Opinion, there were certain Witches and Necromancers apprehended in Scotland, who publickly confefs'd that they had rais'd thofe Storms on purpofe to keep off the Queen from the Coafts of Scotland; and that Bothwel had likewife tranfacted with them about murdering the King. This being made a capital Crime in Scotland by a Law of Queen Mary, he was hereupon imprifon'd: But in a little time he got loofe from his Confinement, and gave the rife to new Troubles in Scotland.

Bothwel caft into Prifon.

This Year died in England, Frances Countefs of Suffex, Widow of Thomas Earl of Suffex, and Sifter to Sir Henry Sidney, an excellent Lady, and whofe Memory is defervedly facred, as fhe was the Foundrefs of Sidney-Suffex-College in Cambridge, wherein fhe follow'd the Copy of Sir Walter Mildmay, who about the fame time exchanged this Life for a better. He was a Perfon of fingular both Piety and Prudence, who acted all the Parts of a good Man and a faithful Subject, and had been made by King Henry VIII, Surveyor of the Court of Augmentations, and chofen Privy-Councellor to Queen Elizabeth, and Chancellor and Under-Treafurer of her Exchequer. For the promotion of Piety and good Letters, he built Emanuel-College in Cambridge, An. 1584; in which are maintain'd a Mafter and 62 Students. He was fucceeded by Sir John Fortefcue, a very worthy Gentleman, and a great Mafter of the Latin and Greek, who was for a confiderable time Preceptor to the Q. in her Studies, and Mafter of her Wardrobe. About this time likewife died Will. Somerfet, Earl of Worcefter, in a good old Age. He was Son to Henry and Grandfon to Charles, and was fucceeded by his only Son Edward, whom God had blefs'd with fo fruitful an Iffue, that he lately faw more Children of both Sexes from his own Loins, than all the Earls of England befides. Nor was it long before thefe following Perfons paid their Debt to their common Mother, viz. John Lord Stourton, the eldeft Son of Charles (whom Queen Mary punifh'd for Example's fake, on account of a Murder committed by him) by the Lady Ann Stanley, the Daughter of Edward Earl of Derby, who was fucceeded by his Brother Edward. Alfo Henry Lord Compton, a Perfon of a fine Wit and folid Judgment, who left his Eftate and Title to William his Son by Frances Haftings, the Daughter of Francis Earl of Huntington. At Bruxels died alfo Thomas Lord Paget; who being clofely link'd to the Interefts of Mary Queen of Scots, and being fufpected on that account, retir'd out of England, as I faid, An. 1585, and left behind him only one Son, viz. William, whom

The death of the Countefs of Suffex.

Mildmay.

The E. of Worcefter.

Stourton.

Compton.

Paget.

1589. Ann. 32.

The death of Lawrence Humfreys.

he had by Nazareth Newton; his Death however prov'd a sad and universal Loss to the Commonwealth of Learning. In the last place, Dr. Lawrence Humfrey quitted this troublesome Stage; an Ox-ford-man and Doctor of Divinity; who, in Queen Mary's Reign, liv'd as an Exile in Germany; where he translated Origen de Recta Fide and Philo de Nobilitate out of the Greek Tongue, and wrote likewise three Books of Nobility, which he stil'd Optimates. At his return, he was made President of Magdalen-College in Oxford, where he was educated; and also the Queen's Professor of Divinity; where, by his Lectures for several Years, his Sermons and Writings, he did the Church considerable Service, and was justly looked on as a Person of Merit. However his highest Station in the Church was the Deanery of Winchester; perhaps because he was not altogether Conformable to the Church of England in some Points of Indifference.

1590.

The Three and Thirtieth Year of her Reign.

Q. Eliz. fortifies some Port Towns.

Queen Elizabeth, who always paid the first regard to Peace in all her Deliberations, tho' not so neither, as to be unconcern'd about the necessary Provisions for War; that she might not be surpriz'd by the Spaniard, levied fresh Forces in the beginning of the Spring, both in England, and in the South of Ireland. Here she fortified Dunganon at the Mouth of the Suire, and Milford-Haven in Wales, with new Ramparts: Towards the repair of her Navy she appointed a yearly Sum of 8970 Pounds Sterling: And tho' in the Year 1587, she had lent by Sir Horatio Pallavicini, towards raising an Army in Germany, for the King of Navarre's Service, under the Command of the Baron Dohna, 101560 French Crowns, and the very last Year 71165 more, on Security given by Beavoir, Bubi and Buzenval, and had likewise consum'd 20000 in sending over the Recruits under the Lord Willoughby: Nevertheless, upon Security offer'd by the Viscount Turenne, she advanced in the first place 33333 Crowns more, for levying Forces in Germany under the Command of the Prince of Anhalt, and afterwards the same Sum on the Credit of Beavoir and Incarvil: And besides all this, she paid every two Months, to the Garrisons in Flushing and the Bril, 125000 Florins, and 26000 more to three thousand Horse and Foot, which serv'd in the Netherlands. She moreover furnish'd out several Ships to all Parts; was at vast Expences in opposing the Attempts of the Pope and the King of Spain in Scotland, and discharg'd all the Arrears she owed her Subjects, beyond Expectation; insomuch that many wonder'd whence she procur'd so much Money to answer all Emergencies, considering she ran not in Debt, (as most other Princes do) and was in a Capacity to support herself and Kingdom without any foreign Assistances, which was a thing that could not be said of any of the Princes that were her Neighbours.

Furnishes the French King with Money.

Her Frugality.

But the truth is, she was provident and frugal to a great degree, and scarce spent any thing, but in the necessary Support of her Royal Character, the Defence of her Kingdom, or the Relief of her Neighbours. Besides, the Lord-Treasurer Burleigh narrowly inspected the Officers of her Customs; through the Avarice of whom either the Queen's Cash had been impair'd, or her Dues lost for want of demanding. But this Defect was mended, after the Queen, being inform'd by one Caermarden, a subtle and prying Fellow, of the great Abuses of the Custom-House-Officers, was pleas'd to order Sir Thomas Smith, the Farmer of the Customs, who held them at 14000 of English Money per Annum, to pay from thenceforward 42000 Pounds, and to advance a considerable Sum besides for having enjoy'd so advantagious a Bargain for several Years, and after that farther raised the Agreement to 50000 Pounds a Year. This the Lord-Treasurer, Leicester and Walsingham oppos'd all they could, and order'd the Gentlemen of the Bed-Chamber not to give admission to Caermarden; nay they went so far as to dispute the matter with the Queen, alledging, That it would be an open Disparagement to herself and Council, to listen to the Insinuations of such a petty Informer. But she answer'd, 'That it was the 'Duty of a Prince to manage things equally be'tween Persons of all Ranks; that such as ac'cus'd Magistrates, or other publick Ministers, 'without producing good Proofs to back their 'Charge, were punishable; whereas such as 'brought true Informations deserv'd Encou'ragement: That the meanest were her Subjects 'as well as the biggest; and that she resolv'd ne'ver to shut her Ears against them, nor to en'dure that the Farmers of the Customs should 'suck, like Horse-leeches, till they burst again 'with the Blood of the Commonwealth; which 'running so fast out of the Treasury, must needs 'bring it into a fatal Consumption: On the o'ther side, she would never suffer her Exche'quer to swell and thrive upon the Spoils of the 'Poor.' And to say truth, the Queen ever abhor'd all Acts of Extortion, and Demands of rigorous Taxes and Contributions; a thing which other Princes before her had Arts to palliate under the softer terms of the Peoples Bounty and Liberal Grant, &c. The laying of the Poll-Tax, propounded first in the Reign of Edward VI, she would never suffer to be so much as mention'd. Besides, the People were always cheerful in paying their Subsidies; and tho' the Assessment now in use seem'd to be somewhat more burdensom than in old Times, yet was it manag'd with all the Candor imaginable, and no rigorous Exactions made; insomuch, that Taxes were then a kind of free Contributions, and always laid beneath the Estimation of the Government; nay the Queen's method was to refer it to her Parliament so to order it, that the Rich might bear the greater share of the Burden, and the Poor be eas'd; which had been done before in the Reign of Richard II. But it was now order'd otherwise: For, upon a fair Computation, it appear'd, that the Taxes would amount but to an inconsiderable Sum, should Men of narrow Estates, which make by far the greater number, and whom we call Pound-Men, pay any thing short of what they used to do.

1590. Ann. 33.

She advances the Farm of her Customs.

Favourable in demanding Taxes.

Relieves the States in the Low-Countries.

Now that the Queen might preserve the better Correspondence with her Neighbours abroad, she refus'd to take Groeningen under her Protection, (which was a rich City of Frizeland, that refus'd both to submit to the Spanish Yoke, and to bear that of the States) for fear of giving the States any disgust. And tho' the Zelanders had disoblig'd her, in casting themselves upon the French King's Protection, without the knowledge and consent of the States of Holland, (of which the French King himself inform'd her) yet she was so Gracious as to reconcile them to the Hollanders. Nor could she forbear taxing the Misconduct of some in those Provinces, whose Proceedings she express'd her dislike of, by publick Writings; because, under pretence of Allegiance to her, they had rais'd Commotions, and embroil'd the States. And she was the more tart and severe in her Reproofs on this Occasion, having understood that Richardot had endeavour'd to procure a general Toleration for all the Netherlanders, which had quitted the other Provinces, on Condition

1590. Ann. 33.

dition they would return to their Habitations; which were it once granted, she easily saw, would prove of the worst Consequence to the States: Forasmuch as these were the very Men, that taking up their Residence in those Towns of Holland, which before wanted Inhabitants, not only enrich'd them, but went a great way towards maintaining the Expence of the War. She likewise order'd the restitution of those Ships which the English had taken from the Venetians and Florentines, at the request of the Great Duke of Tuscany; and put out a strict Proclamation, That none of her Subjects should any way damage or molest the Italians, Venetians, French, Danes, Netherlanders, or those belonging to the Hans-Towns.

Q. Eliz. puts out a Proclamation against Piracy.

However, some there were that adventur'd to annoy the Spaniards, and others that infested the Atlantick-Ocean near the Azores, where the Ships of both Indies must of necessity touch; many of which they took for Prizes, the Earl of Cumberland having demolish'd the Castle of Fyal, and brought off 58 pieces of Ordnance: Others ventur'd to make their way through the midst of the Galleys lying in the Bay of Gades, doing a great deal of Mischief, and spreading a kind of Terror over the Ocean itself.

She procures a Peace for the Moldavians & Polonians.

Queen Elizabeth was now grown very famous, and her Name and Glory of a large and wide Extent; so that she prevail'd on the Grand Sultan to grant a Peace to the Vaivod of Moldavia, who had been miserably infested by the Turks; and the same Benefit she procur'd for the Polanders, whom they had threatned to prosecute with a long and dangerous War: For which good Service the King of Poland and his Chancellor returned her Majesty their hearty Thanks in several Letters of Acknowledgement.

King of France and Scots made Knights of the Garter.

In the mean time, to continue a good Agreement with Scotland, she sent Edward Somerset, Earl of Worcester, to congratulate the King on his Marriage and safe Return out of Denmark, and to let him know, that himself and the French King were created Knights of the Garter; but withal to recommend to him the timely Suppression of the Catholicks in Scotland, which were now grown up to a numerous Faction. The King receiv'd him very courteously; and, the better to preserve a good Correspondence with England, and express his singular Affection to the publick Tranquillity, he dispatch'd Colonel Stuart into Germany, to concert some Measures with the King of Denmark, and the Ambassadors of the Princes there assembled, for renewing the Peace between England, Spain and France.

Q. Eliz. assists the French King.

France (as I before took notice) was at this time miserably consumed by the Flames of Civil War, kindled by the King of Spain and those of the Holy League. In order to extinguish which, and relieve that Nation, the Queen used all possible Means, and held several Consultations and Debates: As, whether the old English Soldiers in the Low-Countries would not do well to join with the German-Forces, which were coming down? Or, whether it were not a better way to send a strong Army into the Netherlands, to give the Prince of Parma a Diversion, who was now projecting a Descent into France? But the great Query was, how the Spaniards might be kept off from the Coasts of France, who (she heard) were attempting to reduce New-Haven, by bribing the Garrison, and then to send a Fleet into Bretaign.

Parma invades France.

Whilst these things were on the Anvil, the Prince of Parma entred France with a powerful Army, at the Command of the King of Spain, who was prevail'd on, through the Entreaties of those of the League, to take this course under colour of protecting the Catholick Religion, and shewing Charity to the Distressed, (meaning themselves, over whom the King had obtain'd a signal Victory at Ivry) the Prince soon marched all over Picardy, relieved with necessary Provisions the City of Paris, which was then in Rebellion, and almost ready to famish, gain'd Corbeil and L'aigny into his Hands, for the better and safer conveyance of Provisions into Paris, and then march'd back with the Army, and receiv'd higher Applauses for his good Conduct, in making the Soldiers cast up Trenches, after the Roman fashion, with their own Hands; and for his prudent declining to Fight, than for the Order and Discipline of his Soldiers, who were so vilely Insolent as to plunder and violate the very Churches. On the other hand, about the Autumnal Equinox, there arrived at Blavet in Bretaign other Spanish Troops under the Command of Don John D'Aquila, who besieg'd Henebon, a small but strong Town upon the Sea, and took it by the Assistance of Philip Emanuel, Duke of Mercoeur, of the House of Lorain. He had invited them in just at the time when the Leaguers were in hopes of sharing and parcelling out all France between 'em, and he had promis'd himself the Dukedom of Bretaign, part of it at least, for his own share, by the Assistance of Spain, and in Right of his Wife, who was the only Daughter of Sebastian Martigues, whose Mother Caroletta of Bretaign was Heiress to John Brose Duke of Estampes.

1590. Ann. 33.

Exploits.

Return.

Spaniards take some Sea-Ports in Bretaign.

This was an Opportunity the King of Spain was mighty willing to take hold on, as thinking that Bretaign did justly belong to his Daughter; forasmuch as it was a Feminine Fee, and she was a Branch of the eldest Daughter of Henry II, King of France; which eldest Daughter (her Uncles happening to die without Issue) had a right to succeed to the Crown of France, unless the Salick Law interpos'd in the case. And tho' he knew very well that Bretaign was, in the Reign of Francis I, united for ever to the Kingdom of France, yet could he not swallow what the Lawyers assert, That whatever is once annexed to the Crown of France, is for the future inseparable from it.

Q. Eliz. desired to send some Forces.

As soon as these Spanish Forces arriv'd, Henry Bourbon, Prince of Dumbez, and Son to the Duke of Montpensier, and whom the King had joined with La Noue in the Government of the Province of Bretaign, desired he might have some auxiliary Troops from England, to go against them. But the Queen and Council thought it no way convenient to furnish a Subject with Supplies of that kind, since the King himself neither knew of, nor requested any such thing, being at that time sufficiently taken up elsewhere, and in Affairs which were like to cost him Trouble enough. However she was far from neglecting the afflicted Condition of Bretaign, for she could not bear the Reflection that the King of Spain should reduce so wealthy a Country, and which being so near a Neighbour, was too conveniently situated for the Invasion of England, Holland, or Zeland: And in this she declar'd herself to be much more nearly concern'd than was Edward III, so long ago, who at a vast Expence was pleas'd to interest himself in the Quarrel of John Montford, to hinder the French from making themselves Masters of Bretaign. Some Persons there were who attempted to persuade the Queen to spare this Charge, to take care of her own Affairs rather than other Mens, and not to trust the French too far; that 'they had been false and treacherous to 'their own Princes, had lately murder'd one 'that was a zealous Asserter of Popery, and at 'this instant were prosecuting another with Spanish Arms and Popish Thunder, who was a Pro-'testant:

1590. Ann. 33. 'testant: That within the Compass of one Age, 'they had injuriously robb'd the German Empire 'of Metz, Toule, and Verdun: That they were 'sworn Enemies to the English; and therefore 'when they most pretended to be their Friends, 'were even then treating them after a base 'and ungrateful manner; and had moreover so 'often chous'd them upon the Loan of Money, 'that they came at last to call all Creditors they 'resolv'd to cheat, in way of proverbial Derisi-'on, Les Anglois: Moreover, that what by ill 'Counsels, and a worse Destiny hanging over 'their Heads, they had so rent and mangled that 'once flourishing Kingdom, that its Neighbours 'rather consider'd it as an Object of Pity, than 'Terrour; since, like an unwieldy Body, 'twas 'ready to sink under the Weight of its own 'Bulk; at least it was grown so light and un-'steady, that if it met with no Enemy abroad, 'it would seek for one within its own Borders; 'for they were now grown so wretchedly stu-'pid, (a Thing which will puzzle the Faith of 'future times) as to invite an Army of Spaniards 'into their Country, and receive them into their 'Towns.' However, the Queen being greatly concern'd for the Safety of the French, rejected all these Remonstrances, as Affronts to that potent and honourable Nation. Nay, upon other Suggestions of the like Nature, which were started by French, as well as Englishmen; as, That whilst Spain and the Juncto were parcelling and dividing France into several Principalities, she might seize on the maritime Countries of Picardy and Normandy; and when they reminded her at the same time, of what the warlike Charles of Burgundy used to say, viz. That the neighbouring Nations would be in a blessed Condition, when France should be govern'd, not by one King, but by twenty Petty-Princes: she heard them with Regret, and disdainfully put them off, saying, That most assuredly the Day which determin'd the Fate of France, would prove the Eve to that of England's Ruin.

Death of the E. of Warwick, Whilst these things were under Debate, Ambrose Dudley Earl of Warwick, the Son of John Duke of Northumberland, and Knight of the Garter, a most excellent Person, departed this Life, without Issue: And not long after him, Sir Francis Walsingham, the Queen's Secretary, Chancellor of the Dutchy of Lancaster, and Knight of the Garter, died of an Excrescence about his Privities, or rather through an intemperate Application of Physick. He was a Person of great Prudence and Industry, and had been concern'd in several honourable Embassies: He was a most steady Assertor of the Reform'd Religion, understood well the Intrigues of Government, and as well how to gain and improve the good Affections of the People, so as to serve his own Turn; insomuch that his Quickness and Dispatch of Business made him consider'd by the Queen, as a Man that even out-did himself; and the Papists found him, to their great Mortification, a Person of that Intelligence and Penetration, and so dexterous at finding out their Tricks and Designs against Religion, his Prince and Country; that they complain'd of him as a very subtle and insidious Man. Indeed he watch'd the Practices of these Men with so great an Expence, that he lessen'd his Estate by that means; and brought himself so far in Debt, that he was bury'd privately by Night, in St. Paul's Church, without any manner of Funeral Solemnity. He left but one Daughter behind him, whose first Husband was Sir Philip Sidney, who had a Daughter by her, afterwards marry'd to Roger Earl of Rutland. Her second Husband was Robert Earl of Essex, who had a Son and several Daughters by her; and her third Husband was the Earl of Clan-Richard, an Irishman, who had Children by her of both Sexes.

and Sir Fra. Walsingham,

A Month or two after Walsingham, Thomas Randolph, his intimate Friend, departed this Life. This Person, whom I have had occasion to mention so often already, had a Brother, Edward by Name, a brave Soldier, who died in Ireland, after having obtain'd a Victory, Ann. 1567. In his younger days he study'd the Civil Law at Christ-Church in Oxford, and was Principal of Broad-gates. Afterwards he was employ'd in several Embassies; thrice to the Peers of Scotland, during the Disorders there; as often to Mary Queen of Scots, after her Return from France; seven times to James VI. King of Scots; thrice to John Basilides Emperor of Russia; once to Charles IX. King of France, and once to Henry III. These great and eminent Services of his, for his Prince and Country, the Queen was pleas'd to repay, by making him Chamberlain of the Exchequer, (a Place formerly of great Honour) and by giving him the Post Master's Place, with some small Manours to maintain them. Nor did he desire any larger Returns, (so far was he from a covetous Man) although he had many Children. It may not be amiss, to mention a pious and serious Piece of Advice which he gave Walsingham, a little before his Death, by Letters which I have seen my self, viz. How decent, and even necessary a thing it was, for them to lay down the invidious Employments, the one of Secretary, and the other of Ambassador; to give themselves the more Leisure to meditate on Heaven, and reconcile themselves to God by a timely Repentance.

The next that quitted this earthly Abode, was Sir James Croftes, who in Edward VI's Reign defended Hadington in Scotland, against the French, and was for some time Governour of Ireland. He was condemn'd for Treason in Queen Mary's Reign, but acquitted by Queen Elizabeth; and being made Governor of Berwick and the East-March, Comptroller of the Queen's Houshold, and a Commissioner at the Treaty of Borbourg, he got above the Envy of the Court, which however had well nigh crush'd him, and died in a good Age his Prince's Favourite, and in fair Esteem with all that knew him. and Sir J. Croftes,

The same Year concluded with the Death of George Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, the Son of Francis, and the seventh Earl of this House and Line. In Queen Mary's Reign, being then a very young Gentleman, he was entrusted by his Father, who was General in the Scottish War, with 3000 Men, with which he brought off the Earl of Northumberland, who was in great Danger at Lowick. after which he was made Captain of a Troop of 500 brave Veterans in the Marches. Q. Elizabeth order'd the Queen of Scots into his Custody, and after the Duke of Norfolk's Death, advanc'd him to the Honour of Earl Marshal of England. In those ticklish times, he made a shift to assert his Honour, and make good his Trust for 15 Years together, against all the Machinations and Slanders of the Court Party, and the ill Conduct of his second Wife, to such a degree, That he left behind him the double Character of a wise and faithful Statesman, and a brave and worthy Commander. He had these Children by his first Wife, who was Gertrude the Daughter of Thomas Earl of Rutland, viz. Francis, who was taken away by an untimely Death; Gilbert, who succeeded him in Title and Estate, and marry'd Mary Cavendish, his Stepmother's Daughter; Edward, who marry'd the Daughter and one of the Heirs of the Lord Ogle; Henry and Thomas; Katharine, marry'd afterwards to Henry, Son of the Earl of Pembroke, who died without Issue; Mary, Wife to George and the E. of Shrewsbury,

Savill,

1590. Ann. 33.

Savill, and Grace, married to Henry Cavendiſh. By his latter Wife, who was Daughter of John Hardwick, and Widow of William Cavendiſh, he had no Children at all.

and the L. Wentworth.

Nor muſt we omit the Mention of Thomas Lord Wentworth, who accompanied the aforeſaid Perſons to another World. He was the laſt Engliſh Governour of Calais. He was ſucceeded by his ſecond Son, the eldeſt dying before his Father.

Gavilock ſtrangled by Tir-Oen.

In Ireland, Hugh Gavilock, ſo call'd by reaſon of his long Impriſonment, the baſe Son of Shan-Oneal, had the Year before accuſed Hugh Earl of Tir-Oen of holding a ſecret Correſpondence with certain Spaniards, who were caſt on the Coaſts of Ireland in the Year 1588. The Earl, to prevent any farther Diſcoveries, ſurprized him firſt, and then had him ſtrangled; but the Ruffians he employ'd, who were in other reſpects brutiſh enough, yet refuſing at that time ſo barbarous an Office, 'tis ſaid he drew the Cord himſelf, and ſo choaked him. Hereupon he was ſummoned into England, and had the Queen's Pardon, upon his humble Submiſſion, and moſt ſolemn Proteſtations and Engagements, before the Queen at the Honour of Greenwich; That on the Faith and Word of a Man of Honour, he would live peaceably with Turlough Leinigh, and all his Neighbours, (for Performance of which he gave Security) and that he would diſclaim the Title of O-Neal, or any Juriſdiction over thoſe Lords that were his Neighbours; That he would form the Country of Tir-Oen into a County; That he would not exact that Iriſh Tax call'd Bonaghty of any of his Dependents; That he would thenceforward put no Man to death, but according to Law; That he would not ſtop the Conveyance of any Ammunition or Proviſions, deſign'd for the Engliſh Garriſons at Blackwater, or the River More; That he would not admit into his Territories any Monks, Friers, Nuns, or Male-contents; That he would uſe all Endeavours to civilize the Inhabitants of Tir-Oen, and to bring them to better Order; with other Conditions of the ſame nature; provided ſtill that Turlough Leinigh, and the neighbouring Lords ſhould likewiſe engage themſelves to an amicable Correſpondence with him; That whilſt he himſelf avoided all Acts of Hoſtility, he might not be expoſed to their Inſolence or Barbarity. Being diſmiſſed home, he promiſed a ſecond time to Sir William Fitz-Williams, the Lord-Deputy, and to the Gentlemen of the Privy-Council, that he would obſerve every tittle of his Engagement. And for ſome time he was indeed very punctual to all the Duties and Obſervances which could be expected from a good Subject, and a vertuous Man. He was Maſter of a Conſtitution that could endure the Difficulties of Watching and Hunger; and join'd to that a moſt indefatigable Induſtry. He had a generous Soul, and capable of the weightieſt Undertakings, and was beſides an expert Soldier, and a ſubtle Politician: Inſomuch that ſome have concluded beforehand, that he was born to do Ireland a great deal of Good, or as much Hurt.

On what Terms he is pardon'd.

His Character.

'Twas not long before, that Hugh Roe-Mac-Mahon, a potent Lord in the Territory of Monaghan, was ſeized in his own Houſe, by Order of the Lord-Deputy; who, tho' he had but juſt before given him the Precedency in a Conteſt that happen'd in his Family upon that Point; yet did he ſuffer him to be try'd by Common Soldiers, and the Scum of the People (as the Iriſh complain'd) for having by Force of Arms extorted from the People thoſe Subſidies, which are demandable by the barbarous Cuſtom of the Country. The Effect of this was, that they condemn'd and executed him, and divided his Eſtate (which was a very good one) betwixt the Engliſh and ſome of the Mac-Mahons; aſſigning to them ſeverally a certain yearly Revenue, that they might enjoy it according to the Laws of England. This he did on purpoſe to weaken the Intereſts of a Family, that was too powerful in Creatures and Dependents; as likewiſe to put the ſame End to the Title and Tyranny of Mac-Mahon; for, it ſeems, this Privilege of the Family render'd 'em inſolent and uſurping, and prone to uſe all the Methods of an inſupportable Oppreſſion. Hereupon Brian-O-Rork, a mighty Lord in the adjacent Country of Brenu, apprehending the very ſame Fate, roſe in Rebellion againſt the Queen; but being chaſed and routed by Sir Richard Bingham, Governour of Connaught, he fled into Scotland. The Lord-Deputy in the mean time being highly concern'd that the Honour of this Piece of Service came not to his ſhare. The King of Scots, upon the Queen's Demand, very chearfully ſurrender'd him into her Hands, proteſting that he conſider'd all her Enemies as his own. Nor was this a bare Complement; for he ſlighted all the Remonſtrances of the Popiſh Nobility in Scotland, and the Motions of the Earl of Weſtmoreland and other Male-contents in England, who did what they could to incenſe him againſt the Queen. He likewiſe demanded Security of James and Donald Mac-Conells, that they would not moleſt the Engliſh in Ireland, either from the Hebrides or Scotland.

O-Rork rebels.

The Four and Thirtieth Year of her Reign. 1591.

Queen's Care of the French King.

In the midſt of theſe Confuſions, the Queen was not more intent on any thing, than the Care of Bretagne in France, and how to relieve the Affairs of the French King; which appear'd to be indeed in a ſinking Condition. She therefore ſent Edmund Yorke early in the Year, to give him a gentle Touch upon his three Months Silence, and to remind him of what immediate Importance it was, to provide for the Defence of Bretagne, as ſoon as poſſible; and to perſuade him by all means to oppoſe and prevent the Deſigns of the Prince of Parma, who intended another Invaſion upon France, in order to join the Spaniſh Forces in Bretagne. Towards the diſpoſſeſſing of theſe, ſhe promiſed him her Aſſiſtance both by Sea and Land, on condition he would appoint a Place of Retreat for her Forces, and join a competent Number of Men with hers. The King was highly ſenſible of the Queen's generous Regards for him, return'd her hearty Thanks for it, and promiſed faithfully that nothing ſhould be wanting on his part. He required, in the firſt place, 3000 Men to ſupport his Affairs in Bretagne; and ſome Regiments to be immediately diſpatch'd for Piccardy. He nominated Cherbourg, Granvill, or Breſt, for Port-Towns of Retreat for her Majeſty's Forces; but principally Blavett, taken lately by the Spaniards, as the moſt commodious, (but whether in jeſt or earneſt, I cannot tell.) Then he gave Orders to Beauvoir de Noclé, his Reſident in England, to draw up Articles of Agreement, and he did accordingly manage the Contract with the Lord-Treaſurer Burleigh, Charles Howard Lord-Admiral, and Hunſdon Lord-Chamberlain, who were Commiſſioners for the Queen: That 3000 English ſhould be ſent over into Picardy and Bretagne, with neceſſary Proviſions to maintain the War: That the King ſhould, in the ſpace of one Year, re-imburſe their Pay into the Queen's Exchequer, beſide the Charge of their Tranſportation, and the Expence of Ammunition, &c. or ſooner, provided the Enemy were diſpoſſeſſed before that time. The Queen was the more eaſily inclined to join Fr. King's Demands and Overtures.

Contract of Aſſiſtance.

in

1591. Ann. 34.

in this Treaty, as being inform'd that the Spaniards were admitted into Paris, the Metropolis of France; and that the Citizens acknowledged the King of Spain for their Sovereign, and gave their lawful Prince no other Title than The Bearnois. That the Spanish King did from hence encourage himself with the Hopes of wearing the Crown of France; and that he had declared as much to Janin, who was Commissioner sent from the Leaguers to the Court of Spain: As also, that Pope Gregory XIII, had on this Occasion raised Forces against the French King, in Italy and Switzerland, under the Command of the Duke de Montmartin, and had published a Bull of Excommunication against him; which was nevertheless condemn'd by the Parliament of Paris, now met at Tours, and order'd to be first fix'd to the Gallows by the common Hangman, and then burnt to Ashes. Hereupon a Proclamation was issued out, forbidding the Exportation of Provision or Arms into those Ports of France, which the Leaguers had in possession, upon pain of High Treason; which also the King of Scots had done before. Sir Henry Palmer was likewise sent out with a Squadron of Men of War, and took 13 of their Ships in their Return from New France; and not long after, Sir Roger Williams went over to Diep with 600 Men, with express Orders to lie ready in those Parts; because the Enemy were very near that Town, and had threatned it hard. And a few days after, Sir John Norris set sail for Bretagne, with the rest of the Forces; which (under him) were commanded by his Brother Henry, and Anthony Sherley. These Recruits join'd the King's Forces, and made a brisk, but unsuccessful Attempt upon Lamballe, which was defended by the Leaguers; and here died that eminent Soldier, Francis la Nové, of a Wound he had received. After this, however, they took Chastillon, and gave some Check to those of the League; tho' they could not totally rout or dispossess them. Sir Roger Williams, with his own Forces and those of Monsieur la Chatré, Governour of Diep, broke thro' a Barricado at Cinquesfaunce, made of Wine-Fats fill'd up with Earth; and put to flight some of the Party, who were appointed to scour the Ways, under the Command of Tremblecourt and Lounde: for which Act he was highly applauded by the King, in his Letters to the Queen. Hereupon he grew more hardy; and not so well considering the Charge he had undertaken, he went along with the King to the very Suburbs of Paris; and in a short Letter sent a Challenge to the Spaniards, to dispatch 200 Pikemen, and 1000 Musketeers, to engage in the Field with the same Number of English. He had scarce got to Diep, but the King sent for him, and order'd him with his Troops to Noyon, quite contrary to the Orders which he had receiv'd from the Queen. Here he behaved himself with that Heat and Rashness, as to throw away the Lives of a great many Men in an Assault, which the Queen having not consented to, was therefore much displeased at.

Motives inducing the Queen hereto.

A Proclamation relating to the Leaguers.

Norris sent to Bretagne.

La Nove slain.

At the same time the French King acquainted her Majesty, by Anthony Reaux, that he was resolv'd to secure Rouen and New-Haven, before the Prince of Parma arriv'd with his Forces in France; and to that purpose he desired the Queen to send 4000 English into Normandy, with two Months Pay; and if they stay'd longer, he engaged to pay them himself; and promised most faithfully, that as soon as they landed, his Forces should be ready to join them; and he would tarry in Picardy in the mean while, lest they of Rouen should have any Suspicion of his Design. To this the Queen agreed, as being very desirous to drive the Enemy farther from the Sea-Coast. Hereupon, a new Contract was made on the Terms proposed; but with this Proviso, that it should be ratified, or (to use the French Term) verified by the Authority of the Supreme Parliament. Within a few days these Forces were raised, and arrived at Diep, under the Command of Robert Earl of Essex, a young Nobleman, who had much of the Queen's Grace and Favour. He was attended by several Gentlemen of the first Quality; and Sir Thomas Leighton and Sir Henry Killigrew, Men of great Experience, were appointed as Assistants to him, where Conduct and Counsel were required. At his Arrival in France, he found the King was at a great distance, as far as Noyon. In Normandy he perceiv'd there was not the least Preparation made, nor could he learn by any means, how he was to dispose of his Forces; so that he began to stomach the King's ill Treatment of himself and his Men, and resented very much his Breach of Promise. Some time after, came to him Sir Roger Williams, and intreated him in the King's Name, to make what haste he could to him at Noyen, in order to concert Measures for carrying on the War: Whither being at last arrived, after a very difficult and hazardous March, the King told him, that he must needs go in Person into Champagne, to join the German Army; but promised to send Marshal Biron and the D. of Montpensier, with all possible Dispatch, to the Siege of Rouen. The Earl with much ado got back to his Men, who had their Camp at Arques; and the better to gain the Affections of his Army, and encourage them at the same time, he knighted several, tho' he happen'd by so doing to disoblige some Persons who had obtain'd that Honour before they set out, and might perhaps think that he cheapen'd that Character, which had been hitherto in mighty Esteem among the English, and which the Queen had confer'd but on a very few Persons, and those of a distinguish'd Note, and good Family. After all there was no Appearance either of Biron or Montpensier: The latter was gone into Champagne, to attend at the Nuptials of Viscount Turenne and the Duke of Bouillon's Daughter; and the former was marched out of the way, to lay a fruitless Siege to the Castle of Pierrepont. And now was another Message dispatch'd to England, by Reaux, to acquaint the Queen with the Reasons which hinder'd the French King from besieging Rouen; for the Queen had warmly pressed this Siege by Sir Henry Unton, her Ambassador in France, and likewise the Verification of the Contract, by Consent of Parliament. Essex all this while lay unemploy'd in his Camp, and was not a little disturb'd that he was cheated of such Opportunities of distinguishing himself: He happen'd once to approach too near Rouen, and lost his Brother by a Shot from the Town. The Queen blamed him by her Letters, for following the King without giving her Notice, and for coming so indiscreetly under the Walls of Rouen. But he made his Peace upon the easy Terms of a few smooth Words; and in the mean while marching with his Forces to Gornay, he was very serviceable to Biron in the Reduction of it.

New Supplies granted.

Earl of Essex commands there.

He goes to the King.

Makes several Knights.

Is impos'd on by the French.

French King sends a Message of Excuse to the Queen.

Essex's Brother shot.

Mean while the King solicites the Queen by Beavoir to send Essex, with the English Forces under his Command, out of Normandy into Champagne, having seemingly laid by all Thoughts of besieging Rouen. This the Queen took so ill, as to expostulate the Matter with him; forasmuch as two Months had now passed, since the signing of the Contract, and the Soldiers were still out of Pay: That for her part, both she and her Friends had been so long shamm'd, and imposed on, and either totally disregarded, or else posted about from place to place, and exposed to infinite infinite Hazards by the Bargain; and the King 1591. moreover was so unsteddy to his Promises and

Ann. 34. Resolves, and had occasion'd her so vast an Expence to so little Purpose, that she determin'd to call home her Forces, unless he would keep his Word, and take some Course to defray the Sum agreed on. He presently endeavour'd to excuse Himself, and pacify the Queen by complaisant Letters: Wherein he laid the Fault upon the Hurry and Confusion of his Affairs. In the beginning of November, when the Prince of Parma was taking the Field with a well disciplin'd Army; he in a slow and dilatory manner began the Siege of Rouen. Essex was sent into England to hasten over new Supplies; and upon his Return, not many Days after, about Christmas-Eve, an Attack was made on St. Katharine's Tower in four places at once, and in three of them the English were exposed to extreme Hazard. At the very same time the King solicited by Mornay Plessis a speedy Dispatch of fresh Recruits to serve against the Prince of Parma; and these the Queen granted, after a modest Reprimand of the King's Neglect, as to the Siege of Rouen, and his stopping the Prince of Parma's Advances. She made it likewise her Request, that the English might be treated at a better rate, and not thrust always into the midst of Danger. But this I must be contented to leave with the Writers of the French History, who were either very little acquainted with these Proceedings, or else have pitifully misrepresented them. Nor will I rob the Church-Historian of his Right in conveying to Posterity the wild Enthusiasm of William Hacket, together with all those abominable Blasphemies, which I almost blush to mention. However, that I may not be charg'd as a Friend to his Follies, or an Enemy to Truth, I shall venture on this short Narrative, till the World is supplied with a better and fuller Account.

Fr. King break his Promise.

Hacket's blasphemous Tenets.

This Hacket was a Fellow of mean Extraction, born at Oundle in Northamptonshire, a very illiterate Man, and as Haughty and Insolent as he was Ignorant: He was moreover of so revengeful a Complexion, that pretending to be reconciled to a worthy Schoolmaster, to whom he bore a Grudge, he clean bit off his Nose; and the poor Man desiring to have it again, that it might be sewed on whilst the Wound was green, the Report goes that he swallowed it after a most savage manner. So bitter an Enemy was he to all Goodness and Vertue, that he would expose and ridicule the Sacred Truths and Doctrines he had heard at Church, and make them the Entertainment of his Cups and Frolicks. After this, having spent an Estate, which he had by his Wife, who was a Widow, he put on a demure Face, and grew a mighty Saint all on a sudden. Accordingly he was the most constant frequenter of Sermons, and the most inquisitive Searcher of the Scriptures you should hear of. At last he came to manage the Pretences of an inward Call and supernatural Revelation, with that Confidence and Dexterity, as to work himself into the good Opinion of a sort of Divines, who were stark mad for introducing the Presbyterian Discipline after the Geneva Model into England. One of this good Brotherhood was Wigginton, as Brain-sick a Teacher as any of the Club, and as stanch an Enemy to Government. This Man brought Hacket acquainted with Edmund Coppinger, a Person of a good Family, who was likewise puffed up with the Conceit of being a chosen Vessel for the Benefit of the Church, and that God had vouchsafed him wonderful Discoveries for reducing the Queen and her Council to a better Sense of Things, even to the embracing of the Geneva Discipline. And this he afterwards communicated to one Arthington, a great Admirer of 1591. this way of Worship. For it seems some of these
Ann. 34. Teachers had before infused it into him, That God did every day stir up one or other of these extraordinary Labourers to work in his Vineyard. This he imparted in the great Joy of his Heart to Hacket, who with a Sanctity, which he could well enough dissemble, encourag'd the Humour, and by praying extempore, and with great Fervours, by Sunday-Fasts, and by frequent Boastings of his Conflicts with Satan, swore at the hazard of his Salvation, that all this was true, and brought as a Proof thereof several pretended Revelations and familiar Intercourses with God; which with many Oaths and Imprecations he likewise asserted. And he had the good Fortune to find so much Credit with the Fraternity, that they consider'd him as a special Favourite of God Almighty, and a much greater Prophet, without all doubt, than Moses or St. John Baptist. Nay, he proceeded so far, as to give broad Signs that he was appointed as a special Prophet to denounce God's Vengeance against such as slighted his Mercy; and foretold, That the Reign of Papacy was at an end, and that England this very Year should be afflicted with the three Scourges of Famine, Pestilence, and Sword, unless the Discipline of the Lord (for that was their Cant) and a new Reformation were put in practice. Towards the effecting this, they form'd a Charge of Treason against the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Lord-Chancellor, (their stiff Opposers) as afterwards appear'd by their Letters, and threaten'd to take them off, if they any way opposed the Schemes of these Novel-Reformers, in the Star-Chamber. They endeavour'd likewise to stir up the Mob to Rebellion, by seditious Papers and Rimes. In which they maintain'd amongst other Positions, That a true Child of Grace, though a mere Ignoramus, might lawfully teach Kings their Duty of Governing, and dethrone the Queen to boot, unless she would lend an Hand to their blessed Reformation. It may appear from this one Instance, how inveterate an Enemy Hacket was to the Queen's Person and Character, that he used to whisper it about, that she had quitted her Title to the Crown; and in a Rage stuck his Dagger into the Breast of a Picture of hers which was drawn upon a Board. Nor was this any wonder at all, forasmuch as he had now wrought himself into the Belief, that God had put the Empire of Europe into his Hands, and that therefore he ought to admit of no Corrival. He likewise made a shift to persuade Coppinger and Arthington themselves, that they had a more than Prophetical Spirit in them, and were a sort of Angelick Visionarists: They therefore conceiving themselves to be under the influence of a divine Inspiration, instantly paid him all Homage that could be expected for a King that had dropt down from Heaven; and began to foment Rebellion as fast as they could. In July they went to a certain Nobleman, and after having offer'd him the first Place of Authority next to the Queen, they presented him with the Description of Hacket's Life and Arthington's Prophecy. But he had something else to do, and so dismiss'd the Men about their business. Some time after they intimated to Wigginton, 'That 'our Saviour had appear'd to them the Night 'before, not with the Body which he wears in 'Heaven, but with that ruling Spirit which was 'shed on Hacket in a more abundant measure 'than on any other; and that Hacket was that 'very Angel who should come before the Approach of the last Day, with his Fan and Crook, 'to separate the Sheep from the Goats: That 'he should likewise beat down Satan, and pull

1591. Ann. 34.

'the Kingdom of Antichriſt up by the roots.' They then left Wigginton, and went to Hacket; before whom, as he ſat upon his Bed, they fell down, and were ſeized with a violent Fit of Devotion. Hacket got up, and joined with them in Prayer, earneſtly deſiring, that the Spirit would direct 'em to do every thing to the Glory of God, and ſo went to Bed again. Arthington immediately adviſed Coppinger to anoint their King with the Holy Ghoſt, in the Name of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt. Coppinger fell proſtrate, and having with a profound Reverence kiſſed the Floor thrice, approached nearer Hacket; who put him back, ſaying, That he need not be anointed by him, ſince he had an Unction from the Holy Ghoſt already; to confirm which he began in this Strain: Do ye my Commandments: Go and declare through the City, that Jeſus Chriſt is come with his Fan in his Hand to judge the World: If any enquire where he is, ſhew them this Place; and if then they will not believe, let them come and kill me if they can: As it is moſt certain that God is in Heaven, ſo 'tis as true Chriſt is come to Judgment.

As ſoon as he had ſaid this, out they went, and proclaimed all the City over, that Chriſt was come, and what other Fooleries he had given them in Commiſſion; often repeating in a louder Tone, Repent, Repent, till they had got as far as Cheapſide; where being throng'd by the Multitude, up they got into a Cart; and what by the help of their Memories, and a written Scroll they had for that purpoſe, they proclaim'd aloud, 'That Hacket was, by the Spirit of Chriſt, made 'a Partaker of his glorified Nature, and was 'now come with his Fan to plant the Goſpel 'throughout Europe, and to ſet up a Form of 'Government and Church-Diſcipline in England,' (and pointed withal to his Lodging.) Then they declar'd, 'That they were two Prophets, the 'one of Mercy, the other of Judgment, who 'were given to Hacket as Co-adjutors and Fellow-'labourers in ſo important a Work: All which 'they affirm'd upon the Salvation of their Souls 'to be true. They farther declar'd, That Hacket 'was the firſt and ſupreme Monarch of the Uni-'verſe, and that all the Princes of Europe held 'their Scepters as ſo many Dependants on him; 'and therefore that he alone claim'd an univer-'ſal Obedience; and that as for the Queen, ſhe 'was to be depoſed.' In the ſame place they fell a curſing the Archbiſhop and the Lord-Chancellor, as Enemies to the ſincere Profeſſion of the Goſpel. Hereupon the Throng gathering ſo faſt, that they could not get forward to other Places of the City to make the ſame Oration, and being likewiſe adviſed by ſome of their Friends to withdraw, they fairly return'd to Hacket's Lodging.

They are taken.

Being ſome time after apprehended, they carried themſelves with that inſolent Saucineſs before the Magiſtrates and Council, as to refuſe the Civility of their Hats, and to tell them in plain Terms, that they were above all human Laws. Hacket was afterwards indicted of Treaſon, and confeſſed himſelf guilty; but made his Hearers tremble at the Blaſphemies then utter'd by him. This, 'tis poſſible, he did with a cunning Intention of poſſeſſing the Judges that he was a Madman, whereas his Gravity and compos'd Mien ſhew'd in other reſpects that he was no ſuch Thing. After his Condemnation, he was drawn upon an Hurdle to the Place of greateſt Concourſe in the City, crying out in a moſt dreadful Tone, Jehova-Meſſias! Jehovah-Meſſias! ſee the Heaven open! behold the Son of the moſt High deſcending to deliver me! At the Gallows, when he was importuned to acknowledge his Sin againſt God and the Queen, he, like an execrable Wretch, inveigh'd againſt the Queen with a loud and boiſterous Rudeneſs: O Heavenly God, Almighty Jehovah, Alpha and Omega, Lord of Lords and King of Kings, God everlaſting, Thou knoweſt that I am the true Jehovah whom Thou haſt ſent, ſhew ſome Miracle out of the Clouds to convert theſe Infidels, and deliver me from mine Enemies: But if not, (I tremble almoſt to repeat it) I will ſet the Heavens on fire, and with theſe Hands pluck thee from thy Throne: With a great deal more which he utter'd to the ſame purpoſe, and in the ſame Stile of Blaſphemy. Then turning to the Hangman, who was faſtening the Rope about him, Thou Baſtard, ſaid he, wilt thou hang Hacket, thy Sovereign? Having the Rope about his Neck, he lift up his Eyes to Heaven, and, with a frightful Grin, ſaid, Doſt thou reward me thus, inſtead of giving me a Kingdom? I come to revenge it.

1591. Ann. 34.

Hacket is hang'd and quarter'd.

In the midſt of theſe loud and horrid Blaſphemies, the Halter diſpatch'd him: But the Mob would have had the impious Villain cut down alive; which was afterwards done, his Bowels taken out, and his Body quarter'd, according to Sentence paſſed upon him. Thus does the great Enemy of Mankind cajole thoſe who pretend an outward Sanctity, but are not ſincerely and ſoberly Wiſe and Good. Coppinger after this ſtarv'd himſelf to Death in Priſon; and Arthington, being reſerv'd for Repentance, ſhew'd it in good earneſt, and wrote a Book to teſtify his Heartineſs therein.

Coppinger ſtarves himſelf. Arthington recants.

Nor were theſe Perſons the only Oppoſers of the Church; but ſeveral others, who had hitherto made fruitleſs Efforts to overturn its Diſcipline, by deriving Slander and Scandal upon the Name and Function of Biſhops, having got ſome Common Lawyers on their ſide, fell to employ their Tongues and Pens in crying down their Authority, and traducing that Power which was given them by the Queen, as illegal and unjuſt. To which purpoſe they put out Pamphlets, complaining, 'That the Eccleſiaſtical Courts exerciſed a kind of Tyranny, contrary to the Laws: 'That the Queen could not by Law grant any 'ſuch Juriſdiction, nor could others fairly exer-'ciſe it, tho' it were granted: That thoſe Courts 'could not impoſe on the Defendant the Oath 'ex officio, becauſe no Man is obliged to accuſe 'himſelf. That by this Oath Men are con-'ſtrain'd either to condemn themſelves with 'Shame and Loſs of Reputation, or elſe to per-'jure themſelves at the Coſt of their Souls: Be-'ſides, that the only Buſineſs of thoſe Courts was 'to take Cognizance of Marriages and Wills, 'according to the Tenour of that old Writ, Mandamus Vicecomiti, &c. i. e. We command the She-'riffs of our Counties of S. N. &c. that they ſuffer 'not any in their Bailiwick to meet in any Places to 'make Recognizance upon Oath, except in Cauſes 'Matrimonial and Teſtamentary.' Eccleſiaſtical Courts oppugned.

On the other ſide, the Civilians and Canoniſts maintain'd the Queen's Authority in Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes, 'as lodg'd in her Majeſty by Autho-'rity of Parliament: That to oppoſe this, was 'an Affront to her Royal Prerogative, and an 'Invaſion upon her Right, in oppoſition to the 'Oath of Allegiance: That the Eccleſiaſtical 'Courts may lawfully take Cognizance of other 'Cauſes beſides Matrimonial and Teſtamentary, 'they made out from the Statute of Circumſpecte 'agatis, and the Articles of the Clergy of the 'Time of Edward I. That the Writ or Law al-'ledg'd, was juſtly to be ſuſpected, becauſe the 'Date was uncertain, and the Stile inconſiſtent, 'for elſewhere it is written, To make Recogni-'zances, or take Oaths: As likewiſe, that to make 'Recognizance, does not properly ſignify to 'give in Evidence, or to anſwer in Law; but

'to

1591. Ann. 34.

'to confeſs a Debt, or to hold Pleas concerning 'Bills, Bonds, or Debts. That the Oath Ex officio in thoſe Courts, as well as in others, has 'been demanded time out of mind, for the Diſ'covery of Simony, Adultery, and other hei'nous Crimes, eſpecially when (to uſe the Law-'Phraſe) Inſinuatio fuerit clamoſa, i.e. the Suſpi'cion was loud and violent: And tho' no Man 'be oblig'd to accuſe or betray himſelf, yet when 'common Fame has already made him guilty, 'he is bound to clear and vindicate himſelf if he 'can, foraſmuch as the Penance impoſed is not, 'ſtrictly ſpeaking, of the Nature of a Puniſh'ment, but rather a ſort of Remedy to cure Of'fenders, to prevent Scandal, and to deter others 'by Example, according to that Saying of Scrip'ture, For thy Souls ſake be not aſham'd to ſpeak 'Truth. For there is a Confuſion that leads to 'Sin, and there is a kind of Shame, the Iſſue of 'which is Grace and Glory.' But I ſhall not inſiſt farther on this Head, there being ſeveral Tracts to the purpoſe learnedly written on both ſides, by Richard Coſins, Doctor of Law, John Morris, and Lancelot Andrews.

Q. Eliz. aſſerts the Churches Right.

The Queen being very ſenſible that their Aim was to wound her Prerogative through the Sides of the Prelacy, quaſh'd all this Violence without any Noiſe or Tumult, and found a way to aſſert the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, in ſpight of all its Enemies.

Engliſh wait for the Spaniſh Plate-Fleet.

About this time, Thomas Howard, the Duke of Norfolk's ſecond Son, was waiting, as he had done for ſix Months before, for the Spaniſh Plate-Fleet homeward bound from America. During his ſtay at Flores, one of the Iſles of Azores, the Seamen being moſt of them ſick, (for Soldiers he had none at all;) Alphonſo Baſſano, who was ſent out with 53 Ships to convoy home the American Fleet, attack'd him ſo unexpectedly, that Howard in the Admiral, and the reſt of the Engliſh Ships, had much ado to get out to Sea. Sir Richard Greenvil in the Vice-Admiral, call'd the Revenge, as he ſtaid behind to call his Men back out of the Iſland, and out of a raſh piece of Bravery, would not ſuffer them to ſail, was pent in between the Iſland and the Spaniſh Fleet, which was divided into four Squadrons; one of which he reſolutely attempted to break through: The Spaniſh Admiral, nam'd the St. Philip, got to Windward of him, and ply'd hard on one ſide, and three Ships more from other Parts as warmly entertain'd him on the other; the Spaniards often boarded him, and were as often beat off and thrown overboard, and fighting the whole Night with freſh Recruits from their Fleet, they loſt a vaſt number of Men. The Engliſh now began to want Powder, beſides which their Pikes were broke, all their braveſt Men either killed or wounded, their Maſts ſplit, and their Rigging damaged, the Ship batter'd, with 800 great Shot, and Greenvil himſelf wounded, and whilſt the Wound was dreſſing ſhot again a ſecond time, and the Surgeon ſlain by his ſide. By break of day, the Hatches appear'd all over Blood, and the vaſt ſhoal of Carcaſſes, and Men half dead that lay ſcatter'd up and down, preſented a very lamentable Spectacle to thoſe who were left alive. After a Fight of fifteen Hours, Greenvil, being now paſt all hopes of Life, order'd the Ship to be ſunk. The Maſter countermanded it, and by conſent of the major part, got into the Boat, and yielded themſelves to the Admiral, on compoſition for their Lives and Liberties. Greenvil being now almoſt at his laſt Breath, was convey'd into the Spaniſh Admiral, and died within two Days, with high Commendations, even from his Enemies, of his Conduct and Bravery. The Ship was ſurrender'd; but being ſhot through her Keel in ſeveral places, ſhe ſhortly after ſunk in a Storm, with 200 Spaniards on board her, and ſo did ſome other Veſſels; ſo that it may be ſaid, the Revenge made good its Name, and forc'd the Spaniards to pay dear for this new Victory.

The Revenge ſinks.

In the mean while Howard, depending more on his Courage than Strength, had a great mind to venture into the midſt of the Enemy's Fleet; but ſo far was the Maſter from conſenting to it, that he ſaid he would firſt leap overboard, before the Queen's Ship ſhould be expoſed to ſo palpable an Hazard; nor did the reſt think it proper to fight againſt ſuch apparent Odds and Danger, and with little or no Probability of reſcuing their Friends: For, to venture five Ships againſt fifty three of the Enemy's, beſides the Extravagance of the Action, would, in their opinion, be nothing elſe but to augment the Glory of Spain, by weakning England, and at the Expence of a great many Lives beſides. However, he and the reſt, eſpecially Sir Thomas Vavaſor, (who aſſiſted the Revenge for two Hours together) fought bravely as long as they had the Advantage of the Wind, and did all that could be expected from Men of Courage, till the Night parted them.

Spaniſh Ships taken.

The Engliſh made themſelves an ample amends for the loſs of the Revenge, by taking ſeveral Spaniſh Ships; in one of which were ſeized about 20000 Indulgences, deſign'd for America, and a rich Treaſure beſides; the Indians, it ſeems, being forced to purchaſe their Pardons at a yearly Rate, by which the King of Spain's Coffers are filled, and good Griſt carried to the Pope's Mill.

A Voyage to the Eaſt-Indies.

George Riman, a ſtout and able Seaman, and James Lancaſter, made about this time a Voyage to the Eaſt-Indies, and had the good Fortune to double the Cape of Good Hope. At Cabo Corriente the Admiral was caſt away, and Riman in her; and not long after there was a mighty Thunder-Storm, and four of the Seamen, who were in the other Veſſels, had their Necks ſo diſtorted by the Force of the Lightning, that they inſtantly died, and above ninety were ſtruck blind, and others lame, beſides ſome who were ſeized with horrible Pains, who yet recover'd all of them to a Miracle, and reſolutely kept on their Voyage. At the Iſle of Comoro, thirty of them and the Maſter were murder'd by the Barbarians, as they ſtopt to take in freſh Water; and at Zanziber they winter'd.

The Admiral caſt away.

Towards the Spring, they took ſome Turkiſh Veſſels belonging to Pegu with wooden Anchors and ſome Portugueſe likewiſe laden with Pepper and Rice.

After this, they ſailed to Zealand, and ſo to Nicubar, an Iſland that abounds in Cinnamon and Diamonds. And finding they had but 33 of their Crew left alive, and that their Proviſion grew ſhort, they ſteer'd their Courſe homewards. At the Iſle of St. Helen they got ſome Refreſhment; and leaving that, they were driven to Trinidada, where they met with poor Comfort and hungry Entertainment. At laſt they met with Charles Barbotier, a Frenchman, who gave 'em ſome Relief; but was treated by them not with that Candour and Fairneſs he had reaſon to expect, but as Seamen uſe to do when they are half ſtarv'd and long for Plunder; tho he prov'd at laſt too cunning for them, and prevented their Deſigns. Afterwards, as Lancaſter was refreſhing himſelf with ſome of his Men in the Iſland of Mone, near Hiſpaniola, the Ship was driven away by a Storm, and not above ſeven diſtreſſed Perſons in her, but got home ſafe and very rich, leaving behind them their Companions in great Miſery and Diſtreſs, who afterwards by the Civility of ſome Frenchmen

1591. Ann. 34.

Frenchmen were brought home, and had the Reputation of being the first that taught their Countrymen the Method of Trading in the East-Indies.

Cavendish's Voyage to the Straits of Magellan.

In the mean time Thomas Cavendish having sailed round the Globe, and returned home with Honour Ann. 1578, undertook this Year a Voyage to the Strait of Magellan, which not being able to pass by reason of bad Weather, and contrary Winds, he was driven back to the Coast of Brazil, and there died an untimely Death, taxing John Davies with his last Breath for having basely deserted him.

His death.

The War now growing hot, there was issued a Proclamation, forbidding any Person, upon pain of Treason, to carry Grain, Ammunition, or any kind of Naval Stores, into the King of Spain's Dominions: And this Reason was alledg'd, That he, being the declar'd Enemy of England, had refused to ratify the ancient Treaties between their Predecessors.

And forasmuch as English Priests began about this time to convey themselves privately into England from the Popish Seminaries abroad, in greater Clusters than they used formerly, (the Spanish King having lately founded an English Cloister at Valladolid) and endeavour'd to bring off the Queen's Subjects from their Allegiance, and draw 'em over to the Spaniards Party: There was publish'd a Proclamation in October, That no Man should harbour any Person whatever, except he first enquir'd who he was, whether he frequented the Service of the Church, what Estate he lived upon, where he resided the Year before, and other Circumstances of the like kind. That whoever could not readily answer these Queries, should be sent to the Justices of Peace appointed in every County, that so the Government might suffer no Prejudice.

A Proclamation against Seminaries.

This Proclamation being somewhat harsh and severe, occasion'd the Papists to put out several Pamphlets full of biting Reflections upon the Lord-Treasurer Burleigh, as the supposed Author thereof. In which, however, they bestow'd high Commendations on Sir Christopher Hatton, as a Person better affected to their Interest, and who was of opinion, that Religion was not to be propagated by Fire and Sword: But it pleased God that he died of a Diabetes the very day before this Proclamation was put out; and 'twas thought his Distemper was heightned by the Regret he conceiv'd at the Queen's demanding from him a large Sum of Money in consideration of the Tenths and First-Fruits of which he had the Management; which Sum he hop'd would be remitted, as he was so great a Favourite with her Majesty: But when she had once sunk his Spirits by an unkind Expression, all that she could do by Visits or any other Methods to raise them again, was to no purpose. He was born of a Family in Northamptonshire more Ancient than Rich. And being a young Gentleman, tall, handsome and well-shap'd, he so wrought himself into the Affections of Queen Elizabeth, that she made him one of her Band of Gentlemen-Pensioners, which were fifty in number; and afterwards, for his modest and courteous Behaviour, she admitted him a Gentleman of her Privy-Chamber, made him Captain of her Guard, Vice-Chamberlain, and one of her Privy-Council, and, to crown her Favours, made him in the last place Lord-Chancellor of England, and Knight of the Garter.

The death of Chancellor Hatton.

He was a Person pious and charitable, a great Patron of Learning and good Sense, and for that reason chosen Chancellor of the University of Oxford. And he was one that managed that weighty Post of Lord-Chancellor with that Equity and Clearness of Principle, as to be able to satisfy his Conscience, and the World too. His Funeral was solemnized with a due and decent Magnificence in St. Paul's, and William Newport, his Nephew by his Sister, whom he had adopted his Heir, by the Name of Hatton, erected a stately Monument for him.

1591. Ann. 34.

The Great Seal was for some time lodged in the Hands of the Lord-Treasurer, the Lord Hunsdon, the Lord Cobham, and the Lord Buckhurst, and some time after deliver'd to John Puckering, the Queen's Serjeant at Law, tho' not with the Title of Chancellor, but Keeper of the Great Seal.

Puckering made L. Keeper of the Great Seal.

Now came on the Trial of Brian O-Rork in Westminster-Hall. He was a powerful Lord of Brenny in Ireland, very much in the Spanish Interest, and was the last Year deliver'd by the King of Scots, and sent into England, as I said before. 'He was impeached for having stirred up Alexander Mac-Conel and others against the Queen: For ordering her Majesty's Picture to be hung at an Horse's Tail, and carried about the Streets in Contempt, and at last cut in pieces: That he had shelter'd in his House several Spaniards that were Shipwreck'd, contrary to the Lord-Deputy's Proclamation: That he had set his Instruments to burn down the Houses of several of the Queen's good Subjects, and had murder'd others; and had made an Offer of Ireland to the King of Scots.' When this Indictment was explain'd to him by an Interpreter, (for he did not understand English) he was so strangely insolent, as to refuse submitting himself to a Trial by twelve Men, unless a longer time were allow'd him, and good Council also appointed him. And he demanded likewise, that the Impeachments sent out of Ireland, might be deliver'd into his Hands, and the Queen herself manage the Trial in Person. When the Lord-Chief-Justice had answer'd him by an Interpreter, 'That if he refused in plain Terms to take his Trial by a Jury of twelve Men, they were obliged however, by the Laws of England, to bring in their Verdict according to the Articles of the Indictment;' he made no other Answer than this, That they might even do as they pleased. Sentence of Death being passed upon him, he suffer'd as a Traitor some Days after at Tyburn, without the least touch of Remorse for his Crime, but ridiculed Meilery Creah, Archbishop of Cassils, (who ministred Advice and Comfort to him in the Irish Tongue) and charged him as a Man of unsteddy Principles and a leud Life, calling him a kind of Apostate from the Franciscan Order.

O-Rork's Trial.

Hang'd.

This Year her Majesty (to her immortal Honour) founded a College at Dublin, the Metropolis of Ireland, and dedicated it to the Holy and Undivided Trinity; for the Advancement of Learning. 'Twas built in the very same Place where the Monastery of All-Saints stood formerly, and endow'd with the usual Privileges belonging to Universities; of Teaching, Reading, and Conferring Honorary Titles or Degrees upon Men of Learning; (the same thing that the Pope had done for this Place, about the Year 1320.) This the Queen did, to propagate Piety and good Manners through the whole Island, and to ease the Inhabitants of a great Expence in sending their Children to a great Distance, for the Advantage of Education.

An University erected at Dublin.

Not long before this, Hugh O-Donell, whom Sir John Perott, the Lord-Deputy, had secur'd on board a Ship, and afterwards confin'd in the Castle of Dublin, to prevent his raising any new Commotions; got out of Prison, and sent the Lord-Deputy word, that his Father had con-sign'd

1591. Ann. 34. fign'd to him the Authority of O-Donel, viz. the Government of Tir-Conell: And from that Inftant he began to rebel in Ireland, as Bothwel did in Scotland. Of whom it may not be amifs to add a Word or two, (tho' it may feem a Digreffion, to meddle with the Affairs of Scotland) becaufe thefe Matters are fo link'd and twifted with the Tranfactions here at home, that they will give Light to the following Hiftory, which would otherwife appear more difficult and perplexed.

O-Donel rebels in Ireland.

Bothwel having been charged with dealing in Witchcraft, had now broke out of Prifon, and maintaining a moft implacable Hatred againft Maitland, the Lord-Chancellor, whom he fufpected as the principal Party in his Impeachment; and having a mind likewife to get both him and the King into his power, about the end of December he broke into the King's Palace at Edinburgh, and with a Party of Englifh and Scotch Borderers, attempted to force open the Queen's Chamber, to fire the King's Lodgings, and to feize upon the Lord-Chancellor's Houfe, all at the fame time: But he was foon repulfed and put to flight by the Citizens that gather'd together upon this Occafion. Some of his Followers were hanged for their pains, and the Hammer was fix'd to the Queen's Chamber-door in remembrance of the Fact.

1592. The Five and Thirtieth Year of her Reign.

Bothwel proclaimed a Traitor.

The beginning of this Year, the King by Proclamation declar'd, 'That Bothwel was the Author of this bold and dangerous Attempt: That he was moreover fo entirely abandon'd to Vice, and loft to all fenfe of Vertue, as through an infolent Pride to trample on the Laws of God and Man: That fince his return from Italy, he had been at the bottom of all Commotions, whether he were directly concern'd in 'em or not: That he had barbaroufly murder'd David Humes, and receiv'd his Pardon for that Crime; but that he now defied the Laws, and feemed to take Sanctuary in repeated Villanies; and fo much the more, becaufe an Italian Wizard had told him, That he was in danger of receiving a juft Fate from the Anger of his provok'd Prince: That his Apprehenfions grew upon him after the Murder of William Stuart of Achiltre, the King's Servant: That from that time he began to herd with a Gang of loofe and profligate Fellows, as bad as himfelf: That he confpir'd with the Pope and the Spanifh King to ruin both Kingdoms: That he afterwards join'd with thofe, who out of a private Grudge had taken up Arms againft fome Courtiers, at Deebridge, a Place far diftant from the Court: That as foon as the King began his March, they threw down their Arms; but that he himfelf encamp'd near Edinburgh, the King's Refidence, intercepted feveral Perfons, and did not withdraw till the King was in the Field juft ready to engage him: That not long after, he applied himfelf to the Black Art, and confulted with Necromancers and Witches, how to take the King off when he was in Denmark, out of a Confcioufnefs of his Guilt, and the Hopes he had conceiv'd of efcaping fcot-free, and fecuring the Crown to himfelf: That being hereupon caft into Prifon, and juft upon his Enlargement on certain Terms and Conditions, his Confcience ftung him to that degree, that he broke the Prifon, and getting together a Gang of defperate Debauchées, attack'd the King's Palace with no other Defign than to tyrannize with more Security when he had murder'd the King's Perfon, and in him the Laws of the Land: That he made a very ftrict Search for the King, fet his Chamber-door on fire, attempted to force open the Queen's Lodgings with an Hammer, flew fome of the King's Servants, and wounded others, and all this out of pure Malice to the King. The King therefore commanded, that no Man fhould harbour or relieve him or his Accomplices, upon fuch Pains and Penalties as are allotted to the Receivers and Harbourers of Traitors.' 1592. Ann. 35.

I fhall refer it to the Scottifh Hiftory, which is chiefly concern'd in the Relation, to give an Account of the Earl of Huntley's purfuing him, authoriz'd by this Proclamation, and the Chancellor's Inftigation; how he affaulted Murray's Houfe, who had conceal'd Bothwel; how Murray was flain, and Huntley imprifon'd for the Fact, and in a fhort time bail'd out on Security given for his Appearance at his Trial; of his Return home afterwards, and the infolent and rude Treatment he there met with from the Clan-Hattons and Murray's Friends, who feemed refolved upon a Revenge. However, it will be of ufe in purfuing the Thread of our Englifh Hiftory to touch upon the following Particulars.

Bothwel having got together a loofe Gang of Fellows from the Borders, and out of England, where he had for fome time skulked, returned into Scotland, and once more outraged the King, in the Month of June, at his Houfe at Falkland, but with the fame Succefs as before: For no fooner did the Courtiers oppofe him, but he fled into England as faft as his Fears could drive him. The Chancellor however was removed from Court upon his Friends Sollicitations. In the mean while, the Jefuits were every where very induftrious with the Nobles to advance the Romifh Intereft: And the Clergy at the fame time, for the Defence and Prefervation of their Religion, prefer'd a Bill in Parliament, 'To have all thofe excommunicated who refufed to join in the Service of the Kirk of Scotland; and if they continued obftinate the fpace of a Year, that their Lands and Chattels fhould be forfeited during their Lives.'

He molefts the Court again.

Amongft the excommunicated Party was one George Kerr, a Doctor of Law, who defigning before the Year's end to travel into Spain, was fo clofely and briskly purfued by the Clergy, that they took him juft as he was ready to go on board; and in their Search of his Things they found feveral Blanks, fome in the Form of Letters Miffive directed to the King of Spain, others relating to private Leagues, and every one of them fubfcribed and figned with the Names and Seals of William Earl of Angus, George Earl of Huntley, Francis Earl of Aroll, and Patrick Gourdon of Achindon: But thefe Circumftances will be better left to the Scotch Writers, who are more fully acquainted with them.

'Tis now time to return to the Affairs of England; for never was Ireland in a more compofed State. However a very exact Enquiry was made all the Ifland over into the Life and Morals of Sir John Perrot, the late Lord-Deputy, who was chofe one of the Queen's Privy-Council for the faithful and honourable Difcharge of his Truft there. But the Lord-Chancellor Hatton, who had a Creature of his own to prefer, and other of Perrot's Enemies at Court, fpared no pains to get him out of his Place, under pretence of his being a very proud Man; and fo far the matter went, that having got one or two Irifh Evidences to inform againft him, he was brought to his Trial in April, tho' the Lord Hatton was dead, and Burleigh ufed all poffible means to prevent it. The Commiffioners were Henry Lord Hunfdon, Thomas Lord Buckhurft, Sir Robert Cecil, the Lord Burleigh's

An Enquiry after Sir John Perrot's Life.

His Trial.

1592. Ann. 35.

Burleigh's Son, (who being a Gentleman of promising Parts, was of late an Assistant to his Father in State-Matters, and made a Privy-Counsellor) besides Sir John Fortescue, Sir John Wolley, and some other Justices.

His Charge,

He was impeach'd, in the first place, 'for having abused the Queen's Person, by contumelious Expressions; saying, that she was illegitimate, inquisitive, and faint-hearted: That she was no Lover of Soldiers, and had hindred him from reducing Ulster; and that one time or other she would want his Assistance. Secondly, That he had fostered and relieved Popish Priests, and notorious Traitors. Thirdly, That he had held private Correspondence with the Prince of Parma, and the Queen's Enemies. Fourthly, That he had fomented the Commotions raised by O-Rorke, and those of the Clan of Burgh.'

and Answer.

He did not deny, but that he had thrown out some reflecting Words upon the Queen's Person, but alledged that those Expressions proceeded not from Want of a just Regard for the Queen. He professed himself to be very much concerned, that through an indiscreet Passion he should ever let fall such Expressions; the Occasion of which was, his being hindred from carrying on the good Designs he had begun in Ireland. As for the rest of the Charge, it being neither made out by clear Proof, nor competent Witnesses, he got clear of it, as a Person no ways deserving the Character of being a Friend to Popery.

Amongst the Witnesses that appeared against him, was Philip Williams, formerly his Secretary; Dionyse O-Roghan, an Irish married Priest, to whom he had given a Pardon for Life, after having counterfeited his Hand, in hopes of discovering the Practices of the Priests through his means; and last of all, Walton, a Man of stain'd Reputation. After he had maintained stoutly his own Charge against Popham, the Queen's Attorney, and the other Council, till Eleven at Night; he was by the Jury brought in guilty of Treason: But the Sentence of Death was deferred till another day; which it being absolutely necessary to pass in Form of Law, at the Instigation of his Enemies, it was pronounced about twenty days after; and a Report went, that Burleigh shed Tears at the same time, for the unhappy Fate of that Gentleman, and said, with a Sigh, That the more unjust any Man's Malice is, so much the more keen and barbarous 'tis of course. O-Roghan the Priest had a Pension of 40 l. per ann. assign'd him. As for Perrot, he fell sick in the Tower, and died in September; when he had hopes of Life, through the Queen's Clemency, who was now appeased. Hereupon she was often heard to applaud that Rescript of Theodosius, Honorius, and Arcadius; If any Person speak ill of the Emperor, through a foolish Rashness and Inadvertency, it is to be despised; if out of Madness, it deserves Pity; if from Malice and Aversion, it calls for Mercy.

Perrot dies in the Tower.

His Estate went, by the Queen's Favour, (as he had formerly settled it) to his Son, who married the Earl of Essex's Sister. Thus did a Gentleman, otherwise very well deserving, occasion his own Ruin, by the ill Management of his Tongue. For sure it is, that reflecting Speeches cannot but leave a scurvy Tincture of Resentment on the Minds of Princes.

We have formerly observed, that the French King encamped the last Year, when cold Weather came on, against Rouen, with the English Auxiliaries under the Command of the Earl of Essex; and there he wintered, inconveniently enough, with the small Forces he had. On the Approach of the Spring, when the King had pretty well fatigued himself with the Hardships of a Winter-Siege, and finding himself not strong enough to take so well fortified a City; he forbore making any nearer Approaches, (tho' he had a Supply of 2000 fresh Men from England) and made no farther Attempts: Nor would he listen to Essex, who being led on by a Desire of Glory, undertook to make a Breach, and enter the City with the English Forces. (But the Truth is, the French were too cautious a People to expose a wealthy City, which they hoped in a short time to get into their own Hands, to be plundered by those of the English.) Essex despairing now of doing any great Feats, after he had (to no purpose) sent a Challenge to Villars, the Governour of Rouen to fight him singly; left the Care of his Men to Sir Roger Williams, and took leave of the French

Essex returns out of France.

King, in order to return for England. For the Queen called him home, and his Friends acquainted him, that his Enemies at Court had possessed the Queen against him, and made their Advantage of his Absence. Within a few Days after,

Fr. King quits the Siege of Rouen.

the French King himself was forced to break up this tedious Siege; his Men daily revolting from him, the Enemy making frequent Sallies, and the Prince of Parma being just ready to attack him: Wherefore he left some of his Forces in the Camp, and returned with the rest to Diep. The Prince of Parma was now a second time invited into France, by those of the Association; and he and his Son Rainutio brought an Army thither once more; and making a Feint, as if he designed the Relief of the Garrison of Chaumert, they took Chasteau-Neuf. After this he had good Success in a small Skirmish with the King's Horse at Aumarle, which animated the People of Rouen to that degree, that they made a Sally, fell on the King's Camp, and seized his Ordnance. Parma returned after this to Abbeville, as if with an Intention to go home; and the King supposing he had been gone, and being straiten'd for Provisions, brake up the Siege, and disbanded a great part of his Army: But the Prince of Parma, just nicking the Opportunity, carried on his Design with new Supplies, took Caudebeck, and open'd the River Seine, for a Conveyance of Provisions to the City, which was now half famished. His Entrance into Rouen flushed and hardened the Rebels; but being too politick a Soldier to engage the Enemy, he soon returned home, with the Loss of his Health, and a great Number of Men. How bravely the English behaved themselves on this Occasion, when the Van of the Leaguers Army were beat out of their Trenches, and routed at Tuccourt, the King himself was pleased to take notice, in some Letters to the Queen, dated from Viccara-ville; wherein he applauded Sir Roger Williams, as a second Cæsar, and bestowed great Commendations on Sir Matthew Morgan.

Parma returns.

English Valour.

The King being almost crush'd with the weight of so tedious a War, was forced to apply once more to the Queen for fresh Recruits of Provision and 6000 Men, for the British Service. She agreed to furnish him with 4000, besides some Pieces of Ordnance; and hereupon entred into a Contract with Bevoir Noclé, and Sancy, who were sent as Deputies from the King. The Conditions were; 'That the King should neither make Peace with the Associators, unless they first submitted themselves, and joined with him in driving the Spaniards out of France; nor with the Spaniards, unless with her Consent: That he should put into the Hands of the English, whilst they were employed in Bretagne, a fortified Town, and some Haven for a Retreat: That he should add of his own 4000 Foot, and 1000 Horse: That he should in a Year's time repay the Charges of transporting the Forces, and all the Money which went to pay the Soldiers;

Succours sent again to the French.

1592. Ann. 35.

'diers; and that this Contract should be recorded in the Chamber of Accounts.' Hereupon Norris, who had been call'd home to inform the Queen of the State of things in Bretagne, was sent again thither in October: Where the French not joining with him, according to Promise, but instead of that, sending him from thence from place to place, and ordering his Forces into La-Main and Normandy; (whilst the Spaniards in the mean time fortify'd themselves in Bretagne.) The Queen resented it very highly, and often demanded the Performance of Conditions; tho' to no purpose. And she had probably call'd her Men home, but that she was certainly inform'd, that the Prince of Parma had a Design of making a third Expedition into France, with Recruits for the Spanish Army in Bretagne, and in order to secure the Sea-Ports there.

Who break the conditions.

But during his Preparations for this Descent, he was taken away by Death, having been fourteen Years the King of Spain's Vice-Roy in the Government of the Netherlands. He was a Prince that had all the Accomplishments fit for a General, and had deserv'd the highest Love and Respect, even from his Enemies. Queen Elizabeth never named him but with great Regard and Commendation; but yet with so prudent a Reserve, that her Praises might no way turn to his Prejudice.

Death of the Prince of Parma.

The Queen, in the mean time, who knew very well, that the King of Spain advanced his Arms, not so much by the Strength of his Country, as the Advantage of the American Gold, which let him into the Cabinets of Princes, debauch'd their Councils, and stole away the Honesty of their Subjects; resolv'd to send Sir Walter Raleigh into America, with 15 Men of War, to seize on Panama, whither the Gold is brought, to be put on board; or else to intercept the Spanish Fleet. But having the ill Fortune to be detain'd in Port, for three Months together, by contrary Winds, he set sail a little too late: Having pass'd Cape Finisbre, or the Land's-End, he receiv'd a most certain Account, that the King of Spain had given positive Orders, that not a Ship should sail from America this Year. Shortly after, the English Fleet was separated by a violent Storm, and they lost their Long-boats; so that his Project was quash'd: and he, designing to return, divided his Fleet into two Squadrons; one of which he entrusted to Sir John Borroughs's second Son, and the other to Sir Martin Forbisher. He order'd Sir Martin to cruize upon the Coasts of Spain, and to prevent any Ships from coming into Harbour: And he commanded Sir John Borroughs to wait at the Azores, to surprize the Caracks that came from the East-Indies. And this Attempt was not altogether without Success; for the Spanish Admiral was most intent upon Forbisher, and neglected the Safety of the Caracks. Borroughs, besides that he took some small Vessels from the Spaniards, and escaped a very notable Danger, by his Conduct and Courage, being hemm'd in between the Spanish Shoar and the Enemy's Fleet; arrived safely at Sancta Cruce, a small Town in the Isle of Flores; and in a few days got Sight of a Spanish Carack, which was chased by three English Ships, under Command of the Earl of Cumberland, and very likely to fall into their Hands, but that they were becalm'd and could not come up with her: A Storm, however, arose in the Night, which obliged both the English and Portuguese to weigh Anchor. At break of day, the English observ'd, that the Portuguese were unlading the Carack in a great Hurry, at the Flores; and upon the Approach of the English they immediately set her on fire. Borroughs being inform'd by one or two Prisoners he had taken, that there were other larger Caracks behind, ranged what Ships he had for two Leagues together, near the Island, and spread them to such a Latitude, as that they could easily discern whatever was around them, at a great Distance. They had not tarry'd long, before a large Carack, call'd the Mother of God, which was 165 Foot from Stem to Stern, and a seven-deck'd Ship, came in Sight, most richly laden, and with 600 Men on board.

Raleigh sent into America.

Design fails.

Boroughs chases a Spanish Carack.

1592. Ann. 35.

The English play'd furiously upon her with their great Guns, and fired in Broad-sides upon her, being animated with the Hopes of a considerable Prize: But they soon sheer'd off again, being something surpriz'd at the Talness of the Ship, and the Number of Men to defend her; till Sir Robert Cross laid the Queen's Ship, call'd the Providence, athwart her Stern, and stood the Brunt singly for three Hours together: After which, the other Ships ply'd her so warmly, especially at the Stern, that no Man had the Courage to stand at the Helm any longer. The first that boarded her was Cross himself, follow'd by several others. The Victory obtain'd, they found every Place full of slaughter'd Bodies, and a confused Heap of dead and dying Men, which with the maim'd and wounded, who lay every where scatter'd up and down, made a very lamentable Spectacle: So that the very Sight inclined them to use their Success with Clemency and Moderation. The Prize, when 'twas brought home, was valued (on Report) at 150000 l. Sterling; besides what the Officers and Seamen had pilfer'd and got into their own Clutches. But although Commissioners were appointed to make strict Search after the Men and Goods, as having stoln the Custom; and a Proclamation was issu'd out, as several others had been before, that they should produce the Goods they had purloin'd or convey'd away, upon pain of being prosecuted as Thieves and Pirates; yet did they manage the Roguery too dexterously for the Commissioners Care, or the Rigour of the Proclamation to lay any hold upon 'em; for they forswore the Fact, and that secured them. And they were observ'd to say, That they had rather trust a merciful God with their Souls, tho' stain'd with Perjury; than venture their Money, which they had got with so much Danger and Pains, into the Hands of unmerciful Men.

Takes another.

Some of the Booty imbezeled.

Nor was the Dishonesty of some particular Merchants less infamous, who, upon the breaking out of a dangerous War between Spain and England, (tho' not yet declared) privately furnish'd the Spaniards with Brass and Iron Guns for their Shipping; which the Queen being made sensible of, prohibited the Exportation of them, under such Penalties, as are due to those who aid and assist the Enemies of their Country; and withal, she forbad the Iron workers from that time forward to cast any Ordnance bigger than those we call Minions. and those not above sixteen thousand Pound Weight.

Merchants send Guns to Spain.

The Queen, in her Summer Progress, pass'd through Oxford, and stay'd there several days; where she was agreeably entertain'd with elegant Speeches, Plays, and Disputations; and receiv'd a splendid Treat from the Lord Buckhurst, Chancellor of the University. At her Departure she took her leave of them in a Latin Oration, whereby she let them know, that she prefer'd the sincere and cordial Respects of that learned Body, to all their Entertainments; tho' they too were very acceptable to her. She return'd 'em abundance of Thanks for their Civility, made a short Prayer, and left some good Advice with them. Her Prayer was, that as she desired nothing more earnestly, than the Safety, Honour and Happiness of the whole Kingdom; so, that the University (which

Q. visits Oxford

(which was one of the Lights thereof) might 1592. flourish and rise up every day to a greater Lu-
Ann. 35. stre: Then for her Advice, it was this, that they would in the first place be careful to serve God, not with the novel and fantastical Devotion practis'd by some, but according to the Laws of God and the Land: That they would not outrun the Laws, but follow them; nor dispute the Fitness and Authority of them; but sincerely obey those that were in Force, and submit to their Superiours: And, in the last place, that they would preserve Peace, Union and good Agreement among themselves.

There was both this Summer, and the last, so great a Drought all England over; that the Fields were burnt, and the Fountains dry'd up, and a great many Beasts perish'd every where for want of Water. The Thames likewise, the noblest River of all Britain, and which has as full and large a Tide as any in Europe, (for it flows twice a day above 60 Miles from the Mouth of it, and receives an Increase from the Mixture of many other Streams and Rivers with it) was however sunk to that degree, (to the Wonder of all Men) on the 5th of September; that a Man might ride over it near London-Bridge; so shallow was the Channel. Whether this Effect was owing to that Drought, or the Violence of a strong South-West Wind, which blew hard for two Days together, and so drove the fresh Waters upwards, and kept back the Sea Tide at the same time, I cannot determine; especially the Moon being then at the Full, and Southerly, and the Sun near the Equinoctial; at which Season Seamen have remark'd, that there are the highest Tides in the River Thames. Some there were, who maintain'd from Philosophy, that this was occasion'd by some occult Quality in Nature; and affirm'd, 'That as a Quartan Ague returns precisely at its Hour, as the Gout observes its Time, as a Purgation keeps a stated Period, unless some Impediment be in the Way; and as the Fœtus is ripe at its Month; so have the Waters certain Spaces and Distances for their ebbing and flowing: But some being lesser than others, are therefore the more easily observ'd; though the greater are no less certain than the other. Nor is this to be wonder'd at, when we see, the whole Order and Course of Nature turns, upon set and determinate Seasons. The Winter has never yet miscarry'd, and the Summer-Heat has return'd in its Season: The Spring and Fall succeed one another as they us'd to do; and the Solstice and Equinoctial keep their exact Times and Measures. There are likewise some Laws and Periods in the subterranean World; which tho' we know little of, yet are they as fix'd as the Center of it. We may easily conceive, that the same Cause which governs the visible Earth, is observ'd in Proportion, in the Regions beneath it.'

Thames very low.

A Guess at its Cause.

L. Montacute dies.

This Year died Anthony Brown Viscount Montacute, (Son of Anthony, Master of the Queen's Horse, and Standard-Bearer of England) whom Queen Mary honour'd with this Title, because his Grand-mother was the Daughter and one of the Heirs of John Nevill Marquess Montacute. She likewise made him Knight of the Garter, and sent him to Rome, with some other Gentlemen, to tender Obedience to that See, in the Name and Behalf of the whole Kingdom. Queen Elizabeth having experienced his Loyalty, had a great Esteem for him, (tho' he was a stiff Romanist) and pay'd him a Visit some time before his Death: For she was sensible that his Regard for that Religion, was owing to his Cradle and Education, and proceeded rather from Principle, than Faction, as some People's Faith did. He was succeeded by Anthony, his Grand-son, who very commendably follow'd the good Example 1592. set him by his Grand-father. Ann. 35.

As does L. Scrope.

About the same time died Henry Lord Scrope, of Bolton, who was likewise Knight of the Garter, and Warden of the West-March towards Scotland; a Person whom I have made frequent Mention of. He left for his Successor his Son Thomas, whom he had by Margaret Howard, Sister to Thomas, the last Duke of Norfolk.

Nor must we forget Sir Christopher Wray, Lord Chief-Justice of the Queen's-Bench; a Person mention'd more than once already, and whose Memory is valuable upon the account of that profound Knowledge he had in the Law; as well as for the Probity of his Life and Actions. He was happy in his Family, and was a great Benefactor to Magdalen-College in Cambridge. He was succeeded in his Office by John Popham, the Queen's Attorney; a Person of a bitter Temper and censorious Disposition.

The Six and thirtieth Year of her Reign. 1593.

A Parliament meets.

In February the Parliament met at Westminster, and made several good Laws, to restrain Dissenters, and Popish Recusants, denying themselves, and dissuading others from holding Communion with the Church of England; concerning the Revenues of Monasteries and other religious Houses granted to Hen. VIII. the Relief and Maintenance of Soldiers and Seamen; the not Building of any Houses, within three Miles of the City of London; and several other Matters. And when they had closely debated and weigh'd (as the Acts of Parliament themselves declare) how earnestly bent the Enemies of our Constitution were, upon the Ruin of England; having already subdu'd our confederated Forces in France, Scotland, and Holland, and seiz'd on all the Places that lay convenient for annoying England: they thought it proper to provide necessary Supplies to divert this impending Danger. Then, after bestowing large Encomiums upon the prudent and wise Conduct of a Maiden-Queen, temper'd with that affectionate Care and Regard for her Subjects; who had disburs'd so vast a Supply from her own Treasury, to carry on a War (with good and happy Success) against an opulent and potent Enemy; as none of her Ancestors had ever done before: and all this, without any burdensome Grants from her People; tho' she had occasion not only to act on the Defensive, but to assist and support her Allies: On this account, the Clergy freely and chearfully consented to advance two entire Subsidies, and the Laity three; together with six Fifteenths and Tenths, to be paid at a certain time or Date. But they humbly requested withal, That forasmuch as those Acts were to be kept upon Record, a Caveat might be enter'd in express Terms, that these large and unusual Grants, which were made to a most excellent Princess, on a most pressing and extraordinary occasion, might not at any time hereafter be drawn into a Precedent. The Queen coming into the House on the last Day of the Session, to give her Royal Assent and Confirmation to the Laws that were made; after a solemn Profession of her Love to her People, was pleas'd to make this Protestation, in the first place: 'That her first Care and Concern had ever been for the Advancement of God's Glory, and that of the Publick; and that she had apply'd her constant Endeavours to this end.' She then represented, in a very few Words, but full of Weight and Sense, 'how free she had always been from Abjectness or Despondency of Spirit, since having God and a good Conscience

Queen's Speech to them.

'for

1592. Ann. 36.

'for her Security, she knew not how to fear 'the most powerful Enemies that could assault 'her.' After this, to encourage her Subjects, she said a great deal of the Bravery of the English; and among other things, 'That their E'nemies knew to their Cost, that the English Na'tion are embolden'd by a kind of Native Cou'rage, to look Danger in the Face; as they had 'often prov'd, if they would not disguise the 'Matter; and would hereafter have occasion to 'do, to the still greater Advance of the English 'Glory and Honour. Let the English only look 'about them, and not suffer themselves to be 'surprized; and their Enemies would soon per'ceive, that it would cost them dear, to pro'voke a Nation so able to revenge its own Cause.' She concluded with her Thanks for the Supplies of Money they had granted, and promis'd to employ all her Thoughts upon Religion, and the Care of her People*.

* See the Appendix.

Barrow the great Sectary executed.

How just she was to the first Part of her Promise, the Care of Religion, you may learn from the Church-History of that time, in the Punishment she inflicted on Henry Barrow and his Followers, who began to disturb the Peace of the Church, by advancing monstrous Opinions, crying down the Church of England, and lessening the Queen's Prerogative in Matters Spiritual: And how well she acquitted herself as to the Civil State, will appear from what follows.

The Queen took no less Pains to weaken and divert the Spaniards, and drive them out of Bretagne in France, than she did to keep them off from Scotland; being very much afraid, lest the Confusions which were on foot in that Kingdom, might open a Gap, to let in the Spaniards, to the absolute Destruction both of that and England. For she had not long since receiv'd most certain Intelligence, as I hinted before, that the Catholick Noblemen in Scotland had, by the Help of the Priests, conspired to let the Spaniards into Scotland, to change the Face of Religion there, and to invade England from that Quarter; and that Creighton the Jesuite, who was, by reason of his great Age, enlarged from his Confinement, upon giving his solemn Word, that he would attempt nothing against England, was, for that purpose, frequently dispatch'd into Holland and Spain.

Queen's Care of Scotland.

The Queen likewise readily foresaw, what an easie matter it would be, to debauch the common sort of People in the West of Scotland, being generally poor and indigent, by some round Offers of Spanish Gold. She likewise reflected what convenient Sea-ports they had in those Parts, from whence they might land their Forces without the least Opposition; what a warlike Nation it was, and how well provided with Cavalry; and how easily they might enter England from thence, as it were by a Back-door: Add to all this, that those of the English, who lie in the Neighbourhood of Scotland, were a sort of fickle and unsteady Subjects; most of them either Papists, or true Lovers of Change and Novelty, that subsisted upon bare Hope and Prospect: And then again, that the Assailants are generally more active and couragious, than those who are put upon the Defensive; because they seem to be reduced to the Cast of a Die, whether their Estates shall be their own, or not.

She sends to the K.

The Queen therefore communicates all this to the King of Scots, and advises him to crush betimes the Power of those Scottish Nobles; to exercise his Royal Authority upon his seditious Subjects, and not shew himself as it were the Shadow of a King. He, for his part, was very well prepared to follow this Advice, and put out very severe Laws against the Catholicks and their Abettors, punish'd David Graham of Fentre, one of the Association, and pursu'd and easily routed the Earls of Angus, Huntley, and Arrol. In the mean while, Bothwell lay skulking in England, and sent fawning Letters to the Queen, (whose Favour he had very little deserv'd) back'd with large Promises, that were he once more re-admitted into his Prince's Favour, he would serve him most faithfully, and do his best to crush the Spanish Faction in Scotland: Wherefore he humbly intreated the Queen to mediate with the King his Master, for his Pardon. But she finding that the King very much stomach'd his being receiv'd in England, was so far incens'd at the Impudence of the Man, for daring to assault his Prince, God's Image and Vice-gerent, and to bring him into daily Fears and Apprehensions; that she sent the Lord Borough Ambassador into Scotland, to assure the King, in her Majesty's Name, that Bothwell had clandestinely stoln into England, and that she would certainly punish those that harbour'd or reliev'd him. His Commission was likewise to inflame the King yet further against the Spanish Faction, and to set up an opposite Association of Protestants in Scotland, for the Preservation of the King's Person, and the joint Defence of the Religion of the Kingdom, against all foreign and seditious Attempts whatever: And this Association was enter'd into in a very short time after. Upon the King's Return from the North, the Lord Borough requested this of him in Writing: 'That he would please to certify the 'Queen of any Attempts or Designs the Spa'nish Faction might have upon England, and that 'he would be so just to protect the Crown from 'any Usurpations upon it: That if he could not 'do Justice on the Persons of those Traitors, he 'would at least confiscate their Estates: That 'he would admit none to his Council, but Per'sons of known and experienced Loyalty; and 'that he would inform the Queen of all these 'Particulars, under his own Hand, to make it 'appear to her and other Princes of the same 'Perswasion, what Care he had taken to oppose 'the common Enemy: And in the last place, 'that he would listen to an Accomodation with 'the Borderers.' If he would consent to these Terms, he promis'd, that her Majesty would be wanting in no possible Service to him, and that she had already inflicted strict Penalties on those of her Subjects, that had conceal'd Bothwell.

1593. Ann. 36.

Queen's Demands.

King's Answer.

To all this he answer'd severally, That he had already given the Queen Intimations of all that he knew of the Spaniards Designs: That he had pursued and manag'd the Rebels to the best advantage he could: That he had put some to Death, and fin'd others, and put Commissioners in possession of their Estates, and that he design'd to Outlaw them every one by an Act of Parliament: That after the Outlawry, he would dispose of their Estates: That he would choose of his Council Persons of Probity, who were sincerely affected to the Religion and Happiness of their Country: That he would ratify and confirm all this by a Writing under his own Hand: That as for the Borderers, and what related to them, he would be sure to observe the strictest measures he could; but that he thought it but reasonable that the Queen should advance Supplies for the carrying on of these Matters, and send her Assistance as well to the subduing the Spanish Faction, as the Rebels, who were now grown every way Formidable. He required in the last place, That she would severely prosecute Bothwel's Abettors; and that she would deliver him up, and where ever he happen'd to be found in England, as an Instance of Treachery and Perfidiousness, which all Princes were oblig'd to abhor Bothwel demanded out of England.

1593. Ann. 36.

abhor and deteſt; and therefore he could not but eſteem them his utter Enemies, whoever they were, that gave the leaſt Countenance to ſo profeſs'd a Foe of his King and Country. Nevertheleſs ſome Scotchmen, having poſſeſs'd the Queen that the King was favourably inclin'd to the Catholick Peers in Scotland, ſhe made anſwer to Robert Melvin, who came to demand Bothwel, and to ask ſome Aids againſt the Rebels, 'That Bothwel ſhould be ſurrender'd according to the Articles of the former Treaties, or elſe baniſh'd out of England; and that as for Supplies, they were not, according to the purport of the Treaty, to be lent againſt any but Foreigners.' However ſome Money was ſent, and Bothwel, who had been declar'd a Traitor by the States of the Realm, being now return'd privately to thoſe of his Party, was conducted by his Friends as privately to the King's Chamber, where, to the King's great ſurprize, he threw himſelf on his Knees, caſt his Sword on the Floor, and implor'd the King's Mercy and Pardon, which he obtain'd at laſt, at the Inſtance of thoſe who were with him, and upon certain Conditions to be obſerv'd by him, viz. That he ſhould immediately depart from the King's Preſence: That he ſhould be ready to anſwer the Charge of conſulting with Wizards; and that he ſhould attempt nothing againſt the King's Miniſters. If he could not clear himſelf as to the point of dealing in Witchcraft, he ſhould depart the Kingdom, and diſpoſe of himſelf as the King ſhould direct, and there ſtay during his Royal Pleaſure.

He returns into Scotland.

For all this, the Day after he had receiv'd his Pardon, he ſeiz'd forcibly on ſome of the King's Servants in the Court; and his Party was ſo prevalent there, that the King was not only oblig'd to reſtore both him and his Followers to the poſſeſſion of their Eſtates, for his own and the Kingdoms preſent Safety, but to remove from Court his moſt faithful Friends, the Chancellor and the Treaſurer, with the Lord Humes, and George Humes.

The King aſſerts his Authority.

But now the King, having conſider'd in the very Anguiſh of his Heart, what Conceſſions he had made, not only againſt his own Inclinations, but abſolutely unworthy of the Royal Character, he declar'd openly in Parliament, 'That he could look on himſelf as no other than a Captive: That he was evidently Bothwel's Priſoner; and, That he could no longer endure that a mutinous Subject ſhould dare to Inſult his Miniſtry, after having had the Boldneſs to Outrage him three ſeveral times within the Walls of his Palace.'

Upon this he got the States to declare him forthwith a Prince abſolutely Free to exerciſe his Royal Power, and chuſe what Miniſters he thought fit. He then recall'd the Chancellor, and the reſt of his Friends, to Court; and revoked thoſe Grants which he had ſo unwillingly made to Bothwel. But ſo merciful a Prince was he, as to forgive all the Crimes which that ill Man and his Accomplices had acted againſt him, and made them an Offer of their Eſtates too, if they would ask 'em in a ſuppliant manner, and keep peaceably at home, and not come to Court till they were call'd. As for Bothwel, he was to go beyond Sea within a prefix'd time, and to ſtay at ſome places of the King's Appointment, during his Pleaſure: Such mighty Changes did ſo ſmall a Time produce in the Court; and Bothwel accordingly was baniſh'd for a little time; or, to ſpeak more properly, withdrew himſelf to the Borders of Scotland, where he retir'd to brew new and greater Miſchiefs. But neither did theſe Methods put an end to the Troubles in Scotland; for the Clergy were very Angry, and miſerably teaz'd the King for not proſecuting the Catholicks with the utmoſt Severity; inſomuch that they join'd themſelves in a Body, and without ſtaying for the Royal Orders, they ſummon'd the Lords and Commons to a Convention, to prevent any Damage that might accrue to the State of the Church or Kingdom.

Bothwel baniſhed.

About this time, there were publiſh'd in Germany ſeveral infamous Libels againſt the Queen; inſinuating, That ſhe had concern'd herſelf in ſtirring up the Turk to advance his Arms againſt Chriſtendom; and there were certain Letters produced, which ſhe had ſent to the Great Turk, but with ſeveral malicious Alterations, and falſe and ſcandalous Additions. The Queen did ſo well juſtify her Honour from theſe ſlanderous Aſperſions, by a Meſſage ſent on purpoſe to the Emperor, that the Pamphlets were call'd in, the Prints forbidden, and the Copies burnt at Prague, and ſhe, for her part, uſed all her Endeavours againſt the Turk, as the Emperor readily and freely acknowledg'd. Nor indeed had ſhe any thing to do with him, farther than to procure her Subjects a free Trade in his Country. To which purpoſe ſhe ſettled an Agent at Conſtantinople, to tranſact Buſineſs there at the Merchant's Coſt; juſt the ſame as the French, the Polanders, the Republick of Venice, and other States, had done.

Q. El[illegible] clears herſel[illegible] ſome [illegible]ſperſi[illegible] in re[illegible] ba to [illegible] Gr. T[illegible]

The next Thing ſhe did, was the taking upon her an honourable Umpirage, in mediating a Peace between the Swede and the Muſcovite, and ſettling likewiſe a good Agreement between the Turk and Sigiſmond Bathor, Prince or Vaivod (as they call him) of Tranſilvania. For the Turk, it ſeems, exceeding the Limits which had been fixed by Compact, and impoſing ſuch Burdens, as did not only claſh with the tenour of that, but which were really intollerable in themſelves: The Vaivod Addreſſed her Majeſty by Stephen Kakaſy, That if ſhe had any Regard for him, ſhe would make uſe of her Intereſt in the Turkiſh Court, To put a ſtop to every ſort of Breach or Variation from the ancient Treaties, and to all Encroachments upon his Bounds and Poſſeſſions. This the Queen undertook, and happily effected, in conſideration that 'twas a Chriſtian People and Province which was concern'd, and as ſhe always lov'd to Succour and Relieve the Diſtreſſed.

Shem[illegible] Peac[illegible] twee[illegible] Swed[illegible] Muſ[illegible] and [illegible] & Va[illegible]

Norris ſpent an whole Winter the Year before in a vain Expectation of Mareſchal D' Aumont and Fr. Eſpinay of St. Luke, who promiſed to join him; in which time a Sickneſs ſwept away a great many of the Engliſh, and the Queen advanced a weekly Pay of above 3200 Pounds of Engliſh Money.

Norris's Acts in Bretagne.

In April, Eſpinay joins his Forces, and routs Ravender's, taking his Standard at St. Supplice; Guerch was likewiſe forced to ſurrender, and the Troops of the Governor of Laval were entirely defeated and put to flight, but not without the loſs of a great many Men, and among the reſt, Randolph, Purley and Chriſtmas, brave Commanders on the Engliſh ſide. When D' Aumont ſtill put off his coming into Bretaigne, and no Place of Refuge was yet granted to the Engliſh, the Queen calls Norris home; and D' Aumont on the other ſide preſſes hard for his ſtay, and makes repeated Inſtances that ſome freſh Recruits ſhould be ſent over.

Whilſt the Queen is aſſiſting France, under the preſent Exigence and Difficulty of Affairs, at ſo vaſt an Expence, and with ſuch an infinite Trouble to herſelf; there was a Report ſpread on a ſudden all over England, That the King was either turn'd Catholick already, or elſe reſolv'd to do ſo. Wherefore Thomas Wilks is diſpatch'd away thither to learn the truth of the matter; and if he had not yet changed his Religion, to dissuade him from a Revolt by the best Arguments he could use, and to put 'em in Writing. But before his Arrival, the King had made a solemn Profession of the Romish Faith at the Church of St. Denis; tho' there were some of the religious Orders of that Church, that at the same time laid Snares for his Life. However he gave Wilks an ingenuous and clear Account of the Reasons inducing him to abjure his Religion, in Terms to this effect. 'As soon (says he) as I was made King of France, I took an Oath to learn the Principles of the Romish Religion within a certain time; and this was the very Condition of my being admitted to the Crown. I have defer'd this Exercise these four Years, and was at last brought to it with some Reluctancy: For when the King, my Predecessor, was dead, I was under a kind of necessity to govern my self by the same Council and Ministry, and to take their Advices in all Matters of Debate; and they made a shift to manage or forestal all the Measures I could think of taking against the Conspirators, by such kinds of Artifices and Agreements, as to leave them altogether fruitless and unsuccessful. As for the Protestants, who were the best Friends I had to advise with, they were seldom or never at the Council Board, being so intirely taken up with Business of their own, that I was stript of those I had most reason to depend on, and was not without Apprehensions that the Romanists would desert me too; so that I was forc'd to take up with their Directions in my own Defence. I do moreover solemnly protest, that as soon as I was call'd to the Government, Eight hundred Persons of Quality, and nine Protestant Regiments revolted from me, and I could not preserve them on any Terms whatever; so that I had none left about me, but a few of my Domesticks, and some Gentlemen of my Chamber. The Catholicks, seeing me totally abandon'd by those of my own Persuasion, began to assume a Power, and press me to a Change of Principle; affirming, that true Catholicks could not, with any good Conscience, submit to an Heretick. Nevertheless I suspended the matter from one day to another, till they plainly discover'd my Weakness, and found it impossible for me, by the help of a few Friends, to be a match for the united Force of the Pope, the Leaguers, and the King of Spain; till a third Cabal was patch'd up out of the Princes of the Blood Royal, the Officers of the Crown, the Prelates, and several Noblemen, who began to form Measures with the Heads and Governments of Cities and Provinces, about deserting me, as a notorious Heretick, and sharing the Kingdom severally amongst themselves. When I could find no other way in the World to contravene the Projects of these Men, I gave 'em my Word, that I would inform myself in the Articles of the Romish Religion. They granted me a Month or two for my better Instruction; and sent some Persons away to Rome to procure me an Absolution and formal Admission into the Church. Those of the Cabal, to prevent this, made all the dispatch they could toward the chusing another King. A great many Noblemen assisted the Pretensions of the Duke of Guise, on Condition he would secure to them and their Heirs the several Governments they were in possession of. For these Reasons I resolv'd, upon mature Deliberation, to embrace the Romish Religion. The Bishops however refus'd me Admission into the Church, without the Pope's leave; at least, till I had put them beyond all fear, that they might accept of my Conversion, without the least Enquiry or Hesitation. By this means, I gain'd over the third Faction to my Interest: I prevented the Duke of Guise his Election: I secur'd the Love and Respect of the French Nation, engag'd the Friendship and Service of the Great Duke of Florence, in Things of the nearest Concernment to me, and at the same time preserv'd the Reputation of the Reform'd Religion, which must needs have suffer'd greatly, had my Change proceeded upon Dispute, or from Instruction.'

French K. leans to the Ch. of Rome.

way

1592. Ann. 36.

His Reasons for it.

The substance of this was, in the mean time, communicated by Morley to the Queen, who endeavour'd to colour over the Aims and Inclinations of his Prince with as fair Representations as might be. But the Queen was very much disturb'd at the matter, and under those Resentments took up a Pen and wrote the King the following Lines.

Q. Eliz. Letter on the King's change of Religion.

'Tis hardly possible to express the extreme Grief and Dissatisfaction which has seiz'd me upon Morley's representation of Things. Good God! what a miserable World do we live in! Could I ever have thought, Sir, that any secular Consideration could have prevail'd with you to discard a just sense of God and his Fear! Or, can you ever reasonably expect that Providence will grant this Change of yours an happy Issue? Or, could you, when you entred on it, entertain a Jealousy, that the gracious Being, who had so long supported and preserv'd you, would fail and abandon you at last? 'Tis, believe me, a dangerous Experiment, to do evil that good may come of it: But I hope you may be yet recover'd to a better Inclination, even the Spirit of a sound Mind. In the mean time, I shall not cease to recommend your Case to God in my daily Prayers, and earnestly to beseech him, that Esau's Hands may not pollute the Blessing and Birthright of Jacob. The promise you make of a sacred and friendly Alliance, I conceive myself to have deserv'd, and even earn'd at a vast Expence: But that I had not matter'd, had you still kept yourself the Son of the same Father. From henceforward I cannot look on myself as your Sister, in respect of our common Father, for I must, and shall always pay a much greater Regard to Nature than Choice in that Relation: As I may appeal to that God, whom I beseech to recover you into the Path of a safer and sounder Judgment.'

Subscribed,

Vôtre sœur, si ce soit à la vieille mode, avec Nouvelle je n'ay que faire.	'Your Sister after the Old-fashion'd way; as for Novelties, I have nothing to do with 'em.'
Elizabeth R.	Elizabeth R.

The better to allay the Grief she lay under on this account, the Queen entertain'd herself with the sacred Scriptures, the Writings of the holy Fathers, and in frequent Conferences with the Archbishop: Perhaps she might consult also the Prescriptions of Philosophy on this Occasion. I am very assur'd, that about this time she employ'd herself in reading Boethius, of the Consolation of Philosophy, which she render'd into very elegant English.

She translates Boethius.

When, among other Particulars, Wilks did now intimate to the King of France, that he had not been so good as his Word in the Affairs of Bretaign: That D'Aumont's Delay was not only doubly Prejudicial to the Queen, in the loſs of her Men, and the expence of her Money, but inſignificant in regard of himſelf; and that the Queen reſolved not to augment or maintain any Forces in Bretaign, unleſs they had a Grant of ſome convenient place of Retreat. The King caſt all the blame upon D'Aumont's Neglect, and promiſed to remedy thoſe Inconveniencies, and to provide a Place of Retreat, ſuch as his Council ſhould direct.

1593. Ann. 36.

French King excuſes his breach of promiſe.

This he gave the Queen an account of by Mony, a Perſon of Quality, and one of his Bed-Chamber; and acknowledged his Crown and Safety to be chiefly owing to her Majeſty, and promiſed withal to ſend an Army into Bretaign as ſoon as the Treaty was concluded, and his Affairs diſpatch'd.

Treaty between England & France.

In the mean time, a Treaty was made between him and the Queen at Melun, in the Month of Auguſt, under their Hands and Seals, and in the Faith and Word of Princes, to carry on a mutual War, Offenſive and Defenſive, againſt the King of Spain, as long as he ſhould be at Variance with Either; and to make no Peace on either ſide, but by each others Conſent, and ſo as both ſhould be included therein.

However, Bretaign was altogether neglected, France being torn with miſerable Convulſions at home, and the Engliſh could not poſſeſs either Pimpol, or the ſmall Iſland of Brehac, with the Parts adjacent, for Quarters of Safety and Refreſhment, but upon ſcurvy and diſhonourable Conditions, viz. That they ſhould not be allowed to put Garriſons into them, or be quartered in any Prieſts or Gentlemens Houſes. Nevertheleſs the States of Bretaign petitioned the Queen not to call home the Engliſh Troops, which had been before determined. And they obtained their Requeſt: For the Forces were continued there, and winter'd after a wretched manner, in a parcel of ſmall Villages, where they lay expoſed to the inclemency of a bad Air, and their Enemies Aſſaults into the bargain. (For all this while Pimpol was too ſmall a Place to afford them all convenient Quarters). The Queen failed not in the mean while to acquaint the King, how much he was concerned, in point of Intereſt, to preſerve and defend the Sea-Coaſts; which if once they ſhould come into the Enemy's Poſſeſſion, would prove an Inlet into his Kingdom, and hardly be recovered without much Hazard and Difficulty. And ſhe recommended the Proteſtant Religion, and its Profeſſors, over and over, to his Care and Protection, by Robert Sidney. But when Sidney mentioned Breſt as a Place of Retreat for the Engliſh, and a Cautionary Town for the Money owing to the Queen, according to her own deſire and inclination; he could not be prevailed on to agree to it; for the French could not endure that the Engliſh ſhould enjoy one Foot of French Ground, tho' it were in their Sea-Ports. Perhaps it was yet too freſh in their Memories, how the Engliſh ſetting out from thoſe Ports in former Times, marched through their whole Country with Triumph and Victory, and were not eaſily perſuaded to quit their Poſſeſſions. Thus did the French practiſe that piece of Advice upon the Engliſh, which the Queen had directed them to uſe againſt the Spaniard.

Q. Eliz. recommends the Proteſtants to the French King.

But to guard her own Subjects the better from the Inſults of the Spaniard, ſhe ordered a Garriſon to be kept in the Iſles of Silley, and a Fort to be built in the Iſland of St. Marie, which was call'd Stella Maria, from the form of a Star which it repreſented. She likewiſe fortified Guernſey and Jerſey, Iſlands that border upon France, and ſeveral other Places, at a vaſt Expence, and with a willing Mind, as bad and lowring as the Times were.

Iſles in the Britiſh Sea fortify'd.

For this whole Year the Sickneſs rag'd violently in London, Saturn paſſing through the extreme Parts of Cancer and the Head of Leo, as it did in the Year 1563, inſomuch that when the Year came about there died of the Sickneſs and other Diſeaſes in the City and Suburbs 17890 Perſons, beſides William Roe Mayor, and three Aldermen, ſo that Bartholomew-Fair was not kept, and Michaelmas-Term was held at St. Albans twenty Miles from London. At which place Richard Hesket was condemn'd for Treaſon, and executed. He was employed by ſome outlawed Engliſh, to perſuade Ferdinand Earl of Derby, whoſe Father Henry died juſt before, to make his Pretenſions to the Crown by a Right deriv'd from his Great Grandmother Mary, Daughter of Henry VII. To aſſert which, he made round Promiſes of Supplies both of Men and Money, and threatned to make away the Earl in a very little time, if he did not liſten to, and conceal this Propoſal. But the Earl, being now in fear of his Life, inform'd againſt Hesket, who own'd the Fact before the Court, and inveigh'd againſt thoſe who had given him this Council. However his Threatnings were too prophetically verified, for the Earl died about four Months after of a moſt lamentable ſort of Death, as we ſhall ſhew in its place.

Hesket hang'd.

In the compaſs of this Year died thoſe two noble Earls, and Knights of the Garter, Henry Stanley Earl of Derby, already mentioned, and Henry Ratcliff E. of Suſſex, who made a quiet and peaceable Exit out of the World: The firſt was the Son of Edward by Dorothy, Daughter of Thomas Howard the firſt Duke of Norfolk; who begat Margaret the Daughter of Henry Clifford Earl of Cumberland, by Eleanor Brandon, Henry VIII's Niece by his Siſter the Lady Mary, Ferdinand and William, who both ſucceeded in their turns to his Title and Eſtate: The other was Governor of Portſmouth, and left but one Son behind him, viz. Robert, whom he had by Honora the Daughter of Anthony Pound.

The Death of the Earl of Derby, Suſſex.

These Noblemen were accompanied into the other World by three worthy Lords, Arthur Grey of Wilton, an excellent Soldier and Knight of the Garter, ſucceeded by his Son Thomas, whom he had by Jane Sybil Moriſon: Henry Lord Cromwel, Nephew to the famous but unfortunate Thomas Earl of Eſſex, who was ſucceeded by his Son Edward, born of Mary the Daughter of John Powlet Marqueſs of Wincheſter; and alſo Henry Lord Wentworth, who had by Ann Hopton, Thomas, who was his Heir.

L. Grey. Cromwel. L. Wentworth.

Nor muſt we omit to mention Chriſtopher Carliſle, who paid the ſame juſt Tribute to Nature; a Perſon famed for his military Bravery both by Sea and Land, in Holland, France, Ireland, and in the American Parts, at Carthagena, St. Domingo, &c. as I have already taken notice, An. 1585.

Chri. Carliſle.

In Ireland, O-Conor Dun, Mac-Davy, O-Brien, great Men in the County of Connaught, and ſeveral others, made heavy Complaints for being unjuſtly proſecuted about Lands formerly appertaining to the Mortimers Earls of March, which they had uſurped to themſelves upon no better Claim than that of ancient Preſcription. At the ſame time the leading Men of Ulſter, who were jealous of coming under the Reſtraint of the Engliſh Laws, which would by degrees leſſen their uſurp'd Authority over the People, by parcelling out their Territories into Counties, (an Example of which they had already ſeen in Monaghan) began now to foment a Rebellion, which they had been a long time brooding: And to begin the Tumult, Hugh O-Donel ſeiz'd unawares upon the Caſtle of Montroſs. And now likewiſe broke out an unhappy Difference between the Earl of Tir-Oen and Henry Bagnal, Mareſchal of the Iriſh Army,

A Quarrel between Tir-Oen and Bagnal in Ireland.

1593. Ann. 36.

Army, whose Sister the Earl had married by force. The Earl remonstrated before the Deputy, Chancellor and others, That all that Part of Ulster which he had reduced to their Allegiance, at the Expence of so much Sweat and Blood, was more at the Marshal's Service and Command, than his: That the Marshal had suborned a Pack of pitiful Fellows to accuse him of Treason, had incensed the Lord-Deputy against him, laid Snares for his Life, and had basely misrepresented him to the Queen. The Marshal however found Credit in Court, till the Earl sent Letters into England, and offered himself to be tried either there or in Ireland. Certain it is however, that he, together with the Grandees of Ulster, were about this time engag'd in a private League, to support the Catholick Religion, (for now-a-days Religion is the ordinary Mask for Rebellion) as also to thrust the English Sheriffs and Garrisons out of their Territories, to assert every Man their own Rights, and to revenge the Wrongs they had suffered from the English. Mac-Guire, a great Lord in Fermanah, was the Person prevailed on to give the next alarm. He was a Man turbulent and quarrelsome, and his Complaint was, That the Lord-Deputy had given himself and his Friends a great deal of Interruption and Disturbance. On this Pretence, he falls a pillaging all the Country about, and enters Connaught with one Gauran a Priest, at his Heels; who being Ordain'd by his Holiness, Primate of Ireland, commanded the other to trust in God and push his Fortune; and withal, promis'd him a most infallible Victory. But it fell out otherwise; for Mac-Guire was routed by the Valour of Richard Bingham, and the Primate slain with a great many more. Not long after, Mac-Guire breaks out into open Rebellion, and Tir-Oen pursuing him, like a good Subject, as he would be thought, receiv'd a Wound in the Skirmish, which got him the Reputation of a stout and loyal Man. Dowdal, a stout English Captain, demolished Iniskilling in the Lake of Erne, which was the strongest Garrison belonging to Mac-Guire, and slew the Centinels and Guards. About that time the Native Irish, who are generally false to the English, were form'd into Companies, and some of them had Commands. But the thing was ill managed, as wiser Heads judg'd then, and the English in general have experienc'd since.

Grandees of Ulster conspire against the English.

In the mean while the Earl of Tir-Oen watching all Advantages, upon the Death of Turlough-Leneigh, who had possess'd the Title of O-Neal, makes bold to assume the same, tho' contrary to his Oath, and an Act of Treason, made on that account. But, who could forbear a Character, which in Ireland sounds bigger than that of Cæsar itself? However, he takes the Honour with some Shinels at first, lest any of the Family of O-Neal should seize upon it; and he promises to throw it up, but begs heartily withal, that he may not be obliged by Oath to do it. After this, he seized on the Sons of Shan O-Neal, one or two of whom had got out of Custody through the Neglect of somebody or other, and refus'd to release them, tho' at the repeated Orders of the Lord-Deputy; for he knew their Power and Interest at home would prove too big and unweildy for his usurp'd Authority. Without taking therefore any farther notice, he falls to charging the Lord-Deputy with abundance of ill-will towards him, and complains heartily of the Injuries offer'd him by the Soldiers in Garrison, and from the Marshal's Designs against him; which however he managed with that Art and Intricacy in a little time, that he seem'd to have forgot them all, and went and submitted himself to the Lord-Deputy; and after great Professions of his future Obedience and good Behaviour, returned home.

1593. Ann. 36.

The Seven and Thirtieth Year of her Reign.

1594.

The Queen promis'd herself an happy conclusion of that dark Conspiracy which was hatch'd in Spain, and broke out in Ireland, could she but once crush that open and barefaced Faction which lurked it in Scotland. When therefore the King of Scots asked her Advice upon an Order made by the States of Scotland, for the Security of the Church and Kingdom, she dispatched Edward Lord Zouch into Scotland, to fix the Peers of the English Interest, and proceed with greater Rigour and Severity against those of the Spanish Faction, than was intended by that Act, forasmuch as it was notoriously known, that they frequented the Mass; that they harboured Jesuits and other Priests, and sent Blanks into Spain sign'd by their own Hands and Seals; and that the King of Spain flatter'd himself to subdue England, through their Assistance, by a Land-Battel, whereas he had in vain endeavour'd it by Sea.

L. Zouch sent into Scotland.

The King answered, that he would put the Laws in execution to the very utmost against those Catholicks; and if they would not be better advis'd, he would be sure to prosecute them till he had reduced them to Obedience, or driven them out of the Kingdom, provided the Queen, whose Interest was as much concerned as his, would lend her Assistance. When Zouch began to use more pressing Arguments for the Prosecution of this Party; the King demanded of him, whether he thought he was at the Beck of another? Or, whether the Queen took upon her to Direct how a Prince, absolute as he was, should govern his Kingdoms? However, he protested he would strenuously assert the established Religion, and preserve inviolably a good Agreement with the Queen. But he could not forbear complaining, that Bothwel, a most pernicious Rebel, had been supported in England; whereas he was ready to deliver up some time since, the Irish Rebel O-Rork into the Queen's Hands.

The King's Answer.

Nor was it long after that Bothwel made a new Effort of Sedition, and advanced against his Prince. Who were his Abettors, I leave the Scotch to tell. Most certain it is, that the prime Ministers of that Kingdom did frequently complain to the Queen, that their Prince was Partial on the Papists side. Bothwel having entred Scotland with 400 Horse from the Borders, came as far as Leith without any Resistance: Where he put out a specious Declaration, as Rebels use to do, and cloak'd his Treason under the following Pretences.

Bothwel rebels and Prints a Manifesto.

'Forasmuch as the true Religion, the King's 'Safety and Honour, together with the Laws 'of the Land, the State itself, and the good Cor'respondence between the two Kingdoms of 'England and Scotland, are brought into Hazard 'by some bad Ministers, who have crept into 'the Government; and not only permit the Ro'mish Priests to carry their Masses from Street 'to Street, but invite the Spaniards to Suppress 'the Church and State, and interrupt all good 'Agreement with the English: He therefore be'ing with the Nobles, Lords and Burgesses As'sembled, to prevent these so great Inconve'niences, had in the Fear of God, and out of a 'due Respect to his Prince, resolv'd to punish 'those evil Counsellors, till he had either 'brought them to a fair Trial, or expell'd them 'out of the Kingdom, and declar'd them to the 1594. Ann. 37.

'World the Betrayers of their Country; and he 'resolv'd to lose no time in the Dispatch of this 'Affair, forasmuch as the Spaniards were just 'ready to invade them. Wherefore he intreats 'the King, persuades the Nobles, and commands 'the Commons, to join their Arms in this so 'pious, just and necessary a Cause; and requires 'the Magistrates to be assistant with their Pre-'sence and Authority. He declares those down-'right Rebels to the King, who shall aid or as-'sist his Counsellors, and threatens to proceed 'against them with the utmost Rigour.'

The King marches against him.

To this purpose, he wrote to the Parliament, which was then held at Dunbar, and also to the English Ambassadors, who were reported openly enough to favour his Designs; and the very same day that he understood the Royalists advanced from Edinborough, which was scarce three Miles off, he departed from Leith, with his Army, divided into two Bodies: But being far unequal in Number, by reason that few came in to him, he did what he could to keep out of Danger, by turning out into By-Roads, and had once the Fortune to attack some of the Royal Party that pursued him, from a steep Hill, whom he beat back and took some, but without killing one Man. He then advanced to Dalkeith, without breaking his Ranks; and from thence his Conscience scared him away into his usual Lurking-places upon the Borders of the two Kingdoms. The Queen sent out a Proclamation over the Kingdom, forbidding any to harbour or conceal him: And this the King took very well, and having made a chearful Profession of the Queen's Goodness, he call'd a Parliament to consult about the Outlawry of the Popish Earls. The Peers, who were but few of them present, were very loth to pass their Votes against 'em, forasmuch as they had no other than presumptive Evidence of their main Design, tho' nothing could give a greater Suspicion of their Aims, than the blank Papers sent over by them. Nevertheless, they were cast by the Votes of the Ministers and Burgesses, who were far the greater Number; and their Coats of Arms were, after the Scotch manner, torn in Pieces, and cast out of the Windows of the Town-Hall, and their Proscription proclaimed abroad by a publick Herald. After this, Argyle was employed against them, who being routed at Glenlivet, in a warm Engagement, the King himself undertook a tedious and difficult March into those Parts, over the rough and craggy Mountains; and having suffer'd Huntly's Houses at Strathbolgy, Slany, and Newton, to be pull'd down, he reduced the Earls to those shifts, that Huntly was forced to take Sanctuary, first with his Aunt, the Countess of Sutherland, and then in France; and all the rest were forced to quit the Kingdom.

Argyle defeated.

The Earls fly the Kingdom.

The mutual Friendship and good Agreement between the Queen of England and the King of Scots, back'd by his constant Adherence to the Protestant Religion, which neither Money, nor Promises, nor the Tricks and Solicitations of the Romish Party could bribe him from; as also the strict Laws enacted against Jesuits and Men of that Complexion, the Execution of Graham of Fentre, the Ringleader of the Spanish Faction, the State's placing the Supreme Authority in Matters Ecclesiastical, in the King, and the Association formed against the Papists: All these Considerations did so damp all their Hopes of resettling the Popish Religion in Scotland and England, that some of them in England, who had before been vehement Sticklers for his Mother's Title, began now to think of lifting some English Catholick into the Succession.

1594. Ann. 37.

Essex proposed as Successor to the Crown of England.

But not being able to pitch on a proper Person of their own Persuasion, they cast their Eyes on the Earl of Essex, a Gentleman that could never endure the Maxim of murdering People for the sake of their Religion; and they borrow'd his Title from Thomas of Woodstock, King Edward III's Son, of whom he was descended. In the mean while, the fugitive Peers were for the Infanta of Spain; but fearing the Queen and the Nation would put in an Act of Parliament against it, and impose an Oath on every one, to reject that Title; they thought it enough for the present, by this means to raise a Difference between the King and the Earl of Essex: To this purpose there was a certain Book printed and dedicated to Essex, under the Sham-name of Doleman; which was a notorious Act of Malice in Parsons the Jesuite against Doleman, a Priest of a modest and quiet Temper, (so far as we may trust that Order) for the true Authors of the Book were Parsons, a great Enemy of Doleman's, Cardinal Allen, and Sir Francis Inglefield.

Parsons opposes his Title.

The Purport of this Book, which quite laid aside the Business of Birthright, was: That the ancient Laws of the Land, relating to Hereditary Succession, ought to be alter'd: That new Laws ought to be made about the Choice of a King, and that none but a Roman-Catholick, how near akin soever to the Crown, ought to succeed to it. Most of the Kings of England they traduced as meer Usurpers, and all of the Blood-Royal in England, as illegitimate, and so uncapable of Succession. The King of Scots Title to the Crown, though most certain and indisputable, they attempted to invalidate; and by Sham-Tricks and Devices endeavour'd to set up the Infanta Isabella, the King of Spain's Daughter, purely for being a Roman-Catholick; a thing I am ashamed and grieved to mention, because the Priests Lips ought to preserve knowledge, and they should stand having their loins girt about with truth. Their first Plea was, because, as this Book pretends, she fetches her Pedigree from Constance, the Daughter of William the Conqueror, King of England, and Wife to Alan Fergant, Earl of Bretaign; whereas notwithstanding Gulielmus Gemeticensis, who liv'd about that time, declares in his last Book, that she died without Issue, and he is followed by the Consent of all the Writers of the Affairs of Bretaign. The next Pretence was, because she had her Descent from Eleanor, the eldest Daughter of King Henry II, who was marry'd to Alphonsus IX, King of Castile; whereas Pope Innocent III makes it out in Matthew Paris, pag. 381, that Maud, the Wife of Henry Leo, Duke of Saxony, and Mother of the Emperor Otho IV, was his eldest Daughter; and Robert, Abbot of St. Michael's Mount, who christened her, affirms, that she was born ann. 1162. A third Argument was, because she was a Descendant from Blanch, the eldest Daughter of the said Eleanor, which was proved to be false both by Roderigo, Archbishop of Toledo, in his Ninth Book, and Pope Innocent, a Writer of better Credit, and both of them living in the same Age. Another Reason alledged was, because she came originally from Beatrice, the Daughter of Henry III, King of England; though 'twas forgot, in the mean time, that she had two Brethren Edward I, King of England, and Edward Earl of Lancaster, from whom a great part of the Nobility of England were linerally descended, besides the Royal Family. Again, they asserted the Infanta's Claim by the House of Portugal, and maintained on the same bottom the Title of the Dukes of Parma and Braganza, from Philippa, the Daughter of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, whom they make to be his eldest Daughter by his Wife Blanch; whereas Froisard, who was a Courtier at that time, time, proves, fol. 169, of the Second Part of his Hiſtory, that his eldeſt Daughter was Elizabeth, Wife to John Holland, afterwards Duke of Exeter, from whoſe Loins proceeded a large Race of Nobility, all the Kingdom over. But I have already confuted theſe genealogical Whimſies, and proved them to be the Brats of Spleen and Falſehood, the main Furniture of that Libel. Theſe things however they made a ſhift to impoſe on the World, clean contrary to the Character of their Function; and in Contempt of the Council of Trent's Authority, and that of Toledo likewiſe, as alſo of their own Laws, a Review of which was made at Rome the Year before: And all to curry Favour with the King of Spain, to cajole and abuſe Mankind, to promote Sedition and Diſorder, and to erect Scaffolds, from whence ambitious Men might catch a Fall, tho' in open Defiance to Truth, they maſqued their Pretences under the venerable Diſguiſe of Religion. Nay they carried the Matter ſo far, as to force the Engliſh Prieſts in the Spaniſh Seminaries (if we may take their own Words for it) to ſubſcribe to this ſpurious Claim of the Infanta's. Yet all this was excuſed not long after, when King James was proclaimed King of England, by the general Votes of the People, by Parſons, in a Letter to a Friend of his, as not having proceeded from any Deſign to hinder King James's Title, but from an eager Deſire to gain him over to the Romiſh Religion; and he hoped he ſhould be eaſily excuſed, ſince theſe Methods had proved no real Prejudice of the King's Claim, i. e. in effect, becauſe the Succeſs was not anſwerable to the Villany of his Intention.

They set up the Infanta of Spain.

1594. *Ann.*37.

Parſons excuſes the Book.

But whilſt theſe Vagabond Projectors were ſearching out for a falſe Heir in Spain, God, who laughed at their Inventions, raiſed up to King James a Son in Scotland, who was undoubted Heir to the Crown of England. For on the 19th of February, was born Henry Prince of Scotland, the Darling of Britain, to whom Queen Elizabeth ſtood Godmother, and ſent the Earl of Eſſex on an honourable Embaſſy, to aſſiſt at the Ceremony as her Proxy.

Birth of Henry Prince of Scotland.

Now whilſt theſe bookiſh Outlaws endeavour'd to write the Infanta of Spain into the Crown of England, there were others of the ſame Principle and Perſuaſion, that were making the ſame Uſe of their Swords, as they did of their Pens; and ſent over ſome villainous Aſſaſſins to murder Queen Elizabeth, whilſt certain Spaniards attempted at the ſame time to take her off by Poiſon. The Spaniards however ſuſpected the Engliſh in a Matter of that Moment, and ſo made uſe of Roderigo Lopez, a profeſſed Jew, the Queen's domeſtick Phyſician, and of Stephen Ferreira Gama and Emanuel Loiſie, Portugueſes, a great Number of whom had in thoſe Days crept into England, as Retainers to Don Antonio. Theſe Perſons being apprehended, by means of ſome Letters, which happen'd to be intercepted, were about the end of February tried at Guild-Hall in London, and charged from their own Confeſſions, with an Intention to poiſon the Queen. Lopez, having had the Reputation of a juſt and faithful Perſon for a long time, did not ſo much as fall under the leaſt Suſpicion, (barring the naked Probability that foreign Phyſicians may be guilty of Treaſon or murder) till he confeſſed himſelf, 'That he 'was inveigled by Andrada, a Portugueſe, to uſe 'his beſt and moſt private Endeavours for the 'King of Spain: That he had received from 'Chriſtophoro Moro, his chief Favourite and Counſellor, a rich Jewel: That he had thereupon 'given the Spaniards frequent Advertiſements of 'what fell within his Cognizance: That at laſt 'he was prevailed on to give his Promiſe to poiſon the Queen, upon an Agreement to receive '50000 Ducats for his pains: That Emanuel Loiſie was likewiſe privately ſent to him by Fuentez and Ibara, to preſs Lopez to diſpatch the 'matter out of hand. Emanuel owned, that Count 'Fuentez and Ibara, after he had given them his 'Promiſe to conceal the Deſign, ſhewed him a 'Letter written by Andrada, in Lopez's Name, 'about taking off the Queen; and that he himſelf was ſent by Fuentez to tranſact with Ferreira and Lopez, about diſpatching the Queen 'with all ſpeed, and to promiſe Lopez himſelf 'Money, and his Children Dignity and Preferments.'

Aſſaſſins employ'd by the Spaniards to murder the Queen.

1594. *Ann.*37.

Lopez did not plead much at the Bar, but exclaim'd againſt Ferreira and Emanuel, as moſt baſe and notorious Lyars: 'That he had no ill 'Intentions againſt her Majeſty, but abhorred 'from his Heart the Bribes of a Tyrant: That 'he had preſented that Jewel, which the King of 'Spain ſent him, to the Queen herſelf; and that 'his great Aim in what he did, was to gull the 'King of Spain, and get a little of his Money.' The reſt ſaid nothing on their own behalf, but caſt the Blame wholly on Lopez. They were all of them condemned, and, after three Months, hanged at Tyburn; Lopez affirming to the laſt, that he loved the Queen, as well as Jeſus Chriſt. Which Expreſſion, coming from a Jew, put the Spectators into a pleaſant Fit of Laughter. The next Day after their Condemnation, Patrick Cullen received his. He was an Iriſh Fencing-Maſter, who had received vaſt Promiſes from the fugitive Malecontents in the Low-Countries, and was ſome time ſince privately ſent over, with Money enough to bear his Charges, on purpoſe to kill the Queen. He did as good as confeſs the Crime, and it being likewiſe proved by undeniable Evidence, he was taken and hanged; tho' he were ſick enough already to have ſaved the Hangman a Labour. Edmund Yorke and Richard Williams were likewiſe apprehended, as Perſons who had been employed by Ibara, and the other Rebels, to kill the Queen; and other Incendiaries at the ſame time, who were employed to fire the Navy with Balls prepared for that purpoſe. Thus did the Engliſh Fugitives, lewd Prieſts, and Lay-Villains together, plot and contrive the Ruin of the Queen, by all the Arts they could uſe; and all from a pernicious Principle of Bigottry, rooted in their Minds, that Princes excommunicated are not fit to live; and the Spaniſh Miniſters ſeconded the Deſign, and improved their Hatred as far as it would go. However the Queen was neither alarmed nor daunted at the matter, but endeavoured by a pious and provident Caution, to prevent or contravene their Meaſures; often calling to mind that Paſſage of the Royal Pſalmiſt, Thou art my God, my Times are in thy Hands. Yet did ſhe not fail to inform Erneſt Archduke of Auſtria, and the King of Spain's Governour of the Netherland Provinces, of theſe ſeveral Plots and Conſpiracies hatch'd by Ibara and other Spaniſh Miniſters, and Engliſh Renegado's, againſt her Life. She deſired him likewiſe to acquaint the King, his Maſter, therewith; that ſo he might clear himſelf of any Imputation, by puniſhing his Officers and Miniſters, and delivering thoſe Engliſhmen into her Hands, who were the principal Agents in ſo horrid and barbarous a Deſign; in order to have them brought to condign Puniſhment: viz. Hugh Owen, Thomas Throckmorton, Holt the Jeſuit, Gifford and Worthington, Doctors of Divinity, &c. For otherwiſe his Royal Character would ſuffer in Point of Honour and Credit with all good Men.

Lopez ſtrives to clear himſelf.

He and others are condemned and hanged.

Queen acquaints the King of Spain herewith.

And leſt the King of Spain ſhould demand Antonio Perez, his late Secretary, who was fled for ſome

1594. Ann. 37.

Perez not loved in England.

some Commotions he had raised in Arragon, and abſconded at this time in England; ſhe declared he was ſent over without her Knowledge, by the French King, to his Ambaſſador; and that ſhe neither would relieve, nor protect him. Indeed ſhe had a perfect Averſion to him, for betraying his Prince's Secrets; and the Lord-Treaſurer Burleigh would ſcarce vouchſafe him the Civility of a Conference. Eſſex 'tis true, entertained him at his Houſe, and furniſhed him with conſiderable Sums; for he conſidered him as the great Oracle of Spain, that knew the Myſteries of the Spaniſh Court, and was profoundly verſed in the Politicks of that Kingdom; yet was his Condition ſo fickle and full of Change, (as the Lot of ſuch Men generally is) that he uſed to ſtile himſelf Fortune's Monſter, and uſed thoſe Words for a Motto on his Picture.

French League diſſolved.

Now did the Leaguers begin to abate ſomething of the Violence of their Meaſures, by which they had plagued and harraſſed France for the ſpace of eight Years. For when the King, who had weakened them by his Arms, and in ſome meaſure broke their Alliance, by a politick embracing of the Romiſh Faith the Year before; came to be ſolemnly inſtalled the beginning of this, and had granted them a Truce; ſome of the Nobility, being overcome with large Promiſes, ſtrove who ſhould be foremoſt in returning to their Allegiance. Others ſubmitted on Condition they might ſtill hold the Governments they had got, in the ſame manner as Hugh Capet had in times paſt, to ſecure himſelf the Affections of the Nobility, granted them the Hereditary Poſſeſſion of their reſpective Governments. Hereupon ſome of the Cities that were in Rebellion, ſurrendred themſelves; others were taken by Surprize; and even Paris it ſelf invited the King privately into the City, and with great Joy delivered it ſelf into his Hands; and the Spaniards (who had now quite loſt the Hopes of the French Crown, and of a Match between the Infanta and the Duke of Guiſe; and all through the Duke of Mayne's Emulation and Jealouſy of his Nephew) were packed away bag and baggage, and not without ſome rude and inſulting Reflexions from the French, who before this time repented heartily of their late Proceedings. But foraſmuch as thoſe Spaniards who were invited into Bretagne by the Duke de Mercœur, made an obſtinate Reſiſtance, and put ſtrong Garriſons into the Sea-Ports, in order to defend what they had got; Norris, who had been called home to give the Queen, in Perſon, an Account of the State of the War in Bretagne, was remanded back thither, with Orders to ſeize on the Spaniſh Fort at Crodon near Breſt; and on the 1ſt of September arrived with freſh Forces at Timpol. At the very ſame time the Marqueſs D'Aumont and Sir Thomas Baskerville, who commanded the Engliſh Forces in Norris's Abſence, beſieged Morlaix; and upon Norris's Arrival, took it upon Capitulation: And altho' it had been concluded upon Treaty with the French Ambaſſadors in England, that if it were ſurrender'd, it ſhould be deliver'd to the Engliſh for a Place of Retreat; yet, to prevent it, D'Aumont added this Paragraph in the Articles of Surrender; That none but a Roman Catholick ſhould be received into the Town. After this, the Marſhal and Sir Henry Norris having taken Quimper-corentin, the French and Engliſh came on the 1ſt of November before the Spaniards Fort at Crodon; where Sir Martin Forbiſher lay at Anchor with ten Men of War, expecting their Coming. This Place is on two ſides guarded by a Moat; and there ſtand two tall and large Forts facing the Land, between which there runs a Wall 37 foot wide, and within that a thick Bank of Earth.

Norris returns to Bretagne.

Morlaix taken.

Quimper-corentin taken.

The Forts are defended on both ſides with Rocks, which have ſeveral Pieces of Cannon mounted on them. The Engliſh and French having got ſeveral Mortars out of the Ships, began to break Ground, and carried on a Trench on that ſide the Fort which lay to the Land; and the Spaniards making a Sally to hinder the Works, were repulſed: But Sir Anthony Wingfield, Serjeant-Major of the Engliſh, a brave old Soldier, was ſlain with a Cannon-Shot, having made his Will juſt the Day before. On the 3d, they made a ſmall Breach, with 700 Shot of great Ordnance, and threw down the Counterſcarp, which Liſter and his Party immediately ſeized on. But whilſt their Eagerneſs prompted them on too far upon the Enemy, who made a ſtout Reſiſtance, ſeveral of them were ſlain, and amongſt them Bruder, Jackſon, and Barker, Officers of tried Courage and Bravery: Several more were wounded on the Attempt; and others miſerably ſinged with Gunpowder. Some were [illegible] charge Norris as having laviſh'd away the Lives of his Men by expoſing them to needleſs Hazards; and the Queen her ſelf, out of her uſual Tenderneſs, ſent him Orders to place the Safety of his Men upon the ſame Level with his own Honour, and not to hazard their Lives too far in a War, which was purely undertaken for the Aſſiſtance of others: For ſhe ſaid, That the Blood of Man ought not to be ſquander'd away at all Adventures: That the boiling Heat of puſhing and forward Men had need be curbed, and not encouraged and egged on into Danger and Ruin: That if he obſerved theſe Meaſures, he would ſave the Credit of his Conduct, and ſit free at the ſame time from the Charge of Cruelty; and ſhe her ſelf ſhould upon better Grounds commend his Care and Regard for her Subjects. But theſe Inſtructions came too late. During the Heat of this Siege, D'Aumont and Norris thought good to undermine the Eaſtern Bulwark, on that ſide where the French were poſted, and to blow it up; which they did, and made a very conſiderable Breach. Then did they attack the Fort on all ſides; Latham, Smith, and others, with the Engliſh, ſtormed the Works on the Weſt-ſide; and the French made the Aſſault on the Eaſtern Part at the ſame time; and the reſt fell to battering the Wall on the South, which lay between both: And this held from Noon till Four of the Clock. At length the Engliſh got poſſeſſion of the Weſtern Work, and Thomas de Parades, the Spaniſh Commander being cut off, they entred the Fort, pulled down the Spaniſh Flags, and opened a Paſſage for the reſt, who put the Garriſon (about 400 Men) to the Sword, and razed the Fort to the very Ground: And all this on the very Day that Don John D'Aquila was coming to their Relief. However this Victory coſt the Engliſh much Bloodſhed; for many good Soldiers periſhed in the Attempt, and Sir Martin Forbiſher being wounded in the Hip with a ſmall Shot, died as ſoon as he had brought back the Fleet to Plimouth. Thus fell a Man of undaunted Courage, and inferior to none of that Age in Experience and Conduct, or the Reputation of a brave Commander, as I have already obſerved.

Death of Sir Martin Forbiſher.

Not long after, there being certain Intelligence that ſeveral Spaniſh Officers were come into Ireland, to raiſe a Rebellion; Norris was once more recalled from Bretagne. The Ships which were to bring him over, upon their Arrival at Morlaix, were forbid to enter the Port; ſo that they were forced to put to Sea again in extreme cold Weather, and to make for Ruſcon, which is a very dangerous Road. This the Queen took ſo much the worſe at D'Aumont's hands, becauſe he owed the taking of Morlaix to the Engliſh.

The

1594. Ann. 37.

Hawkins's Voyage to America.

The English began now to molest and attack the Spaniards, not only in France, but in the farther Parts of America: For Richard Hawkins, Son to the famous Navigator, Sir John Hawkins, having got a Commission under the Broad-Seal to annoy the Spaniards in those Parts, put to Sea the Year before with three Ships and 200 Men. The first place he toucht at, was the Isle of St. Ann; where making a stay of three Months to refresh his Men, the least of his Ships by chance took fire, and was burnt. After which he took a Portuguese Vessel over against the River of Plate, and the Governour of Peru having notice of his coming, prepared a Fleet to intercept him; and after this another of his Ships by stress of Weather returned to England, for which the Captain was punished.

He loses 2 Ships.

Thus being left alone, and at a great Distance from shore, in the Latitude of 50 Degrees, he happen'd upon a fruitful Coast, abounding with Wood, and having good Harbours. Here he cruized up and down from West to North for the space of 60 Leagues, till being driven back by contrary Winds, he made the Strait of Magellan just before the end of January in the same Year, which he found to be nothing but a Sea stocked with a great many Islands; and herein he sailed to the 56th Degree of Latitude. After he had spent six Weeks among these Islands, and strove with uncertain and dangerous Currents, he got safe into the open Sea, and was, according to the Spaniards Account, the sixth Man that had the Honour and Fortune to pass that Strait. As he sailed afterwards along the Coast of Chili in the South-Sea, he took five laden Merchant-men at Villa-Parissa, one of which he carried off, and the Master of the Vessel, and the rest he ransomed for 2000 Ducats, whereas they were valued at more than 20000. After this he steered his Course for Arica, where Bertrand di Castro, at the Viceroy's Command, attacked him with eight Ships, though to his own Damage, his Powder and Shot being all spent. Afterwards, having received fresh Supplies, he made a second Assault upon him in the Bay of Attacame, but with the same Success; for the Fight was closely and briskly maintained on both sides, and several Men lost, insomuch that the Spaniards thought it safer to ply them at a Distance with their great Guns, and endeavour to disable their Ship; which having done for three whole Days together without Intermission, Bertrand sent his Glove, and in the King's Name offered Hawkins and the rest their Liberty, if they would surrender themselves. This Condition he accepted, and most of the rest, for they were miserably wounded, and unable to hold out any longer. Whereupon Bertrand treated them with a great deal of Civility: But it seems a Doubt was made, Whether Faith was to be kept with them or not? Whether Bertrand, whose Commission was immediately from the Viceroy, not from the King himself, could make Hawkins such a Promise in the King's Name, when he produced an Authority directly from the Queen? At length the general Opinion was, that a Faith plighted in the King's Name, was to be observed, by reason that he was no Pirate, but a fair Enemy: Nor could the Spaniard act by any other Martial Laws in the South-Sea, than what were agreeable to the Practice and Customs of other Parts. Nevertheless Hawkins was sent into Spain, and there retained several Years in Prison, tho' Bertrand pressed hard for the Performance of the Articles made by him: But the Spaniards were for using this Rigour to deter others from venturing into the South-Sea. But at length the Conde di Miranda, President of the Council, declared positively, that he ought to be discharged, forasmuch as in Military Cases the Promises made in the Royal Name ought to be sacredly observed by all Captains and Officers, for otherwise no Man would ever surrender himself.

Passes the Strait of Magellan.

Takes Prizes.

He is taken.

1594. Ann. 36.

James Lancaster had notwithstanding better Success in an Engagement with the Spaniards in another Part of America, being equipped with three Ships and a long Pinnace by some Merchants of London, whose Effects the Spaniards had seized on: For he took thirty nine of their Ships, and then taking Venour an Englishman into his Company, besides some Hollanders and Frenchmen who were cruizing in that Sea, he resolved to make an Attempt upon Fernambuc in Brazil, where he was informed that vast Treasures were put on shore from an East-India Carack, which was wrecked thereabouts.

Lancaster's Expedition, and Success.

He takes Fernambuc.

But when he saw the Shore lined by great numbers of the Enemy, he singled out the stoutest of his Men, and clapping them into Boats, made them row away with such Force as to split them in pieces. Nor did the Project fail of an answerable Success, for after they had couragiously driven the Enemy to the Upper Town, they made themselves Masters of the Lower Town and the Port, and maintained it thirty Days together, against all the Force and Policy of the Enemy, refusing all Terms of Accommodation, baffling all their Attempts of firing the Fleet, and at last filling fifteen Ships with the Cargo of the aforesaid Carack; as also with the Sugars which are made here in great Plenty from the Moisture of a sweet sort of Cane; besides a quantity of Brazil Wood, which borrows its Name from this Province, and is very much used in dying of Clothes: With this Lading, and some Gossipine or Cotton, they returned safe home.

Whether it be worth while to mention what follows, I cannot say, unless it may serve as a Curb to the Ambition of Youth. Sir Nicolas Clifford and Sir Anthony Shirley, two young English Knights, had behaved themselves so bravely under the King in the French Wars, that he honoured 'em with the Order of St. Michael, and they took the Oath in the usual Form, returning afterwards with the Ensigns of that Order, and shewing themselves thus equipped in the City and Court, the Queen took it ill that they should take an Oath to, and receive an Honour of that nature from any Prince, without her Leave and Cognizance, as if they had been his Subjects, and not hers; and for this Presumption they were sent to Prison. She was so tender however, as not to have them prosecuted according to Law, because they were young Gentlemen, and consequently erred out of Ignorance, as well as out of her great Veneration for the French King, who had conferred on them such an honourable Title. But she ordered them notwithstanding to resign the Character, and send back the Ensigns of it, and to endeavour to get their Names struck out of the Register of that Order; which the French King hearing of, 'tis reported he said in a pleasant Humour: I could wish the Queen would do me the same Favour, and make some of my aspiring Subjects she happens to see next in England, Knights of the Round Table. For that Order, which had been the Subject of so many old Tales and Stories, was long ago worn out of date, as of late the Order of St. Michael in France has sunk so low thro' the Confusion of the Times, that a French Nobleman said, That the Chain of St. Michael was formerly a Character only of the Nobility, but now it was a Collar for all sorts of Animals. But I will not prevent what I shall hereafter have occasion to say in reference to foreign Distinctions of Honour.

About

1594. Ann. 37. The death of Cardinal Allen.

About this time departed this Life William Allen, commonly called the Cardinal of England, whom I have often mention'd already. He was born in the County of Lancaster, of worthy Parents, and allied to some Noble Families. He had his Education at Oriel-College in Oxford, and was Proctor of the University in Queen Mary's Days, and afterwards a Canon in York Cathedral. Upon the Change of Religion in England, he left the Kingdom, and professed Divinity at Doway, (which was made an University Ann. 1562.) and was made a Canon of the Church of Cambray. He procured a Seminary to be founded for the English at Doway, and another also at Rhemes, where he was likewise created Canon, besides a third at Rome, and two more in Spain, in order to keep up the Profession of Popery in England, for which he had so intemperate a Zeal, as to lay aside both his Duty to his Prince, and his Love to his Country, and stirred up both the King of Spain and the Pope to attempt the Conquest of England. Upon which account he engaged deep in hazardous Projects and Designs, after Pope Sixtus V. had dignified him with the Character of Cardinal of St. Martin in the Mounts, and the King of Spain had given him an Abbey in the Kingdom of Naples, and nominated him to the Archbishoprick of Mechlin. For when the Invincible Armada was preparing against England, he brought a Bill of Excommunication against the Queen into the Low-Countries, and ordered it to be printed in English; and he wrote likewise a kind of Memorial to his Countrymen, persuading them to adhere to the Pope and the King of Spain. But he returned to Rome under a great Disappointment; and being at length tired out with the Heats and Dissentions of the English Fugitives, both Scholars and Gentlemen, he died in the 63d Year of his Age, and was buried in the English Church of the Holy Trinity. He wrote a Treatise of the Eucharist in Latin, and some Apologies in English; one for the Seminaries, another for the English Catholicks, and a third for Sir William Stanley, who betrayed Deventer to the Spaniards. He wrote, besides these, the aforesaid Memorial, and a Book of Purgatory, which are all that I have seen.

And John Piers,

About this time there died likewise John Piers, Archbishop of York, an Orthodox and Pious Divine, who had for a long time been Lord-Almoner to the Queen. He was succeeded by Matthew Hutton, who was translated from the Bishoprick of Duresme to that See.

And Earl of Derby.

About the beginning of this Year died Ferdinand Stanley Earl of Derby, whom I mention'd the last Year, in the very Flower of his Youth, and some suspected he was poison'd, because he was troubled with strange Pains and Vomitings of a darkish Colour, not unlike rusty Iron. There was found in his Chamber an Image of Wax, with Hairs thrust through the Belly of it, of the same Colour with his own, which better Judges thought to be placed there on purpose to avoid the Suspicion of his being poison'd. The Matter which he vomited left such a Stain upon the Silver Basons, that no Art or Care could possibly recover them to their usual Brightness; and his Corps, tho' rolled in Lead, and laid in a Searcloth, was so noisom and offensive, that no Man could endure to come near the Place where he was buried for some considerable time after. The Gentleman of his Horse was shrewdly suspected; for as soon as the Earl took his Bed, he rid away with his best Horse. His Brother William enjoy'd after him the Honour and Title of Earl of Derby, who had afterwards a Trial with the three Daughters of the Lord Ferdinand, for the Dominion of the Isle of Man. The Queen being sensible that the English Fugitives and the Spaniards had an eye upon that Isle, committed the Government of it to Sir Thomas Gerard Kt. for his approved Loyalty, and by reason of his near Neighbourhood thereto, till the Claim should be determined.

1594. Ann. 37.

The Title of the Earls of Derby to the Isle of Man.

Mean while, the Queen's Counsellors, who very well understood the Laws, and were nice Judges of such Cases, maintain'd from the Quirks and Subtilties of their Faculty, that the Right of that Island belonged to the Queen, and that the Stanleys and Earls of Derby had held it by a wrong Claim for 200 Years last past. For (to go a little higher) Henry IV. as soon as he was in Possession of the Crown of England, attainted William Scrope, Lord of the Isle of Man, and gave it to Henry Piercy, Earl of Northumberland. This Earl appear'd in open Rebellion about six Years after; whereupon, the Year following, the King made a Grant thereof by his Letters-Patents, to John Stanley for Life, whereas the said Earl of Northumberland was not then attainted by Act of Parliament, nor his Lands forfeited to the King. A Month after, there was an Agreement made between the King and Stanley, That those former Patents which run for Life, and some others granted by the King, should be delivered up and cancelled, and a fresh Grant of the Island should be made to Stanley, in this Form: We, in regard the said John Stanley hath delivered up to us the said Letters-Patents to be cancelled in our Court of Chancery, have therefore granted unto the aforesaid John Stanley the Island aforesaid, &c. Upon these Words, and notice taken of the Circumstance of Time, that those former Patents were granted for Life, before such time as the Earl of Northumberland was attainted, the Lawyers were of the opinion, that the King could not legally make any such Grant for Life, because he was not yet entitled to the Forfeiture; and consequently, that the latter Letters-Patents being grounded on the Delivery of the former, were invalid; but that the King had been imposed on by a false Pretence, and therefore the Grant was null and insignificant. However the Queen gave up the Claim, and then an Agreement was made between the Uncle and Nieces.

The Death of the Lord Dacres.

Gregory Feines, whom I mention as being the last Lord Dacres of that Surname, died this Year; he was a little Crack-brain'd, and the Great Grandson of Richard Feines, of the ancient Family of the Earls of Bononia, to whom Edward IV. and Henry VI. Kings of England, gave the Title of Lord Dacres, for having married the Heiress of Thomas Lord Dacres. He was the Son of Thomas Lord Dacres, who was ruined in Henry VIIIth's Reign, when he was scarce four and twenty; for some of his Domestick Servants having killed somebody as they were going with him to hunt, tho' he himself were not present at the Fact, yet was he called in question for it, and over-persuaded by the Courtiers, who gaped after his Estate, to confess the Fact, and cast himself on the King's Mercy, as the only way to save his own and his Servant's Life. This he unadvisedly did, and so was condemned for his pains, and the next Day but one executed. However those hungry Courtiers missed of their Bait, for the Estate fell by Law to his Sister Margaret, the Wife of Sampson Lennard, and the Barony of Dacres was granted to the same Margaret, and settled on her Son Henry Lennard.

L. Evers. L. Chandos.

I must not forget these Persons following, who all departed this Life within the Compass of the Year, viz. William Lord Evers, who left behind him Ralph his Son and Heir by Margery Dimmock: Giles Lord Chandos, who died without Heirs-Male, and left his Dignity to his Brother William: And, 1594. Ann. 37. Montjoy.

And, in the laſt place, William Blount Lord Montjoy, a Perſon who had been much weaken'd by the Exceſſes of his Youth; to whom ſucceeded his Brother Charles, Governour of Portſmouth.

Ruſſel made Ld Deputy of Ireland.

Sir William Fitz-Williams, the Lord-Deputy of Ireland, was called home, and in Auguſt his Commiſſion was given to Sir William Ruſſel, the youngeſt Son of Francis Earl of Bedford; after that Henry Duke and Edward Herbert, who were ſent with Men and Proviſions to relieve the Garriſon of Ineskilling, beſieged by Mac-Guire, had been a little before put to flight, and miſerably beaten by the Rebels. As ſoon as he had receiv'd his Patent, Tir-Oen, having got Letters of Protection, contrary to all Expectation, applied himſelf to him, and on his Knees begged Pardon in Writing for not obeying the Summons of the former Lord-Deputy, which he endeavour'd to excuſe, by alledging that his Enemies had laid Snares for his Life. He complain'd that he had, thro' their falſe Suggeſtions, loſt the Queen's Favour, which he acknowledged he had enjoy'd a very liberal ſhare of, and that as he was a Creature of her own raiſing, ſo ſhe might as eaſily blaſt his Honours, and caſt him out of the Kingdom. He deſired he would pleaſe to conſider the Equity of his Caſe, and made large Promiſes of performing whatever ſhould be enjoin'd him as to raiſing the Siege of Ineskilling, and driving out the Iſland Scots. He likewiſe proteſted before God and the World, that altho' in compliance with a Dictate of Nature he endeavour'd to ſave his own Life from the malicious Purſuits of his Adverſaries, yet he never would take up Arms againſt the Queen. And in the laſt place, he humbly intreated the Lord-Deputy, and the Council of the Kingdom, to interceed with the Queen for his Re-admiſſion into her Favour.

Tir-Oen impeached by Bagnal.

There was preſent at the ſame time Sir Henry Bagnal, Marſhal of the Iriſh Army, who exhibited theſe Articles againſt him; viz. 'That he 'had privately ſent Mac-Guire and the Primate 'Gauran (mention'd before) into Connaught: That 'he had held a Correſpondence with Mac-Guire, 'O-Donel, and other Conſpirators: That he had 'aſſiſted them by his Brother Cormac Mac-Baron, 'and his baſe Son Con, in deſtroying Monaghan, 'and beſieging Ineskilling; and had menaced the 'Commanders of Kilulto and Killwarny out of 'their Fidelity and Allegiance.' All theſe things he flatly denied; and as if he had been as clear as Innocence it ſelf, he declar'd, That he would forfeit the Benefit of his Protection, could this Charge be proved againſt him.

Hereupon there paſſed a cloſe Debate in Council, Whether he ſhould be taken in Cuſtody, till he had anſwer'd to this Impeachment? 'Twas the Lord-Deputy's Opinion, that he ſhould: But the reſt, out of an Idle Apprehenſion they ſhould thereby violate the Benefit of his Protection, or elſe out of private Reſpect to his Perſon, thought that he ought to be diſmiſſed, and the Buſineſs deferred to another Opportunity: Whoſe Judgment, as being the major Part, and more experienced in the Affairs of Ireland, the Deputy complied with, tho' with ſome Reluctancy. He was therefore diſmiſſed, without ſo much as an Hearing given to the Evidence and Witneſſes who were there preſent.

The Queen was much concerned at this, becauſe all the World were acquainted with the Villany of his Deſigns; and the Queen had ſignified her Royal Pleaſure to have him confined till he could clear himſelf of the Crimes laid to his Charge.

He gave notwithſtanding great Encouragement to the Council of England and Ireland to hope the beſt of him, and was ready to engage for any thing almoſt that they propounded to him, viz. 'That he would ſecure his Brother Cormac, and 'his Party, from aſſiſting the Rebels, or Mac-Guire: That he would endeavour to thruſt the 'Iſland-Scots out of Ireland: That he would perſuade O-Donel to do the ſame: That in the 'Lord-Deputy's Abſence, he would defend the 'Frontiers with his own Troop of Horſe: That 'he would perform the Article for ſupplying 'Proviſions: That he would build a Priſon at 'Dungannon: That he would, upon certain Terms, 'allow of a Sheriff and Juſtices in the County of 'Tir-Oen: And, That he would be Security that 'Turlough Mac-Henry ſhould not let the Iſland-'Scots into Ireland.'

Ld Deputy purſues the Rebels.

The Lord-Deputy marching ſoon after to raiſe the Siege of Ineskilling, put the Rebels to flight: relieved that Town, and fortified the Garriſon: after which he briskly purſued Teagh Mac-Hugh, who was in Arms in Leinſter; under pretence of going one day on Hunting, he had very like to have taken him; for he forced him from his own Houſe at Ballencure into the ſteep Valleys which they call Glennes, where he placed a Garriſon, and purſued him ſo narrowly by ſome Parties he ſent in queſt of him through the By-ways and unfrequented Roads, that ſcarce a Day paſſed, but they brought in, according to the Cuſtom of the Country, ſome of the Rebels Heads. They likewiſe apprehended Rhiſe, Teagh's Wife, a Woman of a maſculine Spirit, and a Courage above her Sex, who was ſentenced to be burnt in Terrorem, but had her Life ſpared by the Queen's Clemency.

Sir Henry Bagnal was then ſent by the Lord-Deputy into another part of Ireland, where he relieved the Caſtle of Monaghan under a deſperate Siege laid thereto by Mac-Guire and Mac-Mahon, and put a freſh Garriſon therein. But the Lord-Deputy, having diſmiſſed Tir-Oen, could not by any means perſuade him to return to him again, though he made him ſeveral courteous Invitations. At the firſt he made Excuſes, as if he was afraid of the Marſhal. And not long after he began to talk high of a Truce or Accommodation, which is a Subject Princes are not pleaſed to have their Subjects inſiſt on; inſomuch that every one wondered to obſerve ſo odd a Change in the Man, when but a little before he had made his Submiſſions in ſo mean and abject a manner.

The Eight and Thirtieth Year of her Reign. 1595.

K. of Scots makes Preparations againſt the Spaniard.

The Queen and the whole Kingdom did at this time expreſs a publick Satisfaction for the Friendſhip of the King of Scots, and the great Care he profeſſed to keep up a good Agreement with England: For he ſent out a Proclamation for levying Forces to ſerve againſt the Spaniards, who were reported to have a vaſt Armada ready to ruin all Britain. And that he might ſucceed the better in his Preparations againſt them, he admoniſhes all his Subjects in the firſt place, to lay aſide all thoſe Heats and Quarrels, which are more frequent among the Natives of Scotland than any other Kingdom. He laid alſo a ſtrict Charge upon the Borderers, who had been corrupted, ſome of them, with Spaniſh Gold, to infeſt and plunder the Engliſh Territories, on purpoſe to create a Breach between England and Scotland; not only to forbear committing any Acts of Hoſtility upon England, but likewiſe to be very ſedulous in preſerving that good Correſpondence which had been confirmed on both ſides by the Nearneſs of Relation between the two Princes, as well as Parity of Religion and Similitude of Cuſtoms

1595. Ann. 38.

Customs and Language, and all this on pain of being esteemed and proclaimed the Enemies of their Country.

The Queen also put forth a Proclamation much to the same purpose: And whereas some Injuries had passed on both sides, it was agreed, That Commissioners should be assigned to hear and examine them, for the better Establishment of Peace and Justice between both Nations. In less than two Months from the beginning of this Year, were Edmund York, Nephew to that York who betrayed the Fort of Zutphen to the Spaniards, and Richard Williams, who, as I said before, were both of them apprehended the last Year, executed at Tyburn for High Treason. York confessed, 'That Holt the Jesuit, Hugh Owen, Jacomo de Francisco, and others, had offer'd him an Assignment of 40000 Ducats, subscribed by Ibara the Spaniard, if he would either murder the Queen himself, or assist the said Richard Williams in the Fact: That this Assignment was lodged in Holt's Hands for his use; and that Holt had kissed the consecrated Host, and sworn, that the Money should be paid as soon as the Murder was committed; and that he likewise bound York and Williams by their Oaths and the Sacrament to dispatch the Business.' To say truth, there was nothing more notorious than the lewd and villainous Attempts of the Fugitives about this time: For some were employ'd in hiring Assassins to murder the Queen, and others, for the sake of Money, were ready to serve as Actors in the infamous Parricide, though they no sooner took the Pay, but they revealed the Secret: Others again were so untrue to their own Villany, as to push on the Ruin of one another, and to fall a Prey to their own base Arts and counterfeit Impeachments.

York and Williams executed.

Fr. King declares War against Spain,

The French King was now at length resolved to denounce War against the King of Spain, who out of an Ambition of gaining the Crown of France, had raised a dangerous War in that Kingdom, and made daily Incursions upon the People of Cambray, who lived under the French King's Protection. This he signified by Letters to the Queen, and desired there might be some Measures taken in conjunction to carry on the War against Spain. He complained withal, That it would be very prejudicial to him to recal the Forces out of Bretagne, and very serviceable to the Spaniards at the same time. The Queen approved his Resolution of declaring War, and wished him good Success in it; and her Answer was, That she, for her part, had so publickly opposed the Designs of Spain, both by Sea and Land, in the Netherlands and Spain, Portugal and America, that she supposed it was known to all the World; and had the French King done his part, by an Offensive War, instead of acting, as he had, barely on the Defensive, the Spaniards could have done neither of them any great Damage.

and informs the Queen.

Her Answer.

She then laid before him, the Necessity of calling home her Men out of Bretagne, because there were several Commotions in Ireland: Besides that, they were by Contract to remain there no longer than till the Spaniards were removed from the Fort of Brest. She complained likewise, that the English had been very ill used; that they had not been join'd by the Supplies which were promised, and that Morlaix had not, according to the Terms of the Contract, been deliver'd up to them for a Place of Retreat.

No sooner had France and Spain blown the Trumpet to an open Hostility, but a miserable War broke out in the Countries of Luxemburgh and Picardy, Chastellet and Dourlans, were taken by the Spaniards, and Cambray assaulted. Hereupon Monsieur Chevalier was by the King's Council dispatched into England, to press closely for the sending some Recruits into Picardy, within fifteen Days after the Date of the Letters, whereas twelve of them were spent in his Journey, and so but three left to raise and send over the Forces.

However, they fell to making a Levy without Delay; and upon occasion, they were to be dispofed of to Calais, Boulogn, Diep, and other Sea-Ports. And this Sir Roger Williams represented forthwith to the King and the respective Governors of those Towns. The King's Council in Bretaign made at the same time pressing Instances for Aids to be sent thither: But because they mention'd no certain Number, nor on what Design they were to serve, nor took care of any Place of Retreat, the Queen could give them no direct Answer.

She aids him,

There were about this time spread abroad most probable Reports from all Parts of Europe, that the Spaniards were ready to sail for England with a more formidable and better provided Fleet than the former. Whereupon great care was taken to raise the stoutest Fellows in all the Maritime Counties of England, and strict Watch was kept upon all the Sea-Coasts. In the mean time two Fleets were got ready, one to encounter them in the British Sea, and the other bound for America, under the Conduct of Drake and Hawkins.

and prepares against a 2d Spanish Invasion.

All Men began now to expect and prepare for War, and the general Concern was, that so many brave Men, capable of doing their Country the best Service, and so much good Money too, were thrown away upon France; for certain it is, that the Expedition to Brest stood the Nation in 47248 Crowns de Soleil, and above 2000640 more were spent upon the Forces under the Earl of Essex, besides the Money that was lent; and it was a new Subject of Grief to the very Women, to reflect that their Sons and Relations were unhappily taken off, and not reserved for this glorious Occasion.

Mean while Lomeney arrives here from France; and though he did disguise the taking of Cambray, yet he pressed hard that some Auxiliaries might be sent into Picardy, and then Commissioners appointed to treat about Measures for maintaining the War. Which appearing somewhat odd to the Queen and Council, he grew very uneasy, and charged the Loss of Cambray upon the Queen, saying, That she seemed to triumph in the King's ill Success, and thereby would oblige him to make a Peace with Spain. She returned him an immediate Answer, which she likewise did soon after by Letters, and by Sir Thomas Edmonds, who then was her Ambassador at the French Court; which Answer was to this effect.

Her Answer to the French King's Demands.

'That she was much concerned for the Loss of Cambray, but more that Lomeney should lay the Loss of it at her door, because Supplies were not sent from England. She made it appear it was impossible to dispatch them at so short a warning. Nor should she have been thought a prudent Woman to expose them to an Army flushed with Victory, after having twice routed the French; but on the contrary, to have had very little Regard to the Welfare and Safety of her Subjects: That she was so far from taking any Pleasure in the King's Misfortune, and thereby obliging him to conclude a Peace with the common Enemy: That neither the King himself, nor any body else, had the least imaginable reason to suspect any such thing, if he would but take the leisure to reflect how constant and ready she had been in her Services to him. She promised to give him for the future all

1595. Ann. 38.

'all the Aid and Assistance she could, forasmuch 'as they were imbarked in one and the same 'Interest, and their Affairs equally imbarrassed. 'Nor could she be fairly blamed for any Omis'sions or Neglects in respect of the Spaniard, 'since from the very time that they began to 'discover their Spleen against England, she had 'never ceased to weaken and divert his Forces 'both by Sea and Land, and all for this reason 'barely, That she had a mind to rescue her 'Neighbours from the Tyranny of a Spanish Yoke. 'And she was at this very Juncture wholly em'ploy'd in providing a Fleet and Army to op'pose him; she was therefore very much to be 'excused, if she did not send the French King 'Supplies out of hand, since thereby she must 'have exposed either England or Ireland to her 'Enemies, who lay ready to invade one or 't'other, for want of Forces at home to defend 'them. And whereas it was privately whisper'd 'by some Subjects of his, That she either suspec'ted the King's Honour and Constancy, or else 'envy'd his good Success; she protested, that 'such Thoughts were too unworthy of a Prince, 'to find the least Room in her Breast, for that 'she really believed she had a secure Interest 'in his Friendship, and wished him from her 'Heart all the Happiness and good Fortune he 'could desire.'

Besides this, she order'd Edmonds to put the King in mind of these Particulars: 'That 'tis a 'sovereign piece of Prudence in Princes to bear 'and forbear, in little and private Instances, '(tho perhaps against the grain) the better to 'keep their Subjects in Temper, and their Go'vernment in Peace; and that because the Love 'of the People is the surest Safeguard of the 'Prince. Now this having been the Method of 'the King of France himself, 'twas necessary she 'should observe the same Measures, and omit 'nothing for the Security of her Subjects, who 'were so dear to her, and for whose chearful 'Obedience, Courage and Fidelity, she owned 'her self greatly indebted to the Divine Good'ness. All this France it self was able to testify, 'for that many of them had bravely ventur'd 'their Lives there, and a great many more were 'ready to do so, were they not detain'd for some 'time at least by the Cries and Tears of their 'Wives, Children and Relations, especially at a 'time when the common Enemy threatned the 'Subversion both of England and Ireland. Would 'the King but impartially consider these things, 'she question'd not but he would pass a fair Con'struction upon her Answers, and give no ear to 'those who were serving the common Enemy, by 'dissolving that Friendship which had hitherto 'been preserved between her Majesty and her 'self, and endeavouring the Ruin of them both 'by that means. That some Men made it their 'business to do ill Offices on both sides, and so 'to rob Princes of the Lives of their bravest Sub'jects, and the Affections of the rest; yet could 'she never believe that those kind of Practices 'would ever induce him to make a Peace with 'Spain, without the Concurrence of England, (as 'Lomeney had often hinted) on pretence that 'he had not received more Supplies from thence. 'Nay, she professed her self very well assured, 'that so considerable a Prince as he, must needs 'have a greater Regard for his Reputation, and 'set an higher Value upon his Vows and Pro'mises, than ever to forget the good Services 'of the English, or once admit a Thought into 'his Bosom of that unworthy and dishonoura'ble Nature, as to deserve the worst Censures, 'should it be harboured in the Breast of any o'ther Man: But should he (which God forbid) 'be brought to such a Compliance through the 'Importunity of the Popish Leaguers, yet she de'pended still on a good Providence to preserve 'England: That as soon as she could thoroughly 'learn the Design of the Spaniard in those fresh 'Preparations, she was ready to lend him the 'best Assistance she could, to prevent the Ene'mies reaping that Advantage for the future, 'which they had already made of his Necessity.' This is what Edmonds, and after him Sir Henry Unton, the Queen's Ambassador, communicated to his Majesty more at large upon his Return to France.

Fr. King perswaded to make Peace with Spain.

But, to say the truth, the Troubles in France increasing every Day more and more, there were a great many that pressed the King to enter on a Peace with Spain, and endeavoured to persuade him, that the Queen did nothing but amuse him with a few fine Words. Others, on the contrary, dissuaded him from it, particularly Kath. of Navarre, the D. of Bouillon, and Sir Henry Unton, the English Ambassador. And they intimated withal, that there was little or no Hopes of their having Peace with Spain, which had so long withheld from him the Kingdom of Navarre, which belonged to his Predecessors, and had likewise embroiled France, in hopes one Day to govern it; when that Prince had moreover claim'd Little-Bretagne, as his Daughter's Hereditary Right, and asserted her Sham-Title to England in printed Pamphlets, tho' in opposition to the known and unquestion'd Right of the King of Scots, insomuch that he seemed to be, at least in Conceit and Imagination, the Grand Monarch of all Europe.

The King taking but little notice of these Remonstrances, the Queen could not forbear mistrusting all his Pleas of Honour and good Faith, especially when she was certainly informed from the College of Cardinals, that he received the Benefit and Blessing of the Romish Communion, on no other Terms, than these which follow, viz.

Terms of the French King's being admitted a Catholick.

'That he should abjure all Heresies, and pro'fess the Catholick Faith after the same manner 'his Ambassadors shall do in this Place: That 'he shall introduce the Romish Religion into the 'Principality of Berne, and appoint Catholick 'Magistrates in the said Province: That within 'a Year he shall occasion the Prince of Conde to 'be taken out of Hereticks Hands, and cause 'him to be instructed and brought up in the 'Romish Faith: That the Decrees of the Coun'cil of Trent shall be published and received 'throughout the French Dominions: That he 'shall fill the vacant Churches, and religious 'Houses with sound and true Chatholicks, and 'Persons free from the Blemish of Heresy: That 'he shall use his best Endeavours to re-invest 'such of the Clergy in their Benefices, who have 'been unjustly and illegally dispossessed: That 'he shall be careful to confer Dignities and Of'fices of Trust on Catholicks only, and as much 'as may be, to deprive and keep out Hereticks: 'That the Concordates be duly observed, and all 'Abuses reformed which have any way crept in, 'contrary thereto: That the Absolution granted 'in France by the Bishops, be condemned: That 'he shall send Letters to all the Princes of Christendom, and therein give notice of his Conver'sion, Abjuration, and publick Profession of the 'Catholick Faith.'

See the Appendix.

* Mean while the Spaniards put to Sea under the Command of Didaco Brochen, with four Gallies, and arrived in July early in the Morning in Cornwal, opposite to Bretagne, where they set on fire St. Paul's Church, which stood alone in the Fields, besides Mouse-hole, Neulin and Pensans, three poor Fisher-Towns, and then retired without so much as taking or killing a Man. And these 1595. Ann. 38. were the only Spaniards that ever set foot in England, as Enemies.

But Matters of a much higher Nature, and greater Consequence, were undertaken against the Spaniards, not only on a private Account by some particular Persons, but in a publick Manner by the Queen: For Sir Walter Raleigh, Captain of the Queen's Guard, having debauched one of the Maids of Honour, (whom he married afterwards) and being on that account out of Favour, and confined for several Months, was at length enlarged, but banished the Court: whereupon he resolved to follow the Byass of his Fancy, which led him to make new Discoveries both of Things and Places, and so undertook a Voyage to Guiana; a Country which the Spaniards used to say, was very full of Gold. This Voyage, he hoped, would turn to the Honour and Advantage of his Country, as being a probable Road to vast Treasures, and affording a likelier means of annoying the Spaniard, in the inner Countries of America; where he conceived they lay abundantly more exposed, than on the Sea-Coasts; for these Towns are never wealthy, but when the Golden Tide flows in there, to be drained out again into Spain.

Raleigh's Design on Guiana.

His Voyage.

On the 6th of February therefore he failed from Plymouth, and on the 22d of March arrived at the Isle of Trinidado, eight degrees on this side the Line; where he took the small City of St. Joseph's without much Trouble; together with the Governour Antonio Bereo; but not so much as one Piece of Silver in the Place. Having asked Bereo several Questions, who had, it seems, made a very strict Search for Gold Mines in Guiana, he left his Ship at Trinidado, and entring the River Orenoque, which is extremely large, and fed by several Streams, with a few Pinnaces, and 100 Men, he looked out for Guiana for 400 Miles together; and ventured among several Shallows, and Windings, and parting Streams, exposed all the while to the Heat of the Sun just over his Head, and incommoded by violent Storms of Rain, and a great many Difficulties besides: till the Air blowing something cooler in April, forc'd the Rains down every where in such vast Quantities, that he was forced to return for his own Security. He that would know more of this Expedition, may consult an ingenious Book of his relating to it; wherein he gives a most accurate Description of the Countries, as if he had been born and bred there; and concludes that Guiana must needs be a wealthy Country; not only from the beautiful Marcasits found there, but from the Writings of the Spaniards, and upon the Credit and Report of the Barbarians, of whom yet he could but have little Knowledge; but indeed chiefly from the sanguine Complexion of his own Hopes and Desires. He likewise relates some things which appear fabulous enough, viz. of the Amazons, and a certain Nation of People, whose Shoulders are so high, that their Face is placed in their Breast: A Secret which Poets and Travellers had never before discover'd. In his way homeward he set fire on Cumana, because the Inhabitants would not ransom it at his Price, and he did the same by several small Cottages at St. Mary's and Rio de la Hach. Nor was he discouraged from one or two Essays more of this kind, tho' at a vast Expence to himself, and altho' the Spaniards had planted a Colony at Trinidado to oppose his Attempts.

At the same time, Amias Preston, and Sommers pillaged the Island of Porto-Santo near Madera, of Coche near Margarita, the small Town of Coros, and St. Jago de Leon, a small City; but Cumana they ransomed. A few Months before, the three Ships belonging to the Earl of Cumberland did attack a large Carack, called the five Wounds of Christ; she by chance took fire in the Engagement, and was burnt with all her Cargo; the Fire flaming out in that violent degree, that the English had much ado to escape, and the Portugueses were forced to cast themselves into the Sea. These Exploits, and some more, were executed at the Charge of private Men.

English infest the Western Ocean.

But the Queen being inform'd that a vast Treasure was brought to Porto Rico in the Isle of Boriquena, or St. John's, for the Use of the King of Spain; in order to cut off his main Support, by intercepting the same, and keep his Men employ'd in those Parts; she sent thither Sir Francis Drake and Sir John Hawkins, who were to share the Command at Sea, and with them Sir Thomas Baskerville, as General of the Land-Forces, with six of the King's Ships, and twenty other Men of War. They failed from Plymouth on the last of August, and arrived at Grand Canary the 27th of the next Month. Drake and Baskerville had a great Inclination to attempt taking this Island, not only to do themselves Credit, but their Country Service, in gaining a Convenience for victualling the Fleet. Hawkins was of another Mind, as presuming the Fleet very well provided; and that they ought to lose no time, till they had dispatch'd the main Design. But being overborne at last by Baskerville's Importunity, who undertook to gain it in four days; and likewise by the Seamens Complaints for Want of Provision; he gave his Consent. But Baskerville, upon his Attempt to land, soon found the Difficulty, and gave over the Attempt: for the Townsmen had put themselves on their Guard, and the Seamen made a stout Opposition from the Shore. When therefore they had got from thence, after about a Month's Sail, they arrived at the Isle of St. Domingo; and much about the same time five Spanish Ships, which were sent out to observe the English, and convoy the Plate from Porto Rico, seized an English Pinnace which had lost the Fleet; and having by Tortures forced the Master and Mariners to confess that the English had a Design upon Porto Rico, they made thither with all the Sail they could, to give Intelligence that the English were coming. The Gold and Silver they immediately bury'd, and dispatch'd small Vessels to all the Islands and Sea-Coasts, to give the Spaniards timely Notice; who took the Alarm, and armed themselves. The English staying to build some Pinnaces in the Isle of Dominica, lost time, and came too late to Porto Rico: Where as soon as they came to anchor, the Enemy ply'd them with their great Guns from the Ports, and Sir Nicolas Clifford Knight, and Brute Brown, were mortally wounded, whilst they were at Supper, with a Shot which dispatch'd them in a day or two. The same day Hawkins died of Grief, occasion'd by some Contest which had arose between him and the other Commanders; and his Death was much lamented by the Seamen. The Spaniards sunk a great Ship, to block up the Mouth of the Haven, and had placed large Masts on both sides from thence to the very Forts that guard the Avenues: Within were the five Spanish Ships, prepared to oppose the English, all ballasted with Sand, and well stock'd with Musketeers, and great Guns and Ammunition. Nevertheless Baskerville mann'd out his Boats and Pinnaces, and made an Attempt to enter the Town, firing one or two of the Spanish Ships; but being repulsed with the Loss of a great many Men, taken off by a Shower of small Shot, he had no Stomach at all to renew the Assault. He failed therefore from thence to the Continent, and burnt Rio de la Hach, a small Town, which the Inhabitants offer'd to ransom at 34000 Ducats;

Canary in vain attempted.

as

1595. Ann. 38.

They take some small Towns.

as they likewise set fire to some other small Villages thereabouts. Afterwards they burnt S. Martha's, in which they found not the smallest Piece of Gold or Silver. The next Place they took was Numbre de Dios, which they burnt, together with the Shipping; but found neither People nor a Penny of Money in the Town. Thence they marched with 750 Men well arm'd, towards March towards Panama.

Panama: But after a day or two's very troublesome March through very narrow and difficult Passages, they found themselves assaulted from the Woods with Showers of small Shot; and observing likewise that there was a Fort to oppose them, at the Entrance of that Isthmus; and hearing that there were two more within to obstruct

But without Success.

their Passage, they were forced to return to their Ships wretchedly harass'd and half-starv'd, the Men being much weakened and dispirited: And now 'twas resolved to make towards the Isle of Death of Sir Fran. Drake.

Escudo, and from thence to Porto Bello. Mean while Sir Francis Drake was, on the 28th of January, carried off by the Bloody-flux, the Vexation of his Disappointment assisting his Distemper. He had no other Funeral, that what is common at Sea, viz. to be cast overboard with a Volley of Shot; and he happened to find his Grave, very near the Place from whence he had borrowed so large a Reputation, by his fortunate Successes. He that would know more of this Gentleman's History, may have Recourse to what is said of him under the Year of 1580. In their Return they were met by the Spanish Fleet on the South of Cuba, near the Isle of Pines; which had waited for their Coming: However, Baskerville and Troughton, the one in the Vice-Admiral, and the other in the Admiral, gave the Spaniards such a warm Entertainment, upon the first Brush; that, if we may take their Words, the Fleet got clear of them with less Damage from the Enemy, than was received on their side by the English. At last they returned to England, after they had been out eight Months, with very little Booty; having fired only some small Towns, and a good Number of Ships: For 'tis to be considered, that the Spaniards in America, who had formerly lived very secure, by reason of the Distance of the Place, having lately suffered great Damages both from the French and English, who ventured into those Parts, had by this time strengthen'd themselves with good Forts; and were very well provided to make their Defence upon any Assault.

Whilst the English were thus employ'd in the Western Parts, a former Misunderstanding between the Queen and the States-General, which as it ow'd its Rise to a very inconsiderable Occasion, so it by degrees grew enflamed, and soon after by the same degrees vanished; as will appear by what follows. The Lord-Treasurer Burleigh had laid before the Queen, the vast Sums of Money, which had been expended upon the Low-Country-War, since the Year 1585. the great Quantity of Gold and Silver, which had been exported to Holland, and their coined, to the great Advantage of the States, but never a Penny of it brought back into England. How many brave Englishmen had been lost upon their account. What a mighty Expence she must needs be at, before she could quell the Commotions in Ireland, and divert the Attempts of the Spaniards. He remonstrated likewise, how the States ow'd their Security to her Majesty's Assistance, and had by the same means annoy'd their Enemies, establish'd their Government, which before stood on a tottering Foundation; and besides, the Increase of their Wealth by Trade, and their Power by the Accession of new Colonies, had made themselves capable of succouring their Neighbours.

1595. Ann. 38.

Mony demanded of the Dutch.

The Queen, being tired out with the Inconveniences of a tedious War, the Expence especially, signified all these things to the States, by her Residentiary Sir Thomas Bodley; particularly, that England was doubly impoverished, both as to Men and Money, by maintaining so long a War against Spain; which she had made her Enemy, meerly for having lent them her Assistance, in the Extremity of their Affairs. She demanded Queen's Proposals.

therefore, 'That they would ease her of the Expence of maintaining her Recruits: That they would pay back some part of the Charge, and appoint Commissioners to find out Ways and Means for reimbursing the entire Sum, which was raised on their account, and payable to Sir Horatio Pallavicini, to whom she had payed a large Interest for a long while.' The States owned, with many Thanks, the Queen's great and signal Favours; and acknowledged themselves obliged to her Majesty, next under God, for all their good Successes: But they alledged, States Answer.

'That they had laid out such large Sums in the year 1588. against the Spanish Armada; so much the year following in the Portugal Expedition; and after that, so much more in the Voyage to Brest; and had suffered of late so very much by an extraordinary Flood; that they were not at present furnished with Money enough to discharge their Debts, unless by laying too heavy Burdens on the Necks of their People, and so murdering their Cause all at once: That they were so far from finding their Charges lessen'd by their new Acquisitions, that they were rather augmented, through the Necessity of fortifying those Places, and stocking them with fresh Garrisons. Then for their Trade, it was at that time, and had been exposed to infinite Losses, by Seizures of Goods in Spain, and through the Piracies of the English and Dunkirkers. They could not deny but they had supplied the French King; but 'twas not from the great Banks they were Masters of, or that they affected to be thought richer than they were; not out of any Design to crave his Protection, in Neglect of England: But purely to divert the Enemy, and keep that King from making a Peace with Spain; to which either his own Wants, or the civil Dissensions of his Subjects, or the corrupt Counsels of his Ministers, might otherwise oblige him. However, Part of the Money they engaged to reimburse.'

But the Queen demanded more than was offer'd; whereas they strongly insisted, that by the Agreement in the year 1585, the Money was not to be repayed, till the War was at an end; and that the Queen ought not to go back from her Contract, if she had any Regard for her Honour. She however was of another Opinion, founded upon these Maxims of Law and Policy.

Q. replies.

'That all Compacts between Prince and Prince are to be interpreted by the Measures of Truth and Sincerity; and that no Prince is bound by any Agreement, which afterwards appears to have a real Tendency to the common Prejudice and Detriment: That 'tis no Breach of Peace, for a Prince to recede from his Contract, upon the Intervention of some new and unforeseen Accident, which alters the Case, and puts a new Face on the State of things; and which had accordingly been provided for, could the Exigence have been foreseen or apprehended: That Leagues and Agreements between Princes ought not to be played or trifled with, nor are they to be kept with such as are unfaithful to their own Engagements: That a Prince is not bound to observe a Contract, relating barely to a Point of Honour or State, if it turn

to

1595. Ann. 38. 'to the visible Damage and Inconvenience of 'the Subject: That every Contract, tho' confirm'd by an Oath, is understood to oblige no 'farther nor otherwise, than as things shall continue in statu quo, and may fairly alter upon 'Change of Circumstances: That every Man 'owes more to the Publick than to his Promise: 'And that, according to Seneca, a wise Man never changes his Purpose, if things remain as 'they were, when 'twas first fram'd; having no 'occasion to repent or revoke it, because he 'took the best Measures, as things then stood; 'and made as good a Choice as Fortune would 'give him leave.' Upon this therefore follow'd many, and very curious Disputes; as likewise whether the States were obliged to pay any thing to the Queen's Successors, should it please God to take her away; since, according to the Letter of the Contract, the one was not bound to aid, nor the other to pay. Again, Whether the Debt demanded in Pallavicini's Name, were not rather chargeable on those of Brabant, Flanders, and Artois; forasmuch as the Contract was sign'd during their Confederacy, and before the present one, in which the united Provinces were engag'd. However Bodley brought the States at last to those Terms, that rather than incur the Disfavour of so great a Princess, they made the following Propositions: That they would immediately free the Queen from the entire Expence relating to the Maintenance of the English Auxiliaries: (computed at 40000 l. per ann.) That they would pay 20000 l. Sterling for some Years, assist her with a certain Number of Ships, and conclude no Peace nor Treaties without her Consent: That upon the Conclusion of a Peace, they would pay her a yearly Sum of 100000 l. for four Years; with this Reserve, notwithstanding, that they should have out of England, a Supply of 4000 Men, and a free and full Discharge of all Debts and Demands. These Proposals they humbly desir'd her Majesty's Acceptance of, for the Reasons before alledg'd. They represented moreover the unstable Condition of their Government at this Juncture, the People being under a general Consternation at the great Power of the Enemy, who was able to maintain so many Armies on foot; the Provinces not being well agreed about the Method of raising their several Contributions; and the principal Lords at Variance among themselves: Besides that, great Numbers withdrew from the Reform'd Religion, and the Emperor us'd all possible Methods by his Ambassadors, to incline the People to accept of a Peace: So that should this large Debt of Ten Years standing be at that time punctually demanded, it was to be fear'd, the Consequence would prove very fatal to the United Provinces.

Lib. de beneficiis, cap. 13.

Their new Proposals.

The Queen could not be induced to admit their Excuses upon the Plea of Poverty; but her Pity supply'd the Room of all Arguments; for she was unwilling to lose the Benefit of their Alliance, to force them to Despair, or to give the Enemy any Opportunity of insulting. She demanded however, that they should bring into her Fleet 30 Ships, stored with all manner of Provisions, to serve on the present occasion against Spain; and allow some Months Pay to the English Recruits. And thus was this Dispute laid asleep, till the Year 1598.

Accepted by the Q.

In the mean time, the Hans-Towns in Germany made Complaints to the Emperor and States of the Empire, of the Infringement of their Privileges, in relation to Customs, which had been formerly granted them by the Kings of England: That their Goods had been arrested in the Portugal-Expedition; and that the English Merchants had engross'd the Trade in Germany.

To these Particulars, Dr. Christopher Parkins answer'd, in the Queen's Name, 'That those Privileges were revoked in the Reign of Edward VI. by an Act of Parliament, (since unrepealed) upon the account of some Mismanagements, and for other warrantable Causes; as 'being indeed no way convenient at that Juncture, and having been granted when Trade 'and Navigation were at a low Ebb in England: 'But now the Case was alter'd, and therefore in 'Queen Mary's Reign the Exercise thereof was 'totally prohibited: That the Queen, for her 'part, never was for divesting them of their Privilege (which yet she had an Act of Parliament to warrant her in) but had in the first 'Year of her Reign made some temporary Grants 'to them, such as the Times would then bear; 'till they themselves had, without the least Warning, thrust the English out of Hamburgh, contrary to the good Agreement which was then 'between them: Nevertheless she design'd still 'to place them on the same Level of Privilege, 'with the English, in respect of Trade; but they 'rejected the Offer, and insisted on a greater: 'Whereas 'twas contrary to general Custom and 'common Reason, to prefer Foreigners before 'ones natural Subjects, in the Business of trading 'for Commodities, peculiar to every Country; 'which yet they seem'd, by those Privileges, to 'insist upon. Besides, 'twas impossible the Government should subsist, should the Hans-Towns 'be obliged to pay no higher Customs at this 'time of day, than were impos'd above 300 'Years ago; if Liberties granted to the Prejudice of the Government should be allow'd of, 'and those which have been formerly revoked 'should be in Force again, at the Request of any private Person; yet had she very lately offer'd them, upon the Emperor's account, almost the same Privileges with the English, viz. 'that for Customs on the account of Cloths exported hence, and for Commodities usually 'imported hither from the Hans-Towns, they 'should pay no more than the Queen's natural 'Subjects: But if they had a Mind to import 'foreign Wares into England, such as come from 'Spain and the Low-Countries; they might lawfully do so, paying a Penny in the Pound less 'than other Foreigners: But as for Cloth, it 'should not be lawful for those of the Hans-'Towns to transport it any whither, but to the 'Hans-Towns beyond the River Ems, and the 'City of Emden towards the East, and the Baltick Sea: That she likewise allow'd them the 'Liberty of having their Houses in London and 'elsewhere in England, and to govern their Company in a regular way, by a President; on 'condition nothing were done to the Queen's 'Prejudice, or against the Laws of the Land; 'though their own Privileges contain nothing 'of any Liberty to make Choice of their Governor, or to frame Statutes and Orders, or 'maintain any Jurisdiction in a foreign Country, '&c. That the Goods which they complain of 'being arrested, were warlike Ammunition, 'which they were carrying into Spain, to be 'employ'd against England; which their Privileges did not in the least warrant, and contrary 'to the Notice given in all their Cities, that 'they should not do it, unless they would be 'consider'd as Enemies: That their Ships were 'again discharged, and nothing seiz'd or kept, 'but the said Ammunition; which were lawfully detain'd, both by the Law of Arms, and 'the Constitution of the Kingdom. As for the 'Monopoly they complain'd of, the Germans 'themselves had certify'd in their Writings, that 'the English us'd a Way of Trade, far enough 1595. Ann. 38.

'from

1595. Ann. 38. 'from the Oppreſſion of engroſſing. She was 'therefore in hopes, that the Decree of Augsburg 'for prohibiting the Engliſh Trade, procur'd by 'the Hans-Towns, would be laid aſide; eſpeci-'ally conſidering the States of the Empire have 'no Authority to take Cognizance of Privileges 'or any thing whatever, relating to the Rights 'and Laws of the Kingdom of England; which 'being an abſolute and independent Kingdom, 'owns no Superior, but its own proper Sove-'reign.'

Nevertheleſs vaſt Quantities of Grain were in the mean time brought into England, from the Hans-Towns, after the Queen had granted a general Permiſſion to import it without paying Cuſtom. And this mightily abated the Price of Grain; which was advanc'd to ſuch a Rate, by reaſon of the great Rains which fell in the Summer, and ſome private Methods which were us'd to tranſport it, that ſome of the poorer Sort in London began to mutiny on that account.

The Death of the Earl of Arundel. About this time, Philip Howard, Earl of Arundel, died in the Tower of London; having after his Condemnation in the Year 1587, (the Severity of which the Queen was pleas'd to qualify by a gracious Reprieve) given himſelf up to his retired Meditations; till by a religious kind of Auſterity, he had reduc'd himſelf to a very languiſhing State. He left behind him his young and only Son Thomas, whom he had by Ann Dacres of Gilleſland.

L. Vaux. Much about the ſame time did William L. Vaux depart this Life, a Priſoner at large, and a moſt bigotted Catholick. He was ſucceeded by his Grandſon Edward, whom his Son had by Elizabeth Roper.

Heneage. Both theſe Gentlemen were accompanied by Sir Thomas Heneage, who had been a Servant to the Queen from his Youth, and made by her firſt Treaſurer of her Chamber, and then Vice-Chamberlain and Chancellor of the Dutchy of Lancaſter; a Gentleman he was of ſo ſpruce and polite Addreſs, that he ſeem'd purely calculated for a Court. He left but one Daughter behind him, by whom the Family of the Finches was happily augmented with a fair Eſtate and a numerous Iſſue.

Dr. Whitaker. The laſt Month of this Year did William Whitaker lay down this mortal Life; an excellent and well-accompliſh'd Divine, that had been fifteen Years the Queen's Profeſſor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Cambridge, and Maſter of St. John's College. He had impair'd his Conſtitution by too intenſe Studies, when that Query was bandied among the Clergy there, Whether true juſtifying Faith can be loſt? His Memory was much valued, and his Loſs equally lamented by that Univerſity, which had receiv'd conſiderable Advantages from his Sermons, Example and Writings.

Sir Roger Williams. The very ſame Month died Sir Roger Williams Knight, a Welſh Gentleman of the Family of Penroſe in Monmouthſhire. He firſt tried his Fortune in the Army under the Duke of Alva; and afterwards having obtain'd a full and compleat Experience of the Arts and Diſcipline of War, he was perhaps no way inferior to the beſt Soldiers of that Age, could he have put bounds to his Courage, which ran quite away with his Conduct and Diſcretion. 'Twas undoubtedly by a ſingular Excellence in him, that he was capable, upon the bare ſtock of Experience, without the leaſt Improvements of Learning or Education, of writing a moſt exquiſite and judicious Hiſtory of the Low-Country-Wars, in which he was an Actor, and of maintaining, as he did, in an admirable Book on that Subject, the Art of Fighting as it is now practis'd, againſt that which was in former Ages, to the great Mortification of the antiquated Admirers of Bows and Arrows. The Earl of Eſſex attended at his Funeral, which was ſolemniz'd at St. Paul's, beſides as many Officers of the Army as were then in Town. 1595. Ann. 38.

Sir Tho. Morgan. The next Day after he was buried, Sir Thomas Morgan, who was with Sir Roger, his Kinſman, when he breath'd his laſt, departed this Life. He was alſo a Welſhman, and an old Knight, of the Honourable Family of the Morgans of Pencarn in the ſame County; a Gentleman that was juſtly valued for a well-temper'd Courage, and receiv'd yet higher Commendations on the account of his unmovable Loyalty to his Prince; for he put into the Queen's hands an Aſſignment of a yearly Sum of Money made to him under the King of Spain's Hand, to gain him over to his Intereſt, and contented himſelf with the Allowance of a ſmall Salary from her.

Ruſſel, Lord-Deputy of Ireland, foreſeeing by the Circumſtances mention'd by me towards the end of the laſt Year's Tranſactions, that a War was likely to break out, made preſſing Applications by his Friends in England, that ſome experienc'd Officer might be ſent over to him, to aſſiſt him with the beſt Advices in this dangerous Juncture. He had a mind for Baskervil before any other, tho' he did not go ſo far as to mention him. But, clear contrary to his Expectation, Sir John Norris was the Perſon pitcht upon, a thorow Soldier, a good Officer, and every way reſolute and brave.

Tir-Oen takes the Fort at Black-water. As ſoon as Tir-Oen heard that he was ready to arrive with 1300 Veterane Soldiers who had ſerv'd in Bretaign and the Low Countries, and with other Supplies likewiſe out of England, and that the Engliſh had a deſign on the Caſtles of Baleſhanon and Belyck, at the entrance of Lough-Earn, he was driven by his Fears to make an unexpected Aſſault upon the Fort at Black-water, which opens the Paſſage to the Country of Tir-Oen, and forc'd it to ſurrender, through the abſence and neglect of the Governor, Edward Cornwallis; which as ſoon as he had done, being hurried and toſſed between various Reſolutions, he wrote Letters to the Earl of Kildare, with Offers of his Service againſt the Injuries done him by the Lord-Deputy's Officers; and at the ſame time promis'd the Earl of Ormond, and Sir Henry Wallop Treaſurer of the Army, to continue a good Loyaliſt, and intreated the Lord-Deputy and Sir John Norris, by Letters ſent on purpoſe, to uſe him favourably, and not force him to turn Rebel againſt his Inclinations, and purely for his own Security. But theſe Letters were intercepted by the Marſhal Bagnal, and ſuppreſs'd, to the Earl's great Detriment, as he afterwards complain'd.

He is proclaimed a Traitor. For ſoon after he was in July proclaim'd a publick Traitor, both in Iriſh and Engliſh, by the Name of Hugh-O-Neal, the Son of Matthew Fadareugh, (which ſignifies the Blackſmith) and the baſe Son of Con-Oneal. The firſt part of the Proclamation took notice of his Ingratitude to the Queen, who had given him a yearly Penſion as a Relief under his Extremities, advanc'd him to the Dignity of an Earl, given him an Eſtate in Ireland above others of his Family, and pardon'd him not only for the Outrages committed on his Neighbours, but for the barbarous Murder of Shan-O-Neal's Son, whom he had ſtrangl'd without allowing him a bare Hearing. Then was mention'd his baſe uſage of Shan's other Sons, by keeping them in Irons; and his treacherous tampering with the Lords of Ulſter to join in Rebellion with him: And laſt of all, it contain'd the promiſe of a Pardon to all that would deſert him, and a general Caution to every one not to aid or assist the Rebels in any kind or degree whatever.

aſſiſt

1595. Ann. 38. Rebel's Strength. The Rebels were at this present able to muster about 1000 Horse, and 6280 Foot in Ulster, and 2300 in Connaught, every Man of them at Tir-Oen's Command. And among these there were several experienc'd Soldiers, that had been train'd in the Exercise of War ever since the Lord-Deputy Perrot had appointed every Lord in Ulster to have such a number of Men well-disciplin'd, and always in a readiness to serve against the Island-Scots: Others of them had been bred up in the Low-Country-Wars, being sent for over by the Deputy upon an unhappy Errand, as in the conclusion it prov'd: Others were induced, by the Persuasions of the Lord Deputy Fitz-Williams, to serve in the English Wars, and by that means grew experienc'd Soldiers.

Norris advances against Tir-Oen. Nor were the Forces under Sir John Norris any whit inferior, who had Orders to march against the Rebels to prevent the Succours they expected out of Spain; for the Queen had given him the principal Command, (to prevent any Reflection that might fall on the Lord Deputy) stiling him The General of the Army in Ulster in the absence of the Lord-Deputy; and granted him an absolute Power to pardon what Malecontents he should think fit. With what design this was done, I cannot divine; but most certainly 'twas the subject of general Wonder, in regard that the very Essence of Government seems to consist in its being lodg'd in the hands of one, and nothing being either more monstrous or mischievous than a mixt or divided Authority. However the Lord-Deputy acted in conjunction with him, and they advanc'd as far as Armagh, putting the Rebels into such a Consternation, that Tir-Oen abandon'd the Fort at Black-water, set fire on the adjacent Villages and the Town of Dunganon, demolish'd a great part of his own House there, and looking on his Affairs as quite desperate, began to look out for some Retreat or fit place to abscond in; but the Loyalists made an Halt for want of Provision, (which is a Neglect that has disappointed many Expeditions in Ireland) and after having proclaim'd Tir-Oen a Traitor in his own Territories, and placed a Garrison in the Metropolitan-Church of Armagh, they return'd back again. Tir-Oen observ'd them narrowly in their return, and sometimes shew'd himself at a great distance. They afterwards fortified the Garrison of Monaghan, and when they had got pretty near to Dundalk, the Lord-Deputy, according to the Instructions he had receiv'd, gave up the entire Charge of the Army to Norris, and after several Compliments and Expressions of Civility between them, return'd to Dublin, and kept a strict eye upon the Affairs of Leimster, Connaught and Munster.

And the Lord-Deputy.

They return again.

Norris remain'd with a strong Army in Ulster, and did nothing answerable to the great Hopes conceiv'd of him: Perhaps out of an Emulation against the Lord-Deputy, (which the Courtiers endeavour'd to foment by all the sly Arts they were Masters of) the one being as little able to brook an Equal, as the other to endure a Superior; or else from a Principle of Policy usual with Soldiers, who love to spin out a War, as being very sensible that their Value rises according as there is occasion for their Service; or it may be, out of some affectionate Regards for Tir-Oen, who was as great a Favourite with him, as, on the contrary, he was unacceptable to the Lord-Deputy; for he gave, it seems, so much credit to the fine Harangues of Tir-Oen, and his Party, that he blam'd the Lord-Deputy in his Thoughts, as having dealt too rigidly with Tir-Oen, when he refus'd to accept of any Terms of an Accommodation at his Hands. The Truth of the matter is, that the Lord Deputy was really persuaded, that Tir-Oen did nothing but make Pretences of Delay, till the Succours, which were expected, arriv'd from Spain. Wherefore he refused all Terms or Overtures of a Treaty, as so many Tricks and Artifices on his side, and as inconsistent with the Queen's Honour and his own Reputation, since they were the Proposals of a proclaim'd Rebel. Norris, on the other side, being more credulous, conceiv'd such Hopes of bringing him to handsome Terms, as to admit of a Conference with him. But these Expectations were rais'd and cherish'd by the Subtilty of Tir-Oen, who presented Norris with a pretended Submission, subscrib'd by his own Hand, and begg'd Pardon on his Knees before Norris and Secretary Fenton; protesting withal, 'That he did not withdraw his Allegiance from his Prince out of Malice or any ill Design; but that his Friends deeply resenting some Wrongs that were done him, particularly a Design that was form'd to take away his Life, he was in a manner forc'd into a Rebellion: That this was his first Crime against the Queen, which he promis'd to make a full amends for, by a future good and loyal Behaviour; and that he would likewise renounce the Title of O-Neal, which he had made use of for no other Reason, than to prevent its being usurp'd by others, in bar to his Right and Title: That from thenceforward he would quite abandon the Spanish Interest, (into which he had not entred before August) and therefore humbly implor'd the Queen's Mercy, and a general Act of Oblivion, for himself and Friends, in relation to what was past.'

1595. Ann. 38. Tir-Oen submits to Norris. A Truce agreed on.

O-Donel did at the same time submit himself, and thereupon two Hostages were given, and a Truce agreed to till the first of January. And 'twas not long after that Teagh-Mac-Hugh cast himself at the Lord Deputy's Feet, and craving Pardon with humble Looks, and in a lamentable Tone, was receiv'd into Protection, and lived for some time without giving the Government any Disturbance.

Truces prejudicial in Ireland. Persons of better Heads have made an Observation, that not only the present, but former Conferences and Treaties of this kind, have had a scurvy Aspect upon the Queen's Affairs; for in the mean while the Malecontents gain time enough to form and ripen their Projects, to corroborate themselves by new Alliances from abroad, and provide fresh Recruits at home. And thus it was in the present case, for base and ill-natur'd People flock'd in every day to them, the English Forces lying in the mean time unemploy'd, and at a great Expence, and eating the Queen's faithful Subjects out of house and home, because 'twas provided by the Treaty, that they should not quarter in the Enemy's Country.

The Nine and Thirtieth Year of her Reign. 1596.

Upon the expiring of the Truce in the beginning of January, (tho' before that time the Rebels made a shift to seize on the Castle of Monaghan) Sir Henry Wallop Treasurer of the Army in Ireland, and Sir Robert Gardner Chief Justice, both Persons of Gravity and Conduct, were sent to treat with Tir-Oen, O-Donel, and the rest of the Malecontents, and to persuade them to some Terms of Accommodation; to whom they made known their several Grievances, and gave in their Petitions one by one.

Tir-Oen's Remonstrance. Tir Oen's Complaint was, 'That the Marshal Sir Henry Bagnal had defrauded him of the just Fruit of his Endeavours, and had by false and abusive 1596. Ann. 39. 'abusive Insinuations robb'd him of the Queen's 'Favour, and in some measure of his Title and 'Character: That he had intercepted his Let-'ters to the Lord Deputy, General Norris, and 'others, and detain'd 'em to his great Prejudice, 'and seiz'd likewise upon his Wife's Portion; 'whereas he protested he had entred into no 'manner of Correspondence with any foreign 'Prince, till he had been publickly proclaim'd a 'Traitor. He humbly requested a free Pardon 'for himself and his Friends, and that they 'might be restor'd again to their Estates, and 'enjoy the free Exercise of their Religion,' (a very pleasant Conceit, when Religion was a thing that had not hitherto fallen under any consideration in that Kingdom, and the Malecontents themselves had so little troubl'd their Heads about it, that this was the very first time they made use of it as a Medium to strengthen their Party). Again, 'That the Marshal might be 'obliged to pay him a thousand Pounds of English 'Money for his Wife's Portion, she being now 'dead: That no Garrison Soldiers, Sheriffs, or 'any Officers of that sort, might be appointed 'in the County of Tir-Oen: That the Troop of 'fifty Horse, which being in the Queen's Pay 'under his Command, had been taken from him, 'might be restor'd to him: And that those who 'had seiz'd on the Possessions of himself and his 'Friends, might be brought to condign Punish-'ment.' Upon the grant of these Particulars he promis'd to behave himself as a most faithful Subject, and to permit the Archbishop and Dean of Armagh to enjoy their Demesns without molestation.

His Demands.

O-Donel's Complaint.

O-Donel, after a preliminary Harangue of the Loyalty of his Father and Family towards the Kings of England, complain'd, 'That Boom, an 'English Captain, was sent by Perrot, the then 'Lord Deputy, with a Troop of Soldiers into 'his Country, under colour of reducing the In-'habitants to a more civil Deportment, and 'was withal receiv'd with a great deal of Cour-'tesy, and had some Towns appointed him by 'his Father, but that he made him no better re-'turn than doing him all the Mischief he could, 'and advancing a Bastard to the Dignity of O-'Donel: That the Lord-Deputy Perrot had seiz'd 'upon him in Person, committed him to Prison 'upon no Grounds, and unjustly detain'd him 'till by God's Providence he made his Escape: 'That the Lord-Deputy Fitz-Williams had sent 'for Oen-O-Tool, the next Person to O-Donel him-'self in those Parts; and contrary to the safe 'Conduct allow'd him, had for seven Years de-'tain'd him in Custody, tho' nothing could be 'alledg'd against him; and he had practis'd un-'sufferable Violences upon his Neighbours in 'Fermanagh; and that he himself could therefore 'find no better way to secure himself, than by 'assisting them.' As for his Demands, they were much the same with the Earl's, but he insisted likewise on some Castles and Lands in the County of Slego, with the Castle belonging to that Place, which he claim'd an Assignment of as his proper Right: For, it seems, Ulick a Burgh, Ensign of the Garrison, had lately betrayed that Fort to the Enemy, having first basely murder'd his Captain George Bingham.

His Demands.

The Complaints of others.

After these, came on the Pleas of Shan Mac-Brian and Mac-Phelim O-Neal, who made grievous Complaints, 'That the Isle of Magy and 'the Barony of Maughery Mourn, the Hereditary 'Estate of their Ancestors, was unjustly taken 'from them, the one by the Earl of Essex, the 'other by Sir Henry Bagnal; and that he himself 'was kept in Prison till upon Compulsion he had 'made over his Title to Bagnal: And that he 'was at the very Instant, insolently and inju-'riously treated by the Garrison in Knoc-'Fergus.' 1596. Ann. 39.

Hugh-Mac-Guire made a lamentable Complaint of the Sawciness of the Garrison-Soldiers, who drove away his Cows; as likewise, that the Sheriff, being sent into his Territories, had cut off the Head of his nearest Kinswoman, and trampled it under his Feet.

Brian Mac-Hugh, Oge Mac-Mahon and Ever Mac-Couley, complain'd, 'That, amongst other 'things, the Lord Deputy Fitz-Williams had 'taken Bribes to settle Hugh-Roe in the Dignity 'of Mac-Mahon; and that not long after, upon 'his demanding a Tax for his People with Co-'lours display'd, according to custom, he had 'hang'd him up, and given away his Estate 'to meer Strangers, on purpose to extinguish the 'Name of Mac-Mahon.'

In a word, they all join'd in the same Demand, before-mention'd, as to the free exercise of Religion: But these two last requir'd moreover an absolute and full possession of all the Revenues, as well Ecclesiastical, as what belong'd to them, within their respective Counties, upon paying a yearly Acknowledgment in Money. These Proposals being, some of them, thought fit to be granted by the Commissioners, whilst some were to be qualified by certain Restrictions, and others referr'd to the Queen, a Proposal was made to the Rebels on the other side, under the following Terms: That they should lay down their Arms, dismiss their Forces, ask Pardon for their Rebellion, admit Sheriffs into their Counties, repair the Forts they had demolish'd, not any way molest the Garrison-Soldiers, restore whatever they had unjustly seiz'd on, discover upon their Oaths the whole of their Transactions with foreign Princes, and most faithfully promise not to enter upon any such Engagements for the future against their Sovereign.

Articles propounded to the Rebels.

Rejected.

But so insolent was the Faction now grown, as to judge these Conditions highly unreasonable; so that they broke up the Conference, having first agreed on a Cessation of Arms till the first of April, upon these Conditions: 'That no 'Act of Hostility should be committed on either 'side: That the English Soldiers in Garrison, 'should have free liberty to pass and repass with 'their Provision and Arms: That they should 'Forage, carry Wood, and fetch Materials to 'fortify their Garrisons at three Miles distance 'from them, where-ever they happen to lie: 'That they should not by any means endeavour 'to draw the Queen's Subjects into Rebellion, 'with other matters to the like purpose: That 'for the due performance of these Conditions, 'Hostages should be deliver'd by Tir-Oen, either 'to be detain'd during the whole time mention'd 'in the Truce, or to be reliev'd by others in their 'turns.'

The Malecontents insist on new terms.

O-Donel could not on any Terms be persuaded to deliver Hostages; but just upon their breaking up, Tir-Oen and O-Donel gave notice by Letters, that they were not capable of standing to any Conditions, unless Feagh Mac-Hugh in Leimster, Mac Williams, O-Roro, O-Conor Dun, and the rest of the Malecontents in Connaught; as also the O-Railes and those in Brenny, might be restor'd to their Estates, and enjoy full Pardon.

Q. Eliz. sentiments.

The Queen, tho' she was very willing both at that time and afterwards to accept of any Terms (to spare the Effusion of Blood) which were any way consistent with her Royal Character; yet she look'd on it as intolerable that one Rebel should pretend to interceed for another, since (to use her own Expression) she was not to learn how to bestow her Clemency upon such as were sorry for their Crimes, and earnestly sought for it. As for the free exercise exercise of Popery, (which they took no notice of in their written Form of Submission) and the business of alienating Church-Lands, her answer was, 'That she never had willingly and knowingly granted, nor would she hereafter grant to any Man the liberty of breaking the Laws, or seizing on the Revenues of the Church. As for what Wrongs they had suffer'd, she would make 'em Satisfaction, if they could make out the Particulars wherein they were injured: And the Rudeness and Insolence of the Garrison-Soldiers she very much condemn'd.' And she sent several Letters to Norris and Fenton to the same purpose; whose Credulity Tir-Oen had made a most advantagious use of. The Queen found at length that Wallop and Gardiner, her Commissioners, managed things with less Prudence than was expected; so that they received from her a brisk Reprimand for having treated Tir-Oen and his Party, who were proclaim'd Rebels, with too much Distinction and Complaisance.

1596. Ann. 39.

The Rebels folicit the K. of Spain's assistance.

Mean while Tir-Oen importun'd the King of Spain, by private Letters and Agents, to come to his Assistance; till at length one or two Messengers were dispatched to the Malecontents with private Instructions, with whom they struck up this Agreement, viz. 'That if the King of Spain would, within a certain time prefix'd, furnish them with an Army powerful enough to subdue the English, they would join their Forces with them; and in the interim, if he would supply them with Arms and Ammunition, they would not accept of any Terms of Peace whatsoever.'

These Contracts were subscribed by O-Rork, Mac-Williams and others; but Tir-Oen was too politick to sign them, tho' no doubt he gave an implicit Consent. The Letters which the King of Spain sent him, full of mighty Promises, he dispatched away to the Lord-Deputy, as an Argument of his sincere Loyalty to his Prince: But fully depending on some Assistance from Spain, he at the same time revoked his submissive Recantation, and fell back from his Promise made to Norris. This the General took very ill, and roundly charg'd him for having gull'd him with fair and specious Pretences. But Tir-Oen being a Person that knew very well how to shift the Scene, when the Truce was just ready to expire, came to a new Capitulation with Norris and Fenton, which was confirm'd on both sides, and Hostages given. They, between them, procur'd a Pardon for Tir-Oen and his Accomplices in the County of Tir-Oen; which being put off for some time, by reason the Lawyers could not agree upon a Form, he made his use of the Delay, and protracted it for two Months, as being doubtful whether he should accept the Pardon or not, unless the Rebels in Connaught were likewise comprehended in the same. He did however accept it at last, and seem'd very well pleas'd therewith, often protesting, that it was more acceptable to him than the Letters-Patents which convey'd to him the Title of Earl. But for all this he refused to swear Allegiance, or to renounce upon Oath any foreign Assistance.

Tir-Oen imparts Letters from the King of Spain and imposes on Norris.

Tir-Oen receives his Pardon.

L. Deputy routs O-Madon, and Norris the Rebels in Connaught.

Whilst General Norris was making these Terms with Tir-Oen, the Lord Deputy was on the pursuit of O-Maden, who had rais'd a new Commotion, and laid Siege to his Castle of Clobon-O Maden, the Garrison being summon'd to surrender, made a rude answer, That they would never deliver the Fort, were there as many Lord Deputies as single Persons in the Place. But within a few Days they storm'd the Castle, and put every Man to the Sword.

Norris and Fenton march'd forthwith into Connaught, and had much ado to bring the Rebels to any Terms of Agreement, for they were outragiously bent against Bingham, and so made it their whole Business to form Delays, and at last clapt up a Peace not likely to be very long liv'd, and perhaps all this by Tir-Oen's Advice. For he began to equivocate and give some dark Hints, 'That he suspected some foul Play was used toward him, because the Lord Deputy and Sir John Norris were so ill agreed, and in regard the Proposals for Peace offer'd to the Lord-Deputy were so contemptuously rejected: In that the Lord Deputy seem'd likewise resolv'd on War, and had received Recruits of Horse from England, and detained the King of Spain's Letters already mentioned: As also, that the Marshal, his profess'd Enemy, was just return'd out of England with fresh Instructions.' Hereupon he sent his Russians abroad and began to waste and pillage the Country all about. But not long after, being vexed at what he had done, and hearing there was a probability of Peace between England and Spain, he was likewise for making a Virtue of Necessity, and as peaceably inclined as any one could wish. I am quite tir'd with pursuing him through all his Shifts and Devices: In short, upon the appearance of the least Danger from England, nothing was so cringing and submissive; so that by a mock shew of Repentance he always chous'd the English, till he had got into Shelter, and the Forces rais'd against him were dismiss'd. Nor is it to be wonder'd that he was so often believed and pardoned, when 'tis considered what slothful and mercenary Commanders did then abound in Ireland, besides the unseasonable good Husbandry of the English Council, and the Queen's natural Clemency, who always desired that the Robberies and Outrages of the Malecontents (for the Name of a War they did not deserve) might be suppress'd, if possible, without Bloodshed. But how false and dissembling a Wretch he was, the following Particulars will easily discover.

Tir-Oen prevaricates.

They encourage the Rebels in Munster.

The very same Month that he receiv'd the Instrument of his Pardon, did he, together with O-Donel, O-Rork, Mac-Williams, and Tribus Clan-Shees, send private Letters to the Gentry in Munster, putting them in Hopes, and promising their utmost Assistance with Oaths and Imprecations, That if they would join their Forces with them in the Defence of the Catholick Religion, there should no Peace be concluded with the English, but all the Confederates should be therein comprehended.

Soon after, he incited Feagh Mac-Hugh to revive a Rebellion in Leimster, which had been totally suppressed, after he had petitioned for his Pardon, and was now just ready to receive it. He immediately seiz'd on the Fort near Ballencore, and razed it to the Ground: After which he committed several Outrages in the County of Leimster, tho' the Lord Deputy went in pursuit of him. He likewise supported Peter and James Butler, Nephews to the Earl of Ormond, who were then up in Arms: But this was carried on with all the Privacy imaginable.

He rebels again.

Winter now coming on, he could no longer conceal those treacherous Principles which he had thus long masked under a profound Dissimulation; for, in opposition to the Articles of the late Treaty, he publickly forbad the conveyance of Provisions to the Garrison in Armagh, and from an Ambush, prepared for that purpose, slew several Soldiers that were employed in carrying Victuals, or fetching Wood; and he himself made such a furious Attack upon the Garrison, that thirty thirty of them were ſlain. Henry Oge, Man-Shan's Son-in-law, he ſent out to ſet the Villages on fire, and plunder the Country about the River Boyne, and attempted to take the Caſtle of Carlingford by Stratagem.

1596.
Ann.39.

Theſe Diſorders the Lord Deputy and Council fairly expoſtulated; and deſired him withal, that if he had any regard for the Safety of his Hoſtages, or was willing to prevent the being proclaimed a Traitor once more, he would make no more Aſſaults upon the Priſon, nor hinder the conveyance of Proviſions to it. His Anſwer was, 'That he, for his part, had kept the Agreement; but that Feagh Mac-Hugh was ill treated by the Lord Deputy, contrary to his Promiſe, at leaſt, if not to Articles in Form; and that Oen Mac-Collo had been baſely ſlain by the Garriſon at Kellas. Theſe Proceedings had made him the more jealous what might be the Fate of himſelf and his Friends.' He deſired therefore, that in order to a full and final Compoſition, a new Conference might be appointed with General Norris or the Lord Deputy. Which Requeſt whilſt they held in Debate, he permitted Armagh to be reliev'd. But O-Donel in the mean while was wholly intent upon Spoil and Plunder in the Province of Connaught; and at length the Conference, with the Hopes of which Norris had pleaſed himſelf, was quite ſhifted off and laid aſide.

Feagh-Mac-Hugh ſlain.

In the mean while the Lord Deputy ſpared no Pains to apprehend Mac-Hugh, till at laſt the Rebels being routed and put to flight with a conſiderable Slaughter, Colonel Milburn took him as he was endeavouring to ſecure his Retreat; and after giving him ſeveral Wounds, cut off his Head, and ſent it to Dublin, to the great Joy of that City, ſome little time before the Lord-Deputy reſign'd his Patent. About the ſame time was George Butler's Head ſent to the Lord Deputy by Thomas Lea, and his Brother Peter was taken by his Uncle the Earl of Ormond, and hang'd, though he was the immediate Heir of that Family.

In the midſt of theſe Commotions in Ireland, Albert, Cardinal and Archduke of Auſtria, who was made Governor of the Netherlands by the King of Spain, did on a ſudden afford matter to divert the Queen's Thoughts from the Affairs of Ireland; for he was no ſooner inveſted in this new Charge, than he got together the Spaniſh Forces, as if with a deſign to raiſe the Siege of La-Fere, a Town of Picardy, whereas he moſt unexpectedly marched to the Siege of Calais, where the very firſt day he took the Caſtle of Newenham, and made himſelf Maſter of the Port.

Calais beſieged by the Archduke of Auſtria.

As ſoon as the Queen was inform'd of this Siege by ſome Meſſengers from France, whoſe Fears interpreted their Errand, ſhe order'd ſome Forces to be raiſed the very ſame day, being Sunday, during Divine Service, in order to aſſiſt the French King and ſecure her own Kingdoms, for ſhe thought there was reaſon to ſuſpect, that when her Neighbour's Houſe was on Fire, her own might poſſibly feel the force of the Flame. This Army, which was rais'd at ſo ſhort a warning, Eſſex had the Command of; but before they took Shipping, there was certain Intelligence brought, that both the Town and Caſtle were in the Spaniards Hands; for the Archduke having batter'd the Walls, and much impair'd them by the conſtant playing of his great Guns, (which were heard as far as Greenwich) the Townſmen retir'd into the Caſtle, which was eaſily taken in a few days, and a great number of the French cut off; whereupon the Engliſh Army was immediately disbanded, and the French King furniſh'd with ſome Moneys on Security given by the Duke of Bouillon and Sancy.

Taken.

1596.
Ann.39.

'Twas not long before a larger and better Army was rais'd in England, wherein ſeveral Noblemen and Gentlemen offer'd themſelves to ſerve as Voluntiers; for the Report ſpread and gather'd more and more, that the King of Spain was making his utmoſt Efforts againſt England and Ireland, being, without doubt, encouraged by his Succeſs on Calais, which was but a very ſhort cut from England; beſides that Drake and Hawkins's Voyage had foully miſcarried, and the Iriſh ſolicited hard for Succours out of Spain; the Queen thought it the beſt courſe, in order to divert or ſcatter this growing Tempeſt, to attack the Enemy in his own Ports: And to that purpoſe, a Fleet was equipp'd, conſiſting of 150 Ships, 17 whereof were capital Ships, and 22 more were ſent to act in conjunction from the States of the Low-Countries; the reſt were Tenders and ſmall Veſſels. In this Fleet were reckon'd 6360 Soldiers in Pay, 1000 Voluntiers, and 6772 Seamen, beſides Dutchmen. Robert Earl of Eſſex, and Charles Howard Lord-Admiral of England, who had expended vaſt Sums from their own private Purſe, upon this Expedition, were appointed Commanders in Chief, and to ſhare the Power between them, with the Character of Generals; the Lord-Admiral however being to have the principal Authority at Sea, and the Lord Eſſex at Land. And they had likewiſe join'd with them theſe following Perſons to aſſiſt at a Council of War, viz. The Lord Thomas Howard, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Francis Vere, Sir George Carew, and Sir Coniers Clifford. The whole Fleet was divided into four Squadrons; the Lord-Admiral commanded the firſt, the ſecond the Lord Eſſex, the Lord Thomas Howard the third, and the fourth Sir Walter Raleigh. The Officers of the Army were theſe, viz. Sir Francis Vere Lieutenant-General, Sir John Wingfield Quarter-Maſter-General, Sir George Carew Maſter of the Ordnance, Sir Coniers Clifford Serjeant-Major: The Colonels were Robert Earl of Suſſex, Sir C[illegible]ſtopher Blunt, Sir Thomas Gerard, Sir Richard Wingfield, Sir Edward Wingfield Captain of the Voluntiers, and Anthony Aſhley Secretary of the Council of War, whoſe Buſineſs was to keep a Regiſter of their Councils, and the Arguments uſed, and to record the ſeveral Actions and Attempts that ſhould be form'd.

A Fleet prepared againſt Spain.

Commanders at Sea.

At Land.

The Queen gave the Generals the following Inſtructions:

'To make a ſtrict Enquiry into the Quantity of Proviſions that were laid up in the Spaniſh Ships or Warehouſes, to be made uſe of againſt England and Ireland, or ſent to Calais; and to do what they could to intercept or deſtroy it, as alſo the Enemies Ships, ſo far as might be done without running too great a Riſque on their own ſide: For, as ſhe often uſed to ſay, ſhe had much rather her Men ſhould be reſerv'd for the Defence of their own Country, than puſh'd upon the common Hazards of War, where little was to be got either of Honour or Advantage. That what Towns ſoever they took, they ſhould ſpare the Women, and thoſe that were very Young, or elſe Decrepit, and put none to the Sword, but ſuch as made Oppoſition. That the Spoil and Plunder ſhould be kept ſafe to make good the Expences of the War, and to reward thoſe that acted bravely. That the Gentlemen of the Council, ſhould faithfully deliver their Advices and Opinions, without dividing into Sides and Parties; and that the Plurality of Votes ſhould always determine it. That when they had deſtroy'd what Ships or Proviſions they could belonging to the Enemy, they ſhould ſend out ſome Men of War to intercept the Indian Caracks, if they receiv'd 1582. Ann. 25. ' miſſioners at York, how injuriouſly I was dealt withal, they were preſently beſieged by your Forces in the Caſtle of Edinborough, and * two of the chief of 'em were miſerably bereav'd of their Lives; one by Poiſon, the other by the Gallows. And this, after I had, at your Requeſt, caus'd them more than once to lay down their Arms, in hopes of Peace, which God knows whether my Adverſaries ever intended.

* Lidington and Grange.

' From that time forward I determined with myſelf to try whether I could by my Patience mitigate others Rigor, by bearing quietly all things which ſhould be inflicted on a Captive-Queen: yet have I now for this whole Year been quite debarr'd from all intercourſe with my Son, either by Letters or Meſſengers; that ſo, if it were poſſible, the Son might be rent and divided from his Mother, by a ſad and woful Alienation of Affections.

' Conditions of Peace and Concord to be made betwixt us I have often propounded. At Chateſworth, eleven Years ſince, with your Commiſſioners, and with yourſelf by the Ambaſſadors of the moſt Chriſtian King and my own, and the laſt Winter with Beale, have I dealt therein ſincerely. But theſe Conditions have been always rejected, Delays ſought and interpoſed, my Actions and Endeavours miſconſtrued, and the ſincere Affections of my Mind ſtill condemn'd. And of my long Patience I have reap'd no other Fruit, than that by a certain Preſcription it grew to a Cuſtom, that I was every day more roughly handled than other. Theſe things verily I am no longer able to endure: and howſoever it fall out, if I die, I will make known the Authors of my Death; and if I live, I ſhall, I hope, cauſe all wicked Contrivances and Calumnies againſt me to ceaſe, that I may paſs the reſt of my Life in greater Quiet and Tranquility.

' Wherefore, to take away all Miſunderſtandings betwixt us, let the Teſtimonies of the Spaniards that were lately taken Priſoners in Ireland, be produc'd againſt me; let the Examination of the Jeſuits be brought forth; let every Man have liberty to accuſe me publickly; ſo as I in like manner may have liberty allow'd me to defend myſelf, and not be condemn'd unheard. The baſeſt Malefactors and Priſoners are allowed their Defenſe, and their Accuſers brought before them Face to Face. And why am not I ſo dealt withal, who am an anointed Queen, in Blood moſt nearly ally'd to you, and next to you the lawful Heir to the Crown? And this laſt is what above all vexes and troubles my Adverſaries, who labour to ſet us two at Variance. Alas! there is no Reaſon this ſhould trouble them. I call God and my own Honour to witneſs, that I have for this long time thought of no other Kingdom but that of Heaven. Yet are you bound in Conſcience, and obliged both in regard of your Duty and Juſtice, not to prejudice my Son's undoubted Title after my death, nor to further the ſecret Contrivances of thoſe, who, both in England and Scotland, labour tooth and nail the Deſtruction of me and my Son; as is more than too apparent, by the Carriage of your Meſſengers in Scotland, who have behaved themſelves ſeditiouſly enough, (unknown to you, no doubt, tho' Huntington has buſily beſtirr'd himſelf therein).

' Is this Reaſon, that I, who am a Mother, ſhould be prohibited, not only to adviſe my oppreſs'd Son, but ſo much as to underſtand in what Condition he is? Had thoſe Meſſengers been ſent for my Son's Good, haply, if they had taken my Advice along with them, they might have been more welcome to him for my ſake; certainly you had obliged me the more cloſely to you. Neither was there any Reaſon why you ſhould ſo carefully conceal their Sending, or quite take from me at that time all Uſe of my Liberty. But, to ſpeak freely, I beſeech you to employ no more ſuch Miniſters in Scottiſh Matters. For tho' † Cary (I think) would undertake nothing unbeſeeming himſelf and his Honour; yet can I promiſe myſelf no Good of Huntington, by reaſon of his bad Behaviour towards me. 1582. Ann. 25.

† Lord Hunſdon.

' Therefore I do earneſtly intreat you, by the near Kindred that is betwixt us, to have a ſerious Care in my Son's Safety, to intermeddle no more in Scottiſh matters, without acquainting me or the French King; and to eſteem thoſe for no better than Traitors, who detain my Son in Cuſtody, and conſtrain him, againſt his Will, to do what they liſt. In brief, I beſeech you by the Croſs and Paſſion of Chriſt our Redeemer, that I may now, after ſo many Years Reſtraint, be reſtored to my Liberty upon reaſonable Conditions, and may, for the ſmall Remainder of my Life, refreſh my decay'd Body, ſomewhere out of England, after ſo long Grief and Languiſhing in Priſon. So ſhall you oblige me and mine, and eſpecially my Son, to you for ever. And this I will never ceaſe to beg of you with all Earneſtneſs, till you grant it me: and that which moves me ſo earneſtly to crave it, is the afflicted State of my Body and Health. Take Order therefore, that I may hereafter be more courteouſly uſed; otherwiſe, in plain terms, I ſhall not be able to endure it: and put me not off to any other Doom or Sentence than your own. Whatſoever hereafter ſhall befal me, Good or Ill, I ſhall take it to come from yourſelf alone. Vouchſafe me this Favour, that I may underſtand your Mind from yourſelf, either by a ſhort Letter, or by the French Ambaſſador. I cannot reſt ſatisfy'd with thoſe things which the Earl of Shrewsbury tells me, conſidering that they are alter'd every day. When I wrote of late to your Council, you wiſh'd me to acquaint yourſelf only with my Buſineſs. (But there was no reaſon for you to grant them ſo large an Authority over me, to trouble and afflict me). Yet I cannot but fear that ſome of them who are my Adverſaries have procur'd this, leſt the reſt, when they ſhould have heard my juſt Complaints, ſhould oppoſe them, in regard as well of your Honour, as of their own Duty towards you. Now it remains that I make this ſpecial Requeſt to you, that my Mind being taken up with the Thoughts of another Life, I may have ſome Reverend Catholick Prieſt allow'd me, who may direct me in my Religion, for my Soul's Health. This laſt Office is not to be deny'd to the pooreſt Wretches of the meaneſt Condition. To foreign Princes Ambaſſadors you allow the Exerciſe of their Religion, and I freely granted it to my Subjects of a different Religion. If this be deny'd me, (I hope) I ſhall be excuſed before God, but my Adverſaries (I fear) will not eſcape unpuniſh'd. Certainly it will be a Precedent for other Princes of Chriſtendom to uſe the like Severity towards their Subjects of a different Religion, if this Rigor be ſhew'd to me, who am an abſolute Princeſs, and your neareſt Kinſwoman. For ſo I am, and ſo I ſhall be as long as I live, whether my Adverſaries will or no, and tho' they be never ſo ill pleas'd and ſatisfy'd at it. To have my Houſhold increas'd I deſire not, but I am neceſſitated to deſire you that I may have two Waiting-Women allow'd me, whom I ſhall have need of in this my weak Condition: and let not my Enemies ſatisfy their Malice

' and

1582. Ann. 25.

'and Cruelty, in hindring me of so small a Courtesie. Whereas I am privately accused by the Earl of Shrewsbury, that, contrary to what I promised to Beale, I have dealt with my Son, about conveying my Title in Scotland to him, without your Privity; I beseech you, believe not Beale's Suggestions: I promis'd nothing but on certain Conditions, to which I am not at all ty'd, unless those on your part be perform'd by you. Since that time I have receiv'd no Answer, and a deep Silence has ensu'd touching those Matters; but the Practices and Contrivances in Scotland, to the Destruction of me and my Son, have been continued. This so long a Silence I could not construe any thing else but a flat Denial, which I signify'd to you and your Council by Letters. What the French King and his Mother imparted to me, I have truly and ingenuously acquainted you withal, and ask'd your Counsel in it; but I have not heard so much as a Word from you. To submit my self to your Advice touching my Affairs and my Country, before I knew what manner of Advice it would be, I never intended; for this might seem to be a piece of extreme Folly. How my Adversaries in Scotland triumph over me and my Captive Son, is not unknown to you. For my part, I have attempted nothing there which may prejudice you: what I have done has been for procuring a solid Peace in that Kingdom; whereof, sure, I should have as great a Care as your Council; for I am far more interess'd therein than they. I desired with all my heart to gratify my Son, by confirming to him the Title of King, and to bury all Discords in Oblivion. Is this to snatch away the Diadem from my Son? But my Adversaries, and the Adversaries of my Family, would not have it confirm'd to him. This they envy him, whilst they carry a Witness against themselves in their own Breast, and by reason of their guilty Conscience, mistrust their own Condition.

'Let not these, and others my Adversaries, so far blind your Eyes, as that while you live and see it, they bring your nearest Kindred to their Graves, and undermine both Crowns: for to that purpose certainly do they carry on their wicked Practices against me, against my Son, and perhaps against your self too. Can it be any Advantage or Credit to you, that by their means I and my Son, and you and I our selves, are so long deprived of one another? Recal your self to your innate Mildness and Lenity, resume your natural Disposition, and, as you are a Princess, soften your Spirit, and dispose it to lay aside all Displeasure towards me a Princess so nearly related to you in Blood, and so loving to you; that these Matters being compounded betwixt us, I may the more quietly depart this Life, and the Groans and Sighs of my afflicted Soul may not ascend up to God: To whose Majesty I offer up my daily Prayers, beseeching him, that these my just Complaints and woful Lamentations may now at length find Regard with you. At Sheffeild, Nov. 8. 1582.

Subscribed,

Vôtre tres desolée plus proche Parente, & affectionée Sœur,

MARIE R.

That is,

'Your most disconsolate nearest Kinswoman, and affectionate Sister,

MARY Queen.

The Six and twentieth Year of her Reign.

1583. Ann. 26.

With this Letter Queen Elizabeth was variously affected, and (having first permitted Mota-Fenellon the French Ambassador, to go with Davison her own Ambassador into Scotland, watching the Time on purpose that he might at unawares meet Lenox, as he return'd out of Scotland; and having her self after graciously receiv'd the said Lenox, and gently blamed him for the Errors he had committed in Scotish Matters) sent Robert Beale, Clerk of the Council, a morose, ill-temper'd Man, to the Queen of Scots, to expostulate with her roundly about these Letters of Complaint, and, together with the Earl of Shrewsbury, to treat with her about her Liberty, in regard she had very lately by other Letters earnestly requested, that, upon Security given to Queen Elizabeth, she might at length enjoy the same, and be associated with her Son, in the Government of Scotland.

Lenox returns to France by England.

Concerning these things a serious Consultation was holden in the Council-Chamber of England; and most of the Council were satisfy'd that she might be set at Liberty upon these Conditions: 'If she and her Son would promise to attempt nothing which might be prejudicial to Queen Elizabeth, or the Realm of England. If she would acknowledge that whatever was done by her Husband Francis II. King of France, against Queen Elizabeth, was done against her Will, and would utterly disclaim the same as unjust; confirm the Treaty of Edinborough, and condemn all unfair Attempts ever since, by ingenuously renouncing them. If she would be bound to contrive or act nothing, directly or indirectly, against the Government of the Kingdom of England, in either Ecclesiastical or Civil Matters, but oppose all such as should any ways attempt the same, as publick Enemies. If she would forbear to claim any Right to the Kingdom of England, during Queen Elizabeth's Life; and afterwards be content to refer the Title of Succession to the Judgment of the Parliament of England. If (to the end there might be no place left for Prevarication, and that she might not hereafter alledge, that she condescended to these Conditions, being a Prisoner, and constrain'd thereto, she would not only swear to these Conditions her self, but would also procure the Estates of Scotland to confirm them by publick Authority, and the King to ratify them by Oath and Writing, and Hostages to be given for the Performance of them. As for her being join'd with her Son in the Government, it was not thought meet that the Queen of England should be concern'd with it: but this they referr'd to the King of Scots himself, and the Estates of Scotland. And if they were so associated together, they should be dealt withal jointly about the League; if not, severally.

Consultation about setting the Queen of Scots at liberty.

Upon what Conditions.

These things were deliberated and consulted of, but without Success; for the Scots of the English Faction utterly rejected the Conditions, crying out, that some Scots, which were mortal Enemies to the English Nation, were, by the Advice of the Queen of Scots, call'd home out of France; and that Holt an Englishman, of the Society of Jesus, was sent privately into Scotland, to contrive a way for invading England.

Scots of the English Faction oppose it.

There was now much striving in Scotland betwixt Mota-Fenellon and Maninguille the French Ambassadors, and Bowes and Davison Ambassadors of England, which of them should by deeper Insinuation allure the King's Mind to the Love of their Nation, and who should draw most Men to their Party. Whilst they diligently countermined English & French court the King of Scots.

one

1596. Ann. 39.

'any Intelligence of their coming.' Having given these Orders, her Majesty appointed a Form of Prayer to be used every day in all the Ships; to implore the divine Blessing upon all their Designs and Undertakings.

There were some that objected against this Expedition; that 'twas not fit to hazard so many Ships or Men therein, lest the Spaniards, who let slip no Opportunity, should take advantage of their Absence, and reflecting upon the bad Success of Drake and Hawkins, be encouraged either to make a Descent on England, or should prove too hard for the English Fleet, and so put the Nation in Danger that way.

Fleet sets sail. However, the Fleet sail'd from Plymouth, in the beginning of June, and was put back again the first day with contrary Winds: But the next day, the Wind coming fair, they bore away to the West; and order'd things so well, as to pass the Coasts of Portugal undiscovered; For, had they been observ'd, or made any Attempts in the hithermost Parts of Spain or Portugal, the Alarm must needs have been taken, and the Project, in a great measure, defeated. Their Design was (tho' very few were privy to it) upon Cales, so famed by the Poets, for being the Sun's Bed-chamber; and esteem'd, by the ancient Geographers, the utmost Boundary of the Earth. 'Tis at this time a famous Mart, easily defended, and having great Advantages to annoy the Enemy: And this was the Place of Rendevous, appointed by the sealed Instructions deliver'd to every particular Captain, and which they were not to open till they were past Cape S. Vincent, (unless they happened to be parted from the Fleet, by bad Weather) and which they were to throw overboard, in case of Danger from the Enemy. Over against Cape S. Vincent they met an Irish Vessel, the Master of which inform'd them that they came from Cales, and that they were under no Apprehensions there, nor had heard any Account of a Fleet from England: That there were no Forces in the Island, besides a small Garrison, and that there were several Galleons, Gallies and Men of War in the Harbour; besides a great many Merchant-men, that had taken in their Loading for the Indies.

Arrives at Cales. On Sunday the 20th of June, they came to an Anchor betimes in the Morning, near S. Sebastian's Chappel on the West-side of the Island, Essex, full of Fire and Ambition, thought it proper to land the Forces out of hand; but Raleigh, and particularly the Lord-Admiral were of another Mind; as indeed he was ever an Enemy to precipitant Councils, and over-hasty Measures. However, being press'd very hard, he consented that some should make Experiment, whether there was any landing there or not: But 'twas all to no purpose, the Sea dashed with that Fury and Violence against the Shoar. 'Twas then proposed by Essex, that they should forthwith attach the Men of War, the Galleons, and Merchant-men, that lay in the Bay very close to one another; but this Advice would not go down with the rest, because the Ships lay under the Cannon of the Forts, from whence they might expect a very warm Reception, as well as from the Ships and the 15 Gallies; should they make that Attempt.

An Attempt to land, but in vain.

The next day, upon the coming in of the Tide, the Spanish Men of War sheered off to the Puntal, and the Merchant-ships got in towards Port-Real: The English weigh'd Anchor, and took their Station, where they were furiously batter'd on the one side from the great Guns of the Fort S. Philip, and from the Gallies on the other. And now a Resolution was form'd to attack the Spanish Ships; at which Essex was so pleased, that he threw up his Hat for Joy: This Charge was committed to the Lord Thomas Howard, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Thomas Southwell, Sir Francis Vere, Sir George Carew, Sir Robert Cross, and some other Commanders of the smaller Vessels; for the Water being at low ebb, 'twas not thought proper to hazard the taller Ships upon the Shelves and Sands, in a Channel that was both narrow and very shallow besides. Sir Walter Raleigh, according to the Measures resolv'd on, did therefore place himself in the midst of the Channel, and directed the Stem of the Wast-spight, the Ship in which he was, against the Spanish Men of War; which thereupon fell back. The Lord Marshal Vere fired on the Gallies, briskly from the Rainbow; but they being under the Protection of the Town, returned him a very rough Compliment from their Fore-deck, till Essex came in to his Relief; for then they made away as fast as they could, and kept along the Shoar, till they got to Bridge Suaco, which joins the Island to the main Land; and there they were hoisted up with an Engine, and so got away to Sea; except only one or two, which were prevented by Sir John Wingfield in the Vanguard. In the mean time, the Spanish Men of War lay at Anchor at the Puntal, and bestowed several Broad-sides upon the English, which could not hitherto get near them, by reason of the low Water; but now, upon the coming of the Flood, bore down briskly upon them. Essex immediately ventur'd into the midst of the Fight; as did also the Admiral and his Son. In the Miranora they fought stoutly, from break of day till noon; and then the Spaniards perceiving their Galleons were miserably shatter'd, and a great many Men kill'd, resolv'd to fire their Ships, or run them on ground. A great many Seamen for fear threw themselves overboard; some of which were taken, others drowned, and some got ashoar; and several the Admiral pity'd and spared, as they cryed Quarter, and swam for their Lives. The Spanish Admiral, called the S. Philip, Burnt and a Ship of 1500 Tuns, was burnt, thro' a Moor's taken. setting the Gun-powder on fire; and one or two more, which were near her, took Fire and shar'd the same Fate. The S. Matthew, thro' the Care of the Lord-Admiral, was saved and taken; as also was the S. Andrew, by the Assistance of Sir Thomas Gerard.

1596. Ann. 39. Spanish Ships attack'd.

As soon as this Engagement was over, Essex landed 800 Men at Puntal, about a League from Men land. the City; and immediately after Sir Coniers Clifford, Sir Christopher Blunt, and Sir Thomas Gerard, were sent to break down the Bridge and the Engine, which had secured the Escape of the Gallies, to prevent any Access from the Island to the Continent: This was carefully and throughly performed, whilst Essex himself placed his Men in good Order, and marched away with all speed to the City; together with the Earl of Sussex, Lodowick of Nassau, William Herbert Son to the E. of Worcester, Bourke an Irishman, Sir Edward Wingfield, Sir Christopher St. Laurence, Sir Robert Drury, Sir Thomas Germin, Christopher Heyden, Alexander Ratcliff, and some others of the highest Quality. At first the Spanish Horse shew'd themselves about half a Mile from the Town, and then retreated: Annon there appeared a greater Number; whereupon Essex ordered his Men to retreat in good Order, and to return and charge the Enemy, when they had drawn them a little farther from the Town; which they did so effectually, that they put them to flight, and pursued 'em so close, that they had much ado to get into the Town, and secure the Gate. The Earl got upon a new Work which had been lately raised near the Gate, from whence he discover'd an Entrance into the Town; but so steep, that a Man must leap down a Pike's a Pike's Length. However, Evans, the Earl of Suffex's Lieutenant, began the Experiment, and was followed by Arthur Savage, Captain of the Earls Company, who carry'd the red Flag; Samuel Bagnal, and feveral others. In the mean while, Sir Francis Vere, the Field-Marfhal, forced open the Gate, and brake in, with the Earl of Effex himfelf: And now began a brisk Skirmifh in the Streets; which having maintained for half an hour, the Englifh forced their Way to the Market-place, where they were pelted with Showers of Stones from the Tops of the Houfes, which are flat-roofed in that Place. Here was Sir John Wingfield fhot in the Head, and afterwards died of his Wound; who in the firft Engagement had killed a Spanifh Commander, and was wounded himfelf, tho' not fo bad, but that he appear'd at the Head of his Men, till the Fight was renew'd in this place. Several others were wounded, and among them Samuel Bagnal, who had receiv'd eight Wounds; and Arthur Savage, who was all over Blood, receiv'd the Honour of Knighthood. At the very fame Inftant, the Lord-Admiral, with the Lord Tho. Howard, Sir William Paget, Raleigh, Sir Rob. Southwell. Rich. Levifon, Phil. Woodhoufe, Robert Mansfield, and the Seamen came up brifkly and entered the Town, Sir Edward Hobby carrying the Colours before them. The Spaniards now gave over the Fight, and retired into the Caftle and Town-houfe. The latter was immediately furrendered; and the other the next day after, upon the following Terms: That the Citizens fhould have the Liberty to depart with their wearing Cloaths; and all the reft to go as Booty to the Soldiers: That 520000 Ducats fhould be laid down for their Ranfome, and 40 of their principal Citizens fent to England as Hoftages till the fame was pay'd. Shortly after, 'twas order'd by Proclamation, that no Violence fhould be offer'd to the Spaniards; and the Women, Churchmen and Citizens were conveyed to Porto-Santa-Maria.

1596. Ann. 39.

They take the Town.

& Caftle.

In the mean while, Raleigh was ordered, with thofe Ships, which were fmall enough to pafs the Channel, to fet Fire on the Merchant-men that were withdrawn to Port-Real; but an Offer was made of two Millions of Ducats to redeem them: But this the Lord-Admiral would by no means clofe with; for he faid, he was fent to deftroy the Shipping, not to ranfome them for Money. Whilft this Matter was under Debate, the Duke of Medina-Sidonia ordered the Ships to be fet on Fire, after the Goods were unladen, with which they were freighted; which was done to the great Damage of the Merchants. They found a vaft Quantity of Ammunition in the Town, and not a fmall Sum of Money, confidering that every Man feiz'd what he could lay Hands on. It has been made appear by Perfons of Judgment, that the Spaniard's Lofs on this occafion, in Shipping, Money, and Provifions, amounted to above 20 Millions of Ducats. There was not loft one Englifhman of Note except Sir John Wingfield, who was honourably inter'd, in a military way, in the great Church of the Town.

The Merchant-men fired.

There were about 60 Gentlemen, who ferv'd in this Expedition, knighted for their Valour, viz. Robert Earl of Effex, Count Lodowick of Naffau, Don Chriftophoro, a Portuguefe, King Antonio's Son, Sir William Herbert, Bourk an Irifhman, William Howard, Son to the Lord-Admiral, Robert Dudley, George Devereux, Henry Nevill, Edwin Rich, Richard Levifon, Anthony Afhley, Henry Leonard, Horace Vere, Arthur Throckmorton, Miles Corbet, Edward Conway, Oliver Lambert, Anthony Cook, John Townfend, Chriftopher Heyden, Francis Popham, Philip Woodhoufe, Alexander Clifford, Maurice Barley, Charles Blunt, George Gifford, Robert Crofs, James Scudamore, Urian Leigh, John Lea, Richard Wefton, Richard Wainman, James Wotton, Richard Rudall, Robert Manfell, William Mounfon, John Bowes, Edward Bowes, Humphrey Druell, Amias Prefton, Robert Remington, Alexander Ratcliff, John Buck, John Morgan, John Aldridge, William Afhenden, Matthew Brown, Thomas Acton, Thomas Gates, John Stafford, Gillie Merrick, Thomas Smith, William Pooly, Thomas Palmer, John Lovel, John Gilbert, William Harvey, John Grey, John Van-duvenvoord, Melchior Lebben, Peter Redgemort, and Nicolas Medkerke.

Knights made.

1596. Ann. 39.

After this an Agreement was made, for a mutual Exchange of Prifoners; and a Confultation was held, whether 'twas beft to hold Cales or quit it. Effex was of opinion, that the beft way was to keep it; becaufe it might prove a Thorn, as it were, in the Spaniards fides; and he undertook to defend it with 400 Men, and three Months Provifion. The reft were of another mind; for having pretty well furnifh'd their Pockets, their Thoughts and Inclinations began to travel homewards; fo that they would not allow him fo much as a fingle Ship, nor Provifions for one or two Months; whereupon he was forced to quit Cales, whether he would or not. However they firft plunder'd the Ifland, demolifhed the Forts, and burnt down feveral Houfes in the City. On the 5th of July, they got their Plunder together, and the whole Fleet failed from thence, not without this Compliment from the Spaniards; That tho' the Englifh were Hereticks as to Religion, yet in other refpects, they were good Soldiers, and generoufly brave. From thence they made for Faro in Algarve; from whence the Inhabitants were all fled with their Goods. There was a well-ftock'd Library left behind, which was of right the Lord Effex's Prize. Here the Enemy's Gallies, which before attended at fome diftance, began to come up; but the Lord-Admiral commanding them to be gone, they were glad to obey, and as they row'd off, gave the Englifh an hearty Farewel. At Cape S. Vincent, the Fleet was drove a great way to Sea, by a very boifterous Gale, which came up at North; and then a Council was held to confider, whether they fhould not fteer away for the Azores, and there wait for the Indian Caracks. The Earl of Effex made a Propofal, that the Land-forces, and thofe Veffels which were but flenderly provided, or had a great Number of fick Perfons in them, &c. might be fent home to England; and that himfelf, with two of her Majefty's Ships, and ten other Ships, might fail for the Azores; but this did not fquare with the Opinions of the reft, who made heavy Complaints of the Sicknefs of their Men, and the Scarcity of Victuals; fo that he found fcarce any to comply with his Motion, except the Lord Howard and the Low-Countrymen. When he found no good was to be done here, he prevail'd upon them, that every Man fhould deliver his Opinion in Writing; that fo no particular Perfon might bear the Blame; and at length he got them into the mind to go to the Groyne. But as it hapned, there was not a fingle Veffel to be feen there, or in the neighbouring Road at Faroll. When he prefs'd hard, that the Men fhould be landed, and an Attack made upon the Groyne, and would have had them cruize along the Shoar of Gallicia, and fet upon the Ships in the Ports of S. Andreo and S. Sebaftian; they would not give him fo much as the Hearing, but all of them made away for England, and left him, with a few Men, behind. He complain'd of the great Defects of this Expedition, and laid feveral Mifcarriages to the Charge of thofe, that compofed the Council of War. But they found an eafie way to acquit themfelves, and thought they had gain'd Reputation and Advantage enough, in having done the Spaniard fuch confiderable Damages, and in carrying

They leave Cales.

They take Faro.

They return home.

1596. Ann. 39.

carrying off ſo rich a Booty, without ſo much as the Loſs of a ſingle Ship on their own ſide. If any thing was miſmanaged, it ſeemed to be this; That the chief Conduct of the whole Deſign was not lodged in the hands of a ſingle Perſon. However the Lord Admiral was conveniently enough join'd with Eſſex, were it but to qualifie the Fervours of his Youth and Ambition, and curb in the Exceſs of his Courage, by uniting Council to Action, and managing to advantage the Circumſtances of Time and Place, which are nice Parts in the Art and Diſcipline of War.

Though it may ſufficiently appear, by what has been already ſaid, how greatly advantagious this Expedition prov'd to the Queen and the Nation, and how much the Spaniards were Sufferers by it; yet I cannot think it altogether impertinent to mention what follows, from a brief Narrative of the Earl of Eſſex himſelf.

'As to the Honour reſulting from this Expedition: The Engliſh did not wait the Iſſue of the 'King of Spain's Threats and deſperate Deſigns 'upon England, as powerful a Prince as he was; 'but they did as good as make him a Challenge 'in his own Dominions, and beat and drove before them a Fleet of his, moſt compleatly 'equipped, not excepting his beſt and biggeſt 'Ships. Two of his Galleons they took and 'brought home with them; Fifteen Gallies they 'totally routed, with a very unequal Number of 'Ships, and ſet many of their Countrymen free, 'who were condemn'd to the Gallies; beſides 'that they releas'd ſeveral Spaniards, whom they 'had taken Priſoners, and receiv'd their hearty 'Thanks and Commendations for that Act of 'Clemency. Then again, they took the beſt 'fortified City in all Spain, with little or no 'Trouble, and ſtay'd in the Enemy's Country 'for thirteen days together. Then in reſpect of 'the Advantage ariſing from it; beſides thoſe 'two Galleons, already mention'd, which were 'an Addition of Force to the Engliſh Fleet, they 'brought home about 100 Braſs Guns, and a 'rich and valuable Booty beſides. The Seamen 'and Soldiers return'd home likewiſe with Spoil 'and Plunder enough to fluſh and animate them 'for another Expedition. And if we conſider 'the Damage done to the Spaniard; he loſt thirteen of his moſt ſerviceable Ships, forty Indian 'Merchant-men, and four others: There was 'likewiſe taken from him a vaſt Quantity of Ammunition, and his Stores of Proviſions both for 'Sea and Land-Service; inſomuch that 'tis next 'to an Impoſſibility he ſhould in ſome time appear again at Sea, with a Fleet fit to engage. 'Add to this, the cutting off all Opportunities 'of Traffick, for this year, at leaſt, between 'Old and New-Spain. And we may think it alſo 'worth our Notice, that by this means the Engliſh have acquainted themſelves with the Weakneſs of the Spaniſh Sea-ports; and in conſequence, with how little Difficulty they may be 'taken.'

Sir Fran. Vere made Governor of Briel.

The Queen gave them a very courteous Reception at their Return, and beſtow'd many Thanks on thoſe of better Quality; eſpecially on Eſſex and the Lord-Admiral, in whoſe Commendations ſhe was very liberal. And having occaſion to pitch on ſome Perſon, qualify'd for the Government of Briel, a Port-town of great Conſequence, and delivered as a cautionary Security for Moneys ſhe had lent; upon the Lord Sheffield's voluntary Reſignation of that Poſt; ſhe beſtow'd it upon Sir Francis Vere, an Engliſh Colonel in the Service of the States; as a Perſon every way accompliſh'd for ſo important a Truſt. And altho' ſome of the firſt Nobility would have got themſelves recommended to that Honour; and Eſſex himſelf oppoſed Vere; and others likewiſe were of opinion, that ſo honourable a Place would better ſuit one of higher Quality; yet the Queen was no Stranger to his Worth and Family, (he being Nephew to John Vere, the fifteenth Earl of Oxford) and having had Experience of his Loyalty and Courage, as well in the Inſtance of the Spaniards Defeat at Rhinberke, as his taking the Caſtles of Littenhoven and Burick, and recovering the Fort of Zutphen; after mature Deliberation and Advice, ſhe not only made choice of this Gentleman, but permitted him to hold his Command under the States; a Preferment which others were not looking out for; though ſhe was ready enough to acknowledge at the ſame time, that a Perſon who took the States Pay, was upon that account leſs fit to be entruſted with a Town, which the States had mortgaged to the Queen. This was a Proceeding which highly diſobliged the Earl of Eſſex, who had recommended others to the Place: But it rais'd in him a greater and more apparent Diſcontent, that Sir Robert Cecil was choſen Secretary in his Abſence; whereas he had ſome time before recommended Sir Thomas Bodley, on the ſcore of his great Wiſdom and Experience in the Affairs of the Low-Countries, and had run very high in his Commendations; but with ſo much Bitterneſs, and ſo little Reaſon, diſparaged Cecil, that the Queen (who had by this time a mean Opinion of Eſſex's Recommendations) was the more inclinable to refuſe to make Bodley Secretary; neither would ſhe let the Lord-Treaſurer join him in Commiſſion with his Son; both which Honours were deſign'd him, till Eſſex, by too profuſe and laviſh Praiſes, had render'd him ſuſpected as a Creature of his own.

Eſſex diſpleas'd.

King of Spain prepares another Fleet againſt England.

In the mean time, the King of Spain, to regain the Credit he loſt at Cales, and recover his Damages in ſome meaſure, cauſ'd his Fleet to be repair'd at Liſbon, and call'd in Ships from all parts: He likewiſe furniſh'd out all the foreign Veſſels which were then in the Spaniſh Ports, and ſent ſome new-rais'd Forces, and a great Number of Iriſh Fugitives, to Farol; from whence they were order'd for Ireland and England: But a Storm ariſing (as the Report went) in the midſt of the Voyage, ſeveral of the Ships were ſplit upon the Rocks, ſome ſunk downright, and others were caſt away; ſo that the very Elements ſeem'd to be on the Queen's ſide, who had the News of her Enemies Fate, before ſhe receiv'd any Account of their Deſign. However, that ſhe might be the better provided againſt any Accidents, ſhe order'd that the Caſtles of Sandsfort, Portland, Hurſt, Southſea, Calſhot, S. Andrews, and S. Maudites, ſhould be new fortify'd, and furniſh'd with all Proviſions neceſſary for their Defence. And to tie the Knot faſter between England and France, a mutual League offenſive and defenſive, was ſign'd by her Majeſty and the French King, againſt Spain; through the Negotiation of the D. of Bouillon and N. Harlay Sancy. The Terms were as follows.

A great part caſt away.

A Treaty with France.

Articles thereof.

'The former Treaties ſhall be confirm'd, and 'remain in full Force, except ſuch Clauſes thereof, as ſhall be diſannul'd by the preſent Agreement. All Princes and States ſhall be invited 'into this League; whoſe Intereſt it is, to beware of the Growth of Spain. An Army ſhall 'be rais'd with all poſſible ſpeed to invade Spain. 'Neither the Queen of England nor the King of 'France ſhall treat of any ſeparate Peace, but act 'always in Conjunction. Foraſmuch as the 'French Dominions, that lie next the Netherlands, 'are at preſent annoy'd by the Spaniards, the Q. 'ſhall ſend 4000 Foot, to ſerve the King this 'Year, for the ſpace of ſix Months, in ſuch

'Places

1596. Ann. 39.

'Places as do not lie 50 Miles from the maritime 'Town of Bologne. They ſhall likewiſe ſerve as 'long in the Years following, if the Affairs of 'England will conveniently permit; in which 'Particular the French King is to take her Maje-'ſty's Honour and Conſcience, for his Security. 'When the Rebellion in Ireland ſhall be happily 'extinguiſh'd, it ſhall be at the Queen's Plea-'ſure, whether the ſaid Succours of 4000 Men 'ſhall be augmented or not. The Engliſh ſhall 'be admitted into the King's Pay, from the Day 'of their Arrival in France; and continue ſo, till 'they leave the Kingdom. The Queen ſhall from 'time to time ſupply and keep up their Number. 'They ſhall receive their Pay monthly from the 'Queen's Officers, in her Coin. The Engliſh 'under the King's Service, ſhall ſubmit to the 'Orders and Puniſhments of his Officers; with 'this Reſerve however, that the Engliſh Com-'manders ſhall be preſent, and aſſiſt at their 'Trial. Should the Queen be invaded, and 'want the King's Aid, he ſhall be obliged to 'raiſe 4000 Foot in two days time, to be ſent 'into England, at his Charges; not to go above 'fifty Miles from the Sea-ſide; and to receive 'the Queen's Pay from the Day of their Arrival 'in England. The ſaid French Soldiers to be 'ſubject to the Queen's Officers, in the ſame 'manner as is already mention'd. The King 'likewiſe to keep up their Number full and 'compleat. They ſhall ſupply one another with 'all ſort of Ammunition and Proviſions, ſo far 'as they can without Prejudice to their reſpective 'Governments. They ſhall ſeverally defend the 'Merchants that are their Subjects, in both their 'Kingdoms reſpectively. The King ſhall not 'ſuffer the Engliſh to be diſturbed on the account 'of their Religion. The Captains and the com-'mon Soldiers Pay ſhall be annexed in a Sche-'dule.'

Not long after, another Treaty was enter'd into, wherein 'twas concluded, 'That for this 'Year, no more than 2000 Engliſh ſhould be ſent 'over, which ſhould ſerve only at Bologne and 'Monſtreuil; unleſs the King himſelf ſhould come 'to Picardy in Perſon, &c.' The Queen took an Oath in her Chappel at Greenwich, to obſerve theſe Articles, which was done on the 20th of Auguſt, before Henry de la Tour, Duke of Bouillon, Viſcount Turenne, and Marſhal of France: The Biſhop of Chicheſter gave the Oath, and a great many Noblemen aſſiſted at the Ceremony. In September, Gilbert Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, was ſent Ambaſſador into France, to be a Witneſs of the King's Oath there; as alſo to preſent Sir Anthony Mildmay, for her Majeſty's Ambaſſador in Ordinary, in the room of Sir Henry Unton, who died in France; and likewiſe to inveſt his Majeſty in the Order of St. George: Which being a Diſtinction principally intended for military Men, the Queen was willing to honour the Order in the Choice of a Prince, who had made himſelf ſo eminent for martial Bravery. And ſoon after, Sir Thomas Baskerville went over into Picardy with 2000 Engliſh Foot, according to the Articles of the laſt Agreement.

Treaty ſworn to on both ſides.

Whilſt theſe military Preparations were making, there were a Parcel of looſe Fellows, who went about the Kingdom, under the counterfeit Authority of the Queen's Purſuivants; with ſham Warrants and pretended Papers, under the Hands of the Queen's Council and Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioners; and ſearched the Houſes of Widows and Papiſts, taking away by Force their Plate, Jewels, and whatever they could find, that bore the Image of Chriſt, as unlawful Furniture. The travelling Expences allow'd to Men of that Character, they ſtrictly demanded; and defrauded ſeveral ignorant People of their Money, under colour of excuſing them from appearing before the Magiſtrate. Some of theſe Cheats were taken, and made to return their ſtoln Goods; and to reward their Project, forfeited their Ears to the Pillory, and were branded in the Forehead for Rogues and Impoſtors. This however could not totally ſuppreſs the villanous Exactions of theſe Men, till a Proclamation was made, 'That 'the Queen's Purſuivants ſhould never exact 'their Travelling-fees, till the Perſons ſum-'moned made their Appearance; and that they 'themſelves ſhould likewiſe appear with them 'before the Magiſtrate; which if they refuſed, 'the Party ſummon'd ſhould not be oblig'd to 'appear. If many happen'd to be cited by one 'and the ſame Warrant, to appear on the ſame 'Day, that the Purſuivants ſhould likewiſe at-'tend them. If the Perſon ſummon'd had any 'reaſon to ſuſpect the Purſuivant, he might have 'him brought before the next Juſtice of the Peace, 'in order to be examin'd, who and what he was. 'That the Perſons ſummon'd ſhould not, upon 'pain of Impriſonment, bribe off their Appear-'ance; and that the Purſuivants ſhould not take 'any Money on thoſe Conditions, upon the Pe-'nalty of forfeiting their Places, going to Pri-'ſon, and ſuffering ſuch other Puniſhments as 'the Law might inflict.'

Counterfeit Purſuivants puniſh'd.

This Year did Thomas Arundel of Wardour return into England; who being recommended by the Queen's Letters as her Kinſman, and having done ſignal Service in the War of Hungary againſt the Turks at Gran, was created by the Emperor's Letters-Patents, Count of the Holy Empire, and all and every his Heirs and Deſcendants lawfully born of either Sex, or that ſhould hereafter be born in a perpetual Succeſſion, Counts and Counteſſes of the Holy Empire: Which Title whoever enjoys, has (they 'ſay) theſe Privileges annex'd: 'That they have 'a Place and Voice in the Imperial Diets, may 'purchaſe Lands in the Empire, raiſe Voluntiers 'to ſerve in the Army, and cannot be ſummon'd 'to take their Trials in any Court but the Im-'perial Chamber.'

Thomas Arundel made Count of the Empire.

After his Return, when this new Diſtinction had made him famous among the common People, there was a Query ſtarted, Whether ſuch a Title, conferred by a foreign Prince upon the Queen's Subject, without her Cognizance, were to be allow'd of or not? Some were of opinion, that the Rewards and Encouragements conferred upon any Perſons in regard to their Merit, were to be admitted, let them come from what Prince they will: 'For Virtue muſt needs ſtarve where Me-'rit and Worth are forced to go a begging: Be-'ſides, Henry III, readily acknowledged Reginald 'Mohun's Title as Earl of Somerſet, tho' he owed 'his Creation to the Apoſtolical Authority of the 'Pope. Moreover, Henry VIII, complimented 'Robert Curſon, (who was made a Baron of the 'Empire by Maximilian I, on account of his 'Courage and Military Conduct) with the En-'rolment of his Title among the Engliſh Barons, 'and the Allowance of a Salary to ſupport it.' There were likewiſe ſeveral Scotch Gentlemen, whom the King of France had highly preferred for their good Service, viz. Archibald Douglas of Wigton was made Duke of Tours, and John Stuart Earl of D'Evereux. And the Kings of Scotland had always looked upon this as an Honour to their Nation.

But however the Barons of England, imagining that this would prove a prejudicial kind of Encroachment upon their Dignity, for them and their Heirs to ſubmit to a mere upſtart Title, which might continue in the Earl's Family for infinite Ages, took upon them to oppoſe it upon

the

1596. Ann. 39.

the following Grounds, viz. 'That such Marks 'of Distinction ought neither to be accepted by 'the Subject, nor allowed of by the Prince: 'That 'tis the Prince's Right alone to advance 'his own Subjects to Preferments of any kind, 'and cannot properly belong to any other what-'ever, according to that Saying of the Emperor 'Valerian: Let those Honours alone be esteemed va-'lid, which bear the Stamp of our Good-will and 'Authority. For 'tis a Diminution to the Prince's 'Prerogative, and a Discouragement to the Sub-'jects Obedience, when they are allowed to re-'ceive Honours from foreign Potentates, inas-'much as the Person who receives the Title, 'seems to have made a tacit Contract with him 'that grants it: That such Advancements are a 'kind of Lures to draw away Subjects from their 'natural Fealty: That there lies an Action of 'Theft against any Man who shall put his Mark 'upon another Man's Sheep; and 'tis construed 'an Act of Fraud in him that shall strew Pro-'vender in the way to allure another Man's Lamb 'into his own Fold: That altho' Sovereign Princes 'are not tied up by these Laws, yet are they ob-'liged by a general Equity, and the common Voice 'of Nature: That in the Commonwealth of Rome, 'no Man could for that reason be a Denizen of 'that, and Free of another City at the same time; 'whereupon Pomponius Atticus declined the being 'made a Citizen of Athens, left he should there-'by forfeit his Privilege as a Roman: So in the 'States of Venice and Genoa, whoever receives 'any spiritual Promotion from the Pope, or tem-'poral Dignity from a Sovereign Prince, is exclu-'ded from publick Offices, as a Person interest-'ed, and therefore suspected. That however 'Henry III, might be inclined through a natural 'Softness, or forced by the Iniquity of the Times, 'to allow Mohun's Title of Earl, when imposed 'upon him by the Pope, in regard that his Fa-'ther, when the King and Kingdom lay under a 'common Censure of Excommunication, was pro-'secuted with severe Affronts and Indignities, 'and compelled to acknowledge himself a Vassal 'to the See of Rome, as he himself likewise, thro' 'mere Fear, suffer'd the Horse-Leeches of Rome 'to suck and drain the Wealth of England; yet 'nevertheless it appears from the publick Re-'cords, that Mohun was never acknowledged for 'an Earl: That Henry VIII, owned Curson as a 'Baron of England, purely to swallow up in that 'Title the frothy and insignificant one of Baron 'of the Holy Empire; but all this while he en-'joy'd no Vote in Parliament; then 'twas no 'wonder if the Scots received Honour from the 'French, since the Lilly-Tressure in their Prince's 'Coat, speaks them to be under the Protection of 'the French Flower-de-luce.'

Apostolick Counts and Viscounts.

Others were of opinion, that an Earl of the Sacred Empire was but of equal Esteem with the Publick Notaries, and the common Counts and Viscounts of the Lateran, the Pope's Creatures; or that they held much the same Rank with the Doctors of Physick, Lawyers, Grammarians and Rhetoricians of the Royal Palace, who having been Professors of the Sciences in that Place for twenty Years, stile themselves, in Compliment to their Vanity, Counts-Palatine, whereas that is at present a first-rate Character, and signifies one who has a kind of Royal Jurisdiction in his own Courts, and an uncontrolable Prerogative in the point of Fiefs, Inheritances escheated, &c.

Counts-Palatine.

The Queen's Opinion.

The Queen being asked her Opinion in this Case, answer'd, That there was a close Tie of Affection between the Prince and Subject; and that as chaste Wives should have no Glances but for their own Spouses, so should faithful Subjects keep their Eyes at home, and not gaze upon foreign Crowns: That she, for her part, did not care her Sheep should wear a Stranger's Mark, nor dance after the Whistle of every Foreigner.

1596. Ann. 39.

Within the Compass of this Year, several Persons of Note and Distinction were summon'd to their great Change; and among the rest these Gentlemen of worthy Memory, viz. John Puckering, Keeper of the Great Seal of England, who was himself a Person of exact Probity, though he had the ill Luck to lie under the Censures of the Clergy, by reason his Servants dealt so much in Simony, and the infamous Trade of selling Church-Preferments. His Place was supplied by Thomas Egerton, the Attorney-General, of whose fair and equal Deportment every one had conceived mighty Hopes and Expectations.

The death of Puckering, Lord-Keeper.

The next Person worthy to be taken notice of, was Richard Fletcher, Bishop of London, a consummate Courtier, who endeavouring to smother the Cares of an unlucky Match in the Smoak of Tobacco, which he took to excess; and falling under the Queen's Displeasure, (who thought it enough for Bishops to be Fathers of the Church) between the Experiment and the Misfortune, lost his Life.

Fletcher.

Next follows Henry Cary, Lord Hunsdon, who was Lord-Chamberlain of the Queen's Houshold, Governor of Berwick, and Knight of the Garter. He was a Man of Spirit enough, but intemperately Cholerick. His Advancements he owed to the Relation he bore of Cousin-German to the Queen. He had a competent Estate, and never looked after a great one. His Title descended to his Son George, and the Office of Lord-Chamberlain to the Lord Cobham, who survived him but a few Months.

Hunsdon.

After him we must not forget Sir Francis Knolles, who married the Lord Hunsdon's Sister, and lived for some time an Exile in Germany for the sake of the Gospel and a good Conscience. He was Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen, then Captain of the Guard, and afterwards Treasurer of the Queen's Houshold, and made Knight of the Garter; after whose Decease the Treasurer's Place was conferred upon Roger Lord North, and the Comptroller's was given to Sir Francis Knolles his Son.

Knolles.

Towards the end of the Year the Nation lost likewise Henry Hastings Earl of Huntington, the third Earl of the Family, and President of the Council in the North. He was a Person of a sweet and candid Temper, but wanted not a Warmth and Zeal for the Reformed Religion, and spent a great part of his Estate in the Support of those Ministers who were the forwardest Sticklers for the Simple and Primitive Purity of the Gospel. He was interred at Ashby de la Zouch in the County of Leicester; and upon his Decease, Francis Lord Hastings, his Nephew by his Brother George's side, was advanced to his Honour and Title. Afterwards the Dignity of President of the Council for the North was conferred on Matthew Hutton, Archbishop of York, with all manner of Privileges thereto belonging, except only the Title of President.

Hastings.

Amidst these Gentlemen, I must take the Liberty to mention one of the other Sex, viz. Margaret Clifford Countess of Derby, the only Daughter of Henry Clifford Earl of Cumberland, by Eleanor Brandon, Niece to King Henry VIII. 'Tis remarkable of this Lady, that thro' an idle Mixture of Curiosity and Ambition, supported by sanguine Hopes and a credulous Fancy, she much u ed the Conversations of Necromancers and Figure-Flingers; upon which account she lost a great share in the Queen's Inclinations a little before her Death.

Countess of Derby.

The

1597. Ann. 40.

The Fortieth Year of her Reign.

Being engaged in the Purfuit of fomething more important, I muft leave it to the Pens of thofe who manage the Hiftory of the Low-Countries, to do right to the Courage and Bravery of Sir Robert Sidney and Sir Francis Vere, and to let the World know how bravely they behaved themfelves with their Auxiliary Forces the beginning of this Year, in the Battel of Turnhoult in Brabant, which was carried on under the happy Conduct of that Great Perfon Maurice of Naffau, and in which were flain 2000 Neapolitans and Germans, with their General, the Count Varaxi, &c. To proceed then:

The Battel of Turnhoult.

A new Fleet prepared againft Spain.

The Queen having Intelligence early in the Spring, that the Spaniard was preparing to make a new Defcent upon Ireland with the Remainder of their fhatter'd Fleet and a few Veffels they had in Gallicia: In order to prevent or divert the Defign, fhe got ready a fmall Fleet, confifting of ten of her own Men of War, and as many Hollanders. But this number being thought too fmall, it was afterwards augmented, and 5000 Men raifed, befides 1000 old Soldiers whom Vere had brought out of the Netherlands; fo that the Fleet was judged to confift of 120 Ships, whereof 17 were the Queen's, 43 were fmaller Men of War, and the reft Tenders and Victuallers. They were divided into three Squadrons; the firft commanded by the Earl of Effex, who was entrufted with the Management of the whole Expedition; the fecond by the Lord Thomas Howard; and the third was committed to Sir Walter Raleigh: Charles Blunt Lord Montjoy commanded the Land-Forces under Effex; Sir Francis Vere was appointed Marfhal De Camp, Sir George Carew Lieutenant of the Ordnance, and Sir Chriftopher Blunt firft Colonel.

The Earls of Rutland and Southampton, the Lords Grey, Cromwel, and Rich, with feveral Knights and Perfons of Quality, lifted themfelves Voluntiers in this Expedition; and they fet fail from Plymouth on the 9th of July, making a fine fhow with their Plumes of Feathers and rich Accoutrements, (a Vanity which few Nations imitate the Englifh Soldiers in.) Two days after, every Ship received their fealed Inftructions relating to the Courfe they were to fteer, which was indeed to Farol and the Groine, to furprize the Spanifh Fleet in their Harbours, and to intercept the Indian Fleet at the Azores.

On what Defign.

This was, upon mature Advice, judged to be the beft Courfe for the Security of the Nation, as well as the furprizing the Eaft and Weft-India Fleet, which had but flender Convoys, as likewife for taking the Azores, a Port at which thofe rich Fleets do generally touch in their Return from the Indies to take in frefh Water: Befides, that by this means the Queen would have the entire Command of the Seas, and the Spanifh King, upon the lofs of his Fleet, be brought to more reafonable Terms of Peace, or elfe be obliged to make new Provifions for War, to his very great Detriment and Inconvenience. Effex was refolved (as he often declared himfelf) Either to defeat this new Armada, which had threaten'd England for a Year together, or elfe to perifh in the Attempt, for his Country's fake.

Driven back by a Storm.

They had not got above 40 Leagues from Plymouth, when they were caught in a violent Storm, the Wind blowing hard at North-Weft, and rending their Sails and Rigging to pieces: It occafion'd likewife fo unufual a Darknefs, as hinder'd their Profpect on all fides, and that was feconded with terrible Peals of Thunder, fo that the Air and Water were in a moft troubled ftate, and fo continued for four Days together, infomuch that the Seamen were under a great Surprize, and fo were the Soldiers, for the Fleet was diffipated to that degree, that the feveral Ships had much ado to recover Plymouth and other Ports thereabouts. The Admiral was fo damag'd and batter'd, as to be render'd almoft unfit for Service; and fome of the Paffengers who were of nicer Conftitutions, were fo miferably diforder'd by the Sea-Phyfick, and fo afraid of the Force of the Elements, that they quitted the Service, and did not care to venture a fecond Experiment.

1597. Ann. 40.

When the Fleet had in fome meafure recruited itfelf after its double Lofs both as to Number and Strength, they attempted to fail again feveral times, but the Winds continued fo unfavourable, that they could not get out in a Month's time, fo that it look'd almoft as if the Heavens frown'd upon their Undertaking. By this time their Provifions were pretty well exhaufted, and there was no Supply to be had from the Eaftern Parts of England under a confiderable time; it was therefore thought advifeable to difcharge all the Land-Soldiers, except only the 1000 old Soldiers mention'd before, and to difmifs feveral of the leffer Veffels, fince there was no farther Defign upon the Groine or Farol. A Confultation was then held, whether 'twere beft to fail away to the Azores. And all fubfcribed to the Affirmative, except Vere, who faid, 'It would neither 'be for her Majefty's Honour nor Advantage: 'That 'twas highly improbable that fo few Ships 'and fuch flender Forces, fhould produce any 'Effects anfwerable to thefe Mens Expectation; 'and that 'twould be much eafier for the Spaniards to invade England, at a time when the 'Queen's principal Commanders, and part of her 'Navy, were out of the way.' Hereupon Effex and Raleigh rid Poft to confult the Queen upon the Matter: Effex, for his part, propofed great Things, anfwerable to the Complexion of his Spirit and Courage, if fo be he might be allow'd one half of the Fleet and Army to be at the beck of his Inclinations. But the Queen not thinking fit to grant that, he undertook to defeat the Spanifh Fleet in their Port of Farol, would her Majefty permit him to venture the thoufand old Soldiers, and thofe two Ships, the St. Andrew and St. Matthew, taken from the Spaniard, in purfuit of the Defign. He propofed to leave the reft of the Fleet without the Harbour, and to try the Hazard of the Engagement with fome few Ships which he fhould fingle from them. But neither would the Queen fubmit to this, unlefs with certain Limits and Reftrictions; fo that at laft the whole Matter was refign'd to their entire Conduct, with this Provifo, That they fhould take care, if poffible, to fet fire on the Ships in Farol-Harbour, and to intercept the Indian Fleet; and that, upon the whole, they fhould manage themfelves according to the Nature and Circumftances of every new Turn or Emergency.

Being returned again to Plymouth, they made fhift to get clear of the Port on the 17th of Auguft, though with a fcanty Wind; but before they got fight of the Spanifh Coafts, they were fcatter'd by another fevere Tempeft, in which the large Ship called the St. Matthew, having fpent her Main-Maft and Yards, fplit upon a Rock, and the St. Andrew was parted from the reft of the Fleet. The Remainder of the Fleet being in a little time got together again, failed in fight of Afturia and Gallicia, but very unadvifedly in the Judgment of fuch as knew beft; forafmuch as thofe pompous kind of Difcoveries had been of ill Confequence to Drake in his two laft Voyages to to America, and had prejudiced Norris in his Portugal-Expedition: For an Enemy forewarn'd, is the better prepar'd for Defence.

Parted by another Storm.

1597. Ann. 40.

Raleigh left behind.

Not far from the Land's-End, the Croſs-yard of Raleigh's Ship was broken down by ſtreſs of Weather, which as he ſtaid to mend, the Fleet left him behind; and he happening afterwards to receive a falſe Intelligence, that the Spaniſh Fleet was ſail'd from Farol towards the Azores, diſpatch'd a Pinnace to Eſſex upon a fruitleſs Errand, as it proved. Whilſt they were expecting Raleigh, a general Reſolution was taken to quit the Project of firing the Enemy's Ships in the Harbour as a thing impracticable, becauſe they had been already diſcover'd from the Shore. Wherefore they agreed to ſail directly for the Azores, every Squadron being allotted its proper Station.

They ſteer for the Azores.

Eſſex was to anchor at Fyal, Howard and Vere at Gratioſa, and Raleigh at Rio, who was by this time ſhaping his Courſe for the Azores, and after a long Compaſs fetch'd, recover'd the Fleet at the Iſle of Flores, whilſt ſome were apt to charge him with ſtraggling from it on purpoſe (perhaps with deſign to inflame Eſſex the more, who had already but indifferent Thoughts for him). However Eſſex ſeem'd to give him a very chearful Welcome, and excuſed his having ſent Letters to England, wherein he had repreſented him to his Diſadvantage. Raleigh being ſhort of Water, ventured to go aſhore, and take ſome in without leave; but ſcarce had he begun to fill his Casks, but he received Orders to follow Eſſex to Fyal. Thither he ſailed, and not finding Eſſex there, he narrowly obſerv'd the Harbour, and found the Inhabitants were ſecuring their Goods, and the Garriſon ready to intrench themſelves. He adviſed hereupon with the other Commanders, and they jointly agreed to attack the Place; and the Seamen were hot upon the Attempt, as being loth to quit a Booty which ſeemed juſt in their Teeth.

But Sir Gilley Merrick, a Creature of Eſſex's, mightily urged them to attempt nothing in the Abſence of Eſſex. They waited therefore his coming for four Days together, when Raleigh, wanting freſh Water, and being befriended by a fair Opportunity, was prompted on both ſides to land about four Miles from the Haven, in a very ſteep place, and at a time when the Sea ran high. He was however accompanied with theſe Voluntiers, William Brake, William Harvey, Arthur George, John Scot, Thomas Ridgeway, Sidney, Henry Thinn, Charles Morgan, Walter Chute, Bret, Berry, and other Officers. The Spaniards came down upon him, and made what Reſiſtance they could, but were ſoon put to flight. Raleigh being thus on ſhore, and having water'd his Ships, march'd forward to the Town through Ways very difficult and dangerous; and finding the Birds were fled, he ſeized the Neſt.

Raleigh lands at Fyal.

He takes the Town.

The next Day Eſſex, who had been roaming about in queſt of the Spaniſh Fleet, came to Fyal. Sir Gilley Merrick inform'd him what Raleigh had done; and inſinuated withal, that he had made this Attempt on purpoſe to rob him of the Glory of the Action. Which fair Tale, Eſſex was too ready to liſten to; his natural Ambition, join'd with his Jealouſy and Ill-will to Raleigh, having prejudic'd his Thoughts to receive the worſt Impreſſions againſt him. Others perſuaded Eſſex to call Raleigh before a Council of War, and diſmiſs him from the Service; and there wanted not ſome who were for having him executed, for daring to land his Men without the Admiral's leave, perſuading Eſſex at the ſame time, that he could not have had a fairer Occaſion of diſpatching his Adverſary out of the way, and which, if he miſſed, he might live to repent it. Hereupon Sidney, Bret, Berry, and others, who accompanied Raleigh, were caſhier'd and confin'd; Raleigh was ſent for, and every one view'd him with an eye of Diſpleaſure. Eſſex reproved him ſharply for having ſlighted his Authority, ran counter to the Diſcipline of the Navy, and ſo far diſobey'd thoſe Orders which were enjoin'd upon pain of Death, as to land his Men without the General's Command.

1597. Ann. 40.

He anſwer'd in his own Defence, 'That the 'Captains, Pilots, and others under Command, 'were bound by that Law, but not the three 'Generals, whereof himſelf was one: That he 'had expected his coming a great while, and 'would have done ſo longer, had not the Inhabitants of the Place denied him Water, which he 'wanted in that Extremity, that he was obliged 'to win it by the Sword.' The Lord Tho. Howard interpoſed in favour of Raleigh, that he might not be ſeverely treated, and perſuaded him withal to acknowledge his Fault; which he preſently did, and ſo himſelf and the caſhier'd Officers were received again into Favour. For Eſſex being of a Temper patient, and merciful enough as to the point of Injuries, was willing to bury theſe private Feuds and Diſcontents in the publick Safety. But they were rather occaſionally laid aſide, than totally forgot or ſuppreſſed, as afterwards appeared.

Whilſt theſe things were in agitation, the Spaniſh Garriſon quitted the Fort near the Town, in which were found two Engliſhmen with their Throats cut. Some were ſent away to ſearch the Iſland, which they pillaged here and there, and ſo returned, without performing any great Feats; and a few Days after the Town was burnt down to the Ground, after they had carried off the Ordnance found there.

Gratioſa and Flores yield to Eſſex.

From thence they ſailed away to the Iſle of Gratioſa, the Inhabitants whereof threw themſelves on Eſſex's Mercy, as Flores had done, and ſo received Quarter. Here he reſolved to land, to take a View of that delightful Iſland, and to wait for the India Fleet. But being unfortunately diſſuaded from it by one Grave a Pilot, under the Pretence of its being no commodious Harbour for Ships, he ſailed from thence with his whole Fleet for St. Michael's Iſle, and commanded Vere and Sir Nicolas Parker to be upon the ſcout betwixt the Iſland of St. George and Gratioſa, the Earl of Southampton and Sir William Mounſon to poſt themſelves on the Weſt of Gratioſa, and ſome others to wait at other Places. But ſo ſtrangely it happen'd, that the Engliſh had ſcarce been from Gratioſa above two Hours, before the American Fleet, conſiſting of 40 Sail, (7 whereof had Plate on board) arrived there, and having Intelligence that the Engliſh were not far off, made away directly for Tercera. At Midnight they fell in with Mounſon's Squadron, who gave the Fleet a Signal by firing ſome great Guns: They were heard a great way, and the Seamen were overjoy'd, and prepared themſelves very chearfully for an Engagement. Mounſon, Southampton and Vere, who were neareſt, gave them chaſe, but at ſome diſtance, becauſe they waited for more Ships to come up. In the mean while the Enemy's Fleet got to Tercera in good order, three Ships only being taken, which ſtraggled from the reſt: Southampton and Vere attempted to crowd into the Haven with great Boats at Midnight, and to cut the Cables of the neareſt Ships, that they might be forced to Sea by the Guſts which blew from the Shore. But the Spaniards keeping a very ſtrict Watch, that Project unhappily miſcarried. A Pinnace was therefore preſently ſent away to Eſſex at St. Michael's, to inform him what had paſſed, and that they would under-

1597. Ann. 40. undertake to hinder the Enemy from getting out to Sea.

Essex having in a day or two's time got his Fleet together, came and consulted with the other Commanders what Measures were to be taken. Some of the first Officers were for attacking the Town and Fleet, and thought it a very feasible Attempt; and Essex joined in the same Opinion. The Seamen thought otherwise, but however very readily offered their Service both by Sea and Land. But Essex himself and Montjoy, with some others, having afterwards taken a View of the Place, and finding that the Ships were drawn up closer under the Protection of the Forts, and that the Haven was secured by good Fortifications and a convenient Situation, with a strong Garrison, and several Guns mounted, and that the Wind was so contrary, that their Granadoes and Bombs could do them no service, they who were most forward in the Proposal, were the most backward in the Adventure. Essex therefore returned to St. Michaels, and came to Anchor before Cividada, after having first conferred the Honour of Knighthood upon the Earls of Rutland and Southampton, William Evers, William Brodon, and Henry Docwray. The Soldiers being pleased with the Place, (as being the chief City of the Island) they had a Month's mind to plunder it; and the General himself, forgetting his Character, took a Boat, and sought for a convenient Place to land; but the Sea was too boisterous, and the Shores too well lined with Soldiers to encourage his Attempt. Raleigh was commanded to lie there with his Ships, and amuse the Enemy with the Apprehensions of his Landing, whilst Essex made a Descent in some other Place. He went at last to Villa-Franca, about six Miles off, a pretty neat Town, well stock'd with Merchandize, particularly Wine and Wood, and the Place he took without any considerable Opposition. He made here a stay of six Days, and the Soldiers found a tolerable Booty: But Raleigh expected his Return to St. Michaels with some Impatience.

English give up their design on the India Fleet.

Villa-Franca taken.

Much about this time they discover'd under sail an Indian Carack not far from St. Michaels, which she perceiving by a Signal given from a Low-Country Vessel, and finding her self hard beset by the Enemies Ships, ran her self aground under the Town, and got out her Cargo as fast as she could, after which she was set on fire, and kept burning for two Days together. Thus were the English so miserably defeated in their Hopes during all this War, that Fortune seemed to owe them a spight. And tho' nothing is more common than odd Changes and Turns of Fortune at Sea, yet the Disappointments of the English seemed to have been of their own creating, and their ill Success chiefly owing to a peevish Spirit among them, which studied to prevent or eclipse the Honour of any glorious Attempt. Essex now gave Orders, that all the Ships should, upon a Signal given, make ready to weigh Anchor and sail for England against the 9th of October, which is observed to be a Month of a very foul and tempestuous Weather. But three Days after there happen'd a violent Storm, the Wind at North, and dispersed the Ships to a great distance; and it had the same effect upon the Spanish Fleet, which had in the mean time quitted Farol, and had steered another Course, with great Designs and Preparations against England; so that both the English and Spanish Fleets quite lost sight of one another. The English lost not a single Ship, but, 'tis said, the Spaniards lost several of theirs, and had one driven by the Extremity of the Weather into Dartmouth Road, the Seamen and Soldiers being almost famish'd. The Crew confessed that the Spaniards Design was to seize upon some Port in Cornwal, as lying most convenient, by reason of its Situation upon the Mouth of the British Channel, both to receive Succours out of Spain, and to keep the English so closely employ'd in defending themselves at home, that they should not be at leisure to make any further Attempts upon Spain and the West-Indies. Thus did the Almighty, who determines the Events of War, keep these two Nations asunder, and baffle their Projects at a time when they were fully and desperately bent upon each other's Ruin. Essex returned to England about the end of October with no contemptible Booty; but his Ships were miserably batter'd and leaky through Badness of Weather.

A Carack burnt.

English Fleet returns home.

1597. Ann. 40.

Spanish Fleet design for Cornwal.

There were not a few Censures, and those very different ones, passed upon this Expedition, according as People were inclined in regard to Essex, or from an aversion to Raleigh. For the Queen's Favour, in which they had each a liberal share, happen'd to produce Effects strangely opposite; for it excited in the People a kind of Odium against Raleigh, which was fomented by a Jealousy they had of his Unfaithfulness to his Country; and it procured on the other side a mighty Veneration for Essex, which he took care to cherish by all the Artifices of Address, and they to improve through the high Opinion they had conceived of his great Qualifications. Most certain it is, that neither of these Gentlemen came short in any instance of Courage, Sagacity or Conduct; But true Happiness is the Gift of God, and no Man can carve out his own Portion. The Quarrels between these Gentlemen began now to appear more publick and fierce, each laying the Blame of the late Mismanagement upon the other.

Piques between Essex and Raleigh increased.

Essex was likewise very much offended, that Sir Robert Cecil, whom the Queen had the last Year made her Secretary, though in spite of his Endeavours to the contrary, should in his absence be created * Chancellor of the Dutchy of Lancaster: For he had always stood in the way of his Advancement, as a Person who was an equal Match to himself in all points of Policy and good Management, and a great Friend of Raleigh's into the Bargain.

* This is mistaken for the Mastership of the Wards.

He took it likewise very heinously, that Charles Howard, the Lord-Admiral, was advanced, during his absence, to be Earl of Nottingham, with this Character inserted in his Patent: That by the Victory obtain'd Ann. 1588, he had secured the Kingdom of England from the Invasion of Spain, and other impendent Dangers; and did also, in conjunction with our dear Cousin Robert Earl of Essex, seize by force the Isle and strongly fortified City of Cales in the farthest part of Spain; and did likewise entirely rout and defeat another Fleet of the King of Spain, prepared in that Port against this Kingdom. All this Essex conceived as a Diminution of that Honour which he thought to be the Right of his own peculiar Desert. And he looked on it moreover, as a Prejudice to himself, that the Lord-Admiral, who being then no more than a Baron, was therefore his Inferior, should now take Place of him under the Privilege of his new Title of Earl. For it was enacted in the Reign of Henry VIII, That the Lord-Great-Chamberlain of England, the Earl-Marshal, the Admiral, the Steward of the Queen's Houshold, should claim Precedency of all Persons of the same Degree. But the Queen, who always looked on Essex's Merit through a magnifying Glass, that she might at once ease his Thoughts, and fortify his Reputation, by giving him the Precedency of the Admiral, though now advanced to an Earldom, was pleased to honour him with the Title of Earl-Marshal of England,

E. of Essex made Earl Marshal of England land, which had been buried ever since the Death of the Earl of Shrewsbury.

1597. Ann. 40.

Polish Ambassador.

This Year arrived in England Paul Dzialin, Ambassador from the King of Poland, a Person of a right Polish Assurance, and who expressed in his own Deportment the Genius of his Country. Having had his Audience of the Queen, who expected to receive his Master's Thanks for the good Offices she had done him, in procuring a Peace for Poland from Amurath the Turkish Emperor; instead of that, he withdrew from her Majesty, as she sat in her Chair of State, attended with several Lords, a great many Paces backwards, with his Face still towards the Queen, till he had got to the lower end of the Room; (a Compliment which I suppose the English Courtiers were surpriz'd at) here he complained in a Latin Speech, deliver'd with some Vehemence, 'That the antient Privileges of the Prussians and Polonians who traded into England, were not only infringed, but that her Majesty had, contrary to the Law of Nations, prohibited their Commerce with the Spaniards, under which Pretence the Polanders Goods had been seized and sold: That the King of Poland could by no means brook this Treatment, as well, by reason of the Inconveniences which his Subjects suffer'd thereby, as of the near Alliance there was between himself and the King of Spain, and the House of Austria.' They demanded therefore Satisfaction for the Goods which had been arrested, and an Allowance of a free Trade into Spain from that time forward. If not, he declared that his Master, the King of Poland, would take a Course to assert himself, and vindicate his Subjects, as well as make them repent who had been the Abettors of this Injustice.

His Speech.

Queen's Answer.

The Queen made him a prompt and pertinent Answer, as a Check to his Confidence, much to this Effect: 'I confess I am under a Disappointment, for I find an Herald here in the Character of an Ambassador. The Speech you have made, is certainly an Original; for 'tis the first I have heard of the kind; and the Pertness of the Address I cannot help admiring at. But if your Commission extends thus far, (which I much doubt) I presume 'tis, because the King, your Master, is a young Man as well as a young Prince, elected and not born to the Crown of Poland; so that he does not rightly understand the Quality of these Negotiations, nor what has formerly passed betwixt us and his Predecessor. You, Sir, do indeed, for your part, appear to be better versed in Books than Politicks; for whereas you make so great a bustle in your Speech with the Law of Nations, you must know, that whilst Princes are engaged in a state of war, 'tis lawful for one Party to intercept the Forces and Succours sent to the other, and to prevent, as well as he can, any mischievous Consequence to himself. This I affirm to be agreeable both to the Law of Nature and Nations, and has been frequently practised, not by us alone, but also by the Kings of Poland and Sweden, in their Wars with Muscovy. And whereas you lay such a mighty stress upon your Master's new Alliance with the House of Austria, you may remember that some of that House would have stopt the King's Passage to the Throne, and have wrested the Scepter of Poland out of his Hands. As for other things, I shall leave it to our Council to signify our Will and Pleasure.' After this Answer, her Majesty withdrew into her Privy-Chamber.

Dzialin, the better to excuse himself, at a Conference held with some of the Council, produced before them his Oration in Writing, and declar'd it was deliver'd him by Thelitizky Chancellor of Sweden, and drawn up by some others in his Absence, without the Knowledge of Zamosky.

1597. Ann. 40.

The Queen commanded her Privy-Chancellors, Burleigh Lord-Treasurer, the Lord-Admiral, Sir Robert Cecil, and Sir John Fortescue, to acquaint Dzialin with the following Particulars, viz.

Privy-Council's Answer.

'That the Privileges of the Cities of Prussia, as well as the rest of the Hans-Towns, were justly alienated from them in the Reign of Henry VI; yet the Queen had granted them a Liberty of Trade in common with the English, and any greater Privilege she was not capable of allowing them, unless she should so far act the unnatural Mother, as to cherish other Peoples Children, and neglect her own: That to intercept Succours sent to the Enemy, was far from being against the Law of Nations, because the Law of Nature had instructed all Men to defend themselves; and that is a Law not wrote in Characters, but congenial to our very Beings: That those Towns were forbidden to relieve the Enemies of England with any Provisions, by these express Words contain'd in their Articles of Privilege: It shall be lawful for the Merchants aforesaid, to carry, and cause to be carried, their Goods whithersoever they please, as well within our Kingdoms and Dominions as without, except to the Lands of our open and professed Enemies. Moreover, That 'twas yet fresh in memory, how the Kings of Poland and Sweden had seized and sold the Ships and Wares of the English, upon a bare Suspicion only, that they assisted the Muscovite with Provisions.'

Being demanded what he could answer hereunto? he reply'd, That he had it not in his Orders to make any formal Answer, but to deliver the Substance of what was given him in Charge, and then to bring back an Answer. After this he was courteously dismissed.

Merchant Adventurers forbidden to trade in Germany.

But those of the Hans-Towns interposed so effectually with the Emperor, that the English Merchants of the Company, term'd with us Adventurers, were prohibited all Traffick in Germany, because they practised their Trade, and sold their Wares there by the Laws of England, and not those of the Empire. When the Queen had applied to the Emperor by Sir John Wroth, and to the Princes of the Empire by Stephen Lesure, to have this Edict suspended, and Matters brought to a Composition, but without effect, she issued out a Proclamation in London, That the same Day the English were commanded to leave Germany, those of the Hans-Towns should be prohibited to trade or tarry in London, or any other Place within the Kingdom of England; and the Lord-Mayor of London was order'd to dispossess all those of the Hans-Towns, of their Abode in the City, call'd the Stillyard.

And those of the Hans-Towns in England.

Hereupon they called an Assembly of the Hans-Towns at Lubeck, to form an Association for preventing, by all possible means, the Trade of the English in Germany and Poland. To hinder which Project, George Carew, a Master in Chancery, was sent into Prussia, to inform the King and the Estates of Poland, and the Cities of Prussia, what was the Answer which had been given to Dzialin; and to acquaint him moreover, 'That her Majesty was graciously pleased to permit them the free Transportation of Wheat and all other Commodities into Spain, except Ammunition, &c. tho' by the Law of Nations, and the Civil Law, she might intercept any kind of Goods sent over to an Enemy: And that those of the Hans-Towns should enjoy their ancient Carew sent into Poland.

'Pri-

1597. Ann. 40. 'Privileges in England, on Condition they would 'ask them as Favours conferr'd by the Bounty 'of the Kings of England, and not challenge 'them as legal Rights or formal Contracts. For 'Privileges conferr'd by the Courtesy of Princes 'upon their own Subjects, may be revok'd, and 'much more those bestow'd on meer Strangers, 'according as the state of the Times, the good 'of the Community, and other Reasons and 'Exigencies may advise and require. That the 'Hans-Towns had experimentally found this to 'be true in Denmark and Sweden, and in England 'too in the Reigns of Edward VI, and K. Philip 'and Q. Mary: That the Case of Kingdoms and 'private Cities is vastly different; and that Prin'ces are oblig'd to support and assert their Royal 'Dignity, and not encourage the Avarice of 'Merchants, lest they should grow to be an 'overmatch to crown'd Heads.'

His Negotiation with those of Dantzick. Carew so manag'd the matter with those of Dantzick, that they forbore sending any Commissioners to the Convention at Lubeck, or joining with the Hans-Towns of Germany. So that when he had done his Business here, he cross'd over into Sweden, where he met with the King of Poland, who lay at Stockburgh under great Difficulties through the means of his Uncle Charles. However, he could work no good effect upon him, for that the Laws of Poland had provided (as the King was pleas'd to urge himself) That the King thereof should not make any Contract or Treaty with Foreigners singly and by himself. This Answer he receiv'd by Letters open and unsealed, and some others which the Vice-Chancellor would have deliver'd to him sealed and made up, he refus'd to receive, because the Queen's Title in the Superscription was not full and entire, being very loth to allow the least Instance of Disregard to the Dignity of his Prince, which an Ambassador ought to assert above all things, and even to the nicest Punctilio. From thence he came back to Elbing, which owes a great part of its Beauty and Splendor, and the vast Confluence of People thither, purely to the Trade and Intercourse of the English. Here he had the good luck to compromise Matters in some measure between the Citizens of that Place and the English Factory. But these Things fell within the compass of the following Year, only I thought it convenient to insert them here, that I might not distract or draw off the Reader's Mind by starting too often out of the way.

Embassy from Denmark. This Year was Arnold Whitfield, Chancellor of the Realm, employ'd on an Embassy from Christian IV. King of Denmark, and he was attended by Christian Bernick, who brought back hither the Order of the Garter which had been presented by the Queen to Frederick the King's Father, and desir'd likewise, that the ancient Leagues between England and Denmark might be reviv'd, and that the Danes Goods might not be seiz'd at Sea. He complain'd, that the English, contrary to the Treaties, made use of the Fishery of Norway and Ireland, and offer'd his Master's Mediation towards settling a Peace between England and Spain.

Queen's Answer. She gave the Ambassadors a very honourable Reception, promised a Renewal of the former Treaties, and the Restoration of whatever Goods had been seiz'd, and engag'd likewise, on certain Terms, that no Seizure should be made for the future, and that the Fishing Trade should be regulated according to the Terms and Articles formerly agreed upon: But she thought it no way suitable to the Royal Dignity to make use of a Proxy in procuring Peace from the Spaniard, when the King of Spain himself was the first Aggressor, and when she was moreover so sufficiently secur'd in the Courage and Loyalty of her Subjects, as not to fear the Arms of any Prince whatever, much less would she condescend to ask it at a time, when he was engag'd in a bloody and barbarous War against her Ally and Confederate, the K. of France. For the Spaniards had now taken Amiens, the largest and strongest City of Picardy, by the contrivance of oversetting a Cart in the Gate, which was the Stratagem of Ferdinando Teglio, a Person of a small Stature, but adorn'd with a wise Head and a stout Heart; and this had oblig'd the King to ask a second Supply of 4000 Men. The Queen was ready to grant it, provided they should be under his Pay; for the Fleet, which was gone to the Leeward Islands, and her Army in Ireland, had pretty well drain'd her Exchequer. But he protested he was not able to pay them, and the better and sooner to gain his Point, advertis'd her Majesty by Reaux, That the Pope's Nuncio had made him some advantagious Overtures of Peace, and a full and absolute Restitution of all Places in France, except only Calice and Ardres, if he would totally abandon the Queen's Interest: And moreover, that his Subjects in general were inclin'd to embrace these Motions. (Amiens lost. 1597. Ann. 40.)

The Queen replied, 'That she could never 'believe that so great a Prince, and one who 'was so firmly engaged to her Interest, and so 'many ways oblig'd by her, as himself had al'ways acknowledg'd, and who had likewise gi'ven her the Security of a new Oath, would 'suffer himself, under any Pretence or Colour 'whatever, to dispense with Oaths so sacredly 'made, and so solemnly repeated, purely be'cause her own domestick Troubles and Disor'ders made her uncapable of paying him at pre'sent the Service he expected.' This was warmly expostulated with the King by Sir Anthony Mildmay, her Majesty's Residentiary. He was indeed a Gentleman of a true honest English Principle, and would now and then take the freedom to charge the French King's Council with Tricking and Legerdemain; and used to say, That they made a Property of the English, by shifting them off with trifling, loose and ambiguous Answers.

But forasmuch as several were of opinion, that the King of Spain's grand Design was to dissolve the Union and good Agreement between England and France, and by that means to gain the Advantage of an easier Descent upon England from Calais? the Queen thought it the most provident Course to send the French King a Supply under her own Pay, on condition he would lay the Scene of War either in Picardy or Bretaign, in order to remove the Enemy farther off; and that he would likewise add a greater number of his own Men, and assign the English a Place of Retreat; for otherwise she would by no means consent that the English should be sent abroad meerly to be knock'd on the Head, and furnish out a Slaughter house for the Convenience of the French. However she sent him a great Sum of Money; as Security for which, and his other Debts, he frankly offer'd the Town of Calais, provided the Queen would recover it out of the Enemies Hand, within such a time, at her own Expence, and with her own proper Forces: And the better to enable her for the regaining of it, he propounded Bologne as a Retreat, and a Magazine for her Forces, taking it for granted, that Amiens would comply upon easier Terms if the Enemies Forces were divided. But whilst these Matters were in agitation, Amiens was, after a long and difficult Siege, most happily reduc'd; a Piece of Service which he freely own'd, by some Letters dated in September, was greatly owing to the (Money sent to the French K. He recovers Amiens.)

1597. Ann. 40. the good Management of Baskervil, (who died during the Siege) and the Bravery of Sir Arthur Savage, another excellent Commander; together with the Valour of the English: And to make the French King's Happiness yet more compleat, the King of Spain being now oppress'd with the double Weight of Age and Business, grew the more inclinable to embrace a Peace: For, when he began to reflect, that the Foundation of his Government was supported rather upon the Pillars of a Popular Reputation than a real Strength; that he had not Money enough to oppose the Designs of the English, to carry on the Low Country-War, and at the same time to defend his late Conquests in France, and that he was now under a Declension of Years and Strength, his Son but young and unexperienc'd, and the French King a Prince fam'd for Military Skill and Courage, he judg'd it a more prudent Method to treat with the French King about a Peace, (who, through the Pope's Mediation, appear'd at that time not uninclinable thereto) than to leave his Son in the Government of a State miserably embroiled, and expos'd to so many powerful Enemies at once: And a Peace was afterwards consummated between them, to their mutual Satisfaction, as shall be made appear in its due place.

As soon as the Queen began to have Thoughts that this Treaty of Peace was on foot, she apprehending it might turn to the Disadvantage of England, resolv'd to provide against the worst Effects, by furnishing her Exchequer with Moneys, and securing the Love and Affections of her People.

A Parliament call'd. Having therefore summon'd the Parliament to meet at Westminster, she made several good and acceptable Laws; for restoring and making good any Damages committed upon Country-Farms, and punishing the Transgressors; for prohibiting the converting Arable Land into Pasture; against imbezelling any Goods or Lands bequeathed to the use of the Poor, (a Practice which was become the Scandal and Reproach of the present Age) concerning the erecting of Hospitals and Workhouses for the Poor, the Endowments of which not to exceed two hundred Pounds per ann. for preventing the Frauds of the Queen's Receivers, Collectors, &c. for the Relief of Soldiers and Seamen; for building Houses of Correction in every County for Rogues and Vagabonds, for punishing Extortion and Rapes; concerning the Deprivation of Popish Bishops in the first Years of the Queen's Reign, namely, 'That the said Deprivation was and should still 'be accounted legal and valid, and that the Bi-'shops substituted in their room, should be ad-'judged as lawfully created.' For passing these Laws, and restoring Religion to a better State, as well as for her Majesty's wise Administration, the Security of the Kingdom from the common Enemy, and the Defence of Ireland, the Relief of France and the Netherlands, the Parliament return'd the Queen a Joint-Compliment of Congratulation.

Subsidies granted. And, that there might be always a sufficient Fund at hand to answer the Exigencies, and provide for the Defence of the Nation, the Clergy made a voluntary Offer of three Subsidies; and the Laity humbly requested the Queen to accept of three whole Subsidies and six Fifteenths and Tenths; and intreated her withal, (as they had done in the Year 1592.) not to advance this special Instance of their Bounty into a Precedent, unless upon some pressing Necessity of the like nature.

Lord La Ware restor'd. Thomas Lord La-Ware was, after the Death of his Father, called to attend at this Parliament; and he presented a Petition to the Queen, desiring that he might be restor'd to the ancient Privileges of his Family and Predecessors the Lords La-Ware. For his Father, having attempted to poison his Uncle the Lord La-Ware, in Expectation of his Estate, was, by Order of Parliament, in the Reign of Edward VI, excluded from any Estate or Honour, that might accrue to him from his Uncle's Death. The said William was, in Q. Mary's Reign, condemn'd for Treason; and afterwards his Attainder taken off, as if he had never been arraign'd: But whereas, by reason of the former Sentence, he could not by Law enjoy the Honour of his Ancestors, he was, by the Queen's special Favour, created Lord La-Ware, by a new Patent; and as long as he liv'd, claim'd Precedency according to the Date of his Creation: The Queen refer'd the whole Matter to the Lords in Parliament; who finding that the former Sentence concern'd only the Person of William, and that his Children were no way involv'd in the same; and that the Attainder in Queen Mary's Reign was no manner of Bar, because 'twas impossible for him to lose a Title which he never had; besides that he was afterwards fully and entirely restor'd, and the ancient Dignity no way extinct by the new Creation, but only laid aside in his Life-time, because he was not in Possession of it, when he receiv'd his new Patent: For all these Reasons, he was adjudg'd to hold the same Rank with his Predecessors, betwixt the Lord Willoughby of Eresby and the Lord Berkly; wherein he was accordingly reinstated, with the usual Ceremonies.

And Tho. Howard. A Writ was likewise issu'd out, to summon Thomas Howard, the second Son of the Duke of Norfolk, and lately made Knight of the Garter, to pay his Attendance on this Parliament, under the Title of Baron Howard of Walden. And because he was then indisposed, the Lord Scroop was conducted in his stead into the Upper House between two Barons, in his Parliament-Robes; himself carrying the Writ, and the principal King at Arms ushering him into the House: When the Lord Keeper of the Great Seal had publickly read the Writ, he was placed below all the rest of the Barons, tho' elsewhere the younger Sons of Dukes take place of Viscounts. For it appear'd by the Records of Parliament, that in the sixth Year of Henry VIII, when Thomas Howard Earl of Surrey, being call'd to the Parliament, claim'd the Precedency of Earls, whether in sitting or walking; because he was the eldest Son of a Duke: It was then adjudg'd that he should sit in Parliament, according to the Order of his Creation; and in other Places enjoy the Dignity and Prerogative due to a Duke's eldest Son.

The Death of the Lord Cobham, and Marquess of Winchester. This Year died William Brook Lord Cobham, Knight of the Garter, Lord-Chamberlain to the Queen, Constable of Dover Castle, Lord-Warden and Chancellor of the Cinque Ports; and left his Title and Estate to his Son Henry, whom he had by Frances Newton. As also William Powlet, the third Marquess of Winchester; a Person more eminent for his many and great Titles, and the ample Estate of his Family, than upon any other account. He left behind one Son only, born in Wedlock; viz. William, by Ann Howard of Effingham.

The Kingdom of Ireland being at this time involv'd in great Disorders, Russel was call'd home: for the whole Province of Ulster beyond Dundalk, and almost all Connaught, was up in Rebellion, except seven Garrison-Castles, viz. Newry, Knockfergus, Carlingford, Green-Castle, Armagh, Dondrom, and Olderfleet. Thomas Lord Borough, a Gentleman of fine Parts, was sent over Lord-Deputy in Borough made L. Deputy of Ireland.

1597. Ann. 40. in his Room; but tho' he had Courage as well as good Sense, yet was he to seek in point of military Conduct. This Promotion of his was beside the general Expectation, especially Norris's, who, by reason of his Deserts and Abilities, had almost promis'd himself this Dignity: But when he saw, that through the Interest of the Court-Party, who were none of his Friends, and the Unsteadiness of those whom he thought such, his Corrival was now mounted above him, tho' he had no Reason to think himself much inferiour as to Quality, and knew that he was more than his Equal in respect to the Experience of warlike Affairs: And finding moreover, (to his greater Mortification) that he was continued still President of Munster; and being also much disturbed, that Tir-Oen had so often imposed upon him by his hypocritical Condescensions; he resented things so deeply, that after all his Conquests, he was overcome by the most effeminate of his Passions, which turned to a Distemper, and carryed him off in a little time. He was beyond all Dispute a Person of incomparable Worth, and as brave a Commander as any this Nation afforded at that time. He was second Son to Henry Lord Norris, by the Daughter and one of the Heirs of the Lord Williams of Tame; and laid the Groundwork of his After-Experience in the Civil-Wars of France, under the Admiral Coligny. When he was but young, he had the Command of a Regiment in Ireland, under the Earl of Essex. He was Colonel of the English Troops in the Service of the States in the Low-Countries, Marshal of their Army under grave Hollack, President of Munster twelve Years, tho' he was much absent, and General of the English Forces in Bretaign. All which Places having discharged as it became his Character, he deserv'd the utmost that Fame could say, or his Country could do for him.

Death of Norris.

Tir-Oen desires a Truce.

Tir-Oen finding that Norris had almost quitted his Hopes; as low as his own were sunk upon this occasion, yet had he Craft enough to mind his main Chance, and court the new Lord-Deputy, by several Letters, to make a Truce with him, or (in the Irish Phrase) a Cessation of Arms. And in truth it appeared convenient enough to grant one for a Month; tho' the Lord Deputy was always of opinion, that such kind of Truces and Protections were pernicious to the Government. The Month being now expired, the Lord Deputy got his Forces together and marcht against the Rebels, which seemed to be a Circumstance of Credit and Advantage to him upon his entrance to his new Government; and after a doubtful Skirmish with them in the narrow and difficult Passes, he forced his Way through, and couragiously seized upon the Fort at Blackwater, newly fortified by the Rebels; and which was their last and securest Retreat, (the Bogs and Marshes only excepted) besides that it was an Avenue to the Country of Tir-Oen. And this Action was a plain demonstration how easily the Rebels might have been defeated, had there been any to venture upon a vigorous Onset or Pursuit. The very same Day, whilst the Lord-Deputy and his Army were returning God Thanks for their good Success, they were alarmed of a sudden by the appearance of the Enemies Forces from an Hill hard by. Henry Earl of Kildare marched immediately after them with a Troop of Horse, and some Gentlemen who serv'd as Voluntiers, and presently put them to Flight. However there were slain on the side of the English, Francis Vaughan, Brother to the Lord-Deputy's Lady; R. Turner, a stout Man, and Serjeant-Major; and two Foster-Brothers of the Earl of Kildare, for whose death he was so deeply concerned, that he followed them in a few Days after (it being remarkable, that the Affection of Foster-Brothers in Ireland, is of an extraordinary kind); there were besides a great many wounded, and among the rest Sir Thomas Waller, an eminent Soldier.

L. Deputy takes Blackwater.

E. of Kildare dies.

As soon as the Lord-Deputy had repaired the Fort, supported it with new Breast-Works, and brought his Army home; the Rebels being divided between Hope, Fear, and Shame, thought it the best way to lay close Siege to it; for it was a Place of great Consequence, for annoying them; and Tir-Oen looked on himself as absolutely ruined, if it were not recovered. He therefore closely begirt it on all sides, and the Lord-Deputy advanced once more to its Relief; being fully resolved to pierce farther into Ulster. But in the midst of his glorious Advances and Designs, it pleased God to call him off the Stage. His Death was much lamented by all good Men, but proved an Advantage to the Malecontents; for, had he lived, he had, in the opinion of all wise Men, quite defeated the Hopes of the Faction, and secured Ireland from those Hazards it fell into afterwards. The Rebels grew very outragious upon the News of the Lord Deputy's Death, and assaulted the Fort several times with great and violent Shouts; but were always repulsed with Loss, those that scaled the Walls being thrown down backwards and trodden under foot in the several Sallies of the besieged: Insomuch that they began now to despair of taking it by force, and took up another Resolution, to starve it out by degrees; perswading themselves, that there was but a few days Provision left in the Garrison, and that it would be obliged therefore to surrender, upon meer Necessity. But through the singular Bravery of the Governour Thomas Williams, it held out to Amazement, altho' they were reduced to the last Extremities; having no Horse left, and being forced to feed upon the Herbs growing upon the Bulwarks, so distressed a Condition were they in. The Army in Ireland was now, by the Queen's Order, committed to the Charge of the Earl of Ormond, under the Title of Lieutenant-General of the Army, and the Care of the Government was delivered up to Adam Loftus Archbishop of Dublin, and Chancellor; and to Sir Robert Gardiner; who were thereupon styled Justicers of Ireland; Sir Thomas Norris having enjoy'd that Title not above a Month. Tir-Oen makes a long Repetition of all his Grievances, in a Letter to the new Lieutenant, of which I have already given an exact Account, without omitting the least Circumstance, relating to the Sawciness and Misbehaviour of the Soldiers or Sheriffs. He made but very faint Excuses for the Breach of his Engagements with Norris; and the main Heads of Complaint were, That Feagh Mac-Hugh, an intimate Friend of his, was fooled out of his Life: That his Letters to her Majesty were intercepted, and that the Nobility and Commons laboured under most intolerable Taxes and Impositions. He added moreover, That he easily foresaw that the Estates of all the Lords in Ireland were going to be shar'd amongst the Gentlemen of the Gown and the Sword, the Lawyers and the Soldiers of England: Upon this he assisted the Sons of Feagh Mac-Hugh to raise new Commotions in Leinster; and at the same time presented a dissembling Scroll to the Lord-Lieutenant, humbly beseeching him to admit him into Favour, and promising to do all he could to deserve his good Opinion; tho' at the same time, 'twas notoriously known to all the World, that let his Pretences be what they will, his chief Design in stirring up this Rebellion, was to extirpate the English, and drive them out of Ireland.

A: does L. Deputy.

Ormond made Lieutenant-General.

Justicers of Ireland.

Tir-Oen submits.

The

1598. Ann. 41.

The One and Fortieth Year of her Reign.

French K. about a Peace with Spain.

In the midst of these Combustions in Ireland, there sprang up new Troubles from the French Quarters; for tho' the King of France had recover'd Amiens, yet being fatigued out with the Wars, the daily Importunities of his Subjects, and the Solicitations of the Pope, he gave the Queen to understand, by Masy, about the end of the last Year, That he had held some Conferences with the Spanish Ministers in relation to a Peace, but was resolv'd however not to make any farther Steps without her Consent and that of the Confederate States, because he had made with them a League Offensive and Defensive under those Restrictions. He therefore desir'd that some fit Persons might be dispatch'd from England and Holland to dispatch that Matter, and hear what Proposals were likely to be offer'd.

Commissioners sent to France.

The Queen, to satisfie his Christian Majesty, sent away into France her principal Secretary, Sir Robert Cecil, John Herbert Master of Requests, and Thomas Wilks, who died there presently after his landing. The States sent Justin Nassau and John Oldenbarnevelt, and at the same time some others into England, to dissuade the Queen from any Thoughts of a Peace. The English Envoys had these Instructions given them among others, 'To enquire out the Ground of these Proposals 'relating to a Peace, and what Progress was 'made therein; whether there were really and 'actually any such Overtures made, because the 'Spaniards had prevaricated in the Treaty of Borburgh: As also what Security the Confederates 'were like to have if they consented to the 'Treaty: And to propose withal, (since the 'French King had intimated, that this Treaty 'should proceed after the manner of that of Cambray, to restore every one their own) that Calais should be restor'd to the English for the Money owing by the French King, which was far 'more than so small a Town could fairly be valued at. There was also a Clause inserted, 'That they should come to no Resolutions without the consent of the States.'

The King was just now setting out for Bretaign, in order to reduce that Country; for the D. of Mercœur and the Spaniards held no good Correspondence, by reason he refused to deliver Nants into their Hands. Cecil travelled fast enough to overtake him at Angiers; and after the King had paid his Acknowledgements for the Queen's many Civilities, he spoke to this effect to her Ambassador:

French K. Speech to Cecil, &c.

'Tho' the Queen has enter'd on a War 'with Spain, which was begun upon honourable 'Grounds, and has been carried on with an answerable Success, yet unless she prosecutes it 'in a way different from the Measures hitherto 'taken, the longer Purse must of necessity carry 'it at the long run. For my own part, though 'I have a particular Inclination for the Field, 'as best suiting the nature of my Education, 'yet I consider too, that I am a King, and have 'a People under my Care and Protection, and 'therefore cannot but make a Conscience of exposing my Subjects to the Hazards and Difficulties of War; and I should think it a great 'Crime, for any private Ends of Ambition, to 'reject a Peace when offer'd, to the great Prejudice of my own Affairs, and the general Detriment of the Confederates, especially when 'otherwise it must cost a great expence of Blood, 'and bring upon me the Odium of neglecting 'my Subject's Safety.'

Cecil's Reply.

Cecil reply'd, 'That the Queen was no way 'uninclin'd to a Peace, since she had now made 'herself a sufficient Reparation, as to Spain, 'and had no other Concern upon her at present, 'than to secure her own and her Subjects Tranquillity.'

After this, he desired to learn upon what Terms the Proposals of Peace with Spain were offered, and what Methods must be taken, should the Confederate-States of the Netherlands refuse to comply with them?

King's Answer.

'The King own'd that the Queen had sufficiently incommoded the Spaniard; but that 'himself had been a Sufferer: That however the 'King of Spain was very cordial and sincere in 'his Motions of a Peace: That he would restore all the Places he had taken in France, not 'excepting Calais itself; and that he would in a 'little time so order the matter, that the King 'of Spain should accept a Peace upon reasonable 'Conditions, both with England and the Confederate States. He farther declar'd publickly, That 'if he did not close with these Offers of a Peace, 'his Kingdom must of necessity be embroiled with 'fresh Trouble; for he could discern already, 'that his Subjects were ripe for Mutiny, were 'they but thus provok'd.'

He makes a private Treaty.

During these Transactions, the French King minds his own Business, and claps up an underhand Peace with Spain, and the Articles were privately lodged in the Hands of the Archduke Albert, till a Commission came from Spain to make a perfect end of the Business. Which the Queen having some Intelligence of, expostulated the Matter with him. But he urged in his own Defence, the Delays used by the Queen, the great Necessity he was under, and the fair Opportunity which then presented itself; and seeming to have something else in his Thoughts, he referr'd the matter to his Council: To whom Oldenbarnevelt made the first Declaration, to this purpose:

Barnevelt his Speech to the Council of France.

'That the Condition of the States was, 'by God's Mercy and the Queen's Assistance, so 'happily settled, that they had been able hitherto not only to defend themselves, but to 'lend France some Assistance in her Troubles: 'That the French King had appear'd very pressing to enter into a League Offensive and Defensive with them; and that they had very readily embraced it upon her Majesty's account, 'out of a firm hope that a general Peace would 'ensue from thence; and not dreaming in the 'least that so considerable a Prince would ever 'have entertain'd a Thought of receeding from 'the Treaty: That the States were not slighted 'and used at that contemptuous Rate, when the 'Kings of England and France had before now 'form'd the most sacred Alliances with them.' He then made out at large, how unweildy the Power of Spain must needs grow, and on consequence, how dangerous 'twould prove to the French, as well as their Neighbours, should the Confederate Provinces, which were so considerable for Wealth and Power, be reduced once more under their Government. He appealed to the Conscience of the King of France, whether he could in Honour discard their Interest, when he had espous'd it with so many repeated Oaths, and they had given him no manner of provocation to break with them? Then, for a Conclusion, he told them, (after many Reasons offer'd for their Non acceptance of a Peace with Spain) 'That some Kings indeed there had been, who 'had so high an esteem for Grandour and Prerogative, as to bear none at all to the most solemn Leagues and Obligations; but that the 'Consequence of such Proceedings had generally 'been fatal; for, where Princes have pasted with 'their Faith and Honour, 'tis next to impossible 'they should support themselves by meer Power.'

He

1598. Ann. 41.

He propos'd however these following Articles in the States behalf.

'That if the King would lay aside the Thoughts 'of a Peace, and undertake the Siege of Calais, 'they would at the same time attack some other 'Place at their own Expence, and so keep the 'Enemies Forces divided: That they would 'moreover advance Pay for 7000 Men towards 'carrying on the Siege of Calais, and furnish out '25 Men of War with all necessary Provision, on 'condition he would at the same time supply '3000 Horse, 6000 Foot, and 6 Pieces of Ord-'nance.'

These things the Chancellor of France own'd to be Propositions of Weight and Consequence, and promis'd to make the King acquainted with them, and that all due Civilities should be paid to the Confederates who had deserv'd so well at the French King's hands; but he replied withal, That France, which had been so long harrass'd with the Inconveniences of War, was in no Condition to reject the Offer of a Peace, but ought rather to court it with the utmost Application.

The States absolutely refusing all Proposals of Peace, Sir Robert Cecil, who was empower'd to negociate a general Treaty, could proceed no farther. But he went so far, as to make it appear to the Council, 'That the Queen had used 'no Delays, but dispatch'd them as soon as pos-'sible into France to transact about a Peace; nor 'did she refuse to assist the King, provided he 'would carry on the War against the common 'Enemy, in such a way, as might redound to 'the general Advantage of the Confederates. 'That the Necessity, which they took so much 'pains to amplify, was not so extremely urgent, 'since all France, except a Province or two, 'were reduc'd to their just Obedience and Sub-'jection. Then, in reference to the Opportu-'nity they were so loth to lose, he declar'd, 'That he did not much care to dispute with 'Persons who suffer'd their Word and Honesty 'to buckle to the Times and Occasions, and 'make Convenience the Measure of a Prince's 'Honour, as if Profit and Advantage were the 'only Standard they were to go by. He left it 'to their own Judgments, whether their Prince 'had made the Queen a suitable Requital for 'her Kindness, when she had referr'd herself to 'him as an Umpire in the Matter, and had of-'fer'd him a Supply of 6000 Men, if he appear'd 'more inclinable to carry on the War, than ac-'cept a Peace?' Upon the whole, he desir'd another Day to consider and canvass Matters; but that being refus'd, he intreated them to remind his Majesty of the solemn Vows and Obligations he had used in the Earl of Shrewsbury's Presence, after the Treaty was concluded, and before, by several Letters subscribed by his own Hand. And he ventur'd to affirm, 'That the 'Queen had not receeded one Inch from the Ar-'ticles of the Treaty, but had rather exceeded 'her own Obligations; whereas the King of 'France had stuck to nothing.' And hereupon he produced a Copy of the Treaty. He likewise recommended to their Consideration, the finding out some way to repay those vast Sums which had been borrowed of the Queen; for since she was thus abandon'd on a sudden, she was warned, tho' by an after-Prudence, to take care of the future, and not lavish her Favours on those who appear'd so unworthy of them. At length, both he and the rest were dismiss'd with smooth and mollifying Answers; and the King acknowledged the Queen's extraordinary Civilities, and promis'd not to be wanting in any returns of Gratitude she could expect.

Cecil's Speech to the French Council.

The Queen however was much dissatisfied by these Measures, and would now and then put his Majesty in mind, both by Letters, and her Secretary for the French Tongue, Sir Tho. Edmunds, how much he was concern'd, in regard to God, his Honour and Conscience, to make good his Compact, and not suffer himself to be cajoled by the Artifices of pernicious Counsellors; and among some graver Reflections, she thought it not amiss to intermix these stinging Expressions: 'That 'if there was such a Sin as that against the Holy 'Ghost, it must needs be Ingratitude: That if 'he obtain'd from Spain any honourable Condi-'tions of Peace, he might thank England for 'them: That he should not forsake an old Friend 'for fear the new one should not match him: 'That solemn Oaths and mutual Compacts were 'never design'd for Snares, unless by the worst 'of Men: That, as a Bundle of Twigs, the 'readiest way to ruin two Friends acting in 'Conjunction, was to dissolve the Union.' These Observations were too true to be any way acceptable to the French King, and he could find no way to answer them, but the Pretence of an absolute Necessity, which made him closely pursue the Peace till he brought it to a conclusion, fortunate enough for France; tho' in England the common People used the French King's Name as a Proverb to repreach Ingratitude.

But, to give him his due, he was very industrious to procure the same Terms for England, as a Salvo to his Reputation, and manag'd the Matter with the Archduke Charles to get a Truce agreed on for some Months. He endeavour'd likewise to persuade the Queen, That whereas he had hitherto been a Burden to her, he would be sure to be her Friend and Security now the Peace was establish'd, and would never abandon the Interest of a Sister to whom he had such high Obligations. And to say truth, he express'd an extraordinary Value and Regard for her, when the Peace was treated of at Vervin in France. For the French were particularly concern'd for her Honour, after the Dispute which happen'd there between the Commissioners, about Precedency, was made up.

Treaty of Vervin.

I have a few Words to offer relating to this Controversy, and hope the Digression may be pardon'd, when 'tis for the Interest of Posterity to have some light into the matter, which I have borrow'd from the Original sent under the Commissioners Hands to the Archduke. The French Agents peremptorily demanded the first Place, according to a Decree of Pius IV. The Spanish Commissioners would not abide by the Determination, as having been formerly rejected by their Prince; and as conceiving the right of Precedency belonged to them by the Laws of good Breeding, forasmuch as they were come into a Town within the French Dominions, which they would not have done, but in pure Respect to the Pope and the Legate his Representative. It was at length concluded by the Interposition of the Pope's Legate, that he himself should sit at the upper end of the Table, and the Pope's Nuncio next him on the right Hand; and then the French had their Choice, whether they would sit on the right Hand next the Nuncio, or else next the Legate on the left. They chose the left Hand, next the Legate: The Agents for Spain were very ready to accept the right Hand, as being the more honourable Place, and the Nuncio was not of their Number, and besides, they thought the King's Honour was by this means preserv'd to a Nicety: For if Calgariton, General of the Franciscans (a considerable Party in this Affair) had taken Place of them, and sat above them, next the Legate on the left Hand, whereas, like a modest modest Franciscan as he was, he placed himself at the lower end of the Board, over-against the Legate, they had resolv'd to declare in the open Assembly, that they knew the Place which was due to his Catholick Majesty, and would have preserv'd it, had they been his Delegates. But seeing they were appointed and commissioned by the Archduke, who would not presume to place himself on the level with his Christian Majesty, and were expresly stil'd the Archduke's Delegates in the Letters of Protection they receiv'd from the Christian King, they would willingly resign the Place to the French; for the King of Spain, to preserve his own Character, was so prudent to empower the Archduke to depute others in his Room, lest he should be driven upon an invidious Contest of Precedency, immediately with the French King himself.

1598. Ann. 41.

As soon as the Business was compounded, and their Commissions open'd on both Sides, the French resented it very highly, that in the Archduke's there was not the least mention made of the Queen of England, whereas the Duke of Savoy was therein nominated. The answer was, That she was design'd to be comprehended with the Confederates. But this not satisfying the French, they said the Reason was, because she had always acted as an Enemy to Spain, and was at this very time annoying them with her Fleet. But neither did this content the French, till they had solemnly engag'd their Word, that the King of Spain should appoint some to treat with her Majesty, if there appear'd on her side any Inclination towards a Peace.

Character of Hen. IV. from Jannin.

But the Peace being now concluded between France and Spain, the French King, who had hitherto maintain'd the Reputation of a very Martial Prince, being now altogether intent upon Peace, did so highly advance the Honour and Glory of his Kingdom (which had hitherto been shock'd with the Storms and Convulsions of Civil War) by the defence and support of Religion, both the Catholick and Reform'd, as well as by the Encouragement of Learning, the revival of good Laws, the restoration of Traffick, and the adorning the Kingdom with fine and sumptuous Buildings, that he far exceeded the Character of his Predecessors, and obtain'd the Name of Henry the Great.

English debate about Peace with Spain.

The Queen being now oblig'd to have a more watchful Eye upon her Affairs at home, sent Sir Francis Vere over to the States, to learn whether they would concur with her in the forming a Treaty of Peace; or if not, what they would contribute towards supporting the War? She likewise began now to be in earnest with them about their paying back what Charges she had been at upon their account.

In the mean while, a very close Consultation pass'd in England, whether it would turn to the Kingdom's Account, or not, to admit a Peace with the Spaniard? They which were for the Peace, produc'd these Arguments to support their Reasons for it.

Opinion: 'That besides the Pleasure and Convenience of Peace, 'twould moreover clear the 'English of a foul Aspersion which lay upon 'em, 'That they were the general Incendiaries and 'Disturbers of Christendom, as if they placed their 'Security and Happiness in the Dangers and 'Misfortunes of other Men. That the Queen 'would be more secure from treasonable Plots 'and Attempts: That it would put an end to 'an expensive War with Spain and the Arch-'duke: That it would be a Means to extinguish 'the Irish Rebellion, when the Malecontents 'were quite stript of the hopes of Succours from 'Spain: That there would be a free and open 'Trade, for which the Queen and the King-'dom would fare much better: That the Trade 'of Spain, which had formerly brought in such 'handsome Advantages to the English Merchants, 'would again be open'd to them, and their 'Grain fetch them good current Money: That 'the Emperor would revoke his Mandate against 'the English Merchants in Germany: It would be 'the best way to prevent all Broils and Commo-'tions at home, occasion'd commonly by fre-'quent and excessive Taxes and Pressing of Sol-'diers: The League of Burgundy would proba-'bly be renewed, and so there would be no 'ground of Apprehensions from the French Quar-'ter: England would enjoy a little Respite to 'provide and fortify herself against any future 'Emergence. It would likewise make for her 'Majesty's Honour, who upon the States offer-'ing to put themselves under her Royal Prote-'ction, anno 1585, declar'd publickly, and in 'Print, That she aim'd at nothing in the Relief 'of the Netherlands, but their Freedom, and the 'Security of England. If it appear'd at that time 'a wise and reasonable Resolution to Succour 'the Netherlands, and an act of Justice to wave 'the Honour of being their Stadt-holder, when ''twas offer'd purely to carry on the Charges of 'the War; it must now appear an Instance of 'the grossest Weakness to prosecute the War, 'upon a fair offer of Peace from Spain, and not 'the least shadow of a Proposal from those who 'find it their Interest to lengthen out the War. 'Besides, 'twere worth while to weigh these 'Points: Whether England be really able to 'maintain a War against Spain, in Ireland, in the 'Low-Countries, and in other Places at the same 'time? And whether there were any Hopes, 'by continuing the War, to draw the Spaniard 'to any more convenient Terms of Peace than 'what were now offer'd? And this likewise 'was to be thought on more than once, since it 'is without all question, more convenient for 'the English to make an Offensive War, (it being 'a wretched Case to be put on the Defence of 'one's Country at home.) What Parts it were best 'to begin the War in: If on the Coasts of Spain 'or Portugal, 'twere indeed an easie matter to 'plunder the Sea-Ports in either Kingdom, but 'the Expence of keeping them, would eat up 'the Profit: If the Isles of the Azores were made 'the Seat of War; they might, 'tis true, be very 'probably reduc'd, and the Spanish King be great-'ly incommoded by that means, but were not 'to be preserv'd without too big an Expence: 'If America, they have Ships now in all those 'Ports, every way well furnish'd, and the Sea-'Coasts are provided with more and stronger 'Garrisons than before, and there is not a Grain 'of Gold, Silver or Pearl, but what must be got 'thro' the Fire: If in the Low Countries, 'twould 'be an Undertaking hardly practicable, consi-'dering that Country is so well stor'd with for-'tified Towns, and every one of them able to 'endure a long Siege. Nor was it possible that 'the States, tho' the English acted in conjunction 'with them, could do any more than defend 'themselves, till the Spaniards were quite drawn 'off to attend the War with France. And then, ''twas no true Politick Axiom, in the last place, 'That they who are able to stand out a War, may ob-'tain Peace on their own Terms; whereas they that 'cannot, must be contented to bear the brunt.' It was farther urg'd, what Trouble the Athenians and others brought upon themselves, meerly for refusing the Offers of Peace. There were some likewise who alledg'd, (but it was rather from a personal Pique against the Men, than any real Dislike of their Cause) 'That the States, whatever 'pother they make about Religion and Property, 'do 1598. Ann.41. 'do in effect extirpate all Piety, by a general 'Toleration of all Perswasions, but Popery: 'Then for Liberty, 'twas but a Cloak for Advantage and Interest, which they most heartily promoted, by laying burdensome Imposts on 'Provisions, imbasing of Coin, and raising the 'Value when they pleas'd, and other Practices 'of the same sort; By these Tricks they make a 'shift to maintain the War on Foot, and enrich 'themselves by that which all but themselves are 'great Losers by. Besides this, they have erected 'so many Monopolies, that all Trade and 'Commerce is in their own Hands; and, like 'all true Sticklers for Democracy, they hate 'Monarchy at the bottom of their Hearts, and 'have extruded all their Nobility, except one or 'two Persons they make use of in their Wars. 'And 'tis clear as day-light, they mean nothing 'more nor less (a dangerous Precedent against 'crown'd Heads!) than to form themselves into 'Parties, in opposition to the House of Austria, 'as the Helvetians did formerly against the House 'of Habspurgh, to which the other is allied; and 'this they would willingly do at the Expence, 'not only of their own Lives, but those of the 'English, French and Scots, who for the sake of a 'little publick Fame, are too ready to spend 'their Blood in other Men's Quarrels.'

Those who appear'd against the Peace, proceeded upon these Considerations: 'That the 'Spaniard would hereby heap such a Mass of 'Treasure, that should he once have a mind to 'quarrel again, he would prove an Over-match 'for all his Neighbours. That a firm and lasting Peace was by no means to be expected 'from him, without a Dispensation from the 'Pope, when he so grosly trick'd us at Bourburgh, 'ann. 1578, and is of this Opinion to boot, That 'Faith is not to be kept with Hereticks. That 'tis 'impossible he should put up the Damages he 'has receiv'd, without attempting at one time 'or other to make Reprisals. If a Peace be concluded, the Queen must abandon the States of 'Holland and Zeland, and so lose all the Money 'expended upon that War, or else deliver the 'Cautionary-Towns into the Enemies Hands: 'The first of which would be to her Damage; 'and the latter to her Discredit. The States, 'when she has once quitted their Interest, must 'of course come under the Subjection of Spain, 'which would gain thereby a vast Accession of 'Naval and Land-Forces to disturb England; 'besides that those Countries would be a very 'convenient Seat for carrying on a War against 'their Neighbours, and so confirming and settling a Spanish Monarchy; admitting the Difficulty of maintaining an offensive War in the 'Low-Countries, the Uncertainty and Hazard of 'supporting it in the Azores, and the little Advantage of carrying it on in Spain or Portugal, 'and the very great Expence and Charge, be it 'in any of these Places; yet to have the Seat of 'War in America, must needs turn to a very gainful Account; for that vast Country is so thinly 'stockt with Inhabitants, and they live at such 'Distances, that they would find it very difficult 'to relieve one another: Were care taken therefore to land an English Army of 10000 Men in 'those Parts, there to continue, and follow 'planting, no doubt in the least of reducing Carthagena in Golden-Castile, Panama, and the River 'Chagre which is navigable up thither, together 'with Porto Bello; and upon consequence, the 'Treasure which is transmitted through those 'Places into Spain from Peru and Golden-Castile, 'must needs be intercepted, or else detained in 'America. This would be a Means to hinder the 'Spaniards Trade, and lessen the King's Customs, 'to his unspeakable Inconvenience. Nor could 'there be any fear of the Natives, for they are 'great Cowards, and live in an effeminate Climate; and for the Spaniards who might possibly be sent thither, they would find themselves 'too much fatigu'd by their Voyage, and every 'way in too ill a case to dispossess old Soldiers 'of their Garrisons and places of Defence. And 'then there could be no fear of wanting Victuals, 'since that might be supplied as easily from England as 'tis convey'd from Spain. For as soon 'as it came to be known that they had settled 'themselves in those Parts, there would be 'enough from all Nations to furnish them with 'all Necessaries, for the Europeans desire nothing 'more than a free and open Commerce with 'America. Objections against the Hollanders 'concerning Religion and Monopolies are meer 'Slanders, and the Inventions of such as bear 'no good-will to the Reformation; for the States 'do heartily espouse the true Religion, and assert it, together with their ancient Liberty, 'and differ in no Fundamental Point from the 'rest of the reform'd Churches, but agree in all 'Doctrines relating to Salvation. In things indifferent, and not so material, they do indeed 'grant a general Toleration, in compliance 'with the Condition of the Times, just as the 'primitive Church did; for it must be expected 'that some Cockles will grow amongst the 'Corn. As for other Matters, the Miscarriages 'of particular Men ought not to affect the whole 'Body, and the Community ought in all fair 'Construction to stand exempted from the Faults 'of any Individual. There were some Corruptions found among the very Apostles, and the 'Angels themselves were not without Blemish: 'We ought not therefore to bespatter a well-manag'd Government, nor discourage and cry 'down the good Husbandry of a free People, 'if they have stolen the Receipt from the rest of 'the World, how to thrive and grow rich upon 'War and publick Disorder.'

Against the Peace.

The Advocates for a Peace, endeavour'd to invalidate these Arguments by others here set down: 'That the Queen and the Confederates 'had as fair an Opportunity of laying up Money, 'while the Peace held, by which they might 'make as good a Provision for their own Defence, as the King of Spain could to annoy 'them: That there was good Reason to expect 'a firm and lasting Peace with Spain, since that 'Kingdom has suffer'd enough to reflect what ill 'Steps have been taken in the tyrannical Government of the Low-Countries, and by so doing, to correct that Error, by submitting to a 'Peace. There have been several Treaties of 'this nature formerly agreed to by the Dukes of 'Burgundy and the Kings of Castile, the King of 'Spain's Predecessors, which had always been 'duly observ'd to the real Advantage of the English Nation. Suppose the King of Spain, to 'serve a Point of Interest, play'd a little fast 'and loose in the Business of Bourburgh; 'tis in 'our Power likewise to treat of a Peace with 'our Swords in our Hands. There are numerous Examples of Faith duly kept between Popish Princes and Hereticks, without the Pope's 'being made a Party in the Case; witness 'Charles V. and his Successors, who preserv'd inviolably their Faith with the excommunicated 'Protestants of Germany, whom they esteemed 'Hereticks: As likewise Francis I. K. of France, 'who solemniz'd the Funeral of Henry VIII at 'Paris, tho' the Pope had excommunicated him. 'And we may instance in Henry the present King 'of France, who after his Reconciliation to the 'Church of Rome, and his being adopted for her 'eldest

A Reply for Peace

1598. *Ann.*41.

'eldeſt and deareſt Son, made a League offenſive and defenſive with the Queen of England. Beſides this, the Appetite of Revenge flags apace, the Power of Action decays. The Queen may very lawfully and fairly abandon the Cauſe of the States, ſince ſhe oblig'd herſelf to protect them no longer than they could procure from the Spaniard convenient Terms of Freedom and Security, which if they would now refuſe, ſhe is diſengag'd from lending 'em any farther Aſſiſtance. 'Twas neither a juſt nor reaſonable Demand on their ſide, That the Cautionary Towns ſhould be deliver'd into their Hands. 'Twould be eaſy to recover the Money lent out of the Queen's Purſe, upon account of the War, were but a Peace concluded. 'Twill require a conſiderable time to reduce the Low-Countries under Subjection, and Time may produce a thouſand things which at preſent are little dreamt of. But if they are reduc'd by a pacifick Treaty, they can never ſecure themſelves, but by ſecuring their Profit and Intereſt: But whatever became of them, France and England, whilſt they acted in Conjunction, would eaſily ballance Spain, and check any Exorbitance on that ſide. Publick Convenience would prove the firmeſt Ligament to keep the Treaty together. In ſum, the Reaſons for a Peace are deducible from the Law of Nature, which has made Self-preſervation one of her firſt and moſt forcible Dictates; and may be fetch'd alſo from the Law of Nations, which makes the Peoples Safety the higheſt Law: And the Chriſtian Law, which is the beſt and pureſt Reaſon, pleads hard againſt the Effuſion of human Blood, and for the Union of Chriſtendom, againſt Pagans and Infidels; whereas the Arguments for living in a State of War, (which one would think were effectually confuted by Drake's ill Succeſs, whatever golden Dreams may poſſeſs thoſe whoſe Thoughts are rambling to America) theſe are meerly bottom'd upon human Wiſdom, and a politick kind of Providence and Foreſight as to ſome future Dangers: But ſure 'twere better to commit theſe Iſſues to the Conduct of a divine Wiſdom and Care, and in the mean time direct our Aims and Councils to the publick Good, and diſcharge an honeſt Conſcience at home, rather than be ſo intent upon Points which carry a bare Appearance of Convenience or Neceſſity.' Theſe were the Reaſonings and Debates on both ſides.

Burleigh declares for Peace.

Burleigh, the Lord-Treaſurer, upon the force of theſe Arguments, and in reſpect of certain great and neceſſary Advantages to enſue from thence, declar'd himſelf for Peace, as well knowing that the Iſſues of War were precarious, and the Expences great; beſides, that the Treaſure of England was much waſted, and the People apt enough to grow mutinous, if they found themſelves loaded with too heavy Impoſitions; that the common Sort had a natural Averſion to the Nobility, and that there was but little Hopes of any Aſſiſtance from the States; not to mention the Treachery of our own People at home, the little Dependance that was to be fix'd on our Neighbours, and the flowing and opulent State of Spain. So that, as he ſaid, England was like to reap no real Advantage by this War, but only a ſort of negative one, which amounts to little more than the Shadow of a Good.

Eſſex againſt it.

Eſſex labour'd hard againſt any Motions for Peace; and having been bred to the Sword, and gain'd ſome Reputation by it, he would by no means conſent to an Accommodation, but ſtiffly urg'd the Impoſſibility of making any honourable Treaty with Spain, or indeed any Terms, but what they would break, upon theſe and the like Suggeſtions: 'That the Spaniards were a ſubtle and enterprizing People, and very ambitious of extending their Empire; that they bore a moſt inveterate Averſion to England, and profeſs'd a Religion quite contrary to it; that the Pope's Diſpenſing Power was unlimited, and that Axiom generally eſpous'd, that Faith is not to be kept with Hereticks.'

These Arguments, and the Apprehenſion of future Dangers and Inconveniences, he much inſiſted on; inſomuch that the Lord-Treaſurer was provok'd to ſay, that he ſeem'd intent upon nothing but Blood and Slaughter. And after a very warm Debate upon this Point, he took out a Prayer-Book, and without uſing any Words, pointed to this Paſſage; Men of Blood ſhall not live out half their days.

Some however there were who approv'd Eſſex's Meaſures, as conceiving he was principally concern'd for the Honour and Welfare of his Country. Others condemn'd him as a deſigning and ambitious Perſon, who was for advancing himſelf and his Creatures at any rate. To ſilence theſe Men, he wrote a formal kind of Defence; in which he exhibited what has been already mention'd, and diſcover'd withal, that Anthony Rolſton, an Engliſh Runagado, was ſome time before ſent into England by the Spaniſh Miniſters, and Creſwel the Jeſuit, under colour of concerting a Peace, but really and in fact, (as Rolſton afterwards confeſs'd) to diſcover the Queen's Military Strength, to embolden the Papiſts, and by Promiſes and Bribes to debauch ſome Perſons, eſpecially Eſſex, from their Duty and Allegiance.

There follow'd after this a pretty warm Diſpute, between the Queen and Eſſex, about the Matter of a Peace, and the choice of ſome fit and able Perſons to ſuperintend the Affairs of Ireland, at which none were preſent but the Lord-Admiral, Sir Robert Cecil Secretary, and Windebank Clerk of the Seal: For whereas the Queen lookt upon Sir William Knolles, Uncle to Eſſex, as the moſt proper Perſon for that Charge, and Eſſex contending on the other ſide, that Sir Geo. Carew would much better become that Poſt; (perhaps on purpoſe to get rid of him;) and when the Queen could by no means be perſuaded to approve his Choice; he quite forgot himſelf and his Duty, and turn'd his Back upon his Prince in a kind of Contempt. The Queen was not able to bear his Inſolence, and ſo beſtow'd on him a Box on the Ear, and bad him go and be hang'd. He immediately clapt his Hand on his Sword, and the Lord-Admiral ſtepping in between, he ſwore a great Oath, that he neither could nor would put up an Affront of that nature, nor would he have took it at the hands of Henry VIII, himſelf, and in a great Paſſion he immediately withdrew from Court. The Lord-Keeper of the Privy-Seal adviſ'd him in a ſerious and conſiderate Letter, to apply himſelf to the Queen for Pardon, alledging, that 'twas the beſt way to ſtoop to her Anger for the preſent, remembring that Paſſage of Seneca; If the Law puniſhes a Guilty Perſon, he muſt ſubmit to Juſtice; if one Innocent, he muſt yield to Fortune. If he had given the Queen a juſt Offence, 'twas not in his power to make her Amends; whereas if ſhe had done him an Injury, he was oblig'd in Prudence, Duty and Religion, to bear with his Sovereign, to whom he had ſo many Obligations; for that there was a vaſt Difference between a Prince and a Subject. He ſent the Lord-Keeper his Anſwer in a long and paſſionate Letter, which his Friends did afterwards unadviſedly divulge; wherein he appeal'd from the Queen to God Almighty, in Expreſſions ſome-

His Inſolence to the Q.

thing

1598. Ann. 41.

thing to this purpose; 'That there is no Tempest so boisterous as the Resentments of an angry Prince: That the Queen was of a flinty Temper: That he well enough knew what was due from him as a Subject, an Earl, and Grand-Marshal of England, but did not understand the Office of a Drudge or Porter: That to own himself a Criminal, was to injure Truth, and the Author of it, God Almighty: That his Body suffer'd in every Part of it, by that one Blow given him by his Prince: That 'twould be a Crime in him to serve a Queen who had given him so great an Affront. What! was it impossible for crown'd Heads to wrong, and so to stand accountable to their Subjects? Was any Power below of an unlimited Nature? And did not Solomon say, That he is a Fool who laughs when he is stricken? They only that are Gainers by the Miscarriages of Princes, were obliged to take the Indignities they offer'd; and those who suspected the Omnipotency of the Deity, might, if they pleased, place it in earthly Princes; for my part, I have suffer'd so many and great Injuries, that I cannot but resent them from my very Heart.'

Essex received again into Favour.

However, in a little time he became more pliant, received his Pardon, and was re-admitted into the Queen's Favour, who always thought it a less Crime to offend a Person, than to prosecute him with a perfect Hatred. However, his Friends were apt to date his Ruin from this unlucky Circumstance; having made this Remark, That Fortune seldom caresses a cast-off Favourite a second time; and Princes once disoblig'd, are seldom heartily reconciled.

The Death of Ld-Treasurer Burleigh.

In the midst of these Discontents died William Cecil, Lord Burleigh, Lord-High-Treasurer of England, having exhausted himself with Study, and the necessary Fatigue of his Employment; so that growing old, and being troubled with the Gout, he requested the Queen's Leave to lay down his Place. Upon the Receipt of his Letter, she was pleased to pay him some Visits, and to support him with the most kind and encouraging Expressions. However he resign'd his Soul to God in a very few Days, after he had lived long enough to answer the Demands of Nature, and Reputation, and every thing but the Expectations of his Country. He left the World so fairly, that the greatest Enemy he had freely declar'd that he envied him nothing, but that his Sun went down with so much Lustre; whereas generally publick Ministers are not blessed with such calm and fortunate Periods.

His Character.

He was, without doubt, an extraordinary Person, so liberally furnish'd by Nature, (to say nothing of his Presence and Aspect, which had a commanding Sweetness in them) and so handsomely improv'd by Learning and Education, that he had few or no Superiors as to the several Qualifications of Probity and Prudence, Industry, Temperance and Justice. He had besides these Accomplishments, an easy and flowing Eloquence, which consisted not in a Pomp and Ostentation of Words, but in a Masculine Plainness and Significancy of Sense. He was Master of a Prudence form'd upon Experience, and regulated by Temper and Moderation; then for his Loyalty, 'twas true and would endure the Touch, and was only exceeded by his Piety, which indeed was eminently great. To sum up his Character in little; the Queen was blessed in so worthy a Minister, and the Kingdom indebted to his Memory for the happy Influence of his Ministry.

Birth.

Perhaps future Ages may be curious to know the Place of his Nativity, which was at Bourn in Lincolnshire, Ann. 1521. His Father was Richard Cecil of the Family of Altegrennis, which belong'd to King Henry the VIII's Wardrobe. His Mother's Name was Jane; she was an Heiress of the honourable Family of Ekinton, and of the Walcots.

1598. Ann. 41.

Education.

In his younger Days, he was a Student at St. John's College in Cambridge, where at twenty Years of Age he married Mary the Sister of Sir John Cheek, a Gentleman of known Learning, and buried her in a Year or two; after which having studied the Law for a Year or two at Grays-Inn in London, he married Mildred the Daughter of Sir Anthony Cook, who was Preceptor to Edward VI. She was a Woman very well versed in the Latin and Greek Tongues.

Preferments.

Being admitted into the Duke of Somerset's Family, who was Protector of England, he was made his Master of Requests, being the first, as himself told me, who wore that Title in England: Shortly after, he was Secretary to King Edward VI, and received from him the Honour of Knighthood. Upon his opposing the pretended Conveyance of the Crown from the Ladies Mary and Elizabeth, he got into Favour of the former, tho' he was in the Number of those that subscribed it; and his dexterous Management preferred him to a perfect Intimacy with Cardinal Pool, Tonstal, and Sir William Peter. But whereas he had a real and hearty Veneration for the Protestant Religion, (however he might humour the present Occasions) and finding the Road to Preferment lay quite another way, he made his Court to the Lady Elizabeth, who made use of him as a necessary Instrument whilst she was a private Person, and when she came to the Throne, advanced him to be her Secretary and a Privy-Counsellor, and after the Death of Sir Thomas Parry, made him Master of the Wards in the third Year of her Reign; which Office he discharged, as he did all others, like a good Husband for the Queen and the Wards, very modestly in respect to his private Advantages, and not unprofitably for his Followers and Dependants, tho' without the least Blemish upon his Integrity; so that the Queen did so far rely upon the Prudence of his Conduct, as in a manner to lay the whole Weight of the Government on his Shoulders. His great Interest with the Queen, and a plentiful Estate besides, drew upon him the Envy of some of the Nobility, which, he used to say, was sooner overcome by giving way, than making opposition against it. The Queen having had a thirteen Years Experience of his Prudence and Loyalty, was pleased to honour him with the Title of Baron Burleigh, and then to make him Lord-High-Treasurer of England: In which Post he considerably augmented the publick Purse, and his own private Estate, though he abhorred the base and corrupt Methods of scraping up Money; for indeed he seldom or never suffer'd any thing to be expended, but for her Majesty's Honour, the Security of the Nation, or the Support of some neighbouring Allies.

He had a strict Eye upon the Farmers of the Customs, but without Harshness or Pedantry. He used to say, That he never cared to see the Treasury swell like a disorder'd Spleen, when the other Parts of the Commonwealth were in a Conjunction. And he used all possible means (and with good Success) to enrich the Queen and the Kingdom by his Administration, it being a common Expression with him, That nothing could be for the Advantage of a Prince, which makes any way against his Reputation. Wherefore he would never suffer the Rents of Lands to be raised, nor the old Tenants to be put out. The same Method he observed as to his own private Estate, which he managed with that Discretion and Probity, that he never sued any Man, nor was sued himself. I shall forbear too lavish a Commendation of him; him, but this I may venture to affirm with truth, 1598. That he was one of those few who lived and died Ann. 41. with a sound and large Reputation. Indeed he was in all respects so considerable a Person, that I agree with the Opinion of the Ancients, and conceive a silent Admiration of him to be the handsomest Character.

His Issue. He had by his first Wife, Mary Cheek, Thomas now Earl of Exeter, a Person remarkably bless'd in a numerous Issue. By his last Wife, Mildred Coke, he had Robert Earl of Salisbury, who succeeded him in his most honourable Employments, (an Happiness which is very rare and unusual) besides two Daughters, both of which he outlived, viz. Anne Countess of Oxford, who had three Daughters, Elizabeth Wife to William Earl of Derby, Bridget married to the Lord Norris, and Susan Wife to Philip Earl of Montgomery, as likewise Elizabeth married to William Wentworth, who had no Children. He made his Executors Gabriel Goodman Dean of Winchester, a very Reverend and Worthy Person; and Thomas Bellot, his Domestick Steward, to whom he left a large Sum to be distributed in charitable Uses, which was very faithfully performed.

Vid. 1595. The Lord Burleigh's strenuous Endeavours for a Peace, tho' they produc'd not the desir'd Effect, yet did they tend to pare off a great part of the Charge of the War: For when he lay sick, and almost past Recovery, the States sent over John Duvenvoord Admiral of Holland, John Oldenbarnevelt, Keeper of the Seals, John Verke, John Hooting, and Andrew Hessel; and join'd in the same Commission Sir Nowel Carron, their Agent in England, who being mightily for promoting the War, did in the Month of August hold a Conference with Sir Thomas Egerton, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, the Earl of Essex, the Admiral, George Lord Hunsdon, the Lord Buckhurst, Sir William Knolles, Sir Robert Cecil, and Sir John Fortescue, Commissioners appointed by the Queen, and subscrib'd to the following Articles: That the Treaty made Ann. 1585, should be ratified and confirmed, excepting some Articles relating to the Civil Administration: That the Confederate-States should pay to the Queen 800000 l. of English Money, viz. 30000 l. yearly during the Continuance of the War, to be employ'd against the common Enemy, until 400000 l. were paid: And if a Peace were agreed on between the King of Spain and the Queen, there should be paid of the remaining Sum 20000 l. yearly till the 800000 l. were fully discharged: That 1150 English Soldiers who were in the Garrisons of Flushing, Briel, and the adjacent Ports, should be paid by the States: That they might have the Liberty to levy Men in England under English Officers, who should serve under their Pay: That if the Spaniard should make a Descent on the Isles of Wight, Guernsey, Jersey or Silly, the States should be obliged to assist the Queen with 5000 Foot, and 500 Horse: That if 'twas necessary to equip a Fleet in England to serve against Spain, they should provide an equal Number of Ships: That if any English Forces were sent over into Flanders or Brabant, they should provide and furnish out the same number of Men: As for the Money due to Pallavicini, the Queen should re-imburse herself from Brabant and Flanders, and the rest of the Provinces which were not within the Union.

A new Treaty with the States.

Thus was the Queen eased of a vast Expence by this new Treaty, no less than a yearly one of 120000 l. English; and this by the provident Conduct of the Lord-Treasurer Burleigh, and the Management of Sir Thomas Bodley and George Gilpin, who succeeded him in the Council of the States.

Bodley's Library. Bodley, being at present unengaged from Affairs of State, set himself a Task which would have suited the Character of a crown'd Head, I mean the Promotion and Encouragement of 1598. Learning: For he began to repair the Publick Ann. 41. Library at Oxford, and furnished it with new Books: 'Twas set up by Humfrey Duke of Glocester, but thro' the Iniquity of the Times, was in the Reign of Edward VI, stript of all the Books; but he having made the choicest Collection from all Parts of the World of the most valuable Books, partly at his own Cost, and partly by Contributions from others, he first Stock'd, and afterwards left it so well Endow'd at his Death, that his Memory deserves to bear a very lasting Date amongst Men of Worth and Letters.

Whilst these Matters were treating of between An Embassy to Denmark. the English and the States, the Lord Zouch, and Christopher Parkins Doctor of Law, being sent to Denmark to congratulate the King upon his Marriage with the Elector of Brandenburg's Daughter, obtain'd with much ado the Re-imbursement of 30000 Dollars, for some Goods which the Danes had seized belonging to the English Merchants, to the value of 100000 Dollars, on pretence that the English had not acted justly and honestly in the Business of Customs. For it seems there were about this time several Disputes raised as to that Matter, and the Queen, suspecting that the King of Denmark acted more favourably by the Spanish than the English, could not forbear complaining, that the Customs were raised to an unreasonable Height; and he made Complaint on the other hand, that his Subjects were miserably abused and rifled by the English Pirates, and that the Council of England had a nearer Regard to the Avarice of some particular Merchants, than to the publick Welfare and Good of both Kingdoms.

About this time, Philip the second, King of Cardinal Albert married to the Infanta of Spain. Spain engaged Infanta Isabella, his Daughter, to Cardinal Albert, and gave her for her Portion the Low-Country Provinces, and the County of Burgundy. Whereupon the Cardinal, having in a solemn way sent back his Cap to Rome, and received a consecrated Sword from his Holiness, made all the haste he could to Spain. In the mean time, the King of Spain being above seventy Years of Age, took leave of this World in the end of September, and died much lamented for the Evenness of his Temper under all Events. He was a Prince of so wide and extensive an Authority, that there was no Impertinence in his Motto, Sol mihi semper lucet, i. e. The Sun shines always upon me. He was likewise a Prince of singular Conduct, through the Benefit of some of his Father's Maxims, which he had apply'd and improv'd by his own Experience; but he was generally unsuccessful in the Field; for being himself but of a weak Constitution, he was but slow in Action, and forced at last to depend on the Advice of others. By this means, the The three Keys of the Spanish Empire. three Keys of the Spanish Empire, for so his Father called Guletta in Africa, Flushing in the Low-Countries, and Cales in Spain, over which he was advised to have a watchful Eye, happen'd to be look'd after not so carefully as they should; for one of them was taken by the Turks, another by the Confederate-States of the Low-Countries, and the third seized upon by the English, to the irreparable Dishonour of so great a Prince: So that he had good Reason for advising his Son (as 'tis said he did) to make up the Differences with the English and the Netherlanders.

About this time returned home into England Earl of Cumberland returns. George Clifford Earl of Cumberland, who had some time before furnish'd out a Fleet of eleven Ships at his own proper Expence, in order to intercept the Portugal Caracks as they sail'd from the River Tayo to the East-Indies; but they hearing that 1598. Ann.41. that they lay busking about the Coasts of Portugal, staid so long in the River under the Protection of the Fort of St. Julian, which was furnished with an hundred great Guns, that they lost their Voyage for that Season. Whereupon he sailed away first for the Canaries, where he took and plunder'd the Isle and Town of Lancerota: From thence he steer'd for Boriquen, and landing his Men, dispos'd them into Order, and made an Attack on Porto-Rico; and when they had taken one or two of the Forts, he made himself Master of the Town with the Loss of not above thirty Men, tho' there were in the Town above 400 Soldiers, besides Inhabitants. This Place being for the Advantage of its Situation accounted by the Spaniards the Key of America, he resolved to make the Seat of War, and removed all the Inhabitants out of it, tho' they offer'd a plentiful Stock of rich Goods, besides Gold and Silver Plate in ransom for it: But shortly after the English were so wretchedly handled by the Bloody-Flux, and the Griping of the Guts, that in their forty Days stay there, 700 Men were swept away by these Distempers; so that he was forced to return home with more Honour than Booty, tho' he carried off above 60 Pieces of Brass Cannon: However he did a considerable Damage to the Spaniard, in hindring the Caracks from making their Voyage to the Indies for this Year, and the Return of the Spanish Plate-Fleet from America.

He takes Lancerota and Porto Rico.

Much about the same time was Edward Squire arraigned for Treason; a Man of no Family, and who had rose from a little Pettifogger to be an under Groom in the Queen's Stable, then entred a Soldier under Drake in his last Expedition, and being taken Prisoner and carried into Spain, commenced an Acquaintance with Walpole the Jesuit. Walpole got him into the Inquisition as an Heretick, where having suffer'd Hardships enough, he was easily persuaded to change his Religion, and often tamper'd with to distinguish his Zeal by doing something extraordinary for the sake of it. At length the Jesuit told him, after several Preambles, (as Squire himself confessed) That it would be a meritorious Piece of Service to kill the Earl of Essex, but a much nobler Act to take off the Queen, which he told him might be done without Noise or Danger, by poisoning the Pummel of the Queen's Saddle, upon which she was obliged to lay her Hand as she rode.

Squire tried for Treason.

Drawn in by Walpole.

When Squire had consented to this villainous Project, the Jesuit bound him up by several Vows, under pain of Damnation, to execute and conceal the Design. Thus having given his Instrument of Wickedness proper Instructions, and fed him with fine Promises of Saintship and Salvation, and given him his Blessing as an Earnest, he deliver'd him the Poison; and to prevent any Suspicion on the account of his being just returned from Spain, he contrived that he and another should be employed as Agents to redeem some Spaniards who were at that time Prisoners in England. Not long after he very artificially rubbed the Poison upon the Pummel of the Queen's Saddle, pretending to be busy about something else, and crying out, God save the Queen; but through God's Mercy the Poison took not its Effect. Mean while, to avoid all Suspicion, he lifted himself under the Earl of Essex, who intended for the Azores, and went out of England a Soldier in his own Ship; and there he besmear'd the Earl's Chair with the same Poison, but to as little Effect. After this he return'd into England, and lived secure, and without the least Apprehension that Walpole, his Confessor, would have turn'd Informer against him: But he being, it seems, very much nettled at the ill Success of his Enterprize, and suspecting that Squire had chous'd him for all his Vows and Engagements, bent himself wholly to Revenge; and it is most certain, that a Person was sent to England to impeach Squire for Treason in general Terms. Whereupon (the thing being of that Weight and Importance) Squire was examin'd, and at first denied the Fact; but being afterwards more closely tax'd upon certain Circumstances, and suspecting that his Confessor had proved a Judas, he freely confessed all that Walpole had contrived; that he had given his Consent, and how far he had proceeded, &c. However, both at the Bar and at the Gallows he protested, that tho' Walpole and others had persuaded him to the Fact, yet he entred upon it with the greatest Reluctancy. Walpole, or somebody for him, printed a Pamphlet, wherein he utterly denied the whole Sum and Substance of Squire's Confession. However the Matter was, there were some English Runnagadoes that took mighty pains to work the Ruin of others, and to brand themselves with a perpetual Infamy: For I am concerned to say, that some of the Clergy had both espoused and broached this pestilent Doctrine, That to take away the Lives of excommunicate Princes, was no more than weeding the Cockle out of the Lord's Field.

There was about this time a Gang of dissolute and ill-principled Men, who seemed very well pleased with disturbing the Peace and Tranquillity of the Nation: In order to which, they dispersed abroad several Reports (upon what Grounds I know not) that the King of Scots was a Favourer of the Catholick Religion, and but indifferently affected to her Majesty's Person and Interest; and to reconcile the more Credit to them, the Queen had presented her the Copy of a Letter to the Pope, written by the Queen's Secretary, a Person of slender Value and Credit, and subscribed by the King's Hand, which he had procured from him unawares. But the Queen, being not apt to be over credulous, slighted these Whimsies, as the fanciful Projects of some ill-designing Men, contrived on purpose to rob him of the Hearts of the Protestants, and present him with those of the Papists in their room. Nay, when one Valentine Thomas, a great Debauchée, and arraign'd for a certain Robbery, upon his Request to be permitted to offer something of great Consequence in the Queen's Ear, did in a private Audience acquaint her Majesty with the King of Scots Disaffaction to her Interest, so far was she from giving the least heed to such idle Rumours, that she looked on the Author thereof as a meer Slanderer and Incendiary employed to set the King of Scots and her at variance, or else having invented this Story to save his own Life. The Business she order'd to be smother'd up, and would not have Thomas executed, for fear of drawing any unhandsome Reflections upon the King; because Calumnies against crown'd Heads find too easy Credit with the Vulgar.

Reports against the King of Scots.

By Valen. Thomas.

Not credited.

In the midst of these Reports, the Queen sent the King these Heads of Reflection to entertain himself with, viz. Whether there was any Prince who had it in his power to do him more Prejudice or Service than herself? Whether he had receiv'd greater Instances of Kindness and Generosity from any other? Whether he could think of any that had fewer Turns to serve upon him than herself, who desired nothing at his hands, more than to promote the Honour of Religion, and regard his own Interest and Concernment? The latter part of the Advice he closely follow'd. For, to confute and lay asleep these kind of Forgeries, there were several Instruments

1598. Ann. 41.

Books written in the King's Favour.

ſtruments employ'd thro' all England and Ireland, to excite Peoples good Inclinations towards him, by ſaying very great things of his Steadineſs to Religion, and by applauding the Wiſdom, Juſtice and Clemency of his Adminiſtration. There were likewiſe ſeveral Books diſperſed to aſſert his Title to the Succeſſion of the Crown of England, (which had been oppoſed by one John Colvil, an ungrateful Scotchman, tho' he ſoon after wrote his Recantation) as alſo to make out that his admiſſion to the Throne would be more commodious for both Kingdoms, than the ſetting up of any other Title, and that for theſe Reaſons: 'Becauſe his Title was founded upon the firmeſt 'Right; as he was a King already, becauſe it 'would enlarge the Kingdom of England by the 'addition of Scotland, a thing ſo much and often 'deſired; becauſe it would be a means to put an 'end to the Wars of Ireland and Spain; becauſe 'it would open a free Trade and Commerce; 'as he was moreover a Father of Children, 'which are the main Props and Supports of a 'Government; and had a Strength ſufficient to 'defend himſelf and his Subjects; and laſtly, 'becauſe he had the Love and Reſpect of all the 'Princes of Chriſtendom.' Others endeavour'd to ſhew at the ſame time the miſerable Ends of Uſurpers, and ſuch as adher'd to or aſſerted their Titles, particularly of Richard Nevil Earl of Warwick, who lifted Edward IV, into the Throne; and of the Duke of Buckingham, who put the Crown on Richard III's Head; and to urge the Queen to nominate and declare a Succeſſor, ſuch Expreſſions as theſe were ſcatter'd here and there in the abovemention'd Papers: 'That 'tis 'not in the power of Princes to rob their neareſt 'Kinſmen of the Crown: That Kingdoms are 'lineal Rights, and convey'd by Deſcent: That 'the native Rights of Children cannot be vacated by their Parents Act of Diſinheriting, nor 'transferr'd by Parliament to one more remote 'in Blood. Foraſmuch as God Almighty did not 'ſpare the Iſraelites, but gave them over for 'a Spoil, becauſe in contempt of the Houſe of 'David, they made Jeroboam, the Son of Nebat, 'their King; it appear'd that the Alienation of 'a Crown from the next Succeſſor was repugnant to the Laws of God as well as Man. As 'thoſe who wait for the Reverſion of a Crown, 'ought to expect with Modeſty and Patience the 'determin'd Period of thoſe who poſſeſs it, let 'it be as long as Providence ſhall think fit; ſo 'are the preſent Poſſeſſors obliged to give their 'Succeſſors ſome kind of Aſſurances, that their 'Expectations are not precarious, left between 'fond and diſappointed Hopes on the one hand, 'and repeated Demands and Sollicitations on 'the other, both Parties happen to be tired 'out, and ſcarce to know which are to complain firſt.'

Baſilicon Doron, written by King James.

But theſe Books were nothing to one put out under the Title of Baſilicon Doron, and wrote by the King to his Son; deſcribing, in a moſt accurate Stile and Method, the Duty of a well-accompliſh'd Prince. 'Tis ſcarce credible how much this Piece made him reſpected and beloved, and how great Hopes and Expectations were hereupon conceived of him. Queen Elizabeth's Opinion of this Matter I could never learn; but this I am aſſur'd of, that the general Method ſhe took to allay and qualify the Cares of her Crown, was to write or read ſomething every Day. She had ſome time before tranſlated Saluſt de Bello Jugurthino, and now ſhe was taken up in rendring into Engliſh the greateſt part of Horace de Arte Poetica, and a little Book of Plutarch's de Curioſitate, and all under her own Hand; tho' at the ſame time the Rebellion in Ireland was grown to a formidable Height, as I ſhall make appear, when I have paid what is due to the Memory of thoſe Gentlemen of moſt Note who died this Year. They were but three in all, beſides the Lord-Treaſurer Burleigh already mention'd; but they were Perſons of that Learning and Worth, which the World has with great Juſtice repreſented them.

1598. Ann. 41.

The Death of Dr. Stapleton.

The firſt was Dr. Thomas Stapleton, born in Suſſex, and brought up in New-College in Oxford, and he was likewiſe Ordinary-Profeſſor of Divinity and Polemicks in the Univerſity of Doway; for in the Beginning of Queen Elizabeth's Reign he went over to the Netherlands, out of the ſingular Zeal he bore to the Catholick Religion, where his publick Lectures and Writings got him a very great Reputation.

Dr. Coſins.

The next was Richard Coſins, a Cambridge-man, Doctor of Laws, and Dean of the Arches, who purchaſed himſelf a conſiderable Name by the Piece he publiſhed in Defence of the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction.

Spenſer.

The laſt was Edmund Spenſer, born at London, and a Student in Cambridge, who had ſo happy a Genius for Poetry, that he outwent all the Poets before him, not excepting his Fellow-Londoner, Chaucer himſelf; but through a Fate common to that Fraternity, he was always poor, tho' he had been Secretary to the Lord Grey, Lord-Deputy of Ireland. For he had ſcarce fix'd himſelf in his new Retirement, and had got a little Leiſure to purſue his Studies, but the Rebels rifled and threw him out of Houſe and Home, ſo that he return'd into England in a bare Condition, where he died not long after, and was interr'd in Weſtminſter not far from Chaucer, at the Earl of Eſſex's Charge. His Hearſe was attended by the Gentlemen of his Faculty, who caſt into his Tomb ſome Funeral Elegies, and the Pens they were wrote with.

The Fort at Blackwater beſieged.

The Rebellion raged in Ireland this whole Year: For tho' Tir-Oen had procured his Pardon under the Great Seal of England, having begged and obtained it at the Earl of Ormond's Hands by a well-diſſembled Submiſſion; yet did he ſurprize and ſeize on the Fort at Blackwater. The Lieutenant General of the Army (there being at preſent no Lord-Deputy) ſingled out ſome choice Troops, and ſent them to raiſe the Siege. They conſiſted of thirteen Companies of Foot, under Sir Henry Bagnal, Tir-Oen's profeſſed Enemy. On the 14th of Auguſt they form'd themſelves into three Bodies, and march'd from the Camp near Armagh: The Van was led by the Marſhal himſelf and Percy, the main Body by Cosby and Thomas-Maria Wingfield, and the Rear was brought up by Cuin and Billing: The Horſe were under the Conduct of Calliſthenes Brook, Charles Montacute, and Flemming.

Engliſh routed by Tir-Oen.

They had ſcarcely march'd a Mile over ſome little Aſcents, and in ſcatter'd Parties, at too great a diſtance from one another, with a marſhy Plain on one hand, and Woods on the other, but Tir-Oen, out of the inveterate Spleen he bore againſt the Marſhal, attack'd his Party very briskly; and having ſlain him as he fought amongſt the thickeſt of his Enemies, ſoon ſurrounded and vanquiſhed that ſmall Body of Men with his unequal Number, whilſt in the mean time they were not obſerved by their Friends that followed behind, by reaſon of an Hill which was between them. At the ſame inſtant the Gunpowder took fire in the middle Battalion, and blew up and maimed ſeveral Perſons; and Cosby, who was ſent to rally the remaining part of the Vanguard, received a total Defeat. However, they were brought off by Montacute, tho' with great Difficulty and Danger. Wingfield returned with the 1598. Ann. 41. Rear to Armagh, as soon as he found the Powder began to fail; and thus did Tir-Oen triumph over his biggest Enemy, and the English Forces at the same time: 'Tis most certain, they never receiv'd a more absolute Defeat, since they first set Foot in Ireland; for there were slain 13 Stout Captains, and 1500 Common Soldiers, who were shamefully knock'd on the Head, as they were flying or skulking about the Fields: They that escap'd, blam'd the want of Experience in their Commanders, not any Defect of Courage in themselves (a very Modish Excuse, it seems, at that time): Nor, to say the Truth, were the Officers altogether excusable, especially for marching at that distance from their Ranks, (clean contrary to the Discipline of the Field,) and against an Enemy too, that always fight in Crouds, and Conquer by main Strength, rather than by Art, Conduct or Courage: Soon after, the Fort at Blackwater surrendred; the Garrison, who had held out to the utmost, and were now almost starv'd, despairing of any manner of Succour or Relief.

Rear

This Victory was of great Consequence to the Rebels, for it furnish'd them with Arms and Provisions, and got Tir-Oen such a mighty Name, all the Kingdom over, that he was look'd on as the Saviour of the Kingdom, and the Patron of the Common Liberty; and valued himself on that Score as highly as his greatest Flatterers could do. All Munster began now to revolt of a sudden, not so much, 'tis probable, from any great Hopes they had conceiv'd upon Occasion of the late Victory, as out of a rooted Enmity to the English Planters and Labourers; who had been settled upon the Forfeited Lands, after the Earl of Desmond's Rebellion, and in Expectation of being Protected at least, if the Success did not answer. For 'twas grown now a most pernicious Fashion in Ireland, for Rebels and Malefactors to be allow'd the purchasing of Protections, and Instruments of Indemnity, with the very Money which they had got together by Rapine and Plunder.

Munster revolts.

To promote and encourage this Defection Tir-Oen sent into Munster Ouny-Mac-Rory, Og-more, and Tyrell, (the latter an Englishman, but a mortal Enemy to his Country) with a 1000 Men to plunder and ravage the Country. Sir Thomas Norris, President of the Province, advanc'd against him with a pretty good Army, as far as Kilmalock, but perceiving that the Irishmen that serv'd under him, were projecting a Revolt, and that the new Planters from England could not furnish out above 200 Men, and those without proper Arms, he dispers'd his Forces and retir'd to Cork: Which the Rebels understanding, got together a Pack of Rascally Fellows, who flock'd in to them from all Parts, and began to waste and pillage the Country, and to set Fire on the Castles and Houses of the English Farmers all about, and to slay and murther all that came in their way; a Thing they could not so easily have done, had the first Undertakers of those Lands stock'd them with a full Number of Planters, and as well provided as their Contract had oblig'd them. The Rebels taking heart upon these Successes, proclaim'd James Fitz-Thomas, a most vitious and immoral Liver, but a Kinsman of the Earl of Desmond's, Heir of that Title and Dignity, but with this Limitation, that he should still be Vassal to O-Neal, i. e. to the Earl of Tir-Oen: He, it seems, was now so puffed up with his good Fortune, that he boasted of his Conquests, in a Letter to the King of Spain, and intreated him withal, that if there went about any Reports of his Transacting a Peace with the English, He would give no Credit to them, for he had hardned himself against any Propositions of that Kind, whatever Appearance of Convenience or Advantage they brought with them, as being fully resolv'd to keep his Word and Faith with the King of Spain. Nevertheless, he was at the same time, playing his old Game, and Treating by Letters and Messages full of Trick and Dissimulation, about a Surrender to the Lord Lieutenant; but the Conditions he requir'd were most unreasonable.

Munster wasted and plundered.

Sir Richard Bingham was now pitch'd on, as the Person most capable to tame the Insolence of the Grand Rebel; forasmuch as his Courage, and good Fortune had been already approv'd against the Malecontents in Ireland. He is now therefore sent back thither in the Quality of Marshal of Ireland, and General of Leimster, who had been, but a little while before, turn'd out of his Government of Connaught, (upon some Complaints made of his extream Severity) and sent for into England, and there imprison'd on that Account; but he died at Dublin soon after his Arrival: He was a Gentleman of an Ancient and Noted Family in Dorsetshire, but more Eminent for his Experience and Behaviour in the Camp, For he was a Soldier at St. Quintin's, at Conquet in Bretaign, in the Hebrides, at Leith in Scotland, in the Isle of Candie against the Turks, and likewise in France and the Netherlands; besides the good Services which I have already mention'd to have been perform'd by him in Ireland.

Sir Rich. Bingham sent again into Ireland.

His death.

The Fourty Second Year of her Reign. 1599.

The State of Ireland was at this Time, next to desperate; for the whole Nation almost was up in Arms, some pretended they were abus'd and ill treated by the Garrison-Soldiers; others, the great Fear they were in, from the several opposite Factions, which were now grown very prevalent: Some again were stirr'd up by the good Success of the Rebels, and others were provok'd, because they were left defenceless, and lay expos'd to the Robberies and Insults of Thieves and Villains: Some the Priests cajol'd into Mutiny, and some were led into it, through a false Report, spread about by the Head of the Faction, that the Queen was absolutely resolv'd to make a Conquest of Ireland, and to cut off, and destroy them Root and Branch.

The desperate Condition of Ireland.

'Twas therefore closely debated in England, who was the fittest Person to employ, in order to suppress this Rebellion. The Queen and most of the Council were for Charles Blunt, Lord Montjoy: But the Earl of Essex dropt an Hint, that all the Experience Montjoy had, as to Martial Affairs, was owing to his having once had a Commission in the Low-Countries, and a Second time in Bretaign: That he was moreover a Person of a very slender Estate, and as narrow an Interest, and minded Books too much, to attend the Government: That Ireland requir'd a Person of the First Quality, and One, who being Considerable for Honour, Interest and Estate, might make himself acceptable to the Soldiers, upon which account, an old General would be the most suitable Deputy; which was a broad sign that he thought none so proper as himself: Hereupon the Queen resolv'd to make him Lord-Deputy of Ireland, and General of the Army. This he slightly refus'd at first, and desir'd Her Majesty to think on some Abler Person, for a Charge of that Importance; Though at the same Time he had an Objection ready, against any Person she should have Named: Nay he carried himself at such Rate, as made his Adversaries believe he aim'd at nothing so much as the having an Army at his beck, and engaging the Soldiery to his Interest;

A Consultation about a Lord-Deputy.

The Earl of Essex privately seeks the Place.

But slightly refus'd it.

He is suspected of ambitious Designs.

1599. Ann. 42.

tereft; fo that fome Perfons, obferving the eagernefs and warmth of his Purfuits, were apprehenfive that he had fome dangerous Project in his Head, efpecially fince he treated the Queen with more Infolence than before, as if he had forgot the many Favours fhe had heap'd upon him: And to increafe the fufpicion, his Creatures began to make a great Noife about his Defcent, as if he was of the Royal Family of the Scots, by the Eldeft Daughter of Alan of Galloway, (who at the fame time was not of the Blood-Royal,) and Allied likewife to that of England, by Cecily Bourchier his Great-Grand-Mother, who was defcended from Thomas of Woodftock, the Youngeft Son of King Edward III, and alfo from Richard Earl of Cambridge: Upon which account, they pretended that he had a fairer Title to the Crown of England, than any his Corrivals, whofe Pretenfions Doleman had overthrown (except only the Infanta of Spain's Title) in a Book dedicated to the Earl of Effex: Nor was it enough, for them to cry up the Greatnefs of his Extraction, without running Extravagant Encomiums upon his Courage, his Prudence, his Piety, &c. Thefe Particulars were urg'd, to his difadvantage, with all poffible Malice and Application, by fuch as were very willing to get rid of him, fo that they were for lending a Spur to an Ambition, which rather wanted a Bridle, and fill'd his Head with fine Notions of a lafting Fame from Pofterity, and the prefent Love and Veneration of the People; They therefore intreated him to exprefs that Real and Affectionate Regard, he had ever born to his Country, by accepting this Honourable Employment, towards the Difcharge of which, they affur'd him of the utmoft Services that lay in their Power: But whilft thefe fmooth Tongu'd Adverfaries, were beftowing upon him fuch high and lofty Commendations, and raifing a mighty Expectation of him in the Minds of Men; They were in the mean time ufing all Arts to undermine him, as knowing well, that the vehemency of his fpirit would confpire with their endeavours to ruin and undo him, and that there was not any likelier Method to trip up the Heels of an afpiring Man, than to pufh him upon an Office he was altogether unfit for: To be fhort, as quick and penetrating a Perfon as he was, he either did not, or would not perceive the bottom of their Aims, as long as he thought no Employment too big for his grafp, and his Friends or Flatterers fupported him in that Opinion. Hereupon he was, to the general fatisfaction, made Lord-Deputy of Ireland, with an unlimited Commiffion to carry on, or make End of the War, as he fhould think fit, and he likewife extorted from the Queen, the farther Liberty of Pardoning Crimes of High Treafon, and if occafion were, to Tir-Oen himfelf: This was an Authority, which in all other Patents Granted to former Lord-Deputies, had been limited in thefe Words, Treafons touching Our Perfon, Our Heirs and Succeffors excepted: But it was a prudent Part in him, to fecure this Privilege, becaufe the Lawyers tell us, That all manner of Rebellions touch the Perfon of the Prince.

Effex made Lord-Deputy of Ireland.

He had an Army affign'd him, as large as he could wifh, and fuch an one as Ireland had not feen before, confifting of 16000 Foot, and 1300 Horfe; and it was afterwards made up 20000. Indeed he could defire nothing but what the officious Treachery of his Enemies was ready to procure for him; and the better to trepan this unfufpecting Gentleman, they took care to fet Spies upon every Action and Expreffion which pafs'd from him, and they were fure to fix fcurvy and ill-natur'd Gloffes upon whatever they obferv'd. His Inftructions (not to mention fuch as were lefs material, as the Conferring the Honour of Knighthood on none but Worthy Perfons, &c.) were chiefly to purfue the Ring-Leader of the Faction, Tir-Oen, and to hem him in if poffible, by placing Garrifons at Lough-Foile and Balifhannon: This was what himfelf had urg'd, as a very neceffary Point, and he had often charg'd the former Lord-Deputies and Norris with his neglect, alfo with protracting the War, by allowing fuch frequent Parleys with the Enemy. A Proclamation was difpatch'd into Ireland beforehand, Declaring: 'That the Irifh Rebels had fo long 'abus'd the Queen's Clemency, that fhe was 'now conftrain'd to make ufe of Her Power, 'to curb and fubdue them: But fhe was fo far 'from defigning to deftroy them, that fhe never 'admitted one Thought to that Purpofe, nor 'had fhe any Reafon for it; becaufe the much 'greater Part of the Nobility and Gentry, con- 'tinu'd firm to their Duty and Allegiance: As 'for thofe Rebels who fubmitted themfelves, 'She promis'd them Mercy, but as for thofe 'who continu'd obftinate, Death was what they 'ought to expect: To this Purpofe fhe had 'made choice of the Earl of Effex, as a proper 'Inftrument to difpenfe Pardon or Punifhment 'in Her Name: Forafmuch as his Conduct and 'Courage, his Fidelity and Prudence, had dif- 'cover'd themfelves upon feveral Occafions.'

An Army appointed him.

1599. Ann. 42.

A Proclamation fent into Ireland.

About the End of March, the Earl of Effex fet forward for Ireland, and was accompanied out of London with a fine Appearance of Nobility and Gentry, and the moft chearful Huzza's of the Common People: But the Weather happen'd to be Rainy, and a Storm of Thunder went before the Shower. The Wind prov'd contrary to him and obftructed his Paffage, but at laft he arriv'd fafe in Ireland; where having receiv'd the Sword, according to Form, he immediately made the Earl of Southampton General of the Horfe, clean contrary to his Inftructions, and through the Perfuafions of fome of the Queen's Council there, who lov'd their own Intereft too well, he advanc'd his whole Army againft a contemptible Handful of Mutineers, in the Province of Munfter, and quite neglected the Grand Leader of the Rebellion, and all this without the Queen's Cognizance. He feiz'd on Cahir-Caftle, belonging to Edmund Butler, Baron of Cahir, which being incompafs'd by the River Swire, prov'd a convenient Harbour for the Rebels; And infus'd a ftrange Terrour into the Minds of the Inhabitants, by forcing the Rebels into the Woods and Thickets, and driving away vaft Herds of Cattle. However a Party of the Englifh were fhamefully defeated, through the Cowardice of fome, who were under the Command of Henry Harrington, the Principal of whom, he took care to punifh as they deferv'd. He did not return till the middle of July, by which time, his Men were harafs'd and weakn'd to fome Purpofe, and the Army in a moft pitiful Condition. Befides, the Earl himfelf was much diffatisfied at the Queen's having, in the mean time, beftow'd the advantagious Place of Mafter of the Wards, upon Sir Robert Cecil, whereas he had a mind to it himfelf. The Queen was as little pleas'd with Effex's Conduct, through which fo many Men had been thrown away; and when fhe urg'd him to purfue Tir-Oen, who was then in Ulfter, He wrote Her word, that blame ought to lie on the Irifh Council, to whofe long and thorough Experience in the Affairs of that Country, he could not but readily fubfcribe; But he promis'd withal, to make the beft of his way for Ulfter. Upon the heels of this Exprefs he difpatch'd another, acquainting the Queen that he was oblig'd to march out of the way, to Ophalie, a Country near Dublin, to quell the O-Conors O-Moils, who were

The Earl of Effex fets forward for Ireland.

He leads his Army to Munfter.

A Party of Englifh defeated.

Effex difcontented.

1599. Ann. 42.

were up in Arms there; and these he suppress'd with very little Trouble.

Upon his Return he found his Army in so lamentable a Plight, that he was forc'd to press for a new Supply of Men, to attend his Ulster Expedition; and got the Hands of the Irish Council to favour his Demand: He was now fully resolv'd to turn his Forces upon Tir-Oen, and so order'd Sir Coniers Clifford, the Governour of Connaught, to march towards Belick with his Light-Horse, and so put the Rebels Forces into disorder, whilst he fell upon them in another Part; Clifford immediately dispatch'd away with 1500 Men, fatigu'd as they were with a long March, and slenderly provided with Powder, towards the Curlew-Hills, when having pass'd the greatest part of them, the Rebels attaqu'd them unawares, being led on by O-Rork, the Son of him who was hang'd, as was before noted: The English easily repuls'd them at first and continu'd their March; the Rebels follow'd them, and perceiving that their Powder fell short, they charg'd them afresh and put them to flight; for they were too much harass'd by their long March, to make any great opposition: Clifford himself, with Sir Alexander Ratcliff of Ordsal, and several old Soldiers beside, were slain upon the Spot.

Clifford slain.

In the mean time, the Recruits which the Lord-Deputy requir'd, were rais'd in England, and sent over; but in a very few Days, he sent the Queen Word, that nothing more could be done this Year, beside marching with 1300 Horse and 300 Foot to the Confines of Ulster.

Assoon as he had got thither, Tir-Oen shewed himself and his Men, at some distance, for a Day or two, upon the Hills, and then sent Hagan to desire a Parley with the Lord-Deputy. He refus'd it, and sent Tir-Oen word, that if he would he might speak with him the next Day, at the Head of his Army: There happen'd then a small Skirmish, and after 'twas over, an Horse-man belonging to Tir-Oen's Party, cryed out as loud as he could, that the Earl had more a mind to a Parley than to fight, but did not intend however, that the Conference should be held between the two Armies.

Tir-Oen asks a Parley.

The next Day, as the Lord-Deputy was marching forward in good Order, Hagan met him, and acquainted him that Tir-Oen desir'd a Peace, and threw himself upon the Queen's Mercy, humbly desiring to be heard in the mean time, which if he would please to Grant, he would be sure to attend his Excellency at the Ford of a River, not far off, called Balla Clinch, lying near to Louth, the Principal Town of the County. The Lord-Deputy sent some Persons before, to take a View of the Place; they found Tir-Oen there, and he assur'd them, that though there was an high Tide at that time, yet they might very well hear one another cross the River, whereupon the Lord-Deputy came down alone, after having placed a Troop of Horse upon the next Hill: Tir-Oen rode his Horse up to the Belly, and saluted the Lord Deputy with great respect, who was on the opposite Bank; and they spent near an Hour in Conference, not one Person being admitted to hear them.

A Conference between him and the Lord-Deputy.

An Hour or two after, Con, the Base Son of Tir-Oen, followed the Lord-Deputy, and in his Father's Name, requested an Interview, and some Men of Quality on both sides to be present at it. The Lord-Deputy agreed to it, provided there were not above Six in Number. At the Day appointed, Tir-Oen appear'd at the Ford with his Brother Cormack, Mac-Gennys, Mac-Guire, Mac-Cowley, Henry Ovington, and O-Quine; The Lord-Deputy came thither soon after with the Earl of Southampton, Sir George Bourchier, Sir Warham St. Leger, Sir Henry Danvers, Sir Edward Wingfield, and Sir William Constable; All which Persons Tir-Oen saluted with very great Civility, and after the exchange of a very few Words, 'twas thought convenient that Commissioners should be appointed to treat of a Peace the next Day: And 'twas agreed between them, that there should be a Cessation of Arms, from Six Weeks to Six Weeks, and so on successively, to commence from that Day, and to continue till the First of May: However both Parties were to be at liberty to renew the War, upon giving Fourteen Days Notice, and if any of Tir-Oen's Party, dissented from these Proposals, he left him altogether to the Management of the Lord-Deputy.

A Second Parley.

During these Transactions, the Letter, which I mention'd a little before, was deliver'd to the Queen by Henry Cuff; by which assoon as Her Majesty understood that the Earl had done just nothing in so long a Time, with so brave an Army, and at so vast an Expence, nor was like to perform any Thing considerable that Year, the Queen was much surpriz'd at it, and could not forbear blaming his Conduct, as rash and precipitant, beside the slight and disrespect he had shewn to Herself: However that was, she was heard to say, (upon what ground of suspicion I cannot determine) That Essex had something else in his Head, than to do much service to his Queen or Country, in that Government: Nevertheless she would not consent to recal him, (as some perswaded Her) as conceiving it a Piece of Folly indeed, to provoke him at a Time when he had the Sword in his Hand, considering She had once incens'd him already, and then invested him with a dangerous Authority: But She wrote to him and Her Council in Ireland, to this Effect: 'That She could not sufficiently admire, why the Lord-Deputy had lost so much Time, and fram'd so many Excuses and Delays, instead of doing some considerable Service against the Rebels, for that, when he was in England, he thought it most adviseable to attack Tir-Oen in the first place, and had made, several Promises in his Letters, that he would do so: She therefore demanded the Reason, why he had, contrary to his most deliberate Opinion, undertook those Expeditions in Munster and Ophalie, which had prov'd every way so detrimental, without acquainting Her with any part of the Design beforehand, whereas had she been consulted in the Case, she would have absolutely Countermanded it: If his Army was now shatter'd and weakn'd, why did he not pursue the Enemy, when it was in a sounder Condition? If it was not convenient in the Spring to carry the War into Ulster, certainly the Summer and Autumn were not to be neglected; for some time or other of the Year could not but answer his Design: The Queen at length foresaw, that the Nation was like to be drain'd and squeez'd by unreasonable Expences, and that she should be foully reflected on by Foreigners, for the bad Conduct of this War, and that whoever wrote the History of Her Reign, would transmit this Truth to After-Ages: That She, for her Part, had left nothing uneffected, for the preservation of Her Kingdom of Ireland; But that Essex on the contrary, had done all he could to lose it, unless the War were manag'd at another rate hereafter, than hitherto it had been: She therefore roundly charg'd both Him and the Council of that Kingdom, to take a more circumspect Care of the Government, and not to run into wild and preposterous Measures, upon the Bias of naughty and corrupt Counsels: She likewise commanded them to give Her an Account of the

The Q. disoblig'd by the L. Deputy.

Her Letter to him and the Council.

1599. Ann. 42. 'the State of the Kingdom from that time, and 'to provide against such mischievous Consequences for the future.'

The Lord-Deputy was much incens'd by these Letters, and could not well digest some other Matters with which the Queen had upbraided him to the quick; one of which was, That he had not, according to her Orders, displaced the Earl of Southampton from being General of the Horse: For, it seems, the Queen was offended at Southampton for marrying Elizabeth Vernon, Daughter to the Earl of Essex's Aunt, without her Permission, which Men of Quality used to ask in such cases. But that which nettled him most of all was, the Queen's having made Sir Robert Cecil Master of the Wards, as I hinted before. He began for these Reasons to grow cloudy and discontented, and fell at last upon this unhappy and unwarrantable Project, to return into England with a select Party of Men, and there to endeavour the reducing his Adversaries under his Power by force of Arms; a Design which he perswaded himself he should find enough to assist him in, either out of Respect to him, or Fondness for Change and Innovation. But the Earl of Southampton, and Sir Christopher Blunt, who had married his Mother, dissuaded him from this Attempt, as carrying the face of a barbarous, wicked and detestable Design.

Essex discontented.

Forms dangerous Designs.

Whether the Queen had any private Intelligence of this I cannot tell; but this is most certain, that upon a flying Report, which People appear'd willing enough to believe, of a Spanish Fleet's being prepar'd, there were 6000 well-disciplin'd Foot-Soldiers rais'd in London, 3000 of which were to guard the Queen's Person, and the rest to be ready upon any Emergency; and a greater Number was order'd to be levied in the Countries of the briskest and stoutest Fellows that could be found. The Command of the whole Army was given to Charles Howard Earl of Nottingham, Lord-High-Admiral of England, with the Character of Commander in Chief; and his Commission extended as well to foreign Enemies, as Malecontents at home. But in a few Days these Forces were disbanded again.

Forces rais'd in England.

In a Month's time the Lord-Deputy came over to England in great haste, and when he was least thought of, being accompanied by some of his best Friends, viz. the Earl of Southampton, who was remov'd from being General of the Horse, the Baron of Dunkellin, Sir Christopher St. Lawrence, the Baron of Houth's Son, Sir Henry Danvers, who was not yet recover'd from a desperate Wound he had receiv'd, Sir Henry Docwray, and some other Commanders, besides some other Gentlemen of his Houshold, who dispos'd of themselves several ways as soon as they arriv'd. The Earl went on to Nonsuch (where the Queen then was) with six Persons only in his Retinue, on purpose to acquaint her with the State of Ireland. The Lord Grey of Wilton, one of his most inveterate Adversaries, overtook him on the Road, and pass'd by him without any Compliment. And whereas Essex was jealous lest he should do him some ill Office at Court, and Sir Thomas Gerard had requested him to the contrary, tho' to no purpose, St. Lawrence offer'd his Service to take him off by the way, and to dispatch the Secretary in the Court; but the Earl abhorr'd so base an Action, and would not agree to it. But made haste enough to present himself on his Knees before the Queen in her Privy-Chamber, early in the Morning, and when her Majesty least dreamt on him. She entertain'd him with some Marks of Grace and Favour, tho' not with that Freedom he used to find. She order'd him to his Apartment, and there to continue; for he had disobliged her before, and had now given her a fresh Provocation, by leaving Ireland without her permission, and for clapping up a Truce which might at any time be broken at fourteen Days warning; whereas he might have made an entire and final Composition with the Rebels, and was impower'd to give them a general Act of Indemnity.

Essex returns to England.

Visits the Queen.

When the Council demanded the Reasons of his making such a Truce, his Answer was, 'That Tir-Oen relied so much on his Forces, that he 'utterly rejected all Conditions of Peace, unless 'a general Amnesty were granted to all the 'Rebels, the Irish restor'd to their Estates, at 'that time possess'd by the English, and the free 'Exercise of the Romish Religion allow'd of all 'over the Kingdom.' And these Conditions he persuaded the Queen to agree to. But when every-body disapprov'd these Terms, as very unconscionable, and his sudden Return to England rais'd an universal Jealousy concerning him, which was increased by his Enemies at Court by all the Contrivances they could invent, the Queen thought fit to commit him to Custody; but made choice of the Lord-Keeper's House rather than any common Prison, that she might not tempt him to conclude himself an absolutely discarded Favourite. The Reason of his Confinement was the preventing any bad Influence which the corrupt Counsels of designing Men might have upon him, in reference to the drawing off his Duty and Allegiance yet farther. However he very much resented it, that so ill a Construction should be made of his returning into England with a small Number of his Friends; for I have seen a Writing under his Hand, wherein he had methodically rang'd all the Objections which he suppos'd would lie against him, viz. 'First, That he had run counter to his Instructions, by delaying his Expedition into Ulster, 'whereby he had lost his Opportunity, and exhausted the Queen's Treasure and Forces in 'the wrong Place. Then, That he had made 'a Truce directly to the Advantage of the Rebels: And lastly, That he had left the Country in a very unsettled Posture, contrary to the 'Queen's Orders, and with a parcel of Swordsmen at his heels, which was not allowable.'

Excuses his Proceedings.

He is confin'd.

Under the foregoing Objections he subjoin'd these Answers, 'Before my leaving Ireland, I left 'all things relating to the War in the same State 'and Posture in which they appear at present, 'in every Province respectively; and since that 'time, viz. for the space of nine Months, there 'hath no Inconvenience ensued. There can't 'be tolerable Ground for suspecting those who 'attended me into England; for besides that they 'were very few, their own Occasions oblig'd ''em to a speedy Return, and not above six of ''em came along with him to Court. Now was 'it possible any Harm should be done by such 'an handful of Men? It would have been as 'easy for me to have acted Ill, as to design Honesty, when I had the whole Kingdom of Ireland under my Command, and a good Army 'at my beck. Had I entertain'd any Thoughts 'of Revenge, I had no need to call in the Assistance of others; for he that values not his 'own Life, has the Lives of other Men in his 'own Custody: But I am not to learn whose 'Maxim that was, Vengeance is mine, I will repay. 'Must then so much Credit be given to Calumny 'and Abuse, that my Return to England must 'needs render me a suspected Person, when I 'have spent my Blood and Sweat in my Prince's 'Service, and wasted my Estate for her, and 'ask'd her Majesty's Pardon on my Knees? Sure 'I am,

Copy of a Paper wrote by the Lord-Deputy.

1599. *Ann.*42.

'I am, these kind of Suspicions do not consist 'with either Justice or Charity, unless there 'were better Grounds for them, especially when 'taken up against Persons whose Principles and 'Quality seem to privilege them from such 'Disadvantages. Besides, ought I to fall under a 'Jealousy of this nature, who have lost a Father 'and Brother in the Service of my Country? I, 'who have served her Majesty the space of thir-'teen Years out of thirty three, and have for se-'ven of them been a Privy-Councellor? I, that 'have incurred and suffered the worst Effects of 'some Mens Spleen and Ill-nature, purely for 'supporting Religion, and ministring what I 'could to the Queen's Safety, which they envy 'at their very Hearts? It is for my constant Loy-'alty and good Services, that I stand the Mark 'of my Adversaries Malice and Revenge; and 'to such a degree, that I cannot promise myself 'any Security any where but in this Kingdom, 'and that no longer than it shall please God to 'preserve her Majesty's Life?'

He refuses to be rescued.

Nor was he single in these Complaints, but found a great many to second him, and some too that endeavour'd to rescue him by Force from his Confinement, which he still countermanded, as desirous to preserve the Reputation and Character of a good Subject. But to return to the Affairs of Ireland.

Tir-Oen breaks the Truce

The Truce agreed on for six Weeks was scarce expir'd the second time, when Tir-Oen got together his dispersed Forces, and prepared to give his Country new Troubles. Hereupon the Council of the Kingdom sent Sir William Warren Kt. to demand the Reasons of this Breach of Contract: He made answer in a haughty manner, 'That he had not broken the Articles, because 'he had given fourteen Days notice that he 'would renew the War; and he had just cause 'to do so, since he understood the Lord-Deputy, 'the Earl of Essex, on whom his hopes of Pardon 'and Protection entirely center'd, was kept in 'Custody in England: And as for the Council 'of Ireland, he should have no manner of Re-'gard to them for the future, since they had 'dealt so unfaithfully by him already: That he 'could not at present renew the Truce, if he 'would, for he had sent O-Donel into Connaught, 'and others of his Party into other Places.'

Distracted State of Ireland.

In the mean while, Reports were spread among the Rebels, (and we may venture to guess that Tir-Oen was their Author) that England would soon be involved in new Disorders; and as for Ireland, it began to abound more and more with lewd and desperate Fellows; and the Native Irish began to assert their primitive Liberty and ancient Heraldry.

Those Englishmen that were stanch and honest, were entirely disheartned when they perceived the Queen's Money had been employ'd to so little purpose, and they complain'd one against another, that they were shut out from publick Offices and Employments, as much as if they were absolute Foreigners. In the mean time, Tir-Oen made boasting Pretences of asserting Religion and publick Liberty; the Rebels and Malecontents he every where protected, and gave them both Countenance and Assistance; and to keep them fix'd and steady, he used all Endeavours to beat down the Authority of the English in Ireland, the King of Spain having raised both his Vanity and Expectation, by sending him lately some Supplies of Ammunition, Money, and Provisions.

The Pope's Present to Tir-Oen.

The Pope likewise furnish'd him with a large stock of Indulgences, besides mighty Promises, and a Phœnix-Plume for Earnest; perhaps because Urban III, had formerly sent a Coronet of Peacocks Feathers to John the Son of Henry II, when he was appointed Lord of Ireland.

In the mean time some disaffected Persons were very lavish in the Earl of Essex's Commendations, and he was made not only the Theme of their Cabals, but by some the Eccho of their Pulpits too. There were likewise scandalous Libels dispersed by these Men, or some of the same Kidney, against her Majesty's Council, the Design being to wound her through their Sides, by insinuating, that they took little care of the Government, and altogether neglected the State of Ireland.

L. Keeper represents the Misconduct of the Lord-Deputy.

Hereupon, the Day after the End of Michaelmas-Term, when the Council met, as they used to do, in the Star-Chamber, the Lord-Keeper, after a short Premonition to the Nobility and Gentry to go down to their respective Seats in the Country, and maintain Hospitality among their Neighbours, and a Charge to such as were Justices of the Peace, to punish such as were the Breakers of it, and to restrain, as much as possible, the Disturbers of the publick Tranquillity: And after he had bestow'd a brisk Reprimand upon the Authors of scurrilous, abusive and dangerous Reports, he proceeded to declare how indefatigable her Majesty had been in promoting and recovering the Tranquillity of Ireland, how oddly and indirectly the Earl of Essex had managed himself in the Prosecution of the Rebels, and what unreasonable and (in respect to the Queen) dishonourable Terms he had made with Tir-Oen, who had hereupon took the Insolence to report, That he resolv'd in a little time to come over to England, and parcel out a good part of it for his own Share.

L. Treasurer seconds the Charge,

The Lord Buckhurst, who was made Lord-Treasurer in the Lord Burleigh's room (after some sharp Reflections upon the infamous and barefac'd Libels that were abroad) represented, how brave and well-regulated an Army had been sent into Ireland, and how compleatly furnished with all manner of Provisions; and likewise, that her Majesty had expended upon this War in six Months time, the Sum of 600000 Pounds, all which the Earl of Essex must own to be true.

And L. Admiral,

The Earl of Nottingham, Lord-Admiral, did likewise set forth, how the Queen had consulted Persons of the best Judgment and Experience, and who were very well acquainted with the State of Ireland, and were not to learn the Temper and Humour of the People of that Nation; and all these her Majesty had seriously advised with upon the Business of the Rebellion: That the major Part of them were of opinion, that Ulster was to be reduced in the very first place; that the Earl of Essex was of the same Mind, and had frequently said, That the young Branches of the Faction did not so much want lopping, as the Root did to be pulled up; but he was sorry to have occasion to say, that the Earl had acted clean contrary to his Sentiments. He affirmed moreover, that five of the Queen's Ships, which were sent into Ulster for present Service, lay six Months together in the Harbour to no purpose at all.

And the Secretary.

Secretary Cecil set forth, in the first place, her Majesty's extraordinary Care in the Defence and Security of her Kingdoms of England and Ireland, by forcing the French out of Scotland, by protecting the reform'd Religion in France and the Low-Countries, and defending Ireland from the Insults both of the Pope and the King of Spain; and that with so happy Success, that for seven Years before, there had not appear'd one single Rebel in Ireland; and the Queen likewise from thence received greater Revenues than her Father King Henry, her Brother King Edward, or her Sister Queen Mary, had done before her. He proceeded 1599. Ann. 42. afterwards to recount at large, how powerful an Army the Lord-Deputy had under his Command, and what a scandalous Defeat Harrington and Clifford suffer'd: Then, to answer the Cavils of some who pretended, that as absolute as the Earl of Essex's Commission was at first, yet 'twas afterwards retrench'd by private Orders from England, and other Instructions given that did not so well square with his own Sentiments; and that the Expedition into Munster, with the Neglect of Tir-Oen, were in compliance with the Advice of the Council of Ireland: He alledged, That his Authority was not any ways clipp'd or lessen'd, nor any new Orders given him, but what himself had approv'd and resolv'd on from the very beginning. For the Truth of which he appeal'd to the Earl of Essex himself, and produc'd those very Letters, wherein he endeavour'd to excuse his Miscarriage as to Munster: Whether he undertook that March in respect to his own Judgment, or that of the Irish Council, he must leave to God, the Searcher of Hearts, the said Council having given it under their Hands, that they were so far from persuading him to that Undertaking, that they did not in the least approve it: And whereas some Persons were for palliating his abrupt Return into England, he could not but own the Queen had, upon his earnest Request, given him leave to return upon any warrantable Occasion; but however, that she did afterwards expresly command him, upon his sending her an Account of the desperate Condition of Ireland, as he tender'd his Duty and Allegiance, not to return hither, till he had given her a satisfactory Account of what he had done in Ulster, and what Person he thought most proper to intrust with the Government in his absence. All these Directions he took not any notice of, but presumed to return into England, contrary to her Majesty's Command.

In the last place, he repeated the Articles which Tir-Oen insisted on, at a time when Success had bloated him up, of which I have already given some Account. He could not but lament the ill Conduct of that Affair, which Foreigners would not fail to turn to the Discredit of the English Nation, which had hitherto maintain'd so glorious a Character; besides the Dishonour it might reflect upon her Majesty, who had appeared so considerable in the Eyes of all the World: That this Procedure had moreover so flushed and encouraged the Rebels, that the next Day after the Earl of Essex's Return to the Court of England, Tir-Oen could not forbear using this Expression, That he did not question but he should in a little time see as surprizing a Change in England as any Age had produced, and that 'twould be his Turn then to appear there, and come in for a share with his Neighbours.

What Reasons he had to support himself in such Hopes, or how he came to the Intelligence of what related to the Earl of Essex, in a few Hours time, he was not, as he said, able to conjecture. Thus much Cecil.

As for what was said by others then present, I need not take notice, since all their Declarations were much to the same purpose. 'Tis now time to take leave of the Earl of Essex, who being in the Lord-Keeper's Custody, began to center his Thoughts upon Things of a Divine and Heavenly Concernment; and by the pious and devout Strain of several Letters which he wrote to his Friends under that Confinement, one might perceive that his Mind was unhinged from earthly Pursuits, and had bid a solemn Adieu to all worldly Satisfactions.

In the mean time Andreas of Austria, Son by the Lady Welsera to the Cardinal and Archduke Ferdinand, the Emperor Maximilian's Brother, and who acted as Vice-Governor of the Low-Countries, in the Absence of Albert of Austria, who was gone into Spain to concert Matters relating to his Marriage, employ'd Charles Landfranck and Hieronymo Comano, to negotiate a Peace between the Queen and Philip III, King of Spain. The Queen, for her part, shew'd no Aversion to it, provided the King of Spain would appoint a sufficient Commission to treat about it, and if the Confederate Provinces might some way find their Shares in it: For she sent back word, That she esteem'd it an unpardonable Crime to abandon them, or submit to Terms that might turn to their Prejudice, or her own Dishonour. However, this Proposal of a Treaty proved the occasion of some Jealousies and Misunderstandings between the States and the Queen, because there went about at the same time very confident Reports, that a new Armada was fitting out in Spain: But 'twas thought that this Blow was diverted by the Holland Fleet, which took the Isle and Castle of Canary much about that time, and likewise plunder'd the Isle of St. Thomas.

The Spaniard proposes Peace.

Nor were these Reports without Foundation; for there were several Gallies got ready in Spain, by the Directions of Frederick Spinola, a Genoese, who was Master of an Estate too big for a private Man: 'Twas he that persuaded the King of Spain, when he served him in the Low-Countries, to send some Gallies into Flanders. They were dispatched away under his Command, and cruizing along the Coasts of France, by the Advantage of those Etesian Winds, which in the Dog-Days blow generally from the N. W. in our Climate, they got into the Harbour of Sluse in Flanders, without being discover'd by the English and Holland Ships that lay ready to intercept them: For they went North about through the Channel; and whether they were driven by the Tide, or were not acquainted with those Parts, or were purely beholden to their Luck, it so happen'd, that they quite defeated the Hopes of the English and Dutch that waited for them. They were indeed strangely surprized at first at the Arrival of these Gallies, having found by Experience, in the Year 1545, when Francis I, attempted to no purpose the bringing of them thro' the Mediterranean to the Coasts of England, that the British Channel was too rough and boisterous to carry such flat-bottom'd Vessels. However, they became soon after formidable enough; for they were built by skilful Workmen, much in the Form of those Vessels which sailed as far as the Azores in the Year 1593, which was lookt on as a wonderful Performance. Indeed, they were able to endure a greater Sea than taller or bigger Ships; and were very serviceable in a Calm, being easily rowed about with Oars, as occasion required; whereas Vessels of greater Bulk, built at a great Expence, were good for nothing when the Wind fell, but to serve as Marks for the Enemies Shot.

Spanish Gallies brought into Flanders.

Much about this time, one Hill an Englishman was sent to the Queen from Charles, (intitled, By the Grace of God, the Hereditary Prince of the Swedes, the Goths and Vandals) to acquit him to her Majesty from some Aspersions he had fallen under, in being represented as an Abettor of Change and Innovation, and a Competitor with his Nephew Sigismond, King of Poland, for the Crown of Sweden. He requested her Majesty not to listen to such Reports, or the Authors of them, and to join her Endeavours with his for the Establishment of the true and orthodox Faith. The Queen vouchsafed him a publick Audience, and promptly answer'd him, 'That she heartily wish-' ed he might act faithfully by his Nephew, lest he,

Charles of Sweden endeavours to clear himself to the Queen.

1599. Ann. 42. 'he committed an Offence againſt the Laws of 'Nature, Juſtice and Relation, and appear'd to 'regard his Duty rather from Complaiſance than 'Principle.'

The death of Mr. R. Hooker. This Year did Richard Hooker quit this Life for a better. He was born in Devonſhire, a County that has produced the chiefeſt Wits, and from thence he removed to Corpus-Chriſti College. He diſcharged all the Duties, and had all the Virtues of a good Divine, being a Perſon of moſt exemplary Modeſty, to which he added an exact Temperance, and had made himſelf Maſter of ſeveral Parts of Learning; a Specimen of his good Senſe we have in his Books of Eccleſiaſtical Polity, which were written in Engliſh, but do very well deſerve a Tranſlation into a more univerſal Language.

1600. The Three and Fortieth Year of her Reign.

Doubtful Titles confirm'd. The Beginning of this Year the Queen employ'd about National Affairs; and that ſhe might not want Money under the vaſt Drain of it, which went to ſupport the Iriſh War, ſhe appointed Commiſſioners, for a certain Sum, to confirm ſuch of her Majeſty's Lands to the Poſſeſſors, as were of moſt doubtful Title: For, it ſeems, the Owners of them were miſerably peſter'd by a vexatious and chargeable ſort of Vermin, call'd Concealers. A Proclamation againſt exporting Gold and Silver. She likewiſe put out a Proclamation, commanding the Execution of thoſe Laws of Edward IV, Richard II, Henry IV, and ſome others, againſt the Exportation of Gold and Silver, either in Coin or Bullion; and ſhe ſeemed to be at preſent totally intent upon the Affairs of Ireland. Tir-Oen's Infolence. For Tir-Oen being ſtrangely elevated upon the Earl of Eſſex's Return, behaved himſelf as if he had been the abſolute Monarch of that Kingdom; and that he might blow up the Flame which he had kindled in Munſter by his perſonal Appearance there, he made a Journey thither in the Depth of Winter, under pretence of a religious Viſit to a piece of our Saviour's Croſs, which is pretended to be kept at St. Croſs's Monaſtery in Tipperary; and there he drew ſeveral Perſons in to ſhare in his Rebellion. He created James Fitz-Thomas, a Relation of James Earl of Deſmond, and already dubb'd an Earl by the Rebels, in good earneſt Earl of Deſmond; and advanced Florence Mac-Carty to the Title of Mac-Carty-More. Thoſe whom he moſt ſuſpected, he obliged to deliver Hoſtages, and ſent a pack of Villains to rifle ſuch as were in the Queen's Intereſt, with Mac-Guire at the Head of them, who was one of the prime Actors in the Rebellion: Maguire and St. Leger ſlain. But he happening by chance to meet with Sir Warren St. Leger Knight, received his Death's Wound from the other's Lance, and ran him thro' with the ſame Weapon.

Deplorable State of Ireland. The Rebellion being now got to an Height too great to be ſuppreſſed by the Earl of Ormond, who was appointed General of the Army, and Sir George Carew Treaſurer, (both of them Lords-Juſtices of Ireland) the Queen, who was always ſucceſsful in her Choices, in the Depth of Winter, and contrary to the general Expectation, was pleaſed to ſend over Charles Blunt Lord Montjoy into Ireland in Quality of Lord-Lieutenant, as judging him of a Temper as well qualified for Government as Duty. He arrived in Ireland in the Month of February with a ſmall Retinue, and without any Pomp or Buſtle, and found the Kingdom in a very declining and almoſt deſperate State; for Tir-Oen had gone the whole Iſland over without any Oppoſition, and paſſed as it were in Triumph from the remoteſt Part of Ulſter into Munſter, as I before obſerved. 'Twas a great Diſcouragement to all ſober Perſons, to obſerve the Government under ſo ſad a Declenſion, with ſcarce any Proſpect or Hope of Recovery; whilſt ill Men were pleaſed to find the Stream run in their own Channel, and expected to find their Account in the publick Diſorders; and there is no manner of queſtion but the Nobility ſtrove hard to revive their Liberty, which they complain'd had been ſo long dead and buried; and they were incited thereto by an Indulgence which Pope Clement VIII, ſent them (to uſe their own Phraſe) out of the Treaſury of the Church. The Pope encourages the Rebels by a Bull. Herein (to be as ſhort as I can) he beſtow'd, in the firſt place, great Commendations upon the Biſhops and Noblemen of Ireland, for having lent ſo powerful an Aſſiſtance to James Giraldine and John his Couſin-German, and lately alſo to his beloved Son Hugh, Prince O-Neal, Earl of Tir-Oen, Captain-General of the Catholick Army in Ireland; and then proceeds in words to this effect: 'We being willing to encourage 'you, your General and Soldiers in your Proceedings againſt the Hereticks, with all ſpiritual Bleſſings and Aſſiſtance, and that you may 'go on with the more Cheerfulneſs and Reſolution in aſſiſting the Expedition that is forming 'againſt them, to which we have been incited 'by the Example of our Predeceſſors, and relying 'upon the Mercy of Almighty God, and the Authority of his bleſſed Apoſtles St. Peter and St. Paul; we, I ſay, do graciouſly grant and beſtow 'in the Name of God to all and every of you 'that ſhall follow your General Hugh Earl of 'Tir-Oen, and his Army, in the Defence and 'Support of the Catholick Faith, and ſhall join 'themſelves with them in this Expedition, and 'aſſiſt them with their Advice and Friendſhip, 'Proviſion and Arms, with all things neceſſary 'to maintain the War, and by what other Services and Methods you are capable; and likewiſe to the ſaid Hugh our General, and all and 'every Soldier of his Army, upon the true and 'ſincere Repentance and Confeſſion of all reſpectively, and their Participation of the Holy 'Communion, full and plenary Pardon of all 'their Sins, in as ample a manner as was ever 'uſed to be granted by the Popes to ſuch as went 'to the Holy War againſt the Turks, for the Recovery of the Holy Land. Notwithſtanding, &c.

'Given at Rome at St. Peters under the Seal 'of the Fiſher, in the Ninth Year of our 'Popedom.

M. Veſtrius Barbianus.

L. Deputy marches againſt Tir-Oen. The Rebels, on purpoſe to terrify the new Lord-Deputy, were ſo preſumptuous as to ſound their Trumpets in the very Suburbs of Dublin: But he was not ſo eaſily daunted, being reſolv'd, if poſſible, to way-lay Tir-Oen as he return'd out of Munſter. Having therefore at a ſhort warning got together what Forces he could, (the ſtouteſt Men being then abſent in Munſter with the Earl of Ormond) he haſtned away into Fereal, to intercept and engage him: But Tir-Oen being inform'd of his Deſign, (for ſome of the Queen's Council were ſtill too much at his Devotion) prevented him by haſty Marches through difficult and unfrequented Roads. Upon the Lord-Deputy's Return to Dublin, he made it his chief Buſineſs to ſelect a Party of brave old Soldiers to ſhip away to Lough-Foil and Baliſhannon, near the Mouth of the Lake Erne, that ſo Tir-Oen might be ſhut in and ſurrounded on all Sides: He likewiſe took care to furniſh the Garriſons in Leaſe and Ophalie with freſh Supplies, which was a difficult and hazardous Undertaking, conſidering what a vaſt Number of Rebels were diſperſed thereabouts.

In

1600. Ann. 43.

In the Beginning of May, his Army advanced towards Ulster, on purpose to give the Rebels some Diversion on that side; whilst Sir Henry Dockwray settled a stronger Garrison at Lough-Foil, and Sir Matthew Morgan at Balishanon.

His March towards Ulster.

These two Persons arrived the same Month at Culmo, near the Mouth of Lough-Foil, with 4000 Foot and 200 Horse: Where having raised a Fort, and another at Ellogh, they came to Derry, Derry fortified.

a small City in a Peninsula of not above forty Acres compass; on one side 'tis for a great way encompassed by a River, and on the other, the Marshy Ground and Bogs render it inaccessible: In this Place were left the Ruins of a Monastery, a Bishop's Palace, of two Churches, and an old Castle. Here they built a Magazine and Places for their Stores, of Oaken Planks, and fortified the Town with rough Stone, which they picked up from the Neighbourhood, and out of the Rubbish of decay'd Buildings; and their Lime they made of Shells burnt to Powder.

Tir-Oen repulsed.

Tir-Oen was in the mean time kept in play by the Lord-Deputy; and every Skirmish proved so unlucky to him, that Fortune seemed to have changed Sides, and to force him upon his old Shifts, to retreat among the Bogs and Marshes. The Lord-Deputy having fixed these Garrisons, returned in the middle of June to Dublin; and demanded from England some Recruits of Provisions, Men, and Arms, in order to furnish a Garrison in Armagh, more on this side, that the Rebels might be by that means the more closely straitned and blocked up. Mean while he advanced towards Leafe, the common Retreat of the Leimster Rebels, where among others of the lewd Gang, he slew Ony-Mac-Rory-Og, the Chief of the Family of O-More, a Man of a desperate and daring Spirit, and the chief Author of the late Commotions in Munster: He then proceeded to spoil their Country, and drove the Rebels into the Woods and Thickets; so that few or none of them could shew their Heads in those Parts. As soon as the new Recruits arrived from England, tho' he was extremely straitned both for Money and Provisions, and the Air began to grow very cold in that Climate, the Sun having got beyond the Æquinox, he marched once more into Ulster, and went up the Streights of Mogbery, beyond Dundalk: This is looked on to be the most difficult and troublesome Pass, which Nature has made in that whole Kingdom, for it lies among Hills, Woods and Bogs, and all of them clog'd and barricado'd by the Rebels, with Ditches, Planks and Timber, and a sort of Pallisadoes, fill'd up with Stone and Turf, with great Art, and indefatigable Industry; beside which, the Waters were out, and made Travelling the more dangerous, by reason of some great and continued Rains, which had swollen the Rivers above their Banks. As soon as the Waters fell, the English manfully broke through all those Oppositions, and having put the Enemy to flight, and surmounted all Difficulties, the Lord-Deputy erected a Fort about eight Miles from Armagh (the Rebels having spoil'd and ransack'd all thereabouts): This he order'd to be call'd

A second March into Ulster.

Fort Mount-Norris built.

Mount-Norris, in memory of Sir John Norris, under whose Conduct he had learnt the Elements of War, and he made Edward Blany, a Person of good Courage and Resolution, Governour of it: By whose means the Malecontents in those Parts were afterwards severely punished, and at last totally suppressed: In his Return, he gave the Rebels a notable Defeat near Carlingford, where they had blocked up the Road; and several other Skirmishes passed, of which I shall take no notice. However there fell on the English Side, amongst a great many more, Dr. Latware, Chaplain to the Lord-Deputy, and his Secretary Cranmer, both of them Persons of great Learning, and upon that score, in singular Esteem with him.

1600. Ann. 43.

Leinster and Connaught [illegible]

The Lord-Deputy being now returned, and there happening something that made it necessary to defer Sir Matthew Morgan's Expedition to Balishanon till another Opportunity, Tir-Oen and the rest of the Rebels, advanced their whole Strength against Sir Henry Dockwray, and between frequent Skirmishes, and fraudulent and base Practices, they put him very hard to it; but for all that, his Courage and Bravery carried him safe thro' all Difficulties, and he went so far as to spoil the little Country of O-Caban, thro' the Assistance of Arthur O-Neal, the Son of Turlogh; he seized likewise on Dunalong in view of Tir-Oen, and placed John Bowles over that Garrison: And not long after he took Liffer-Castle, (to the great Regret of O-Donel) by the help of Neal-Garve of the Family of the O-Donels, whom he won to his Interest, by giving him some hopes of the Lordship of Tirconnel, to which he laid an Hereditary Claim: About this time a Spanish Ship arrived at Calebeg, with Money and Arms, and the Rebels flock'd to her as fast as possible, in hopes of a good Booty, leaving those Parts to be taken and possessed by the English Garrisons: On the other hand the Lord-Deputy, to lose no time, enter'd into the Glins, or Valleys in Leimster, in the very midst of Winter, and reduced Donel Spaniah, Phelim Mac-Pheoli, and the mutinous Clan of the O-Tools, of whom he received Hostages; he then advanced into Fereal, and drove Tirell, the best Soldier of this Rebel-Party, out of his Fastness (to use their own Term) that is, a marshy Place all over-run with Thorns and Briers; at last he got to Ulster, thro' many troublesome and winding Passages, and had the good Fortune to conquer still as he advanced.

Dockwray hard pressed by the Rebels.

Lord-Deputy arrives at Ulster.

The first Act he perform'd here, was to waste the County of Ferney, and kill the two Sons of Evar Mac-Cowley; after which, he sent Sir Richard Morrison to destroy the little Province of Fues. In Brenny he fix'd a Garrison, under the Government of Sir Oliver Lambert, and then moved away to Drogheda, and took into his Protection Turlogh Mac-Henry, a Grandee in Fues, Evar Mac-Cowley, O-Hanlon, who pretended himself to be Hereditary Standard-Bearer to the King in Ulster, together with several of the O-Raleis, and Mac-Mahons, who fell on their Knees, and tender'd him Hostages.

Sir George Carew does good Service in Munster.

Thus far did the Lord-Deputy Montjoy proceed the very first Year; and Sir George Carew made a Progress in Munster, equally successful, for he was lately made President of the Southern Province of Ireland; which was desperately harrass'd by a Rebellion, which the Titular Earl of Desmond had promoted through every Part of it: For in the first place, he so order'd the matter with the Commanders of the hired Troops from Connaught, (which they call Bownies) that when the Rebels had sent for them, he got Dermitz O-Conar out of the Country by a Wile, sent away Redmund a-Burgh, by giving some hopes of retrieving his ancient Estate, and dispatched Tirell, by alarming him with the Apprehension of being murder'd unawares. He moreover so dexterously fomented a Suspicion, he had before raised among the Rebels, by sham and counterfeit Letters, that they grew jealous, and ran away from one another: After this, he and the Earl of Twomond, his constant and inseparable Friend and Assistant, marched against them, took the Titular Earl, who was rescued afterwards by the Rebels, and either seized, or took by Capitulation, the Castles of Logher, Crome, Glan, Carickfoil, Corgrag, Rathmore, and Cabir.

Several Castles taken.

1600. Ann. 43.

bir. Sir Charles Wilmot, whom he had made Governour of Kerry, subdued Lixnaw, Castle Marny and Lisbuil, and Sir Francis Barkly took Glanemire. Captain Graam pursued the Titular Earl so close, that he was forced to quit the Province; and several Rebels were frighted into Submission, by his good and happy Success and fled to the Queen's Mercy and Protection; and amongst the rest, Florence Mac-Carty, a true Master of the Art of Dissembling, as most of them proved themselves upon this Occasion; for it was discover'd that a great many of them, sent away Priests to Rome to ask his Holiness's Pardon, for this Tergiversation, (a Term they used for their not persisting Rebels) and requested a Dispensation for not appearing in open Arms, whilst Matters remain'd in the present Posture: To be brief, the President, who had found that Province so miserably out of order upon his Entrance in April, managed Things with that Conduct, that by December, all Things were in a quiet Posture, and not one single Fort stood out against the Queen.

A new Debate concerning a Peace with Spain.

Whilst these Things were carrying on in Ireland, there was a Consultation held in England, about a Peace with Spain, and it was grounded on the very same Reasons I mention'd ann. 1598. The Archduke Albert, had made a Motion this way not long before, upon his Return from Spain with his Lady the Infanta, when his Holiness presented him with a consecrated Sword. And altho' the Queen had utterly refused to engage in a Defensive League with the King of Spain, as well as to deliver up the Cautionary Towns, or prohibit a free Trade with Holland and Zealand; Articles which he much insisted upon, nor would She be brought to yield the Point of Precedency to Spain; yet did both He and the French King press for a Peace by repeated Embassies, and indeed the King of Spain was foremost in the Request; for he began now to affect a Peace, not only from Temper and Inclination, but by the Advice and Direction of his Council: He knew indeed very well, that his Father before him was extremely desirous of settling a Peace with England, after he had made one with France; that he might have the Glory of leaving his Kingdoms to his Son, at a time when they were in a settled State of Peace and Tranquillity; and he was likewise persuaded, that such a Treaty would prove to the Advantage of the Catholick Cause, and turn to his own Profit and Convenience. Without all doubt, they entertained mighty Hopes at Rome (as I found by a certain Piece, written there about that time) that this would occasion a more favourable Treatment of the Roman Catholicks in England, who would be permitted upon their Return, to exercise their Religion with more Freedom, and disperse it to better Advantage. It was thought moreover, that this would conduce as much to his Honour, as the having discover'd a New World did to that of his Predecessors, and that he should find the more Respect and Observance, from the Petty Princes about him, when they found him disengaged from the Incumbrances of War, so that he might then sit and act as the Umpire and Moderator of all Europe. Nay that he would likewise prove a Gainer hereby, for by this means, the Estates of Holland and Zealand would be the sooner brought to Reason, and the Money be spared, which went every Year to maintain his Forces in the Netherlands, and to bring home his Indian Fleets; which, provided they made a safe Return, must needs enrich the Kingdom of Spain: And beside this, the English would by degrees throw off their Care, as to Shipping and Navigation, when they found it brought them no Grist from Spain, and this might prove the way to take them napping, in a golden Slumber of Ease and Peace; when after a long Disuse, they had almost forgot the Trade and Business of War.

1600. Ann. 43.

Though the Queen was no way ignorant of all this, yet being of Opinion (upon serious Thoughts) that a Peace would tend much to her own Honour, and the Welfare of the Kingdom, she was contented to resign herself to the French King's Importunity, and left to him, the Appointment of the Time and Place for concluding the Treaty: For the Time, he determin'd the Month of May, and the Place nominated was Bologne, a Sea-Port in France, formerly called Bononia, and Gessoriacum Navale. And because there was some Reason to guess there would arise some Dispute about the Point of Precedency, there were certain Commissioners appointed, to enquire into the Matter; and they made an Observation, that in the Book concerning the Ceremonies of the Court of Rome, which (as the Canons observe) is the great Directress and Mistress of all the other Courts, the First Rank among Princes belongs to the King of France, the Second to the King of England, and the Third to the King of Castile; and that the English without Molestation, enjoy'd that Place in the General Councils of Pisa, Constance, Sena, and Basil, though in that of Basil, 'twas indeed unhandsomely contested by the Ambassador of Castile: Besides, the Kingdom of Castile, which is a Title the King of Spain values above all the rest, is but a young State, in comparison of England, and was an Earldom, not a Kingdom, till the Year 1017, and then the Prince had no solemn Inauguration: That amongst those Princes, who were stiled High and Mighty, the King of England was reckon'd the Third, and the King of Spain the Fourth; and that his Holiness, Julius III, had pronounced in Favour of Henry VII, King of England, against Ferdinand of Castile; that the Queen of England, was both in respect of Birth and Regal Dignity, above the King of Spain; and this was the very Argument, which the Spaniards made use of in the Council of Basil, against Henry VI, King of England: That, in short, the Lawyers have jointly resolved, That a Precedency held Time out of mind, or by Immemorial Prescription, is to be looked on as a Fair and Uncontestable Claim. They remarked farther, that whereas in the first Session of the Council of Trent, under Paul III, there appeared but one Ambassador to represent the Person of Charles V, both as Emperor and King of Spain, who in his Master's Right, took Place of the French King's Ambassador, the Spaniards have accordingly demanded this Priority ever since, as well in the Emperor's Right as the King of Spain's, because it had never been disputed against them. At the same time, the English could not forbear taxing the French King's Ambassador with a Point of Indiscretion, for not withstanding it; and entring a publick Protest against the Emperor's Ambassador, should he presume to take the Precedency of the French King, in the Name of the King of Spain. They observed moreover, that the Spaniards demanded the Upperhand, in respect of the Largeness of their Dominions, and the Extent of their Prince's Sovereignty beyond that of others, besides that he had deserved so highly of the Church of Rome, and had taken Place of the French King, in the Council of Trent in Pius Quartus's Time; though 'twas done indeed out of Rule: But enough of this.

A Treaty at Bologne.

Observations about Precedency of England and Spain.

1600. Ann. 42.

Commissioners appointed to treat of Peace.

On the Day appointed, there appear'd at Bologne these Commissioners for the Queen, viz. Sir Henry Nevil, her Majesty's Leiger in France; John Herbert, who was at this time made one of the Secretaries; Robert Beal, Secretary to the Council in the North; and Sir Thomas Edmunds, Secretary for the French Tongue. For the King of Spain, appear'd Balthazar Lord of Zuniga, Fonseca, one of the Privy-Council, and Ambassador in the Netherlands, and Ferdinando Carillo, Licentiate of the Order of St. Jago, the King's Sollicitor in Castile: The Archduke employ'd John Richardot, Seignior de Barley, Chief President of the Council, and Lodowick Verreiken, Auditor and Principal Secretary. The English had these Instructions amongst others; 'Above all things to 'take care of the Queen and Kingdom of England, 'and Welfare and Reputation of the Publick. 'That, in Point of Honour, they should by no 'means yield the Precedency to the King of 'Spain, but challenge it rather in a discreet and 'sober way, for the Reasons already mention'd: 'That if the Spanish Commissioners would not 'submit, some middle Temper should be found, 'lest the English should be represented, as more 'concern'd for a Punctilio, than a Matter of 'Weight and Concernment: They were to pro-'pose, for instance, the taking Place by turns, 'and the First to take his chance for it. Then, 'in regard to Publick Good and Advantage, they 'were to be extremely careful that the Trade of 'England and the United-Provinces was not pre-'judiced by any unjust and fraudulent Practices: 'That the English should enjoy an open and free 'Trade into the Indies, forasmuch as the same 'Liberty was granted them in all the Dominions 'of Charles V, in the Treaty of 1541. In those 'Places at least, where the Spaniards have no 'Plantations, and with those Indian Princes who 'are not under their Government: That the 'Spaniards should offer their Terms, because they 'had first propounded a Treaty: That as to Re-'bels and Fugitives, there should nothing be 'mention'd, (tho' according to the ancient Con-'tracts with Burgundy, they were to be expelled 'out of the Kingdoms of each Prince respective-'ly, and by that of France to be deliver'd on 'demand). But if the Spanish Commissioners 'should propose it, they should then declare, 'that none were entertain'd in England from the 'Netherlands, but only Merchants and Trades-'men; whereas several of the English were sup-'ported with Pensions in the Netherlands, on pur-'pose to disturb and embroil the Government.'

Exceptions on both sides.

Having produced on both sides their Credentials, the Spaniards made an Exception against the Epithet of Most Illustrious, which in those on the Queen's Side, was inserted in the Archduke's Title, who borrowing his Descent, as they observ'd, from Sacred Emperors, and being Brother and Son-in-law to two Kings of Spain, and Husband to the Most Serene Infanta Isabella, eldest Daughter of Spain, was by all Princes dignified with the Title of Most Serene. The English then alledging, that an Archduke ought not to be on the Level with Crown'd Heads as to Character, and that no other Distinction was allowed in former Treaties to Archduke Philip, Father to Charles V, than that of Most Illustrious; the Spaniards replied, that 'twas no Wonder, if that Age presented the Archduke with no other Title than that of Most Illustrious; since in the very same Treaty, Henry VIII, himself, was stiled by no other. The English, on the other side, found these Flaws in the King's Commission: That there wanted a Form of Sub-delegation; that the Commission was confused, and made obscure by a Mixture of Commissioners; that 'twas sealed by the King's Privy Signet, whereas her Majesty's was under the Great Seal of England; and that there was a Clause missing, in reference to the King's obliging himself to ratify whatever should be concluded on. They made answer, That the Form of appointing Subdelegates, was comprized in these Words, Par Tratar y Hazar Tratar; that the Distinction of Privy and Great Seal was a thing not known in Spain, and that the King's Commission was subscribed by his own Hand in the Presence of his Secretary, and confirm'd under the Publick Seal of the King and Kingdom; and that all Ratifications run in this Form, Estar y passar Estare y passare.

English claim the Priority.

A few Days after, the Title of Most Serene being inserted in the English Credentials wherever the Archduke was mention'd, the English Commissioners, who till now had managed the Business with those of the Archduke purely by Letters and private Conferences, demanded a publick Meeting in order to a Treaty, and that the Precedency might be allow'd to her Majesty. The Spaniards being offended that the English had made the first Claim, as if 'twere true in such Cases what they use to say, Le premier Demandeur êtoit le Vainqueur; i. e. That the Conquest belongs to the first Challenge, made answer, 'That ''twas a strange and unprecedented thing for the 'Kings of England to be upon the same Foot with 'his Catholick Majesty.' The English replied, That the Precedency of the Crown of England was known all the World over, and to be maintain'd upon good Grounds; and that the Queen's Leiger Ambassador ought to take place of a bare Delegate, as he had a double Power invested in him. Edmunds alledged also, That he had acquainted Richardot before the Conference, that the Queen would not give up the Point of Precedency; and when pressed for an Answer from him, he had nothing to say against it, but said, 'He would give his Answer 'when they came to a Meeting; and that he did 'not think so small a Circumstance would put a 'stop to the Treaty.'

Spaniards dispute an Equality.

After this the Commissioners invited one another to private Debates at their several Apartments, on pretence that their Interviews would be less interrupted, but in reality to trick one another in point of Distinction and Priority: But this matter sunk likewise on both sides. And tho' the Netherlanders wrought hard to make the Spaniards more complying, yet they could never be brought to admit of an Equality between their Prince and the Queen of England, because he must then of course acknowledge the French King for his Superior, it being agreed on all hands, that the Kings of England have yielded the Precedency to those of France. However the English held fast to their first Resolution in asserting this ancient honourable Claim, and declar'd withal, that the Spaniards had no reason at all to take it ill, because to use one's own Right, is no Injury to that of another Man; nor could they assign any Reason why they should deny her Majesty at least a Parity of Honour, she being as absolute a Monarch as the King of Spain, and had as ample if not greater Power and Prerogative within her Dominions.

New Instructions to the English.

After this, Edmunds was sent back into England, and returned with these Directions: 'That 'if any Method were propounded to adjust the 'Point upon an Equality of Title, which should 'be no way prejudicial to the Queen, they 'should admit of it, without insisting too nicely 'upon their first Instruction: That a perpetual 'Peace should be establish'd between both Prin-'ces and their Successors, and that no mention 'should be made of a Truce: That Trade should be reduced to the fame Foot it was upon Ann. 1565: That it fhould be folemnly agreed and fettled, that no Ships fhould be arrefted without the Confent of the Prince to whofe Subjects they belonged: That they fhould not upon any account grant the Spanifh Men of War the free ufe of the Queen's Ports: That if they went fo far as to deny a free Traffick in the Indies, the Matter fhould be connived at, juft as it was by the French in the Treaties of Cambrefis and Vervin: Every one therefore fhould be left to venture at his own Coft and Peril. For were a Reftraint of this kind allowed of, the Trade of the Englifh into thofe Parts would for the future be quite fhut up and foreftalled. They were likewife ordered to take no notice of the Rebels and Fugitives, according to the Examples of the French in the Treaties of Blois and Vervin. They fhould engage that the Englifh Garrifons in the cautionary Towns fhould act barely in Defence of thofe Places, without ferving in the Field againft the King of Spain. They were to declare moreover, that the Queen was fully refolved to preferve the Trade of her Subjects to the Archduke's Provinces, and yet not to recal the Englifh Soldiers, who were in the States Service, and under their Pay: That they fhould in the laft place accommodate every thing to the Circumftances of Time and Place, becaufe they fupply Men with better Expedients than they can otherwife apply to every Exigence and Occafion; and that they fhould have an Eye to the main Drift of the Spaniards in this Negotiation, whether 'twere only to amufe the Queen till they could get an Opportunity of invading England or Ireland, or elfe to win the United Provinces to their Party, and unhinge them from the Englifh Intereft.'

'be

1600. Ann. 43.

Archduke's Complaint.

Englifh reply.

In the mean time, the Archduke, who had his Head and Hands full of the War in Flanders, complain'd of the Queen's fending Recruits to the States, and preparing Ships for the Indies. The Commiffioners anfwer'd, That they were in the dark as to this; but fuppofing it true, 'twas no new Act of Hoftility, but a Continuation of what was begun before the Treaty, and was to be difpenfed with till the Confummation of a Peace. They retorted upon the King of Spain, his having furnifh'd the Irifh Rebels with Money and Arms; that he had receiv'd Hoftages from them, and promis'd them Supplies: That this was clear enough from his own Letters, which the Rebels fent the Queen to gain her Favour, and which, if they pleafed, were ready to be produced; and that this indeed was a new Encroachment, forafmuch as the King of Spain's Father never ventured to relieve them, otherwife than privately and underhand.

Whilft thefe Things were under Debate, and both Sides began to fufpect that Peace was but a bare Pretence to cover other Defigns, the Spanifh Commiffioners declared, that his Catholick Majefty would by no means yield up the Priority, or fo much as admit of a Parity of Title, and therefore had exprefsly order'd them to break off the Treaty. The Archduke's and the Queen's Delegates were much concerned at this Refolution, and therefore to prevent an abfolute Breach, the Englifh propofed, That the Queftion of Precedency might be laid afide, and they permitted to treat with the Archduke's Delegates, by Letters, Conferences, or Meffages, as they before had done.

Treaty diffolv'd.

New Propofals, but in vain.

The Spaniards moved, That if they would agree to a Meeting to be had in Holland, and the States to affift at it, they would come to a Treaty in any place in Holland not under the Queen's Poffeffion: Or if they would confer in any Part of the Spanifh Dominions, they would entertain the Englifh with all the Refpect and Civility due to Strangers.

There was likewife a Motion ftarted, to have the Bufinefs put off for fixty Days, which would rather look like a Difcontinuance, than a final Diffolution of the Treaty; and in the mean time all Parties fhould apply themfelves to bring Matters to an Accommodation, if both Princes thought fit: But all this was to no purpofe, for immediately did the Spanifh and Archduke's Commiffioners haften home before they were looked for, and the Queen likewife called back hers, having firft made her publick Proteft: 'That fhe had done all that became a good Chriftian and a free Princefs, to fettle a firm and lafting Peace, to prevent the fhedding of any more Chriftian Blood: And tho' there were fcurvy and fufpicious Appearances of foul Play and unfincere Dealing, forafmuch as there were Supplies of late fent to the Rebels in Ireland, yet at their Requeft fhe did not refufe to fend Commiffioners to the Treaty: And fince fhe faw no Reafon to give the Spaniard the Upper-hand, as fhe had intimated to Edmunds before the Treaty, fhe had infifted upon an Equality; and if they would not fubmit to that, fhe was willing ftill to carry on the Matter by the Interchange of Meffages and Papers.' Thus, after three Months time, did the Treaty of Bologne dwindle into nothing.

The States Defigns on the Sea Towns in Flanders.

Mean while, the States having been fuccefsful beyond Expectation, were fo far from harbouring any Defires of Peace, that they were ftudying at the very inftant to poffefs themfelves of the Sea-Coaft of Flanders, the better to guard their Trade (Spinola's Gallies being very bufy at Sea) as alfo to relieve Oftend, the only Town they had in Flanders, and which was begirt and hemm'd about with feveral Forts and Sconces raifed by the Spaniards. Thefe Projects appeared very feafible, the Enemies Affairs being in an ill Condition, and the old Soldiers at the fame time bent upon Mutiny or Revolt. Having therefore made up an Army of 14000 Foot and 3000 Horfe under the Command of Maurice of Naffau, and engaged the Chief of the States to act in conjunction with him, they refolved to land at Oftend; but the Wind being contrary, they difembark'd at low Tide at Philippine-Sconce in Flanders, by the Advantage of their flat-bottom'd Boats, wherein they got to Land at high Water; and their Landing put People into fuch a general Confternation, that the Garrifons furrender'd as faft as they approach'd them, not excepting the ftrong Fort of St. Albertus near Oftend; and on the 8th Day after, they waded over a fmall Ford, and got to Newport without any Difficulty. The next Day, juft as they were ready to fit down before it, the unexpected News was brought them, that the Archduke was marching towards them with 7000 Foot and a 1000 Horfe: For it feems he follow'd them clofely Night and Day, regain'd moft of the Sconces, defeated 800 Scots that were placed in the way to intercept his Paffage, and cut off their harraffed and ftraggled Troops almoft as far as Newport. Here the Spaniards thought convenient to make an Halt to recover Albertus's Sconce, and to draw a Trench in order to cut off Supplies of Provifion from Maurice's Army; but this was looked on as a cowardly Project by the Archduke, who was too much flufh'd with his good Fortune to liften to it. On the other hand, Maurice had difpofed all things for an Engagement: The Foot, which compofed the Van, he committed to the Conduct of Sir Francis Vere, (as he himfelf has Newport attempted.

Archduke comes to relieve it.

1600. Ann. 43. given it us in his Commentaries) and the Horse was commanded by Count Lodowick of Nassau: A Resolution was then taken up to repass the Ford as soon as the Tide served. Vere forbid his Men to strip themselves, assuring them, that in a little time they should either get better Clothes, or need none at all. He then sought out a Piece of Ground most convenient for the Battel, being a narrow Plain between the Sea and some Banks of Sand, which rose to a pretty Height to Landward as well as towards the Sea. The English were placed in the highest Part of these Hills, being not above 1500, with 2500 Musketeers of Friesland. Maurice now proposed whether 'twere better to advance forward against the Enemy, or wait for them in that Posture: And most were of opinion, 'twas the best way to march on, that being the likeliest Method to surprize the Enemy, and carry the Day; whereas by waiting their Approach, their own Party would be dishearten'd, and the Enemy take the Advantage, besides that, they would gain the Opportunity of better fortifying themselves, and of cutting off any Prospect of Provisions or Retreat. Vere was of a different Judgment, and thought that the Enemy's Army, which was raised in haste, could not possibly be in a Condition to hold out long in a Country which the War had left bare and unfurnish'd: That on their own Side, there was no Reason to fear a Scarcity, for they had Provision enough in their Ships, and an open Sea to convey what they wanted: That the Enemy being fatigued by the hot Weather, and a long March up and down steep and tiresome Hills, would be easily routed by fresh and unharrass'd Forces.

Grave Maurice approved of these Measures, and fix'd in the Place where he was, having appointed some Companies to prevent a Sally from the Garrison of Newport. He likewise order'd the Shipping to sheer off to a greater Distance, that his Men might grow bold upon Necessity, when they had lost the Hopes and Prospect of any Retreat. Then he began to dispose his Men into Order, and placed six Pieces of Cannon before the first Battalion. The Archduke had got by this time pretty near to Newport, and held an Hour or two's Debate, whether 'twere best to stay there, or give his Men some Refreshment, and wait the coming up of the Troops which were still behind; by which means he lost his Advantage both as to Time and Place. However he had conceived Hopes which made him advance with great Cheerfulness; and finding the Pass too narrow, by reason of the coming in of the Tide, for his Horse, which could now find no other way than by those sandy Hills, he dismiss'd a Prisoner on purpose, who was to alarm the Enemy, by crying that the Scots were all put to the Sword, and that the Archduke would not stand an Engagement; but his Mouth was soon stopt. Vere's Advice was, to send out the Cavalry to stop the Enemy's Approach; but the General of the Horse, unwilling perhaps that Vere should reap the Glory of that Design, withstood it: The Cannon therefore was by Vere's Orders drawn down upon them, and the Enemy receiving a speedy Defeat, retired to the Hills, and there waited for the coming up of their Foot, who marched along the Shore, and now and then plaid on Maurice's Men with their great Guns, the Ships at the same time discharging upon them as the Tide came in. By this time they were obliged to double their Files, the Place was so narrow, and being put into some Disorder, they were forced to climb the Hills till they were almost spent. Vere took his Post on the top of the foremost Hill, that he might view the Enemy's Motions from above, and 500 Spaniards endeavouring to gain the Ascent in a confused and disorderly manner, the Friesland Musketeers receiv'd 'em with a Volley of Small-shot, and drove 'em back; after which there happen'd a kind of wild Skirmish, such as the unequal Risings and Descents of the Grounds thereabouts would admit of, the Sand being so loose and yielding, that they could not take any sure Footing. However, the Fight was briskly maintain'd by Supplies of fresh Troops on both Sides, each Party mounting the Hills by turns, and gaining a kind of alternate Conquest. Vere, whilst he acted the Part of a good Commander and Soldier, receiv'd a Wound in his Leg, and another in his Thigh some time after, both which he concealed for fear of discouraging his Men; and his Forces were so hard pressed, that they were forced to retreat under their Cannon by the Sea-shore, and he himself being forced to follow 'em, had his Horse shot under him, which fell and lay upon him, till Sir Rob. Drury and Highham helpt him up, and mounted him upon Drury's Horse, and that at a time when the Enemy was just upon him. Just by the Cannon he found his Brother Horace with 300 Foot, and immediately order'd 'em to play upon the Enemy, who appear'd now in great Numbers upon the Shore. He commanded his own Troop of Horse and Bale's to attack the Enemy, and Horace Vere to lie for a Reserve with his Foot. He beat the Enemy back to the Hills, and from thence they were repulsed with a Shower of Small-shot; and as soon as they saw Maurice advancing with the main Body, the Horse began to fly in Confusion, and the Foot follow'd them, and both were cut off in great Numbers. There were slain about 9000; and among the Prisoners were the Admiral of Arragon, Vigilare, Sapena, and many other Persons of considerable Quality. There were wounded the Archduke himself, after having discharged the Office of a brave General; the Duke D'Aumale, Alphonso Dacales, Aid-de-Camp; Roderico Lasso, and several others. But these Particulars I refer to those who shall give the World the History of the Netherlands. 'Tis sufficient for me to have made these short Remarks out of Sir Francis Vere's own Commentaries, who has left us to make an Estimate of the English Courage from this Particular, That out of 1500 there were 800 slain and wounded, 8 Captains kill'd, and but two of the Commanders escaped unhurt. The Spaniards attributed this Defeat to the Number of the Enemy, which was double theirs, and pleaded the Fatigue of a long March, that the Sun was in their Faces, that the Wind blew the Dust in their Eyes, that the Ground was unequal, and in a word, that their own Horse behaved themselves like Cowards, and the English like good Soldiers. Among those who deserved the first Commendations, were the two Brothers, Sir Francis and Horace Vere, Edward Cecil, Callisthenes Brook, Thomas Knolles, Daniel Vere, John Ogle, Toxley, Fairfax, Valvasour, Holcroft, Dennis, Tirril, Hammond, Sutton, Foster, Garnet, Morgan and Scot.

1600. Ann. 43.

Battel of Newport.

Spaniards fly.

The English and French took up this whole Year and the last in making Complaints about Reprisals, which indeed through the frequent Piracies which were practis'd, became too common on both sides. But a Measure was at length propos'd towards an Agreement by Monsieur Thumier Boissie the French Ambassador, a Person of Sense and Gravity, to this effect, viz. 'That the Subjects 'of each Prince respectively should be taken into 'Protection, and permitted to follow their Traffick in a lawful manner, according to former 'Treaties: That sufficient Security should be 'demanded for Merchantmen, and other Vessels

A Treaty concerning Reprisals between French and English.

'set

1600. Ann. 43.

'set out with Provisions for War and Reprisals, double to the Value of Provision in the Ship, and to the naked Value for these without Reprisals. That if the Officers of the Admiralty should either neglect to take Security, or accept what was not sufficient, they should be obliged to answer for all the Damages occasion'd thro' their Default. That Care should be taken of the Cost and Charges of the Merchants, and that their Causes should be dispatch'd, if possible, within six Months. That Judgments given in Actions brought at Civil Law, should from that time be duly executed against all Offenders. That the several Bails should answer the Penalty agreed on, but till Satisfaction were made to the Party injured. That upon the Refusal of Justice after 3 Months Request made by either Prince, or his or her Leiger Ambassador, it should be lawful to grant Reprisals on either side. That no kind of Arms or Ammunition should be transported into the King of Spain's Dominions. That if any thing should be detained or seized by the King or Queen's Officers, without laying down the just Value, their Majesties should take care to make due Payment in convenient Time. That all Ships fitted out by the immediate Order of either Prince, or made use of by their Admirals in the publick Service, should be adjudged and taken for the King or Queen's Ships; and if any thing were done by them amiss, they should oblige themselves to make Reparation. That Reprisals should not be barely suspended, but absolutely revoked on both sides. That publick Proclamations should be made, not to suffer or permit any Dividend, Transportation or Alienation of Goods taken; and that no Man should purchase, receive or conceal them, unless they should be first adjudged to be lawful Prize by the Verdict of the Judge of the Admiralty. That no Pirates should be harbour'd in the Cities, Ports or Towns on either side, or permitted to lie at Anchor, but should be arrested and brought to Trial, and submitted to the Penalties of the Law, with Cost of Suit, and Interest. However, That every thing herein should be interpreted with this restrictive Proviso, That if any thing should be found contrary to former Treaties, nothing should be here construed in Derogation from them; but that due Care might be taken against Piracies, such as the Badness of the Times required, this should be lookt on meerly as a present and occasional Provision, till a more full and absolute Treaty could be form'd to the mutual Satisfaction of both Princes.'

Other Differences with the French.

There were likewise some Demurs started concerning the Imposition of some new Customs on the English Wares, contrary to the Treaty of Blois; as also about the deceitful and fraudulent making of English Cloths, to the great Disgrace and Scandal of the Nation. The Queen likewise made a modest Demand of what was formerly lent to the King; some part whereof he paid back with large and handsome Acknowledgments for the Favour.

Difference with the Danes.

But besides this Contest with France, there arose a new Dispute with the Danes, upon the Article of Trade, and the Privilege the English took of Fishing on the Coasts of Norway, and near Iceland, and that upon this Occasion; the King of Denmark being the last Year offended at this Practice, and the Piracies committed by the English, surprized and took some Englishmen belonging to Hull, as they were Fishing upon the Norway Coast, with some of his Men of War: Their Ships and Lading he order'd to be sold, to a considerable Value, and put the Seamen to the Torture, alledging that he had two Years ago signified his Mind in England, as to the Prohibition of the Fishing Trade, and that they must expect to be thus served, if they would presume to use it without his Leave. These Proceedings the Queen resented as Arbitrary, because there was no Hearing allow'd, and took them as so many Invasions upon her Person, her Subjects, and the ancient Treaties between them: She therefore interposed in favour of the Hull Men, in Letters dispatched by Stephen Leise and Thomas Ferrar: She own'd that Whitfield and Bernick had barely pretended that the English had incroach'd on the Fishery of Norway and Iceland, contrary to the Treaties, but had produced no Proof for what he said: She convinced him that several Privileges had been granted to the English, in this very respect, by the former Kings of Norway, before the Union of the Crown of Denmark to it, and that the same Grants were afterwards confirm'd by John and Christiern, Kings of Denmark. It being then objected, that by King John's Agreement, the Patent for Fishing was to be renewed every seven Years; the Queen replied, that it had been discontinued for many Years, and that 'twas through the Neglect of the Danes, not the Default of the English; for till the Extrusion of King Christiern, Ann. 1521, that Septennial Licence had been still demanded by the English, and since that Time, 'twas never exacted by Frederick the King's Great Grandfather, nor his Grandfather Christiern, nor his Father Frederick: But the last of these Princes promised, in his Letters Ann. 1585, that if the English would forbear any Insolences and Abuses, they should enjoy the same Privileges they used to do, without suing for any new Grant; that upon this Account, the English were injuriously treated, because they had of late refused to ask a Licence from seven Years to seven Years, as they had formerly done, and that the ablest Lawyers had given their Opinions, that the Sea is free and publick by the Law of Nations, and ought not to be the Monopoly of any Prince whatever. In short, the Queen seemed desirous, either to have the Matter composed by proper Deputies on both sides, or else to refer it to the Elector of Brandenburgh, the King's Father-in-law, the Duke of Mecklenburgh; and Henry Julius Duke of Brunswick, the King's Brother-in-law, as Umpires: but this the King would not consent to. And when the Matter could not be adjusted by either Stephen Leise and Ferrar, who were sent into Denmark on purpose, nor by Crag, a Person of good Learning, sent from thence into England, it was at length resolved on both sides, to send Delegates to Embden; the Queen sent thither Richard Bancroft, Bishop of London, Christopher Parkins and John Swale, Doctors of Law, to concert Measures with the Danish Commissioners: But the English being detain'd by contrary Winds, or prevented by some unlucky Mistake or other, from appearing at the Day prefix'd, the Danes were for getting home as fast as could be, on pretence that the Date of their Commission was expired; but some thought the Reason was the Scarcity of their Provisions, (for the Danes allow their Ambassadors a certain Quantum of Victuals, in the room of Money, that other Princes give) nor would they hearken to the Proposal made them, of desiring their Prince to extend the Date of their Commission: Hereupon the English complain'd that the Danes had no Design of renewing the State of Things, in reference to them, but were for exacting new Customs every Day at their Pleasure, upon their Vessels in Oresund-Key, for making Sale of their Effects by new Orders and Decrees, and resolv'd to stop their Fishery in the the free Northern Ocean, and their Paſſage that way into Muſcovy.

1600. Ann. 43.

The Eaſt-India Company ſettled.

The Queen however was about this time pleaſed to erect an Eaſt-India Company, and to endow them with large Privileges, for the Improvement of Navigation, the Glory of the Kingdom, and the Increaſe of Trade; and they immediately ſent thither with three Ships, James Lancaſter, the Perſon whom we mention'd in the Year 1594, to have taken by his Courage Fernambuck in Braſil; and every Year ſince, they have diſpatch'd a Fleet thither, with an anſwerable Succeſs and Advantage; beſides, they have, to the Honour of the Engliſh Nation, placed Factories in Surat, in the Great Mogul's Country, in Maſlipatam, Bantam, Patane, Siam, Sagad, Macaſſer, and likewiſe in Japan, having obtain'd glorious Succeſſes, big enough to curb the Inſolence and Baſeneſs of their Adverſaries; but whether it be for the real Advantage of the Kingdom to have ſuch a Maſs of Money exported, and ſo many Men yearly loſt in the Voyage, I leave Poſterity, and wiſer Judges to determine.

The Pope's Briefs againſt the Scots.

Whilſt the Queen was labouring at this rate to enrich her Subjects, Pope Clement VIII, being ſenſible of her Declenſion in Years, and very deſirous to eſtabliſh the Intereſt of the Catholick Religion in England, ſent two Briefs (as they are call'd) into England, one to the Popiſh Clergy, and the other to the People, wherein he caution'd them, Not to admit any Perſon, how near allied ſoever to the Crown, after the Queen's Death, unleſs he were not only inclin'd to tolerate the Romiſh Perſuaſion, but to advance and eſtabliſh it, to the utmoſt of his Power, and would oblige himſelf, as his Anceſtors had done, to perform the ſame upon Oath: But theſe Briefs were kept very privately, and the Contents of them communicated but to a very few; but here was laid the firſt Platform of that Execrable Plot, the Powder-Treaſon: As the main Deſign of ſending theſe Briefs from Rome, was the Excluſion of King James from his Right of Succeſſion to the Throne of England, ſo were there private Attempts uſed in Scotland, by the Fraternity of the Retivens, to take away his Life; for their Breaſts glowed with Revenge, for the taking off their Father, the Earl Gowry, by Proceſs of Law, in the King's Minority; upon which Account, they got the King, to whom they had been much obliged, by a ſort of Stratagem into their Houſe, and there deſign'd like Villains to make him away, and doubtleſs they had done it, had not God Almighty, the Guardian of Princes, ſo ſupported the King, that by grappling with them, and through the timely Aſſiſtance of John Ramſey and Thomas Areskin, he turn'd their lewd Deſign to their own Deſtruction. For they were killed in the very Enterprize, and their Accomplices executed, their Eſtates being forfeited by Act of Parliament, their Houſes razed to the Ground, their Bodies quarter'd, and ſet upon Poles in ſeveral Towns, and All that bore the Name of Retiven, commanded to change their Sirname, that their very Memory might be extinct and loſt for ever: I hope I ſhall not be charged with an Indecency, in mentioning Extinction of Name, ſince other Writers have given a very large Account of it.

The Conſpiracy of the Gowrys.

Complaints of Scarcity of Corn.

Much about this time, there was a general Complaint of a ſad Scarcity of Corn in this Kingdom, occaſion'd partly by immoderate Rains about the end of the laſt Year, and partly by the Coldneſs of the following Spring, not to mention the engroſſing Spirit of ſome, who had got a Licence to tranſport great Quantities abroad, and made a great Gain thereby. The Populace, who generally turn more upon the Hinge of Opinion and Jealouſy, than a true Judgment, caſt a great deal of Dirt and Reproach upon the Lord-Treaſurer Buckhurſt, for granting them a Licence; and theſe Aſperſions wrought ſo upon him, that he applied to her Majeſty, who clear'd him by publick Proclamation from this Charge, and caſt the Fault upon ſome private Huckſters, who were for making a Market; and withal, order'd thoſe that were moſt clamorous upon this Occaſion, to be ſeized and puniſhed: But they, being true as Steel to a Mobbiſh Principle, railed and grumbled the more, and privately taxed him with having acknowledged the Action.

1600. Ann. 43.

Eſſex repents himſelf.

The Earl of Eſſex had now lain ſix Months under the Lord-Keeper's Cuſtody, and his good Nature at length, with the Senſe of his Misfortune, and the Advice of his beſt Friends, particularly the Lord Henry Howard began to work in him a very ſerious Change of Sentiment, to put him upon removing his evil Counſellors, Sir Gilly Merrick and Cuff, and giving ſuch Demonſtrations of a patient, humble and modeſt Temper, as made his Friends conceive the beſt Expectations of him, and render'd him eſteem'd by all, and envied by his Adverſaries: The Queen moreover was ſo well reconciled by the Submiſſion of his Letters, that ſhe permitted him to go home to his own Houſe, under the Cuſtody of Sir Richard Barkly, and ſeveral times proteſted, that all ſhe did or deſign'd againſt him, was for his Reformation, not his Ruin.

Is brought before Commiſſioners.

But becauſe the common People made his Innocence the publick Theme and Subject of Diſcourſe, her Majeſty thought fit, to qualify all Suſpicions of a ſevere Treatment towards him, to give it out by Order of herſelf and Privy-Council, that he ſhould have a fair and publick Hearing, (not in the Star-Chamber, leſt it ſhould fall too heavy on his Purſe or Perſon) but in the Lord-Keeper's Houſe, before the Queen's Council, Four Earls, Two Barons, and Four Judges, and that ſome Judgment or Cenſure ſhould paſs upon him, but ſhort of an Impeachment or Charge of Treaſon: The chief Heads of the Indictment againſt him were theſe, 'That he had, contrary 'to his Orders, made the Earl of Southampton, 'General of his Horſe: That he had conferred 'upon ſo many, the Honour of Knighthood: 'That he had drawn his Forces into Munſter, 'inſtead of purſuing Tir-Oen, the Head of the 'Rebels: That he held a Conference with him, 'contrary to the Duty owning to her Majeſty's 'Royal Dignity, and the Character of a Lord-'Deputy, and in private too, which made it 'liable to the worſe Conſtruction.' All theſe Points were largely inſiſted on by the Queen's Council, who produced out of his own Letters, written above two Years before, and diſperſed up and down by ſome of his Followers, ſome abrupt Paſſages to this purpoſe: That no Tempeſt was more violent, than the Reſentment of an inflam'd Prince: That the Queen's Heart was obdurate: That 'twas very poſſible for Princes to err, and wrong their Subjects: That he knew his Duty as a Subject, and his Privilege as Earl-Marſhal of England, &c. From hence they concluded, 'That he repre-'ſented the Queen as a very paſſionate and ir-'rational Princeſs, and compar'd her to Pharaoh, 'on the ſcore of her Heart being hardned, and 'made her void of all Sincerity and Juſtice, ſo 'that, excepting a bare Allegiance, he ow'd her 'neither Thanks nor Service.' They likewiſe charged him with ſome Heads and Articles, taken out of a certain Book, dedicated to him, about the depoſing Richard II.

His Defence.

He then kneeled down upon one Knee before the Table, and thanked Almighty God for his great Mercies, and his Sovereign, for not ordering him an Hearing in the Star-Chamber, but that she had commanded that Cup to pass from him (to use his own Words) and had permitted him to be tried in a private House; he declar'd therefore, that he would not dispute his Case, or go about to excuse the Failings of his green and inconsiderate Years; he likewise protested, that he still kept himself a Loyal Subject, and neither had, nor would depart from his Allegiance so much as in Thought: In a word, he protested his Intention to have been sincerely honest, whatever Appearances might happen afterwards to the contrary, and that he now took a most hearty Farewel of this World: At this he shed Abundance of Tears, and the Company express'd their Satisfaction and Hopes of him in the same manner. However he could not forbear urging some Excuses on his own behalf, such as these: 'That he made Southampton General of the Horse, out of an honest, tho' mistaken Opinion that the Queen would approve his Choice, when she knew the Reasons he acted upon, which her Majesty having rejected, he immediately displaced him; that he had knighted so many, with design to keep the Gentlemen-Voluntiers firm to his Interest. That he advanced into Munster upon the ill-weigh'd Directions of the Council of Ireland; that Ormond, the principal Person of them, had paid for those Measures with the loss of his Sight, and Sir William St. Leiger, by the loss of his Life.' As he was going to proceed, the Lord-Keeper reminded him of his first Resolution, and advised him to stick to that, and betake himself to the Queen's Mercy, who did not design to have him impeached of Treason, but only taxed with the Breach of Orders, for 'twas but frivolous to pretend Obedience, when he had given so few Signs of it, so that if he went about to palliate his Fault, it might prove a means to lessen the Queen's gracious Intentions towards him; beside 'twas very absurd, to masque an express and formal Act of Disobedience, under the Pretext of a Loyal Inclination. 'Tis not very material to respect what was observ'd upon this Occasion, by others there present, since 'twas in a manner much the same with what was said then, or some time after, in the Star-Chamber. In fine, the Lord-Keeper pronounced his Sentence, That he should be remov'd from the Council-Board, suspended from his Offices of Earl-Marshal and Master of the Ordnance, and kept under Confinement during the Queen's Pleasure. This Sentence was approved of by all the rest, and a great many entertain'd Hopes of his being again receiv'd into Favour, because the Queen had expresly order'd, that he should not be remov'd from being Master of the Horse, as if she design'd to employ him again, and that the Judgment awarded against him, should not be enter'd upon Record.

1600. Ann. 43.

His Sentence.

There were some likewise, who observ'd the Temper of the Queen, and the Inclination of the Earl and his Enemies, with the usual Consequences in such Cases, that were apt to conclude much, in favour of the Earl, upon these probable Grounds: 'That the Queen being a Princess of a mild and intreatable Disposition, was not to seek that the Throne was establish'd by Mercy: That 'twas both in her Power and Inclination, to express Compassion, and thereby speak her self a wise Woman: That she would by no means provoke so considerable a Person, for fear of driving him to the last Extreme: That she would by no means consent to his Ruin, in respect to the Government, which would be so great a Loser by it; that her Majesty had hitherto form'd her Actions, upon the Model of a strict and regular Justice: That she had declar'd her Design to be the Earl's Reformation, and not his Ruin; and that the Word of a Prince was Sacred as an Oracle. That Princes, like God Almighty, act in Consistency, and without Contradiction: That moreover she was of Mithridates's Temper, and hated those that trode on the Neck of Virtue, when abandon'd by Fortune. That the Queen was as constant in the Continuance, as discreet in the Disposal of her Favours. That there were Instances of Persons who had grosly offended her Majesty, and yet were not totally laid aside; particularly the Earl of Sussex had been impeach'd, as an Abettor of the Troubles in Ireland; the Duke of Norfolk had been accused by Crofts and Sadleir, for not obeying his Orders in the Siege of Leith; and the Lord-Keeper Bacon, about a Book written by Hales, relating to the Succession: Henry Earl of Arundel, Henry the Father of Southampton, and Lumley, were charged for holding private Correspondence with the Queen of Scots; Crofts for a secret Correspondence with the Prince of Parma; Walsingham for assisting Gowry in seizing the King of Scots; and the Earl of Leicester about some Mismanagement of his in the Low-Countries: But yet all these Persons were perfectly re-instated in the Queen's Favour: As for the Earls of Northumberland and Westmorland, who had joined themselves in a foreign Conspiracy to work the Ruin of their Country, and had in order thereto, appear'd in open Rebellion, they had justly paid for their Treason with their Lives; and the Duke of Norfolk's Fate was equally just, because he had committed the same Fault twice, and attempted, contrary to his Promise and Oath, to marry the Queen of Scots, concealing in the mean time all the Designs she carried on Abroad, and assisting those Scots who were proclaimed Enemies to England; indeed the Queen of Scots herself fell under the same Character, (however she might be protected by the Prerogative of a crown'd Head) when she once took violent and irregular Courses to procure her Liberty, insomuch that the Queen and Kingdom's Safety were endanger'd thereby, and the State had no other way to secure it self. But now there was nothing of this nature objected against the Earl of Essex, whose Miscarriages both to the Queen and Council, had already been acquitted from the Imputation of treasonable Designs: That the Queen, on purpose as it were to keep his Hopes alive, had advanced none of his Enemies upon his Fall, tho' they had made their Suit, with all possible Application, for much higher Promotions.

The Queen of a mild and gentle Temper.

1600. Ann. 42.

'That the Earl had been singled out by the Queen, and distinguished while he was but young, by several signal Favours, on the score of his Quality, (being, at some distance, allied to the Blood Royal) and the Appearance of a very promising Virtue. That he had receiv'd, among other effects of her Displeasure, a Box on the Ear: That he had done his Country very eminent Services both at Home and Abroad: That there was not a Man in England, so happily furnished for a General, and who was so capable of managing a War, keeping off an Enemy, and gaining the Hearts of the People as himself; that therefore he was the properest Person to extinguish any Troubles that might arise, and keep the Government from Fermentation, nor did any Man deserve the Queen's Grace and Compassion more than himself. That all Persons would find themselves concern'd in the severe Treatment of a Person who had deserv'd so highly; that nothing could inspirit the Enemy more, than to see those Persons used ill, whose Merits rose higher than those

1600. Ann. 43.

those of others, and whose Innocence had pass'd the common Vote. That what was formerly said of Germanicus, might be applied to him, That his worst Enemies were his great Accomplishments: that his bitterest Adversaries could lay nothing to his Charge, but that he acted in a Sphere above them. However, that they need not fear being admitted again into his Friendship, since he was, like Pompey, courteous to his Enemies, and easily reconciled upon Submission and good Behaviour: Besides, that his Adversaries did not agree among themselves, but were differently inclin'd as to his Case, so that, when he was some time ago to have been summon'd to an Appearance in the Star-Chamber, some of them were of Opinion, that he was to be proceeded against without Rigour and Severity. That the Secretary would not be brought to admit of any fraudulent Endeavours or foul Play against him: That his Adversaries durst not do all they had a mind to; besides, they were so prudent to consider that Affairs at Court do not always run in the same Channel, but that Love and Hatred, Jealousies and Suspicions, Favour and Rigour are acted by certain Springs, and depend on Changes and Periods, that we know little of. That no Man alive knows whether he shall be a Favourite, or cashier'd before the next Sun-setting: That they were sometimes obliged to offer their best Ministers as Victims to Fury and their own Reputation: Witness, Empson, Dudley, Cromwel, Cardinal Woolsey, &c. That just as Men find Princes to have acted by others, the same will their Case be, when their own Turn comes about. His Enemies ought therefore to take care, not to engage too far in this business, least they should hurt themselves most, at the long Run, besides the Inhumanity of adding Tears to the Afflicted; and that they should not exasperate the Queen, and raise groundless Jealousies in Her, in reference to a Person of that Figure; for tho' Men could not but wonder at such a Procedure, God who is a just Being, would not fail to protect such as were injuriously oppressed.'

Upon these Reasons, and others of the same nature, did several ground a Conjecture that Essex would once more be taken into Favour; and 'twas made a Point of Deliberation among them, how the Earl was to demean himself, during this Interim of Suspence, whether it was his best way to get himself dispatch'd on a * Free Embassy, and so travel abroad into some foreign Parts, till this Storm blew over, or else to retire within himself, and raise his Mind by the same gradual Movements, by which his Fortune had declin'd; or whether it were properest, to enter on a mix'd kind of Life, and so stand ready for whatever Fate should accost him. By this means it was possible, that his obscured Virtue might in time shine out, and recover from its Eclipse.

* A kind of Voluntary Exile, or Avoidance of an Encounter.

His pretended Humility.

In the mean time he appear'd, for his own part, extremely mortify'd with the Sense of his Condition, and declared both in his Discourses and Letters, that he had discarded all the Gayeties of Life, and drown'd his Ambition in his Tears, and that he had but one Request to make the Queen, viz. That She would (to use his own Word) let her Servant depart in Peace. The Queen was extremely pleased with this Deportment, and in a little time removed Barkley from him, under whose Custody he was, and left him at his own Liberty, to retire if he pleased into the Country; but she advised him however, to keep within the Eye of his own Discretion, and not on any account to venture to Court, or come near her Person.

After this Sentence was pass'd, Cuff, who had always persuaded the Earl to plead not Guilty, but to insist upon his Innocence, as the Safeguard of his Honour, began to charge him so bluntly for a faint-hearted and timorous Man, and was so very liberal in bestowing Reproaches upon all that persuaded him to the contrary, that Essex was disobliged at his Freedom, and ordered him to be cashier'd his Service; but Merrick his Steward, who was of Cuff's Opinion, did not perform his Order, lest Cuff should be tempted to gratify his Revenge, by joining against his Master with the rest of his Enemies.

Cuff taxes Essex of Faint-heartedness.

His Message to the Queen.

The Earl was now at his Liberty, and being just upon going into the Country, he gave this Account of himself to her Majesty, by the Lord Henry Howard: 'That he kissed her Majesty's Hands, and the Rod she used in correcting him, but that he could never recover his usual Cheerfulness, till he was vouchsafed an Admission to that Presence, which had always influenced his Happiness, and in which he was sufficiently bless'd, as long as he moved within his Sphere: That he had now resolved to make amends for his Error, and to say with Nebuchadnezzar, Let my Dwelling be with the Beasts of the Field, to eat Grass as an Ox, and to be wet with the Dew of Heaven, till it shall please the Queen to restore my Understanding to me.' The Queen was very much pleased with these Expressions, and replied, That she heartily wished his Actions might prove of a piece with them: That he had tried her Patience a long while, and therefore she ought to take some time, to make proof of his Submissions: That her Father would never have pardon'd so much Obstinacy. But that she would not look back, for fear of incurring the Fate of Lot's Wife: That all is not Gold that glisters: That if the Furnace (of Affliction) produced such Effects, she should hereafter have the better Opinion of Chymistry.

Her Answer.

Cuff's ill Advice to Essex.

As soon as Cuff got Admission to the Earl, he fill'd his Ears with the same pernicious Counsels as before; 'Telling him that he had ruin'd himself by his Confession: That he had incurred such a Disreputation thereby, as could hardly be conceived, and which he ought to make good again, tho' with the Price of his Blood: That the Lord Henry Howard and others, had appear'd his Friends in some trivial Points, on purpose to trepan him in matters of higher Importance, and to deliver him up as a Prey to his Enemies. That he could never hope to be so free a Person as he once was, unless he purchased his Liberty, by some very hazardous Exploit; that therefore he ought to undertake some great Action, to recover his Credit and Liberty; in his Friend's Defence, and the Protection of his Country from corrupt Ministers.' These Suggestions Essex very little regarded, being firmly persuaded, that he should once more creep into Favour, and obtain a new Grant for Farming the Sweet Wines, (for so they term all, but French and Rhenish) his Patent being almost out of Date, and he having been a considerable Gainer by it: The Queen gave him some Hopes of her Favour, by Messages and Letters; but in reference to the Farm, she sent him these short, but cutting Answers, 'That she must first learn the Value of it, and that Benefits were not to be bestow'd at random:' At the same time she permitted the Perquisites thereof to go to others, saying, 'That an ungovernable Beast must be stinted in his Provender, that he may be the better managed:' She likewise much applauded that Physical Aphorism; That corrupt Bodies, the more they are pamper'd, the worse it is for them.

Some tart Expressions of the Queen.

The Earl of Essex was touch'd with these Answers to the very quick, so that he suffer'd his Passion to steal the Reins from his Reason, and gave himself up to Cuff and some other warm Spirits, who did all they could to possess him,

that

1600. Ann. 43. that 'twas now apparent, the Queen, the Council, and his Enemies were resolved to crush him, and sink him into the Condition of a very Beggar, and if he once was forsaken by the Queen and his Money, he must expect to lose his Friends, and be loaded with the Scorn and Reproaches of his Enemies: Hereupon, the Earl of Southampton was call'd home out of the Low-Countries, a Consultation was held among some Divines at Oxford, the Subject of which I have not learnt, and the Earl returns to London, Sir Christopher Blunt, being very much concern'd, that he had by his Advice involv'd the Earl in these Difficulties (for as I observ'd before, he had perswaded him to venture into England with a slender Retinue) and hearing that the Lord Henry Howard had labour'd to little purpose, in making up the Breach between him and his Adversaries, did now advise him to venture boldly into the Queen's Presence (as himself afterwards confess'd,) and gave him some Hints withal, that several Gentlemen were ready to secure him, both in his Access and Return. But the Earl's Answer was, that he was held from that Attempt by a Scruple of Conscience, and that he must take the Judgment of some Divines upon that Point; however he intimated to Blunt, not long after, by his Servant Cuff, that he would speedily come to some Resolution, and would be sure to acquaint him with it; he began now, to give free Access to all Comers, and Merrick, his Steward, kept open House for all Swordsmen, Malecontents, and broken Gentlemen, and admitted Buffoons and Parasites of all sorts: Some of the warmer Clergy set up popular Lectures, which the Tradesmen mightily frequented; and the Earl received daily Visits from his Sister the Lady Rich, who had lost the Queen's Favour for abusing her Husband's Bed: And whoever seem'd to disapprove these Measures, was censur'd as an avow'd Enemy to the Earl's Honour and Liberty.

He is hatching Sedition.

The Death of the Lord North.

In the very last Month of this Year, did Roger Lord North make an happy Exchange of this Life for a Better: he was Treasurer of the Queen's Houshold, and the Son of Edward Lord North: A Person of great Briskness and Vivacity, that had an Head and Heart fit for Service: I have mention'd him before in the Years 1587, and 1574. His Estate fell to his Grandson, Dudley North, whom his Son had by Dorothy, the Daughter and Heiress of Valentine Dale, a Gentleman well vers'd in the Civil Law. He was succeeded as Treasurer, by Sir William Knolles, whose Place of Comptroller of the Queen's Houshold, was conferred on Sir Edward Wotton, a very able and eminent Minister of State.

1601.

The Forty Fourth Year of her Reign.

Embassies from Morocco and Russia.

The Beginning of this Year, the Queen gave Audience to several Foreign Embassies: In the Southern Parts, Her Alliance was courted by Hamet King of Morocco; and Boris Pheodorick Emperor of Russia, address'd to her from the North, for the same Favour: She likewise gave an Honourable Entertainment to Wolf-Gang-William, Son of Philip-Lodowick, Count Palatine, Duke of Zweibruck and Newburgh, Virginius Ursinus, Duke of Bracciano in Tuscany, and the Rohans, two Brothers, in their Return from paying a Visit to the King of Scots, they being Descendants of James I, King of Scots. All these Noble Personages paid Her Majesty a pure Visit of Respect.

Essex drops some unfit Expressions.

Mean while the Earl of Essex lived retired, and gave himself up to the Service of God, the Conversation of his Friends, and the Devotion of the Church. However, he let fall some Expressions now and then, which shew'd how much he regretted the powerful Interest which his Enemies held in the Queen, and which indeed his Friends condemn'd as relishing too much of an indiscreet Resentment; and therefore advised him, as the Lord-Keeper had done before, 'not to neglect himself, his Friends, and his Country: That Persons otherwise at the greatest Variance, ought to unite for the Publick Good and Advantage: That he should by no means seek the Cure of his own Private Grievances, in those of the Publick: That he ought to submit to the present Exigence: That he should make the most submissive Applications for the Queen's Favour, who had been so generously kind to him, and not to lend his Enemies an Handle to insult:' But this Advice was quite thrown away, and receiv'd much such an Answer as the Lord-Keeper's had done, viz. 'That, where he expected Plenty, he met with an Hurrican; that if he was wanting to his Friends or his Country, 'twas long of others, not of himself: That the Queen had degraded him to the State of a private Man, and he could not fawn himself into an higher Post: That he had been unjustly confin'd: That Princes had but a limited Power, and were not infallible. That his Enemies had wounded him in every Pore of his Body: That their Insolence could not exceed his Constancy and Resolution: That let them look as big as they pleased, he would never be the Slave that should cringe to them.'

1601. Ann. 44.

The Queen incensed.

These Expressions coming to the Queen's Ear, strangely warp'd her Affections from him; but what she resented most, was the Affront he offer'd to the Make of her Person, for (to name but one Expression) he had declar'd, 'That she was now grown an old Woman, and was as crooked within, as without.' This was a Wrong, which some Court-Ladies, whose Hopes and Intrigues he had formerly disappointed, took care to aggravate to the highest degree; so that she did as good as flatly deny him a Licence for Farming the Wines: This put his Spirit into a new Ferment, and to increase it more, the Lord Grey of Wilton drew upon his intimate Friend the Earl of Southampton, as he rode along the Streets; for which however he was by the Queen's Order committed to Custody, and his Enemies galled and fretted him one Day after another, with giving out base and unhandsome Insinuations.

Essex tampers with the King of Scots.

Hereupon, he laid himself open to ill Impressions, and went again upon the same clandestine Designs in which he had embark'd, when in Ireland, endeavouring to remove by Force his Enemies at Court. He was every Day putting some new Project on the Anvil, and there were enough to help him to form them into shape. He now made use of all the Arts of Popularity to gain the Croud, which he perceived were perfect Idolizers of his Virtue; and labour'd to curry Favour with the King of Scots, by respectful Letters, and Complaints of his Adversaries, tho' he was thought to have injur'd and disoblig'd him before. He was very particular in setting forth the Interest of his Adversaries, viz. That in the West of England, Raleigh was Governour of the Isle of Jersey, that in the Eastern Parts, the Lord Cobham was Lord-Warden of the Cinque-Ports, the Lord Burleigh President of the North, and the Lord Carew President of Munster in the South of Ireland: That these were the most convenient Places for the Spaniards to land; that these Persons were every one of them well affected to the King of Spain, and at Secretary Cecil's Devotion, who together with the Lord-Treasurer Buckhurst, and the Lord-Admiral, one of whom had the Queen's Purse, and t'other her Navy, and both were Cecil's Creatures, steer'd the Helm of Government juſt as they pleaſed: He therefore practiſed with the King of Scots to ſend Ambaſſadors into England, to preſs a publick Declaration of his Title to the Succeſſion. He prepares a Scheme of Inſtructions for them; wherein he lays down ſeveral Proofs of the exorbitant Power of his Adverſaries, as likewiſe of their ill Affection to the King of Scots, and their great Reſpects for the Infanta.

1601. Ann. 44.

I do not affirm, that all this was done with a Deſign to remove his Adverſaries, as Oppoſers of the Succeſſion, provided ſuch a Declaration were not made: However, as nothing works more on the Affections of Men, than a Shew at leaſt of Religion, the Earl endeavour'd to gain the Puritans, and their Preachers, to his Party, a ſort of People the Queen did not care for. He likewiſe courted Papiſts, by a ſeeming Commiſeration of their afflicted Condition: He hired up a parcel of Soldiers, and other Fellows of a deſperate Fortune and Courage, and placed them near his Houſe.

Essex courts the Puritans and Papiſts.

Mean while he made very few privy to his Deſign, therein following Cuff's Advice, who had ſuggeſted to him, that he ought to have a Multitude at his Beck, but few of his Council: Theſe were the Earl of Southampton, whoſe Firmneſs he had made trial of; Sir Charles Danvers, a Perſon entirely devoted to Southampton, as being obliged to him for his Life; Sir Ferdinando Gorges, Governour of Plimouth-Fort; Sir John Davis, Surveyor of the Ordnance under him, and a moſt exquiſite Mathematician; and John Littleton of Frankel, a Man well vers'd both in the Cabinet and Camp, but one whom his Father had diſinherited for ſome Miſbehaviour towards him, unworthy of a Son to offer, or a Father to receive. This Juncto met frequently in Drury-Houſe, to avoid Suſpicion, and the Earl of Eſſex produced before them a Catalogue of ſuch Noblemen as he conceived beſt inclined to his Cauſe; it was reckoned to conſiſt of about 120 Earls, Barons, Knights, and Gentlemen of good Eſtates. He then adviſed them to deliberate among themſelves, Whether 'twere beſt firſt to ſeize on the Court, or on the Tower of London, or on both at once? And what Methods were to be taken with the City itſelf? They were all of opinion, that the beſt way was to aſſault the Court in the firſt place; and this was the Method they propoſed: Sir Chriſtopher Blunt was with a choice Detachment to poſſeſs himſelf of the Palace-Gate, Davis was to ſeize the Hall, Danvers the Guard-Chamber, which was but ſlightly watch'd, and the Preſence-Chamber, and Eſſex was to ruſh in from the Meuſe (which were Stables belonging to the Court) with a ſelect Party at his Heels, and to beg the Queen on his Knees to remove his Adverſaries from her Preſence. 'Twas afterwards confeſs'd that he had reſolv'd to bring them upon their Trial, and then to call a Parliament, and make a Change in the Government.

His Counſellors.

The Court to be ſurpriz'd.

Whilſt the Party were expecting Ambaſſadors from Scotland, and a favourable Opportunity to advance theſe Projects to a Concluſion, the Jealouſies as to Eſſex were much increaſed, not only by reaſon of a much greater Confluence of People than ordinary, under the pretence of hearing Sermons at Eſſex's Houſe, but becauſe the Preachers themſelves had let fall ſome Expreſſions, as if Kings themſelves ſtood accountable to the Superior Miniſters of the Realm. Hereupon, or elſe perhaps on ſome ſlight Intimations, Robert Sackville, the Lord Treaſurer's Son, gave the Earl a Viſit on the 7th of February, in a pretended way of Complaiſance, but really with a deſign to obſerve what Company he kept. The Earl of Eſſex was ſoon after ſent for by Sir John Herbert, one of the Secretaries of State, to appear before the Council then met at the Lord-Treaſurer's Houſe, in order to receive ſome Inſtructions as to the Management of that Liberty the Queen had given him; and at the ſame time a Note was privately deliver'd into his Hands, adviſing him to take care of himſelf. Hereupon the Earl ſuſpecting that ſomething had taken Air, and fearing a ſecond Confinement, excuſed his not appearing, on pretence of being at that time under ſome Indiſpoſition; for he was reſolved not to forfeit his Liberty but with his Life. Thus was this Contrivance quaſh'd, which had been four Months in agitation, and the Actors were forced by their Fears to enter upon new Meaſures.

Eſſex ſuſpected.

1601. Ann. 44.

He is ſent for to the Council.

Refuſes to appear.

Eſſex was under a ſtrange Perplexity, and ſent for ſome of his neareſt Friends, whom having inform'd of the Danger they were in of being forthwith order'd to Priſon, he conſulted with them, Whether it were better to ſurprize the Court directly, or to try the Inclinations of the City, and make uſe of their Aſſiſtance, or elſe to fly for it? Seize the Court they could not, for want of Men and Arms, and other Conveniences; beſides, they were told that the Guards were doubled: Moreover, 'twould carry a very foul Appearance of Treaſon againſt the Queen, to commit an Outrage upon her Palace. As they were debating the Point of the Citizens Affection, and the Unſteadineſs of Humour common to the Vulgar, in comes a Perſon, as if commiſſion'd on purpoſe, and makes large Tenders of Service and Aſſiſtance from the City, againſt all the Earl's Opponents. Wherewith Eſſex was ſo far inſpired, that he began to talk of the large Intereſt he had in the City; and to flatter himſelf from the popular Noiſes formerly beſtow'd on him, and the loud Complaints that went about againſt his Adverſaries, that he had a very powerful Party ready to aſſert his Cauſe, and protect his Fortune. He likewiſe believed the Reports of others, that Sir Thomas Smith, the Sheriff of the City, would be ready to ſtand by him with a Thouſand of the Train'd-Bands which he had under his Command.

He reſolved therefore, ſince Things were come to that paſs as to make Delay as dangerous as too much Speed, to go the next Day (which was Sunday) with 200 Gentlemen into the City, juſt before the Sermon was done at St. Paul's, and there give the Aldermen and People the Reaſons of his coming, and crave their Aſſiſtance againſt his Enemies; and if the City appear'd backward to eſpouſe his Cauſe, he determin'd to withdraw to ſome other Part of the Kingdom; but if they ſhewed any Inclination to aſſiſt him, then to make uſe of their Aſſiſtance in getting acceſs to her Majeſty.

All that Night Meſſengers were ſent up and down from Eſſex's Houſe to give his Friends notice, that the Lord Cobham and Raleigh lay in wait for his Life. Hereupon the Earls of Rutland and Southampton came to him on Sunday the 8th of February betimes in the Morning, with the Lords Sands, Parker, Lord Monteagle, and about 300 Gentlemen more of good Quality; who were all receiv'd by him with great Civility. He told ſome of them, that he went in danger of his Life; that he was reſolved to go to the Queen and acquaint her with it, becauſe his Enemies had abuſed her Majeſty's Name to his Prejudice: Others he aſſured, that the City of London appeared for him, and that he would go thither and make uſe of their Aſſiſtance to bear down the Power of his Adverſaries.

In the mean while his Houſe was lock'd up, and not a Man ſuffer'd to go in or out, unleſs he he were very well known. But whereas Sir Ferdinando Gorges was permitted to wait on Raleigh, who had fent for him, and waited in a Boat for his coming, Blunt perfuaded him to feize on Raleigh. Some People do not ftick to fay, that Gorges did at this time difcover the whole Matter to Raleigh. However, 'tis certain that Raleigh advifed Gorges to take care he were not clapt up for being fo long abfent from his Government without leave; and that he likewife bid Raleigh look to himfelf, for that feveral Gentlemen were complotting againft him and fome others who were lookt upon to have abufed the Queen's Authority.

1601. Ann. 44.

The Queen about this time order'd the Lord-Mayor of London to fee that the Citizens were all ready in their Houfes to execute fuch Orders as they fhould receive; and fhe fent the Lord-Keeper to the Earl of Effex, with the Earl of Worcefter, Sir William Knolles Comptroller of her Houfhold the Earl's Uncle, and Popham Lord Chief Juftice of England, to learn the meaning of this tumultuous Convention. They were with much ado let in at laft through the Wicket, and all their Servants kept out, except the Purfe-bearer with the Seal. The Court-yard was fill'd with a confus'd Rabble, and in the midft was Effex himfelf, with Southampton, and feveral others, who flock'd in upon this Occafion. The Lord-Keeper applied himfelf to Effex, and let him know, that he was fent with the other Gentlemen from the Queen, to underftand the Reafon of this unufual Concourfe; and if they had fuffer'd any Grievances, he promis'd them a fair and equitable Redrefs: Effex anfwer'd him in a louder Tone than ordinary; That there was a Confpiracy againft his Life; that fome were employ'd to murder him in his Bed: That a great deal of Treachery had been ufed againft him; and that Letters had been counterfeited under his Hand and Seal: That they were met in defence of themfelves, and for his Security, fince all he could do or fuffer would not fatisfy his Adverfaries, unlefs they might have his Blood. Popham fpoke fomething much to the fame effect as the Lord-Keeper had done; and promis'd, if he would fairly tell him what Attempts had been ufed againft him, to give the Queen an account of it, and procure him a fair and candid Hearing. Southampton complain'd, that the Lord Grey had drawn his Sword upon him: But then, replied Popham, he was committed for it. Then the Lord-Keeper preffing him once more to difcover his Grievances, (as privately as he pleafed) the Rabble intercepted him, crying out, Let us be gone, they do but abufe your Patience: They defign nothing but to deftroy and abufe you; and in the mean while we lofe time. The Lord-Keeper thought it now time to apply to the Throng, and bad them, upon their Allegiance, lay down their Arms.

Some of the Council fent to the Earl.

Mean while Effex retired into the Houfe, and the Lord-Keeper with the reft followed him, on purpofe to have fome Difcourfe with him in private, the Mob in the mean time muttering out fome Expreffions to this purpofe; Cut their Throats, away with that Great Seal; clap 'em up in Cuftody. When they had got into the inner Apartments, Effex order'd the Doors to be bolted upon 'em, and then told 'em, That if they would have a little Patience, he would go and advife with the Lord-Mayor and the Sheriffs, and be back again in a very fhort time.

He confines 'em.

Thus were thefe four Gentlemen of the Privy-Council confined and left in the Cuftody of Sir John Davis, Francis Trefham, and Owen Salisbury, an old Soldier, and one that neither wanted Courage nor Confidence, with a Guard of fome Musketeers.

Effex had forgot to provide Horfes, and to fecure the main Point, by reafon of this unlook'd-for Vifit from the Gentlemen of the Council; fo that he left his Houfe in hafte (Sir Gilley Merrick being appointed to defend it) with a fmall Party of 200 Men or thereabouts, all of them indeed lufty and able Fellows, but unfurnifh'd with proper Arms, the greateft part of them having their Cloaks caft over their Shoulders, and no other Weapons but their Swords by their Sides; the Earl of Bedford, the Lord Cromwel, and other Gentlemen, join'd with them as they went along. As foon as he was got into the City, he cried out, For the Queen, for the Queen; my Life is in danger. And thus he went forward thro' the chief Streets of the City, directly to Sheriff Smith's Houfe near Fen-church. The Citizens got together in a fort of Amazement, and Effex defired them to arm themfelves, or elfe they would be capable of doing him no good Service. However there was not a fingle Perfon in the whole City, tho' well difciplin'd, and very populous, that ventured to appear in his Intereft, not even thofe of the loweft Rank and Condition. For tho' the Citizens were, according to the Temper of the Vulgar, defirous enough of Change, yet their Wealth made them fomewhat cautious, and ready to exprefs their moft faithful Loyalty to the Queen. And to fay the truth, Poverty is that which above all things prompts the English to Mutiny. Having paffed thro' the greateft part of the City, he got at laft to the Sheriff's Houfe, in a great Difturbance, and in fuch a Sweat, that he was obliged to fhift himfelf.

He enters the City.

The Sheriff, whom he entirely depended on upon the uncertain Reports of others, immediately withdrew himfelf by a Back-door to the Lord-Mayor's Houfe. Mean while, Thomas Lord Burleigh, and Dethick Garter King at Arms, came into the City, and proclaim'd Effex and his Adherents Traitors, tho' they met with fome Oppofition. The fame Method was taken by the Earl of Cumberland, and Sir Thomas Gerard Knight-Marfhal, in other Parts of the City. As foon as Effex underftood this, he got out of the Sheriff's Houfe as faft as he could in a dejected melancholy Condition, crying out, That England was to be made over to the Infanta of Spain, and defiring the Citizens to take up Arms, tho' to no purpofe. When he faw that no body was ready to engage in his Caufe, and that his own Party flunk away from him by degrees; and hearing withal, that the Lord-Admiral was advancing with a ftrong Party againft him, he began to grow defperate. He refolved therefore to return home, in hopes of obtaining the Queen's Favour by the means of the Lord-Keeper and the reft of the Council which he had confin'd in his Houfe. But when Sir John Levifon, who commanded a Party of Men at Ludgate, had refufed Gorges the Liberty of a free Paffage for Effex, Gorges, confulting his own Intereft, perfuaded the Earl to fend him to his Houfe to difcharge the Counfellors, and with them to intercede with the Queen for his Pardon, while there was yet fome Hope, and no Blood fpilt, and the Queen remaining in fome Sufpence as well as the Citizens. The Earl confented that the Lord-Chief-Juftice Popham fhould be releafed, and none elfe; but he refufing to accept of his Liberty, except the Lord-Keeper might enjoy the fame, Gorges difcharged them all, and went with them by Water to the Court.

Council releafed.

Mean while Effex, when he thought of returning home, found a Chain drawn crofs the Street near the Weft-Gate of St. Paul's Church, and a Company of Pikemen and Musketeers placed againft him, by the Care of the Bifhop of London, and 1601. Ann. 44. A Skirmish near St. Paul's.

and under the Conduct of Sir John Levison. This was the first time that the Earl drew his Sword; and here he order'd Blunt to fight his way thorough, which he perform'd with great Resolution, and fell briskly upon Waite, a Person that Leicester, Blunt's Rival, had formerly sent into Holland to murder him. Waite was slain, and Blunt himself wounded and taken Prisoner. There fell besides, Mr. Henry Tracy, a young Gentleman, much in favour with Essex, and two or three Citizens. The Earl being repulsed there, and his Hat shot thro', and several of his Party slinking away from him, he got to Queen-Hithe, with a few Friends that stood firm to him, and there he took Boats, and retired to his House.

Essex fortifies his House.

He was very angry to find the Council were discharged, and a great many of his Papers he threw into the Fire, that they might not, as he phrased it, tell any Tales: And now he began to prepare for his Defence. He had now laid aside all Hopes of receiving any Assistance from the City, and so began to make his own House as strong as he could. The Lord-Admiral immediately besieged it to Landward, and assigned several Posts to the Regiments of Horse and Foot, under the Command of the Earls of Cumberland and Lincoln, the Lord Thomas Howard, the Lord Grey, the Lord Burleigh, the Lord Compton, and others; the Admiral himself, with his Son the Lord Effingham, the Lord Cobham, Sir John Stanhope, Sir Robert Sidney, and Sir Fulk Grevil, seiz'd upon the Garden by the Thames-side. Being just ready to make an Assault, he sent Sidney to summon the Earl to surrender. Southampton asked, Whom they were to yield to? Was it to their Adversaries? That were perfectly to court their own Fate; and if to the Queen, that were a plain Confession of their own Guilt. However the Earl promised to yield, and appear before the Queen, if they would allow him Hostages for his Security; if not, 'twas, he said, the common Resolution to sell their Lives at as dear a rate as they could. The Lord-Admiral sent word by Sidney, That Rebels were not to make their own Terms, nor any Hostages to be deliver'd to them: But withal he let Essex know, That he had that Respect for the Female Sex, as to permit the Countess, the Lady Rich, his Sister, and their Waiting-Gentlewomen, the Privilege of safe Conduct, they having fill'd the Place with their Shrieks and Cries. This Essex took as a Favour, and only desired an Hour or two's time to strengthen the Place they were to pass by, which was likewise granted. Before the Hour was expired, Essex grew desperate, and resolved to fight his way out; and the Lord Sands, who had more Years over his Head than the rest, egg'd him on to it, by frequently repeating this Saying, That the boldest Counsels are the safest; and that 'tis more commendable for Men of Honour to die by the Sword, than by the Ax or the Halter.

He is summoned to surrender.

Nevertheless Essex could not easily determine himself, but began to entertain Thoughts of submitting, and gave notice, that upon such and such Terms he would yield up the Place. But the Lord-Admiral refusing to grant any Conditions, he said, that his Intention was to accept, not to propose them; but three Things however he requested the Grant of; A civil Treatment for himself and his Friends; which the Lord-Admiral engaged for: next, A fair and impartial Hearing; to which the Admiral answer'd, that there was no reason to suspect the contrary: and in the last place, he desired, that one Mr. Ashton, a Clergyman, might be permitted to assist him in Prison, for the Benefit of his Soul: the Lord-Admiral replied, That he would use what Interest he had with the Queen, that all these things might be allowed him: Then all the Noblemen immediately falling on their Knees, deliver'd up their Swords to the Admiral, and yielded up themselves at Ten of the Clock at Night. There were none kill'd besides Owen Salisbury, and one or two who were shot within-doors, and about as many of the Assailants without.

He yields.

1601. Ann. 44.

They are committed to Custody.

Essex himself and Southampton were first conducted by the Admiral to the Archbishop of Canterbury's Palace at Lambeth: They were not sent directly to the Tower, because the Night was dark, and there was no passing thro' the Bridge. However they were soon removed from thence by Water to the Tower, by the Queen's Orders; and Rutland, Sands, Cromwel, Monteagle, Sir Charles Danvers, and Sir Henry Bromley, were disposed of into other Boats; the rest were committed to the common Goals. Thus did twelve Hours time put an end to this Commotion; which some were pleased to call a Surmize or Misapprehension, others a Mistake: Those that judged more severely of the matter, term'd it Perverseness, and an impatient Thirst of Revenge; and they that spoke worst of it, gave it no harsher Name than that of an indiscreet Forwardness; and to this Day few there are that lookt upon it as a capital Offence.

The Fidelity of the City.

The next Day the Queen was pleased by publick Proclamation to commend the unshaken Loyalty of the City, in Terms very obliging and full of Acknowledgment; and advised them withal, to preserve carefully the publick Tranquillity, forasmuch as the Infection of this late Mutiny had spread itself too far: She warned them also, to keep a strict eye upon such as were suspected to be Favourers of Change and Innovation, and acted as publick Incendiaries, by seducing the Populace, or disparaging the Ministry.

On the 12th of February, Thomas Lea (a Kinsman of Sir Henry Lea's, who had wore the Honour of the Garter) told Sir Robert Crofts, Captain of a Man of War, that 'twould be a glorious Enterprize for six brave mettled Fellows to go to the Queen, and compel her to discharge Essex, Southampton, and the rest that were in Prison. He was a Man himself of great Assurance and Resolution, had commanded a Company in Ireland, was very intimate with Tir-Oen, and an absolute Creature of the Earl of Essex's. This did Crofts immediately discover to the Council; insomuch that Lea was sought for, and found in the dusk of the Evening about the Door of the Queen's Privy-Chamber. He seemed very thoughtful, was extremely pale, and in a great Sweat, and frequently asked, Whether her Majesty was ready to go to Supper? And, Whether the Council would be there? In this Posture he was seiz'd and examin'd, the next Day had his Trial, and by Croft's Evidence, and his own Confession, condemn'd and carry'd away to Tyburn, where he own'd that he had been indeed a great Offender; but as to this Design, was very innocent; and having moreover protested, that he had never entertain'd the least ill Thought against the Queen, he was there executed. And this, as the Times were, appear'd a very seasonable piece of Rigour.

Tho. Lea taken.

Executed.

Upon the 15th of this Month, there was an Order issued out, That all Vagabonds should upon pain of Death, forthwith depart the City; with all notorious Frequenters of Ale-houses and Taverns, and such as ran about the Town, fetching and carrying Stories and Reports, and were prepared on all Occasions to disturb the publick Peace.

About this time, some or other of the Conspiracy being brib'd with the Hopes of Life or some kind of Recompence, discover'd the whole Plot, as it was form'd in Drury-House; but who the Person was, I could never learn. This as soon 1601. Ann.44. soon as the rest observed, by some particular Hints in their Examinations, they concluded that the whole Design had taken Air, and that it would be but a ridiculous piece of Secrecy to conceal that which was sure to come to light, if others had not divulged it already: So that not being able to promise themselves any Advantage from their Silence, they made a free and full Discovery.

Essex and Southampton arraigned. Hereupon Essex and Southampton, who imagin'd that Things had hitherto been kept in the dark, were on the 19th of February arraign'd in Westminster-Hall, before the Lord Buckhurst Lord-Treasurer of England, who was made upon this Occasion Lord-High-Steward of England; their Judges or Peers, the Earls of Oxford, Nottingham, Shrewsbury, Derby, Worcester, Cumberland, Sussex, Hartford and Lincoln; the Lord Viscount Howard of Bindon; the Barons of Hunsdon, Delaware, Morley, Cobham, Stafford, Grey, Lumley, Windsor, Rich, Darcy of Chiche, and Howard of Walden, who was at that time Constable of the Tower of London. Their Assistants were, Popham, Lord Chief-Justice of England; Periam, Lord-Chief-Baron of the Exchequer; Gawdy, Fenner, Walmsley, Clerk and Kingsmill.

The Names of the Peers being called over, Essex demanded, whether they had not the same Privilege with private Men, of excepting against some of their Peers. The Judges answer'd, That the Reputation and Character of the Peers of England was such, that they were not obliged to take their Oaths upon any Trials, nor did any Exception lie against them. After this they were joined in the same Impeachment of Treason,

Articles of the Charge. viz. 'That they had complotted to take away 'the Queen's Crown and Life, and consulted 'how to surprize her at her Palace; and that 'they had broken out into a publick Rebellion, 'by shutting up the Council of the Nation, and 'exciting the Londoners to Mutiny and Sedition, 'by false Stories and Reports, by assaulting the 'Queen's faithful Subjects in the publick Streets, 'and fortifying the Earl's House against the 'Queen's Forces.'

Being demanded, Whether they were Guilty or not guilty of the Crimes laid to their Charge? They answer'd, Not Guilty; and put themselves, for their Trial, upon God and their Peers. Essex alledged, That he had done nothing but according to the Dictates of Nature, and the Laws

Open'd by Yelverton, of Self-defence. Then Yelverton, the Queen's Serjeant at Law, open'd at large the Particulars of the Charge; and made out, That a bare Intention of Mischief against a crown'd Head, was High-Treason: He then drew a Comparison between Essex and Cataline; for as the latter got to his Party a medly of People of all sorts; so had the former entertain'd a mix'd Croud of Atheists, Papists, and even Stigmatiz'd Persons, in his Service. He upbraided him with the Abuse of those many Favours the Queen had conferred upon him, since she had been still loading him with fresh Honours and preferments, and began her Bounties to him when his Age was too green to plead either Merit or Service. He farther charged him for having abused and mismanaged his Trust and Preferments, by courting the Breath and Applause of the Soldiery, and cherishing an Ambition, which, like the Crocodile, grows in Bulk, as it advances in Years; and professed himself amazed at their pleading Not Guilty, when their Crimes were so notoriously known and publick.

And Coke. Edward Coke, the Queen's Attorney-General, proved out of Fitz-Herbert, a very eminent and famous Lawyer, That a mere Intentional Contrivance of Mischief against the Prince, was Treason, tho' not to be adjudged such, till it discover'd itself by some Overt Act, either in Expression or Fact. He argued upon this, That those Persons were construed to be Contrivers of the Prince's Ruin, who run into Commotions, get together a Multitude in Arms, refuse to separate and disjoin at the Command of their Superiors, or else endeavour to bring the City, the Tower, the Court, or the Prince himself into their Power: That the Earl could not borrow the least colour of Defence from the Law of Nature, because the Majesty of a Prince is too sacred a Thing to be made a Sacrifice to private Revenge. He then proceeded to a particular Enumeration of those Honours the Queen had bestowed on Essex; as for instance, her having made him Master of her Horse, admitted him to the Council-Board, constituted him Earl-Marshal of England, and Lord-Deputy of Ireland, and given him in a very little Compass of Time a round Sum of 30000 l. He likewise mention'd his imprisoning the Lords of the Privy-Council, and the Menaces used to put them in fear: He charged him with holding Correspondence with Blunt, Danvers, and Davis, Persons all Popishly affected; and made some Remark on their going to the City rather than the Court, since their Guilt, it seems, would not bear a nearer Approach to the Lustre of a crown'd Head, which is a Ray of the Deity. He also commended very highly the Confessions to be produced against them, because they were free, consistent, and ingenuous, and not extorted through Fear or Force. And after having summ'd up the main Substance of the Charge by way of Narrative, how he would have seized the Queen, and called a Parliament, he ended with this smart Observation; That it were much to be wished that this Robert might be the last Earl of Essex of the Name, since he had ambitiously attempted to be Robert the First, King of England.

To the whole of this Charge, Essex answer'd with a visible Briskness and Courage: 'That Rhetorick was the Talent or Trade of those, 'who valued themselves upon the Knack of 'pleading innocent Men out of their Lives: He 'therefore desired the Peers to form a Judgment 'upon the Reality of Things, not from the bare 'Pomp of Words: He protested his sincere Affection to the true Religion; and that he never 'look'd on Davis as Popishly affected, when he 'attended every day upon Divine Service: That 'in all the Clutter and Confusion made by the 'Rabble, he heard nothing like a Threatning 'utter'd against the Council: That for his part, 'he honoured and respected them as his particular Friends: That he was forced to shut them 'up, for fear of any ill Consequence from the 'Multitude; and that he was obliged to act as 'he did in his own Defence, having understood, 'not by idle Reports and uncertain Surmises, 'but by express and most undoubted Messages; 'That his Enemies had a Design of taking him 'off: That he had hitherto, and would hereafter preserve a most inviolable Loyalty to his 'Prince, (to whom he had such infinite Obligations) and be always firm to the Interest of his 'Country: That he had no other design but to 'cast himself at her Majesty's Feet, to acquaint 'her with his own Grievances, and the palpable 'Dangers which threaten'd his Country.'

Essex's Answer. Why he shut up the Privy Counsellors.

Popham, Lord-Chief-Justice of England, being sworn, and demanded what he could say relating to the Prisoners; laid before them the unworthy Usage which the Counsellors had received from them. The Earl made answer; 'That he had 'not the least ill Intention against those honourable Persons, but professed a most high 'Value

1601. Ann. 44.

'Value and Regard for them: That he had obſerv'd, that the Royal Orders were not ſufficient to keep his Friend, the Earl of Southampton, from being publickly inſulted, the Lord Grey having drawn his Sword upon him in the Street; for which reaſon he made uſe of the Aſſiſtance of his Friends, to repel the Attacks of his Adverſaries in the ſame way they were offer'd: That he was however a good Subject to the Queen, and a true Friend to the Kingdom for all this; nor did he ſay thus much to preſerve a Life of which he was heartily weary, but purely for the ſake of his Aſſociates, who had both Integrity and Courage enough to do their Queen and Country good Service: That it plainly appear'd from hence, that ſome Miſchief was intended, that Raleigh had given Gorges an Hint to ſhun his Converſation, as he would a Veſſel juſt ready to ſplit. He complain'd, that Prieſts had been dealt with to accuſe him, and that his Hand had been counterfeited.' And true it was, that a certain Impoſtor had forg'd it on purpoſe to get Money, as we ſhall ſhew in its place.

Gorges's Evidence. Then was Gorges's Evidence produced, viz. That Eſſex had reſolved to ſeize upon the Court, and call a Parliament, and that his laſt Hopes were placed in the Londoners; all which Gorges was ſent for from Priſon hard-by to teſtify to his Face. As ſoon as Eſſex ſaw him, upon the Suppoſition that he had made upon one Motive or other, a full Diſcovery of the Buſineſs, and came as a voluntary Witneſs againſt him (becauſe his Evidence was firſt produced) beſtowed upon him ſeveral ſmart and ſevere Reflections, and endeavoured to invalidate the Credit of his Evidence by the Paleneſs and Diſcompoſure of his Looks.

Now came on the Charge relating to the Conſultation held in Drury-Houſe, about ſeizing the Court and Tower into their hands. Southampton made a ſhort and modeſt Defence, and ask'd pardon for his Crime, which was purely owing to his Affection for the Earl of Eſſex; and after a Declaration of his ſtedfaſt Loyalty to the Queen, Southampton's Defence. he anſwer'd, 'That ſome Propoſals of that kind were made indeed, but nothing reſolved upon, the whole Matter being refer'd to Eſſex: That what was acted, was a thing quite different from the Matter of Debate, viz. Their going into the City, which was with no other Deſign than to facilitate Eſſex's Acceſs to the Queen, there to make a perſonal Complaint of the Wrongs that were done him: That his Sword had not been drawn all that day: That he heard nothing of the Proclamation wherein they were declar'd Rebels: That he hinder'd as much as in him lay, the firing of any Shot from Eſſex's Houſe. He then deſired that the Cauſe might be decided by Rules of Equity, not the Niceties and Quirks of the Law.' This Attorney-General's Reply. the Queen's Attorney call'd a colourable Evaſion, and demanded whether it were not Treaſon to ſeize upon the Court-Gate, the Court, the Privy-Chamber, &c. hereby to get the Queen into their hands? Southampton calmly ask'd him, what he thought in his Conſcience they deſign'd to do with the Queen? The ſame, reply'd he, that Henry of Lancaſter did with Richard II. he went to the King, and fell on his Knees, pretending nothing but the Removal of his evil Counſellors; but when he had once got the King in his Clutches, he robbed him of his Crown and Life.

The Judges Aſſiſtants being ask'd by the Lords, whether the Conſultation in Drury-Houſe were Treaſon? They jointly agreed, that it was ſo, and that the Commotion in the City was the immediate Reſult of that Debate; for could they have raiſed Forces enough in the City, they would immediately have fallen upon the Court. 'Twas then demanded, whether this Cabal was form'd by Eſſex's Means and Endeavours? And there were ſeveral Teſtimonies brought to prove, that the main Heads of this Conſultation were written with his own Hand; and that he threw ſome Papers into the Fire, that they might not (as his own Words were) tell any Tales. When he heard all this objected, which he imagin'd had hitherto been kept as a profound Secret, he ſaid, 'That the Hopes of Life and Pardon had drawn theſe kind of Confeſſions from ſome Men, and that he wiſh'd them an happy Enjoyment of their Lives, whereas his own was become a Burden to him: That Cobham, Cecil, and Raleigh's Attempts had drove him to a neceſſary Defence of himſelf; and that whatever Conſtruction the Law might put upon his Viſit to the City, 'twas a great Satisfaction to him, that his Conſcience did not tax him with the leaſt Thought of Diſloyalty to the Queen.' Cobham then roſe up, and declar'd, That he had Cobham's Anſwer. never born any Ill-will to Eſſex, but neither could he bring himſelf to approve his Ambition. To this Eſſex replied, 'That he would for all that have removed ſuch a baſe Informer from the Queen's Perſon, tho' at the Expence of his Right Hand.'

Bacon anſwers Eſſex's Accuſations. Francis Bacon, one of the Queen's Council at Law, endeavoured after this to weaken Eſſex's Excuſe for his Rebellion, on pretence of a Plot laid for his Life, by an excellent Speech to this purpoſe: That Cobham, Cecil, and Raleigh, were Gentlemen of that unqueſtion'd Worth and Probity, and Perſons withal of ſuch plentiful Eſtates, that they would never have brought the one or the other into Hazard by ſo baſe and diſhonourable an Action. He ſhew'd, that thoſe Fictions of a Plot upon his Life, were deſtroy'd by their own Inconſiſtency, foraſmuch as Eſſex never continued long in one Tale; but pretended ſometimes that he was to be murder'd in his Bed, then in a Boat, and laſtly by the Jeſuits; beſides the Vanity of his Suggeſtions, ſince, it ſeems, he had given out that the Kingdom of England was ſold to the King of Spain. He ſaid moreover, That 'twas a common thing for Rebels to attack Princes through the Sides of their Miniſters, and tax'd Eſſex for an Hypocrite, and one that had conceal'd the worſt Deſigns under the Mask of Religion. He reſembled him likewiſe to Piſiſtratus the Athenian, who cut and wounded his own Body, and made the People believe his Enemies had done it; whereby having procured himſelf a Guard of Soldiers, he reduced the Commonwealth under a State of Slavery. He was going to proceed, but Eſſex interrupted him, and put him in mind, That 'twas not ſo long ſince he had written an affectionate Letter to the Queen on his behalf, and againſt thoſe very Adverſaries he had been ſpeaking of. And this, 'tis true, he had done as a Friend, when he thought there was room to introduce Eſſex once more into the Queen's Favour. Eſſex rejoin'd, That he was inform'd that Secretary Cecil had once told the Cecil tax'd by Eſſex. Council, that the Infanta of Spain had as fair a Title to the Crown of England as any of her Competitors.

As ſoon as he had dropt the Word, in came Cecil, who lay perdue in a Room hard by, and beg'd the Lord-Steward upon his Knees to permit him to clear himſelf of ſo baſe and ſcandalous an Accuſation. Which being granted, he thus applied himſelf to Eſſex: I confeſs, my Lord, you have a Flux of Wit to which I cannot pretend; and in point of Heraldry I muſt yield to your Lordſhip, for

I am

1601. Ann.44.

I am not a Peer of the first Rank; tho' I think I may call my self a Nobleman: And I will as freely own, that you are the better Soldier of the two. But still, I wear the Guard of Innocence; and in this Court I bear the Character of an honest Man, whilst you appear here as a publick Criminal; on which account I challenge you to name, if you dare, the Counsellor, to whom I said those Words. Essex refused this; upon which Cecil was ready to conclude it a Fiction of his own; which Essex however denied. Then Cecil turn'd to Southampton, saying, I intreat you, Sir, by that Nearness and Intimacy, which has been between us from our Youth, as you are a Christian, and a Man of Honour, that you name the Person. Southampton refer'd it to the honourable Board, whether he might, by the Rules of Honour and Decency, nominate the Person: They then judging it very reasonable that he should be named, Sir William Knolles, the Earl's Uncle, and Comptroller of the Queen's Houshold, was mention'd as the Man. He being, at Cecil's Request, sent for, came accordingly, and acknowledged, That he had heard Cecil say, about two Years since, that one Doleman had asserted the Infanta's Title to the Crown of England, in Print; and that this was all he could say. But, said Essex, these Words were spoke to me with a quite different Air of Construction. Then Cecil replied, 'The Odium, which your Lordship's Malice would endeavour to bring me under, with all the World, is purely owing to that peaceable Temper, whereby I have aim'd to promote the Good of my Country; and to your Lordship's Love of Fighting; as it turns to the account of some, whom you affect to have your Creatures. For this Reason it was, that you publish'd your Declaration against the Peace; and the same Motive has raised in you a Disaffection to all those who are Well-wishers to a Treaty; as if they were in the Interest of Spain. For my own part, I am so far from espousing the Infanta's Title, that I cannot, without great Disturbance of Thought, admit the Supposition of her being receiv'd here.'

Sir Will. Knolles appears in Court.

Whilst Knolles was expected, the Attorney charged Essex with having acted under a Disguise; for that, being himself a Protestant, he had promised Blunt a Toleration of the Romish Religion. This Essex deny'd, but own'd at the same time, that he knew Blunt to be a Papist, because he was educated under Allen, who was afterwards a Cardinal; and that he had heartily endeavour'd to make a Convert of him. He declar'd moreover, that he could never approve, that Christians should be persecuted for the Faith they professed.

Southampton once more excuses himself.

Southampton did now a second time urge in his own Defence, the great Respect he had for Essex, together with his Ignorance of the Laws; and cast himself, with a great deal of Submission, upon the Queen's Mercy, whom he acknowledged to be a most superlative Pattern of Goodness; and against whose Crown or Person he never had harbour'd one Thought amiss.

The assistant Judges being ask'd their Opinion concerning the Earl's repeated Protestations, that no Harm was design'd the Queen, were pleas'd to declare, That whoever attempted to make himself so powerful, that the Prince should not be in a condition to oppose him; he was guilty of Rebellion; that in the Sense of the Law, every Man is interpreted to be a Rebel, who conspires against the King's Crown or Life; for a Rebel will never suffer a Prince to reign; lest he should afterwards call him to an account for a Traitor. This they proved from the Imperial or Civil Law, which makes any Attempt against the Prince to be Treason; and also from the Reason of the Thing, because 'tis impossible, that he that has presumed to give Laws to his Prince, should ever submit to his Authority, or spare him his Life, in order to recover it. He produced likewise several Instances from the Chronicles of England, as of Edward II, and Richard II, who being once betray'd into the hands of their Subjects, were soon depos'd and murder'd. Sir John Levison, who stood by, did then give a full Account of the Scuffle, which I before mention'd to have happen'd near St. Paul's; after which, they proceeded to read the Confessions of the Earl of Rutland, the Lord Cromwel, and the Lord Sands.

Essex's Answers to several Objections.

The Earl of Essex began now to be more calm and moderate in his Answers; and said, That his Design was meerly to oppose violent Measures by Force; and that he would not have made so unadvised an Entrance into the City, had he not foreseen that his Life was in danger. Then Mr. Attorney-General insisted upon Lea's Plot, and some Irish Transactions; and charged him again with Ambition, Popery, and Atheism: All which he flatly deny'd, and said, he made no doubt, but to make so Christian an End, as would quickly clear him of all those Slanders. Bacon told him afterwards the Opinions of the Judges, and that they were both adjudg'd to be guilty of Treason; and he prov'd them uncapable of producing any Excuse for this Fact, because they refus'd to lay down their Arms, at the Lord-Keeper's Command, and when they had been publickly proclaim'd Traitors. Essex reply'd, that he saw no Herald, but an infamous sort of a Fellow, whom he should never have took for such an Officer: That had he intended any thing more, than to defend himself against his private Enemies, he would not have ventur'd abroad with such an inconsiderable Handful of Men, and those without Arms; for they had no other or better, than their Swords, Bayonets, and Pistols. Bacon reply'd, that this was a piece of Policy in him, since he depended on the Assistance of the City, and imagin'd no less, than that they would provide themselves and his Friends with Arms, upon his account: wherein he follow'd the Pattern of the Duke of Guise, who made his Entrance, not very long ago, with a very small Number, into the City of Paris; but gather'd such Numbers in his Progress, as to force the King himself out of the City. He concluded, that let the Herald be a Person of never so ill a Reputation, he was yet invested with the Queen's Authority. Soon after the two Earls were, by the Lord-Steward's Command, order'd to withdraw; and then the Lords quitted their Seats, and went aside to a Conference; and having held a Debate of about an Hour, they return'd to their Places, and by a general Vote found Essex and Southampton guilty of Treason. The Prisoners were then call'd again to the Bar, and the Clerk of the Crown acquainted them with the Sentence, according to Form; and ask'd them severally, if they had any thing to offer, why Judgment should not pass upon them: Essex requested the Peers to interpose with the Queen in favour of Southampton, who was capable of doing her Majesty good Service. As for his own Life, he protest'd, he did not value it: That all his Desire was, to lay down his Life with the sincere Conscience of a good Christian, and a loyal Subject; whatever he might appear in the Sense of the Law: That he was loth however to be represented to the Queen as a Person that despised her Clemency, tho' he should not, he believ'd, make any cringing Submissions for it. And you, Gentlemen, concluded he, I most heartily intreat, that tho' you have condemned me at this Tribunal, you would acquit me in your Opinions, as one

They are pronounced guilty.

Essex's Speech hereupon.

that

that never had any ill Intentions against my Prince. Southampton humbly implored the Queen's Mercy, and desired the Peers to intercede for him, and to urge on his behalf, what their Interest with her Majesty, and their own Consciences should dictate to them; again protesting, that he never harbour'd a Thought that was ill against the Queen. And this he did in so modest and becoming a way, as excited a Compassion in all who were then present.

1601. Ann. 44.

And Southampton's

The Lord-Steward did now make a very pathetick Speech, and advised Essex to implore the Queen's Mercy; after which he pronounced the Sentence of Death against them, in the usual Form, that they should be hang'd and quarter'd, &c. The Edge of the Ax, which was from them before, being now turn'd towards them, Essex said, If her Majesty had pleased, this Body of mine might have done her better Service: However, I shall be glad, if it may prove serviceable to her any way. He desired to have the Benefit of the Holy Sacrament before his Death; and that Mr. Ashton, a Clergyman, might assist him in his spiritual Concerns. He asked Pardon of the Earl of Worcester, and the Lord-Chief-Justice of England, for detaining them in Custody; and of the Lord Morley, and the Lord La-Ware, for bringing their Sons into Danger, who were unacquainted with the whole Matter. Then the Lord-Steward broke his Staff, and the Court broke up. I was present myself at these Proceedings, and have related them with all Fairness and Impartiality; and as succinctly as I could, without omitting any material Point, but what may have escaped my Notice.

Several others tried.

The next Day came on the Trials of Sir Rob. Vernon, Sir William Constable, Sir Edmond Bainham, Knights, John Littleton, Henry Cuffe the Earl of Essex's Secretary, Captain Whitlock, the two Brothers John and Christopher Wright, and Orel an old Soldier. They had no sooner held up their Hands, according to Custom; but a Letter came from the Queen, who had been inform'd by Sir Fulke Grevil, that most of them had been drawn in at unawares; commanding, that Littleton, who was then sick and past Recovery, together with Orel, and Bainham a Person of lewd Principles, and one that ridiculed the Laws, should be brought upon their Trials, and the rest remanded to Prison. Bainham and Orel pleaded Ignorance, and that their Adherence to the two Earls, was purely out of Respect and Complaisance. Littleton, being clearly cast by Danvers's Evidence, could not deny but that he assisted at the Consultation: And when, among other Heads of his Indictment, he was charged with some ill Design, by reason of the great Number of Horses, and Quantity of Arms, he had then at his Inn: His Answer was, that he had an Estate able enough to keep a good Stock of Horses; and that he had always taken a particular Delight in Horses and Arms. When he receiv'd Sentence of Condemnation with the rest, he lifted up his Eyes, and only repeated these Words; We praise thee, O God! We acknowledge thee to be the Lord! Their Lives, however, were given them by the Queen. 'Tis said Bainham paid Raleigh for his Pardon. Littleton died soon after of his Disease; and Orel was kept in Prison for some time. Essex, in the mean while, was so disorder'd in his Thoughts, either from the Alarms of his Conscience, or the Impressions left upon him by the Minister; that he could think of nothing but Damnation, unless he discovered the whole Scene, and confessed who were his Accomplices. Hereupon he desired to speak with some of the chief of the Privy-Council, and with Cecil in particular. Accordingly the Lord-Keeper, the Lord-Admiral, the Lord-Treasurer, and Cecil, went to him; and after he had asked the Lord-Keeper's Pardon for detaining him in Custody, and Cecil's for accusing him in the matter of the Infanta; there was made on both sides a very fair and Christian Reconciliation. Then he told them, that the Queen could never be safe as long as he lived; and desired them, that he might suffer privately in the Tower. He very much blamed some of his Accomplices, as aiming at nothing less than the Ruin of their Country; and desired particularly to speak with Blunt and Cuffe. As soon as he saw them, he accosted Cuffe after this manner: Be sure you ask Pardon of God and the Queen, and behave yourself so as to procure it. As for my own part, I have fixed my Thoughts upon a better World, and have resolved to deal sincerely before God and Man: And I must tell you plainly, that this Instance of Disloyalty is purely owing to your Advice.

Their Lives spared.

1601. Ann. 44.

Essex taxes Cuffe.

Cuffe was surprized at this, and in few Words, but to the purpose, charged the Earl with Weakness and Levity in betraying his best Friends; and this was all that he said.

Cuffe's Answer.

Essex impeached likewise, as privy to the Design, Sir Henry Nevil, a Person of Note, who was just going into France, in Quality of Ambassador, there to reside, in order to ratify the Treaty of Blois, and prevent any Outrages on either side: Whereupon he was countermanded, and ordered into the Custody of the Lord-Admiral. He discovered several more in Scotland, France, and the Low-Countries, and charged the Lord Montjoy, Lord-Deputy of Ireland, as accessary to the Design; besides several more in England. But there being such a Number of them, and Ireland proving very happy under Montjoy's Administration, the Queen was so prudent, to dissemble what she had heard as to this matter.

Essex discovers his Associates.

But still Essex thought a verbal Confession too little: and therefore being moved by the dismal Scene presented to his Conscience, by the Person whom he chose to guide it; he deliver'd the same in Writing under his own Hand, which his Enemies shewing to King James some time after, brought the Earl and his Friends into great Disesteem with that Prince.

On the 25th of February, (the Day appointed for his Execution) Dr. Thomas Montford and Dr. Will. Barlow, together with Ashton, the Minister of the Parish, were sent to him betimes in the Morning, to prepare him for Death: In the Presence of whom, he returned hearty Thanks to Almighty God, for disappointing those Designs of his, which would have proved so pernicious to the Government. He told them he had now taken a View of his Crime in its full Dimensions, and was deeply concerned, that he had endeavoured to put so fair a Face upon a foul Cause, at his Trial: He acknowledged the Queen's Goodness in permitting him the Benefit of a private Execution, to keep his Thoughts from that Discomposure, which the Noise of a Croud must needs have engaged them in; protesting withal, that he had learnt by a sad Experience, the dangerous Emptiness of popular Applauses. He own'd himself a corrupt Member, and fit to be lopt off from the Body of the Commonwealth; having attempted an Enterprize, which, like a publick Leprosy, had spread its Contagion far and near.

The Queen was, in the mean time, unresolved how he should be disposed of. On the one side, her former Esteem and Affection for him prompted her to some degree of Tenderness; and so she sent her Orders by Sir Edward Cary, to countermand his Execution: But then his Obstinacy on

The Queen unresolved about him.

1601. Ann. 44.

on the other ſide, in refuſing to ask her Pardon, and in declaring openly, that his Life could never conſiſt with her Safety, did ſo far provoke her to uſe Rigour, that ſhe preſently after ſent freſh Orders, by Darcy, that he ſhould die.

He is led to Execution.

Accordingly he was conducted between the Divines, to a Scaffold ſet up in the Court-yard of the Tower of London; near to which ſat the Earls of Cumberland and Hertford, Viſcount Howard of Bindon, the Lord Howard of Walden, the Lord Darcy of Chiche, and the Lord Compton: There were likewiſe preſent ſome of the Aldermen of London, and ſeveral Knights and Gentlemen. Among theſe was Raleigh, with a Deſign, if he may be believed, to anſwer for himſelf, ſhould Eſſex object any thing to him, at his Death. But ſome did not ſtick to expound the Meaning of his Preſence, in ſuch a barbarous Senſe, as if he came to feaſt his Eyes with the Tragedy of the Earl's Sufferings: But being adviſed not to preſs upon him at his Death, he retired farther off, and ſaw him executed out of the Armory.

As ſoon as the Earl came upon the Scaffold, he pulled off his Hat, and lifting up his Eyes to Heaven, confeſſed that he had in his younger Years been guilty of many and great Sins; for which he put up his moſt ardent Prayers for God Almighty's Pardon, through the Merits of Jeſus Chriſt; and more particularly for this laſt Sin, which he branded with the Epithets of bloody, crying, and contagious; as having drawn ſo many Perſons in to offend their God, their Prince, and their Country. He then asked Forgiveneſs of the Queen and her Miniſters, and pray'd for her Majeſty's long Life and Proſperity; proteſting to the laſt, that he never intended the leaſt Violence to her Perſon: He gave God Thanks, that he never had been popiſhly affected, nor atheiſtically inclined; but had ever fixed his Hopes upon the ſole Merits of his Redeemer: He then pray'd God to fortify his Spirit againſt the Terrours of the laſt Enemy, and begged of the Spectators to join with him in a ſhort Ejaculation, which he utter'd with all the Signs of a ſerious and inward Devotion. After this the Executioner ask'd him Forgiveneſs, which he freely granted: Then having repeated the Apoſtle's Creed, he placed his Neck upon the Block, and having repeated the firſt Verſes of the 51ſt Pſalm, he ſaid, In all Submiſſion and Obedience do I proſtrate myſelf to receive the Puniſhment I have deſerved: Have Mercy, O God, upon thy penitent Servant, for into thy Hands, O Lord, I commend my Spirit. Then was his Head taken off at the the third Blow, but the firſt deprived him of all Senſe and Motion.

Beheaded.

This was the fatal, but withal pious and Chriſtian End of Robert D'Evereux, Earl of Eſſex, in the 34th Year of his Age; tho' the French Marſhal Biron, and ſome other lewd Perſons, did ridicule his Piety, as a way of dying fitter for a Gown-man, than a Soldier; as if a Chriſtian might not ſtartle at the Terrours of Hell, without forfeiting his Courage. However this ſpeaks his Father's Precaution to have had ſomething prophetical in it; he having warn'd his Son, upon his Death-bed, to take heed of the 36th Year of his Age: ſo that 'twas an Hint which appeared to be inſpired from above. But this we have taken notice of under Ann. 1576.

His Character and Family.

He was indeed a moſt accompliſhed Perſon, and had all thoſe good Qualities in Perfection, that become a Nobleman. His Family was not only great, but ancient; and borrowed its Surname from Eureux, a City in Normandy. His Eſtate and Barony he owed to his Marriage with Cecily, the Daughter of William Bourchier, whoſe Grandmother was Siſter to Edward IV, King of England, and her Great Grandmother Daughter to Thomas of Woodſtock, (Son of King Edward III,) by one of the Daughters of Humphrey Bohun Earl of Hereford and Eſſex. Hereupon the Title of Viſcount Hereford was conferred upon his Great Grandfather Walter, by King Edward VI, and that of Earl of Eſſex upon his Father, by Queen Elizabeth.

Education and Preferments.

This Gentleman, Robert Earl of Eſſex, was bred up in his younger Years at Cambridge; where he devoted himſelf to the Study of Humanity and Religion, and being introduced to the Queen by his Father-in-law the Earl of Leiceſter, 'twas with ſome Difficulty he raiſed himſelf to the Condition of a Favourite, the Queen happening to have no great Reſpect for his Mother. But he had no ſooner wrought himſelf into her Majeſty's Eſteem, by a Deportment that ſeem'd to deſerve it; but ſhe was pleaſed to forgive him a Debt, which his Father owed to the Exchequer, made him Knight of the Garter, and advanced him to the Honour of a Privy-Counſellor, when he was ſcarce 23 Years of Age. He was ſeveral times appointed General of her Majeſty's Forces, though Fortune did not always ſmile upon him: (I do not pretend to fetch the Reaſon from Aſtrology, and place his ill Succeſſes upon the malign Aſpect of Mars, which happened to be in the Eleventh Houſe, at his Nativity.) However it was, the Queen heaped upon him freſh Honours and Favours every Day, and had a particular Value for him, becauſe he was a brave Soldier, and cut out for a Camp.

Great Favour with the Queen.

As ſoon as he had got a ſecure and real Intereſt in the Favour of his Royal Miſtreſs, he made it his buſineſs to outſtrip all Perſons, whether of his own or a ſuperior Rank; and this was a Quarrel which the more politick Courtiers had to him; eſpecially when he took upon him to diſparage all whoſe Actions were not of his own Square, and to brow-beat thoſe who had not the Advantage of the Royal Ear or Favour. Add to this, the Pains and Expence he was at to gain the Careſſes of the Vulgar, which are always precarious and ſhort-lived; and to recommend himſelf to the Army, which is equally fatal and hazardous. Nor was he excuſable in his Deportment to the Queen herſelf, whom he treated with a ſort of Inſolence, that ſeem'd to proceed rather from a Mind that wanted Ballaſt, than any real Pride in him; though it looked the more ungrateful, becauſe acted when he had more than once been reſtored to the Queen's Favour, and received freſh Inſtances of her Bounty.

Diſreſpectful Carriage to her.

However, this unhandſome Carriage, and a way which he had of skrewing (as it were) Favours from her, join'd with a Coldneſs and Diſreſpect towards her Perſon, and back'd by the ſly Management of ſome that wiſh'd him not well, fail'd not by degrees to leſſen, and at the long run to extinguiſh entirely the Queen's Affection for him.

Indeed he was a Perſon not rightly calculated for a Court, as being not eaſily brought to any mean Compliances. He was of a Temper that would readily kindle an Injury, but would not ſo eaſily forget one; and ſo far was he from being capable of diſſembling a Reſentment, that (as Cuffe uſed to complain to me) he carried his Paſſions in his Forehead, and the Friend or the Enemy were eaſily read in his Face.

His Wife and Children.

He married Frances, the Daughter of Sir Francis Walſingham, and Sir Philip Sidney's Widow; a Match that the Queen did not approve, as being without her Conſent, and, as ſhe thought, beneath the Dignity of the Eſſex Family. He had by her one Son, named Robert, and two Daughters, viz. Frances and Dorothy: He had likewiſe another Son, whoſe Name was Walter, by one Southwell, a Miſtreſs of his.

1601. Ann. 44.

Others arraigned.

On the 15th of March, Sir Christopher Blunt, Sir Charles Danvers, Sir John Davis, Sir Gilley Merrick, and Cuffe, took their Trials in Westminster-Hall, before the Lord-High-Admiral of England, the Lord Hunsdon Lord-Chamberlain, Secretary Cecil, Sir John Fortescue Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Lord-Chief-Justice of England, and some other Commissioners. They were impeached of the same Crimes with the Earl of Essex, viz. 'That they had plotted and 'contrived the Death of the Queen, by consulting to seize upon her Person, to raise a 'Rebellion in the City, &c.'

The three first proposed this Question, Whether they might not own the first part of the Indictment, and plead Not Guilty to the other? since they utterly denied any Plot or Conspiracy against the Person of the Queen. Merrick and Cuffe being taken from the Bar, the Judges declared, as they had done before, 'That whoever takes up Arms 'with an Intention to over-rule his Prince, or 'abridge the Royal Prerogative, he is guilty of 'a Plot upon the King's Crown and Life, and 'ought so to be adjudged.'

This they made out by some Precedents of People in the Country, who within the Memory of some lately alive, were condemned for a Rising in Oxfordshire and Kent. The Kentish-men rose in Arms to have an Augmentation of their Day-wages and Salary, and the other to get the Ditches and Fences removed from Pastures and inclosed Grounds. To this purpose several other Proofs were produced, shewing very plainly, that whoever went so far as to contrive the securing of his Prince's Person, would on consequence make as bold with his Life; because Insolence is inseparable from Conquest, and the Rage of the Multitude knows not how to pity or distinguish, especially when their own Safety is at stake.

Sir Christopher Blunt tried.

Blunt was tax'd from his own Confession, and that of the Earl of Essex, who had impeach'd him as a principal Abettor of the late Treason. As soon as he heard his Confession read, and saw it signed by Essex's own Hand, he seemed very much startled at it, and desired to be allowed the Liberty of a Conference upon that Matter with the Lord-Admiral and Cecil in another Place: He then fetched a deep Sigh, and with his Eyes lifted up, used this Expression; Thou, O GOD! knowest from what Designs I endeavoured to dissuade the Earl. After this was read Thomas Lea's Confession, a Person I have mention'd before: He acknowledged, that by Blunt's Leave, who was General in the Wars of Ireland, he had sent to Tir-Oen, and was inform'd by the Messenger, that Tir-Oen should say, That if the Earl of Essex would be ruled by him, he would make him the greatest Man in England.

'Twas urged moreover, that Lea had said, That he knew that Essex, Tir-Oen, and Blunt, were all engaged in one Aim and Design, nor could Blunt himself deny, but that he had, by Essex's Orders, given leave to Lea both to send and go in Person to Tir-Oen. There were likewise read several Papers, which were sent out of Ireland, tending to prove the Correspondence between Essex and Tir-Oen.

Danvers's Trial.

Then Flemming, the Queen's Sollicitor, applied himself to Danvers, and acquainted him, that 'twas the Sense of the Law, 'That if a Man 'shall join himself as an Associate with treasonable Persons, he is guilty of High-Treason, 'admitting he knew nothing of any Design to 'take up Arms against his Prince: And that 'Danvers could not therefore, upon any account, 'appear innocent, when he had been convicted 'by his own and other Mens Confessions, as having been once himself of the treasonable Cabal.

1601. Ann. 44.

To this he answer'd no more, than that the Respect he had for the Earl of Southampton had in this Affair over-borne any Regard to his own Life and Estate: For, it seems, Danvers having been obliged to fly for killing a Man, Southampton first concealed, and then conveyed him into France, where he behaved himself commendably in the Field, till the Queen was pleased, after a great deal of Importunity, to grant him his Pardon.

Davis being condemn'd in his own Conscience, and cast by his own Confession, had not a single Word to say: And being charged with being Popishly affected, he could not deny but that his Tutor at Oxford had grounded him in the Principles of Popery, and that Blunt had confirmed him in the same whilst he was a Soldier in Ireland. At which perceiving that Blunt was a little moved, he soon satisfied him, by saying, that he was induced to approve of that Persuasion, not so much upon the Force of Blunt's Arguments, as the Lustre and Integrity of his Life and Conversation.

Cuffe's.

Then were Cuffe and Sir Gilley Merrick brought to the Bar; and Cuffe was confronted with the Confessions of Danvers, the Earl of Essex, and Sir Henry Nevil. Danvers acknowledged that Cuffe had attended upon all the several Meetings, and had always advised to attack the Court. The Earl himself had declared before the Council, and given it under his Hand, that he had been the main Instrument that put him upon these disloyal Measures: And Sir Henry Nevil ingenuously confessed, (unless my Memory fails me, for I was then present, and heard his Confession read) That Cuffe told him at his Return out of France, that he must expect to be blamed for the Miscarriage of the Treaty of Bologne; that he made him several Visits afterwards, and persuaded him to come and pay the Earl one, which he did once afterwards: That after all this, when he was just ready to return to France, he desired him to go to Drury-House, and hear what Measures they were going upon; protesting withal, that nothing was to be there debated on, but what was for the Earl's Advantage and the publick Good, and which he might hear safely, without calling his Loyalty into question: That he requested him, in the last place, to be with the Earl when he seiz'd on the Court, and so discover'd to him the whole Design; which when Nevil disapprov'd of, as a very dangerous, lewd, and difficult Undertaking, and withal said pleasantly, 'Twas one of those Experiments which had never any Commendation till it was over. Cuffe did all he could to extenuate the Hazard and Difficulty of it; assur'd him, that the Earl had the City of London and several of the Aldermen at his beck, and then applied that of Lucan to the Occasion:

——Arma Tenenti
Omnia dat, qui justa negat.

'He that the juster Claim of Power denies,
'Gives all that such an injur'd Power can seize.

Nor indeed was Cuffe able to deny one Syllable of all this.

Hereupon the Attorney-General began to argue with him in a Logical Method, and Cuffe managed himself so well in Mood and Figure, that Cecil could not forbear calling him a very subtle Sophister. But Anderson, the Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, being unable to keep his Temper, and telling them that they were both but indifferent Disputants, pressed him close with the 1601. Ann. 44. the Statute of Treason made in the Reign of Edward III. To be brief, Cuffe's Defence was chiefly made up of these two Pleas: 'That whereas he was impeach'd of Treason for being present in Essex-House on the Day of the Insurrection, by the same Logick might a Lion within a Grate undergo that Charge. That he had indeed lamented that whole Day the miserable Case of the Earl, which was all that he was concern'd in: That he used all the Persuasions he could with him to implore the Queen's Mercy. And then for the Consultation in Drury-House, 'twas with no better Propriety to be stil'd Treason, than an Embryo to be call'd a perfect Birth, forasmuch as it never took effect.'

In answer to this the Council pleaded; 'That he had no occasion at all to stay in Essex-House, and that every one had their Office assigned them; some were to defend the House, (and himself was one of that Number) others were to secure the City, and both Parties were to join in a mutual Assistance of one another. That in the point of Treason, there were no Accessaries, but every one was adjudged a Principal, and all guilty alike: That the Conference in Drury-House was a formal Treason of itself, because they consulted about taking off the Queen, and afterwards proceeded to put that Debate in execution.' In the last place, the Judges deliver'd it as the Sense of the Law, 'That if several Persons conspire against the Life of their Prince, and execute their Designs in different ways, yet is it adjudged to be one and the same Crime in all respectively, because they were all engaged in one and the same mischievous Design.'

These Answers of the Judges, together with the Confessions of Essex, Nevil, and Danvers, did fully invalidate whatever Cuffe could say for himself.

Merrick's. Merrick was indicted in the next place, 'For having invited by certain Letters his Brother Salisbury, Groine, and several other resolute Persons, to his Party; and for undertaking the Defence of Essex-House; for fortifying and holding it out against the Queen's Forces; for having procured the out-dated Tragedy of the Deposition of Richard II, to be publickly acted at his own Charge, for the Entertainment of the Conspirators.'

This the Lawyers construed as done by him with a Design to intimate, that they were now giving the Representation of a Scene upon the Stage, which was the next Day to be acted in reality upon the Person of the Queen. And the same Judgment they passed upon a Book which had been written some time before by one Hayward, a Man of Sense and Learning, and dedicated to the Earl of Essex, viz. 'That 'twas penn'd on purpose as a Copy and an Encouragement for deposing the Queen.' A dear Performance it proved to the Author, for the unseasonable Publication cost him a long Imprisonment, particularly one Expression in the Preface relating to the Earl; That he was a Person of the most promising Hopes, and seemed reserved for very great Things.

Merrick heard the whole Charge with a composed Bravery, and said no more but this; That the Earl of Essex had been the occasion both of his Rise and his Ruin.

Requests of Blunt, Danvers and Davis after Condemnation. They were every one of them found guilty of High-Treason by a Jury of 12 Men; and after Sentence of Death was pronounced, Blunt and Danvers requested, that they might be beheaded; (a Privilege allowed to Noblemen) and indeed they were both honourably descended: Danvers's Mother being the Daughter, and one of the Heiresses of Nevil Lord Latimer, by the Daughter of Henry Earl of Worcester; his Grandmother was the Lord Mordant's Daughter, and his Great-Grandmother of the Family of the Courtneys. The other was a Branch of the Blunts Family of Kidderminster, who were of the same House and Line with the Lords Montjoy. Davis desired to suffer the same way, tho' he was of a Quality inferior to them; if not, that he might not be quartered, but be allowed a Christian Burial.

Cuffe's Speech at his Execution. On the 13th of March were Merrick and Cuffe drawn to Tyburn, and the Substance of Cuffe's Speech at the Gallows was as follows: 'I am brought hither to pay my last Debt to Nature, and to suffer for Crimes committed against God, my Prince, and my Country; and as I cannot but discern the infinite Justice of God, when I reflect on the multitude of my Offences, so can I as little doubt but the Severity of my Punishment will make way for my Admission into the Embraces of his Mercy. We are exposed here as sad Spectacles and Instances of human Frailty; the Death we are to undergo carries a frightful Aspect, (for even the best of Men desire Life) besides that 'tis as full of Ignominy as Terrour: However 'tis the Portion of the best of Saints, with whom I assuredly hope to rise again in Christ: Not that I would be thought by any one to depend on my own Merits, which I absolutely discard; but I place my entire Trust and Dependance in the Atonement of my Saviour's Blood. I am fully persuaded, that whoever feels a secret Consolation within himself, whilst he groans under the Infliction of any earthly Punishment, is chastised by God with a paternal Tenderness, and not in an angry and judicial way. But to come to the Cause of my Death: There is no body here can possibly be ignorant what a wild Commotion was raised on the 8th of February, by a particular great, but unadvised Earl: I do here call God, his Angels, and my own Conscience to witness, that I was not in the least concerned therein, but was shut up on that whole Day within the House, where I spent the time in very melancholy Reflexions.' Here he was interrupted, and advised not to disguise the Truth by Distinctions, nor palliate his Crime by specious Pretences. Then he proceeded in these Words: 'I confess 'tis a Crime as black as Treason, for a Subject, who has lost his Prince's Favour, to force his way to the Royal Presence. For my own part, I never persuaded any Man to take up Arms against the Queen, but am most heartily concerned for being an Instrument of bringing that worthy Gentleman, Sir Henry Nevil, into danger, and do most earnestly intreat his Pardon. And whereas I said, that One and Twenty Aldermen out of the Twenty Four were devoted to the Earl's Interest; I only meant, that they were his Friends, and ready to serve him, but not in the way of open Rebellion.' Here he was again interrupted, and so began to apply himself to his Devotions, which he managed with a great deal of Fervour; and then making a solemn Profession of his Creed, and asking pardon of God and the Queen, he was dispatched by the Executioner. He was a Person of admirable Learning and equal Wit, but of an unquiet and turbulent Spirit.

Merrick executed. After him, Sir Gilley Merrick suffer'd in the same way, and with a most undaunted Resolution; for, as if he were weary of living longer, he once or twice interrupted Cuffe, and advised him to spare a Discourse, which however rational, was not over seasonable, when he was taking taking leave of the World. He clear'd the Lord 1601. Montjoy from having any Acquaintance with the

Ann. 44. Design, and intreated those Noblemen that stood by to interceed with the Queen, that there might not be any farther Proceedings against such as had unwarily espoused this unhappy Cause.

Danvers beheaded. Two Days after, Sir Christopher Blunt, and Sir Charles Danvers, were beheaded on Tower-Hill. Danvers, notwithstanding he had offer'd 10000 l. for his Life, tho' under perpetual Confinement, yet bore his Death with a most Christian Clearness and Composure; having first craved God's Pardon and the Queen's, to whom he wish'd all Prosperity, as also the Lord Grey's, who was there present, to whom he acknowledged he had been ill affected, not from any Injury he had suffer'd from him, but purely on the Earl of Southampton's account, to whom the Lord Grey professed an absolute Enmity.

Blunt's Confession. As soon as Blunt was upon the Scaffold, he spake to the People to this effect: 'Tho' it may 'appear more proper to employ the present Juncture in craving Forgiveness of God for my Sins, 'than upon things foreign to that; yet since I 'am accused for having persuaded the Earl of 'Essex to this great Crime, I will declare the 'Truth, as I hope for the Salvation of my Soul. ''Tis above three Years since I observ'd the 'Earl's Mind to be ruffled with Discontents, and 'many Motions of Ambition. In Ireland, whilst 'I was ill of my Wounds at the Castle of Rheban, 'as likewise at Dublin afterwards, he told me, 'That he resolved to send over his best Troops out 'of Ireland to Milford-Haven in South-Wales, 'to gain them entirely to his Interest; and when he 'had gather'd more Forces, to march up to London. 'I consider'd well of the matter, and endeavour'd 'to dissuade him from it, as a desperate Design, 'and one that would occasion the Effusion of a 'great deal of Blood. I cannot deny but I ad'vised him to get the Court into his Power, and 'so to make the most reasonable Conditions for 'himself: And tho 'tis very true, that in all our 'Debates we fully intended not to touch her 'Majesty's Person; yet had the Business suc'ceeded, I cannot say but it might have cost her 'Majesty her Life. After the Earl was absolutely 'discharged, he treated with me upon the same 'Subject at Essex-House, but fixed upon nothing. 'After which he sent for me out of the Country, 'not many Days before this treasonous Enter'prize was acted. As for other things, I have 'already made a particular Confession of them 'before the Right Honourable the Lord-Admiral, 'and the most worthy Secretary, to whom, I 'request you, Sir Walter Raleigh, to present my 'Respects, and I likewise ask Forgiveness of you 'all.' Then he looked up to Heaven, and begged of God, 'to preserve and defend the Queen. 'And thou, O GOD, continued he, forgive my 'evil Intentions and profligate Life. I desire 'you all to bear me witness that I die a Catho'lick, but such an one as relies solely and fully 'on the Merits of Christ's Death and Suffer'ings; and I also desire your Prayers for me.' Then he took leave of the Lord Grey and the Lord Compton, who were present; and having said a short Prayer to himself, he submitted his Neck to the Ax, with a Resolution worthy of him.

Thus was the Rebellion crush'd, the Tranquillity of the Government secur'd, and the rest of the Conspirators reduc'd by the Execution of the Earl of Essex, Cuffe, Merrick, Danvers, and Blunt. Those that had the best Purses were fined, but The rest pardon'd. very few paid their Fines: The rest had their Lives spared, and enjoyed the Benefit of a free and gracious Indemnity: Southampton, and Smith the Sheriff of London, were kept Prisoners in the 1601.
Tower: But Smith having been falsely accused, Ann. 44.
and put to a great deal of Trouble upon the Informations of some few, and Essex's Credulity, was either by the Queen's Goodness, or on the score of his own Innocence, permitted to be bail'd out of Prison.

On the 8th of July was Sir Henry Nevil brought Nevil's Charge and Defence.
before some of the Queen's Judges and the Privy-Council at York-House, and charged 'with hav'ing attended upon the Consultation in Drury-'House: That he had not discover'd the De'signs which were in agitation; and that he 'had communicated to Essex the private Trans'actions relating to his Embassy in France.' He confessed, 'That at the Earl's Request he had gi'ven him a Journal of what had pass'd during his 'Administration: That he was present only at 'one Meeting: That he had always laugh'd at 'their Projects as so many Chimera's, and con'sider'd them as the Dreams of a crazy Brain; 'That he was afraid to reveal any thing that 'Essex and Persons of his Figure were concern'd 'in, for he hated the Character of an Informer, 'and was in great hopes they would change 'these wild and indiscreet Measures, for better 'and more sober Resolutions, since as yet no'thing had been determin'd or fix'd on; or else, 'that he might take a fairer Opportunity, and 'less suspected, for disclosing their Purposes, after 'he had got again into France.' However, he Sentenc'd to the Tower. was by the common Vote of them all order'd to the Tower, and briskly reprimanded, as one that deserv'd the Severity of the Law.

There was a Verdict likewise about this time John Danvers, a notable Cheat, punish'd.
passed in the Star-Chamber, which having a relation to the present Cause, ought not therefore to be omitted in this place. I took notice before of the Earl's having complain'd that some Letters of his had been counterfeited. There was an Inquiry made into this Business, and it produced a very remarkable Discovery. The Countess of Essex apprehending that in Times so troublesome, neither her Husband nor herself were free from Danger, concealed some particular Letters which she had received from him, in a certain Cabinet, which she committed to the Care of one Mrs. Rihove a Dutchwoman: She hid them somewhere in her House; but by chance John Daniel, her Husband, found and read them over; and observing there was something in them which might affect the Earl's Safety, and provoke the Queen, he got them transcribed by one who was very dexterous in the Imitation of Hands and Characters: And just upon the Countess's lying in, he told her, That he would most certainly deliver them into the Hands of the Earl's Adversaries, unless she would immediately give him 3000 l. The Countess, to avoid the Hazard, paid him down directly the Sum of 1170 l. which as large as it was, procured her only the bare Copies; the Impostor, it seems, having a Design to put off the Originals at a round rate to the Earl's Adversaries. He was for this Cheat condemn'd to perpetual Imprisonment, fined 3000 l. whereof 2000 was adjudged to the Countess, and to have his Ears nailed to the Pillory, with this Inscription, A most notorious Impostor.

Not long before this, the Scotch Ambassadors, the Earls of Mar and Kinloss (whom I observed before to have come something of the latest) were introduced to the Queen, and after a Compliment of Congratulation, upon the happy Prevention of the Effects of this Rebellion, they had some Discourse with her Majesty upon the Business of Valentine Thomas's escaping condign Punishment, and the Fraud that was practised in carrying

1601. Ann.44.

carrying off two Englishmen, William Evers and Ashfield, from Scotland. They likewise demanded the Assignment of a certain Portion of Land in England for the King's Use: The Answer given them was; 'That their Gratulatory Address was 'very acceptable, and that the Queen wished 'the Scotch might never transcribe so bad a 'Copy; or if such a Commotion should happen, 'that one Day might put an end to it, as it had 'done to this: That Valentine Thomas was par'don'd on purpose to prevent the opening of a 'closed Wound; forasmuch as a Slander, be it 'never so false and ill-grounded, finds Credit and 'Countenance easily enough with bad Men: That 'Evers had render'd himself suspected of ill De'signs, by his flat Denials and false Protestations: 'That Ashfield was a Man of pernicious Principles, 'and had trick'd the Warden of the March, and 'got a Licence to travel into Scotland; and that 'the Warden had paid him in his own Coin, and 'fetch'd him back again: That to harbour the 'seditious Subjects of another Prince, was the 'same thing with raising Troubles and Commo'tions at home. As to the Assignment of such 'a Portion of Land, the Queen said, she had 'given a sufficient Answer before; however she 'condescended to advance a yearly Augmenta'tion of 2000*l.* as long as the King maintain'd 'a firm Alliance with her, and did not listen 'to the Suggestions of such as valued their own 'peculiar above the publick Concernment.'

Queen's Answer to the Scotch Ambassadors.

Privateers built in England.

The Spanish Gallies lying at Sluis, did at this time infest the Coast of Kent, but more especially the Holland and Zealand Ports; insomuch that the Queen built several Privateers, and mann'd them with Persons freed from the several Jails; and the Londoners contributed very liberally to the Design, tho', as it happen'd, to little purpose. However, to free themselves from any Apprehensions on the score of these Gallies, the Confederate Provinces were so careful as to send an Army once more into Flanders, to seize the Sconces about Ostend, and so ravage the Country round about with the more Freedom; besides that they would by that means secure Contributions from those Parts, get the Sea-Port Towns of Flanders under their Power, and prevent the Enemies Gallies from receiving any Harbour or Protection thereabouts: And the better to conceal their Design, and divert the Enemy, they thought convenient to send Grave Maurice at the same time into Gelderland to besiege Rhynberck. They acquainted the Queen herewith by Sir Fr. Vere, and desired her to permit 4000 Men to be raised in England, and transported at their Charge; to which the Queen gave her Consent. But before Vere was returned out of England, Maurice was marched towards Berk, and the Archduke Albert had besieged Ostend; insomuch that the States were now obliged to go upon new Measures, and endeavour rather to preserve Ostend, than to take any of the Spanish Forts: In order to which they conferred on Vere the Title of General of all the Forces within and without Ostend; and gave him an absolute Authority and Commission. From Berck they sent for twenty Companies of English; but Grave Maurice having already begun the Siege, and expecting the Enemy would attack him, sent but eight Companies, under the Command of Sir Horace Vere, and that with some Reluctancy. Sir Francis Vere, relying on their Promise, that the rest should follow soon after, and that he should have a sufficient Recruit of Provisions, arrived in July at Ostend by Night, over against the old Town, in a Place that lay much exposed to the Enemies Shot, they having just before his coming, blocked up the Haven: And 'twas not long after that Sir Edward Cecil, as young a Soldier as he was, ventured upon a bold Exploit, and relieved the Besieged with Men, Victuals, and Ammunition.

Archduke Albert besieges Ostend.

Ostend, which was within a very late Remembrance no better than a poor Fishing-Town, was, at the beginning of the Troubles in the Low-Countries, first pallisadoed, and then strengthned with a Garrison, and fortified with many Works, as affording a very commodious Haven: By which means Sir John Conway, and after him Sir John Norris, did so annoy Flanders, that the Prince of Parma was forced to lay Siege to it, tho' to little purpose. La Motte attempted it by Stratagem, but was beaten off with considerable loss, and the Archduke Albert surrounded it with 17 Sconces; but the Garrisons to be maintained in these proving no less burdensome to Flanders than the Enemies, and the Haven being thought convenient for the Spanish Gallies, and likely to spoil the Navigation of the Zelanders and English, the Spaniards resolved to get it into their Hands at any rate; and the States were as resolutely bent to defend and preserve it; and to say truth, this Age cannot afford an Instance of a Siege so bravely carried on, and so stoutly opposed; there was never more Men killed on the like occasion, nor any Service that continued so long: But I shall not stand to give you a second Journal of the Siege, which is to be had in Print; it shall suffice to glance a little on the following Particulars.

Ostend describ'd.

Spaniards attempt it several ways.

Sir Francis Vere, finding his Forces considerably diminish'd by frequent Sallies from the Town, when it had now been besieged for five Months, besides the Damage done by the Enemies Shot, and the Sickness which raged in the Place, and tha Sea having at the same time swallowed up one part of the old Town, their Provision likewise growing short, and the Winds proving so contrary, as to give them no hope of any Supplies which had often been demanded; and he being moreover informed, that the Enemy design'd to make a general Assault upon the Town, desired to capitulate with the Archduke about Conditions for a Surrender; and Hostages being exchanged on both Sides, Commissioners were sent to manage this Affair. But General Vere had no other Intention but to spin out the time, and feed them with the hopes of a Surrender, till some fresh Recruits were sent in to him; so that he dismissed the Commissioners with baffled Expectations, and excused himself by that military Axiom; That to impose upon an Enemy, has a mixture in it of Pleasure and Convenience, as well as Equity. He used likewise a sharp piece of Raillery with them, and said, He hoped they would excuse him if he should find himself obliged to play the same Game a second time; since he could not in Honour act otherwise, when he had received the Supplies he wanted, and all other Necessaries. The Archduke was touch'd to the Quick at this Procedure, and taxed Vere as a Person that was like to gain a Conquest by Craft sooner than Courage; and fourteen Days after, he plaid 18 great Pieces of Cannon upon the Counterscarps for the whole Day; in the Evening he forced 2000 old Soldiers to make an Assault upon the old Town at Low-water, and sent some Troops of Horse after them to press them forward: But General Vere, who appear'd with his Brother Sir Horace in Places of greatest Danger, with a select Party, bravely beat them off three several times. Those that were to make the Attack upon the East-side of the Town, came something too late, but retired seasonably upon the coming in of the Tide, though not without some Damage. They who were appointed to attack the Fort Helmont, and another called the Hedge-Hog, with the English For-Briskly assaulted.

1601. Ann. 44.

Fortification, made a shift to gain them with little Trouble, the Soldiers being called off to the Defence of other Places; but they were soon obliged to quit them again: Two thousand were dispatched to an Avenue on the West, called the Gullet, and made themselves Masters of an Half-Moon which was abandon'd; but they were soon dislodged from thence, and several of them perished, whilst to avoid drowning, they fled away in Confusion: There were planted on the West-Gate nine Pieces of Cannon, which continually discharged such terrible Showers of Chain-shot and Pieces of Iron, with other destructive Materials, on those who stormed the Western Bulwark and the Sand-Hill, that they fell in great Numbers; and the Tide happening to flow in upon them in the midst of the Assault, they were struck with such a Consternation, that they threw away their Arms, Ladders, and Draw-Bridges, and left themselves to the Fury of the Waves, and the Swords of the Enemies, who were ready to sally out upon them. The Archduke was not so far discouraged by this terrible Slaughter of his Men, but he still continued the Siege, tho' with poor hopes of gaining the Town, since he was neither capable of cutting off Supplies from it, nor of springing any Mines, by reason there were so many Works and Rampires round the Town. But Vere, having now repaired those Parts which were batter'd and damag'd, was call'd away by the States, who thought good to change the Governor, and sent fresh Recruits every five Months; and so he was succeeded by Frederick Dorp: And both he, and those who came after him, defended the Town for three Years and about an hundred Days, against all that the Enemy, or rather the Sea, could do, to oppose them. It had been happy for the Soldiers if the Sea had broke in and swallowed it up; for this Place proved the common Grave (tho' indeed a most glorious Monument at the same time) to the best Soldiers in the Low-Countries, Spain, France, England, Scotland, and Italy, whilst they fought all the while for a meer barren and fruitless Plot of Ground. But this Account is more proper for the History of the Netherlands. However it will not misbecome our English Annals to insert the Names of such as died at, or else bravely maintain'd this long Siege, and by that means recommended their Names to Posterity: Among the last we are obliged to take particular notice of the two Veres, Sir Edward Cecil, and Sir John Ogle; and among the former, the most considerable Persons were Sir Charles Fairfax Kt. Colonel Lawrence, Dutton, and Drake, Serjeant-Major Carpenter, Holcroft, Jeffery Dutton, Grevil, Wilford, Humphreys, Drake, Broughton, Herbert, Frost, Maddison, Gerard, Butler, Rogers, Dennis, and Conigrave, all Captains. Nor ought we to omit the mention of John Carew of Antony, a young Cornish Gentleman, who having his Arm shot off in a Salley, and carried a great distance from him, took it up as if he felt no Pain; and whilst his Fellows were bemoaning the Disaster, brought it in his other Hand into the Town, and shewed it to the Surgeon, with this Expression; Look, here is the Hand which but to day at Dinner-time serv'd the Occasions of the whole Body.

Bravely defended.

Governor changed.

English slain at this Siege.

Fr. King comes to Calais.

This Siege brought the French King to Calais, from whence is the shortest Passage to England, in order to secure the Frontiers of his Kingdom; which the Queen no sooner heard of, but she sent Sir Thomas Edmunds to pay him a Visit of Congratulation. He, in return of her Complaisance, sent Marshal Biron, with D'Arverne, D'Aumont, and several other Noblemen, into England. The Queen happening at that time to take the Country Air at Basing, welcom'd them into the Kingdom, and gave them so favourable and gracious a Reception, that they went as high as possible in the Commendations both of her Eloquence and Generosity.

1601. Ann. 44.

But forasmuch as certain French Writers have mention'd, that the Queen shewed to Biron and the other Gentlemen the Earl of Essex's Skull in her Closet; or, as others affirm, fixed upon a Pole, it must needs be a Story as ridiculous as false, since that was interred with his Body. 'Tis certain indeed, that in some Discourses with the Marshal, she taxed Essex as highly ungrateful, and no less obstinate and indiscreet, for not asking her Pardon: And she took occasion from thence to express her Desires, that the French King would rather use in time such a sort of Rigour mixed with Mercy, than such a Clemency as might prove fatal to his Government, whenever he had occasion to demand the Lives of Traitors, who fought for nothing but publick Change and Disorder.

Queen's Discourse with Biron.

And this Advice might have awed Biron out of those desperate Designs he was at this very time forming against his Prince, had he not been under the Power of a strong Infatuation: But he was so blinded by the Fate which pursued him, that in a very few Months he suffer'd the same Punishment that Essex had done before him.

The Queen, upon her Return from her Progress, held a Parliament at Westminster, wherein, among other things, several good Laws were made for the Relief of the Poor, and of maimed and disabled Soldiers and Seamen; against fraudulent Guardians and Trustees, the Cheats and Impositions of Clothiers, and the Robberies and Outrages committed upon the Borders of the Kingdom towards Scotland. But whereas great Complaints were made in the Lower House, relating to the Engrossing Practice, (for it seems there were some who under the colour of publick Good, but in reality to the great Damage of the Kingdom, had got the Queen's Letters-Patents, for the sole Privilege and Liberty of vending some particular Sorts of Wares) the Queen therefore, to forestal them, published a Proclamation, declaring those Grants to be null and void, and also left them to be tried at common Law: A Method which was so acceptable to the Lower House, that Eighty of that Body were appointed to wait upon her Majesty with their humble Thanks, which the Speaker was to present in the Name of them all. She received them very graciously, and gave her Answer in the following Speech.

A Parliament called.

Several good Laws made.

Gentlemen,

Queen's Speech.

I owe you my best Thanks and Acknowledgments for your Respects towards me, not only for your good Inclination, but those clear and publick Expressions thereof, which have discovered themselves in retrieving me from a Mistake into which I have been betray'd, not so much by the Fault of my Will, as the Error of my Judgment. This had unavoidably drawn a Blemish upon me, (who account the Safety of my People my chief Happiness) had you not made me acquainted with the Practices of these lewd Harpies and Horse-leeches. I would sooner lose my Heart or Hand, than that either should consent to allow such Privileges to Engrossers, as may turn to the Detriment of my People. I am not so blinded with the Lustre of a Crown, as to let the Scale of Justice be weighed down by that of an Arbitrary Power. The gay Title of Prince may deceive such as know nothing of the Secret of Governing, as a gilded Pill may impose upon the Patient: But I am not one of those unwary Princes; for I am very sensible that I ought to govern for the publick Good, and not to regard my own Particular; and that I stand accountable to another another and greater Tribunal: I account myself very happy, that by God's Assistance I have hitherto enjoy'd so prosperous a Government in all respects; and that he has blessed me with such Subjects, for whom I could be contented to lay down my Crown and Life: I must intreat you, that let others be guilty of what Faults or Misdemeanors soever, they may not thro' any Misrepresentation be laid at my door. I hope the Evidence of a good Conscience will in all respects bear me out. You cannot be ignorant that the Servants of Princes have too often an eye to their own Advantage; that their Faults are often concealed from their Notice, and that they cannot, if they would, inspect all things, when the Weight and Business of a whole Kingdom lies on their Shoulders.

1601. Ann. 44.

The Death of the E. of Pembroke.

About the beginning of this Year died Henry Herbert Earl of Pembroke, the Son of William, who was created Knight of the Garter, an. 1574, and made President of the Council in the Marches of Wales upon the Death of his Father-in-law, Sir Henry Sidney: By whose Daughter, Mary by name, a Lady much addicted to Poetry and other pleasant Studies, he had William, the present Earl of Pembroke, who succeeded to his Father's Title; Philip now Earl of Montgomery, and Anne, who died whilst she was very young.

L. Norris.

About the same time departed likewise Henry Lord Norris of Ricot, who was by K. Henry VIII, restored to his Estate, after his Father was put to Death, with some strict Conditions relating to the Estate of his Grandmother, who was one of the Heirs of Viscount Lovel; but he was more firmly settled in it by Queen Elizabeth, who was pleased to make him a Baron upon his Discharge of an Embassy into France, with great Commendations for his good Managery. He had by Mary, his Wife, one of the Heiresses of John Lord Williams of Tame, (who in Henry VIII's Reign was Treasurer of the Court of Augmentations, and a Privy-Counsellor to Queen Mary, and very much in her Favour) a Race of Children that proved Men of extraordinary Spirit and Courage, viz. William, his eldest Son, Marshal of Berwick, who died in Ireland, and left behind him his Son Francis, who enjoy'd the Title of his Grandfather: John, whom I have frequently mention'd; Thomas President of Munster, and for some time Lord-Justice of Ireland, who died of a slight Wound for want of due Care: Henry, who died about the same time by the very same Disaster; and Edward, the Governour of Ostend, who was the only Son that survived his Parents.

L. Willoughby.

Within a few Days after him died Peregrine Berty, Lord Willoughby of Eresby, Governour of Berwick, who had passed thro' all the Offices of a Commander both in the Low-Countries and France with great Commendations: Robert, his Son by the Lady Mary, Sister to Edward Earl of Oxford, succeeded him both in Honour and Estate.

'Tis now convenient to turn our Prospect towards the Affairs of Ireland. About this time there was issued out a Proclamation pursuant to an Act made in Henry VII's Reign, forbidding the carrying any English Money into Ireland, because the Rebels secured a great part of what went over to buy up Arms and Ammunition; or else the Merchants transported it from thence into foreign Parts, to the great Detriment of England; 'twas therefore taken into Consideration, the altering the Irish Coin, by mixing with it some Alloy of Brass, forasmuch as the War there drained this Kingdom of an annual Sum of Consultation about the Irish Coin.

160000*l.* Sterling. By this means some were of opinion, 'That the Expences of the War might 'be lessen'd: That all the good Money might 'be drawn out of Ireland into England by Bills of 'Exchange, and on consequence the Rebels lose 'their Trade with Foreigners, when the good 'Money failed, which must needs weaken them 'very much.' Others maintain'd the contrary, 'That this Alteration of the Coin would turn 'to the Queen's Dishonour, and the Detriment 'of the Kingdom: That the good Money could 'not be drawn out of Ireland without a vast Expence to the Queen: That should there be a 'new Coin in England, the Profit arising thereby would not balance the Charge of bringing 'the old Money over; and the Profit would be 'less, were it coin'd in Ireland, where they must 'be forced to set up a Mint at vast Charges, and 'hire Workmen at excessive Rates: Nor would 'this in the least prevent the Rebels Correspondence with Foreigners, as long as there was 'any Silver in new Coin, and the Merchant 'knew the way to separate it, since 'tis much 'the same to him whether he receives one Piece 'of Coin or three of the same Value; and that 'it was to be feared the Soldiers would mutiny 'upon this account, forasmuch as their Pay 'would be considerably lessen'd.'

Altered quickly.

But Buckhurst, the Lord-Treasurer, a Person well versed in Affairs of this kind, got the Queen's Leave, upon pleading a Necessity, which generally governs the present Occasion, for altering the Money for a certain time, and then reducing it to its old Standard. The Queen herself was averse to this Motion, saying often, That it would reflect upon herself, and disoblige her Army. However the Soldiers continued quiet and in good order, an Happiness peculiar to the Queen, who had a way of Commanding by a Power mixed with great Love and Tenderness for her People. But without doubt it proved a very great Prejudice to the Army; and whether it turned to her Majesty's Advantage or not, I cannot tell. However it could not but fetch in a vast Gain to the Pay-masters and Officers of the Treasury; and perhaps it owed its Contrivance to the Avarice of that sort of Men, which is usually very ingenious where any thing is to be got.

As soon as the Lord-Deputy was informed of this Resolution, he got his Forces together early in the Spring, to prevent Mutiny, or any other ill Effects of Idleness; and before they could be well formed into a regular Body, he marched with those he had ready, to Moghery; where he kept them closely employed: for he ordered the Trees to be cut down, and a Passage made thro' a thick Wood, and there he built a Fort. He then drove the Mac-Genises out of Lecale, when they had possessed themselves of it, and took in all the Rebels Castles, as far as Armagh, into which City he also put a strong Garrison: And so great Advances did he make this Summer, that he removed Tir-Oen from Blackwater, where he had very commodiously encamp'd himself. Mean while, John O-Dogherti being dead in Tirconnel, the Lord-Deputy declared his Son to be his Heir, because his Father held his Estate according to the Laws of England; and he deliver'd it into the Hands of Hugh Boy and Phelim Reaugh, his Guardians, who were entrusted with the Care of his Education: O-Neal Garve was mightily nettled at this, and presently seized upon the young Gentleman's Estate, as pretending a rightful Claim thereto; as if he imagin'd himself the sole Proprietor of the Lands of Tirconnel, and all the People in it. And he very much stomach'd the Lord-Deputy's being of a contrary Opinion, though he had resolved to carry himself impartially on both sides. However Sir Henry Docwray gave O-Neal Garve such fine Words and fair Promises, that he got him over to the English Party; and to find him some Work, he fell upon Mac-Swine Fanagh, a principal Man among the Rebels, and carried off a rich Booty, which he nevertheless vertheless restored to him, upon his Submission, taking the Oath, and Delivery of Hostages: But upon his revolting a second time, he hung him up in Effigy, and after having spoiled his Country, drove him to that Extremity, that he gave Hostages once more, and continued ever after a peaceable Subject. After this he wasted a small Country in Tir-Oen, called Slewgh-Art, a Place full of Woods and Bogs, and about fifteen Miles in length, by the Direction of Neal Garve. He then took Derry-Castle, and put Garrisons into Newton and Aimogh.

Docwray routs Mac Swines.

1601. Ann. 44.

Takes the Castle of Derry,

The Lord-Deputy, upon his Return to Black-water, sent for him; but for want of Necessaries, and the Enemy having blocked up all the Ways, he was not able to get to him. Whereupon the Deputy advised him, not without some Appearance of Resentment, to repair this Neglect, by some Service that might make amends for it; which indeed he failed not to do, upon the first handsome Occasion: For, being informed by Neal Garve, that the Soldiers were drawn out of Tir-Connell, to march against the Lord-Deputy; and that the Monastery of Donnegal, near Balishanon, had none but a few religious Persons in it, he sent him thither with 500 English, who with great Ease made themselves Masters of the Place. O-Donel, upon the Lord-Deputy's Return, marched with all his Forces to Donnegal, who had furnished themselves with burning Firebrands to destroy the English. There were 30 Days spent in resolutely maintaining the Siege, and there was as much Noise and Shouting, as if they had got an absolute Victory; for it happen'd, that the Monastery took Fire, and was burnt down in the Night, but yet did the English maintain themselves with great Resolution.

and Donnegal.

Reports of the Spaniards Design on Munster.

Whilst Matters went on with good Success in these Parts, the Lord-Deputy received several Letters of Information, and built on a much more certain Foundation, than some Reports he had heard before of the same kind, that the Spaniards were making for Munster. Hereupon he was obliged to drop his Design, and to think of securing Ireland from a foreign Invasion, rather than the Effects of an intestine War. But however, to prevent the Loss of what he had already gained, he first fortified the Garrisons in Ulster, and then made the best of his way to Munster, having with him only two Cornets of Horse, the Infantry being order'd to follow with their Commanders. Tir-Oen and O-Donel did likewise hasten thither as fast as they could, by secret and unknown ways, having now broken up the Siege of Donnegal: Upon which Sir H. Docwray march'd immediately by Land, and relieved the Garrison of Donnegal. He placed two Companies in Asherow, under the Command of Edward Diggs, who took Balishanon in a little time; a Place which they principally aim'd at: And he was now pretty even with the Irish, for their Treachery in betraying Newton and the Castle of Derry.

Balishanon taken.

The War being now transplanted into Munster, the Series both of Time and Fact obliges me to pursue the Scene. Tir-Oen and the Rebels of Munster had, by their Emissaries, Matthew Oviedo a Spaniard, nominated by his Holiness for Archbishop of Dublin, the Bishop of Clonfort, the Bishop of Killaloe, and one Archer a Jesuit, got the King of Spain's Promise, that Succours should be sent to the Rebels in Munster, under the Conduct of Don Juan d'Aquila; a full Assurance having been given, that all Munster should revolt, and that the titular Earl of Desmond, and Florence Mac-Carty, should bring in a considerable Number to their Assistance. In the mean time the President, Sir George Carew, to prevent this, immediately impeach'd the said titular Earl, whom he had lately seized in a private Place; where being forsaken of all his Friends, he had very advantageously conceal'd himself. This he did, because should he have died without a Trial, his Estate could not have been forfeited by the common Law without an Act of Parliament. After he was condemned of Treason, he declar'd, That he took up Arms for the Restoration of Popery, and the Estate of his Ancestors; and that he was incited thereto by the Insults of the newly-arriv'd English, the late Exactions put upon arable Lands, and the way used in England of trying by a Jury of twelve Men; besides, that he was buoy'd up, with the Expectation of Supplies from Spain which by the Archbishop's account he knew were ready to arrive, he having been sent into Spain in February: Besides, that the same was confirm'd by Florence Mac-Carty: The President likewise discovered, that there had passed a Conference between Tir-Oen, the said Archbishop, and others, about the most convenient Place where the Spaniards might land in Ireland; and that they had jointly resolved that Munster was the most proper Part of the Kingdom for that Design, tho' they could not agree as to the particular Port: Some thought it the best way to seize first upon Limerick, as lying near to Connaught and Leimster, and not very far from Ulster, and therefore very conveniently situated for joining their Forces; besides that 'twas remote enough from England to prevent any Alarm from the English Fleet. However, Donat Mac-Cormack affirm'd, That Florence Mac-Carty did for good Reasons give the Preference to Cork, as being a more convenient Haven, and a City weaker, and so less defensible; so that the Spaniards might from thence directly make an Attack upon Barry, Roch, Cormach, Mac-Dermont, and Mac-Carty Reogh, who stood firm to the Government; and either draw them to their Party, or else seize upon their Estates. Hereupon the President judged it upon all accounts the best way to surprize Florence, though he had formerly granted him Letters of Protection, and an Act of Indemnity for his Life: And having secured him, after many Attempts of his to escape, he sent him with Desmond into England; by reason he had wronged a certain Creditor, contrary to the Purport of his Protection: And being now at length most certainly informed of an Invasion from Spain, which he could not make either the Lord-Deputy or the Council in England believe: He order'd Provisions and Necessaries to be brought from all Parts into Cork, convened an Assembly of the Province there, and seized on some seditious and suspected Persons, to prevent any Mischief that they might occasion. He took Hostages from others, and managed Matters with that Conduct and Circumspection, that the Town was supplied with Provisions, to hold out a Siege of several Months. He likewise received a seasonable Supply of 2000 Men from England.

Earl of Desmond taken.

As is Florence Macarty.

The President having, in the midst of September, received a most certain Account of the Spaniards being under Sail, did immediately give the Lord-Deputy notice of it; who being arrived at Kilkenny, sent for the President thither: He therefore appointed Charles Wilmot Governor of Cork, and then hasten'd away to the Lord-Deputy. They immediately held a Consultation, whether the Lord-Deputy, who was attended but with a small Retinue, and had no Life-Guard, should return back, or stay at Kilkenny, till his Forces were got together. Some thought it best for him to return, and that it was not consistent with the Grandour of a Lord-Deputy, to go forward with so poor a Train: The President was very positive in the contrary Opinion, viz. 'That he could neither stay there, 'nor return, without being taxed as timorous 'and faint-hearted; as well as hazarding the 'Defection of the whole Province: And that 'Niceties and Punctilio's are to be dispensed 'with, where the Safety of a Kingdom lyes at 'Stake. 'Twas requisite therefore he should ad-'vance forward, and use his Authority, as Lord-'Deputy, against such as were inclinable to re-'volt; who would not only in all Probability 'remain more fixed to their Duty, when over-'awed by the Lord-Deputy's Presence, who had 'been so famous for his happy Successes; but 'would most certainly revolt, should he return 'back. Some were of opinion, That the best 'way was, for the Lord-Deputy to march for-'ward, as far as Clonmel on the Edge of the Pro-'vince, and not venture farther, till his Forces 'arrived.' But the President offering him a Guard of 200 Horse, and assuring him that Cork was plentifully furnished with all Necessaries, he advanced on with a great deal of Chearfulness.

L. Deputy inform'd of the Spaniards coming.

1601. Ann. 44.

Spaniards arrive in Ireland.

In the mean while, the Spanish Fleet, which could not reach Cork Haven, by reason the Wind slacken'd, enter'd the Mouth of Kinsale Harbour on the 23d of September, and landed their Forces. Whereupon Sir Richard Percy, who commanded the Town with 150 Men, being not strong enough to oppose them, immediately retreated, according to his Instructions, with his Men, to Cork. The Spaniards finding the Gates open, enter'd with 35 Colours flying, and were congratulated by the Inhabitants; the Mayor going before them with his Staff, and performing the Office of a Quarter-Master in assigning 'em their several Quarters. The President order'd all the Cattle and Beasts for Service, that were on this side the River Averley, to be driven away; and sent Flower with 400 Foot with light Arms, to spoil the Country all about: And he likewise found it requisite to augment his Army, by listing every where a great Number of Citizens and Townsmen; not that they were likely to do much Service, but as they would serve for Hostages; besides the Apprehensions, that whilst they lay at home, and had nothing to do, they might through their great Fondness for Popery, or their natural Respects for the Spaniards, whose Descendents they affect to be thought, be induced to revolt, and deliver up the several Towns to the Enemy.

President's Care of things.

Don Juan d'Aquila, who was General of the Spaniards, with the Character of The Catholick King's Captain or Superintendant-General in the Holy War, for the Preservation of the Faith in Ireland, put out some Manifesto's; wherein he endeavour'd to possess the People, That Queen Elizabeth was, by several Censures of the Bishop of Rome, deprived of her Crown: That her Subjects were absolved from their Oaths of Allegiance; and that the Spaniards were come to deliver Ireland from the Power of Satan. For after this rate he expressed himself, and the Humour took so well, as to procure the Coming in of a great many loose Fellows to his Party. The Lord-Deputy having gather'd together what Forces he could from all Parts, immediately fell upon the Siege of Kingsale: And having disposed of his Army all about it, he judged it of absolute Necessity to take Kincurran, a Castle upon the Haven, and near the Town, wherein were placed 150 Spaniards; because of its being so convenient for defending the English Fleet, as well as annoying the Spaniards, if they should be obliged to return. This Place was soon forced by the President to surrender upon Discretion; for being made Lieutenant-General of the Army, he forthwith mounted his great Guns, and repulsed the Spaniards both by Sea and Land, who came to relieve it.

Kincurran-Castle taken.

Much about the same time was the Haven blocked up by the Vice-Admiral, Sir Richard Levison, who was sent from England with two or three of the Queen's Ships, to hinder them from bringing Succours to it: And the English began to shoot briskly into the Town from their great Cannon, and besieged it more closely and vigorously than before. Notwithstanding, the Briskness of their Attacks was something abated, in regard Levison was forced to draw off his Seamen and make Sail against 2000 Spaniards, who were landed at Bere-Haven, Baltimore, and Castlehaven; five of whose Ships he sunk.

Some Spanish Ships sunk.

The President was at the same time dispatch'd from the Camp, with some Troops, to prevent O-Donell's joining with these new Succours from Spain; but the Ground being hard frozen, he got by Night, and through some By-paths to the Spaniards. And 'twas not long after, that Tir-Oen himself, with O-Rork, Reimund Burk, Mac-Mahon, Randal Mac-Surley, Tirell Baron of Killey, and some others of the principal Men among the Rebels, appear'd in view: With whom Alphonso O-Campo having join'd the Spaniards, that were just landed, (both Parties together making up 6000 Foot, and 500 Horse,) they were big with the Thoughts of an assured Victory; because their Troops were more in Number, and their Men fresher and less fatigued, and every way furnish'd with all Necessaries. Whereas the English were miserably harrassed with a Winter's Siege, their Provisions short, and their Horses almost spent with hard Service and slack Provender.

Tir-Oen joins the Spaniards.

The Lord-Deputy carried on the Siege amidst all those Disadvantages, with wonderful Vigour and Resolution, and strengthned his Camp with new Works. On the 21st of September, Tir-Oen appeared with his Forces upon an Hill; and having fixed his Camp there, he shewed himself likewise the Day following. The next Night, the Spaniards made a Sally from the Town, and the Irish endeavour'd to possess themselves of it; but they were both repulsed. On the 23d of December, some Letters were intercepted from d'Aquila to Tir-Oen, wherein he desires that the Spaniards who were newly arrived, might be put into the Town, and an Assault be made on both sides at once, upon the English Camp. The same Night, when the Moon was just rising, the Lord-Deputy order'd Sir Henry Poer to make a Detachment of eight Companies of old Soldiers, and to dispose them in order of Battle, on the West-side of the Camp. Sir Henry Greames, who was upon the Scout that Night with a Party of Horse, gave the Lord-Deputy notice, very early in the Morning, that the Rebels would certainly advance; because he observed so many Matches lighted in their Camp. Hereupon a general Alarm was forthwith sounded, and Troops dispatch'd away to all those Posts, where there was any Access to the Town. The Lord-Deputy, with the President, and the Marshal Sir Rich. Wingfield, marched towards the Centry, and by Sir Oliver Lambert's Advice, look'd out an advantagious Place to receive the Enemy: There were sent thither the Regiments of Sir Henry Folliot and Sir Oliver St. John, with 600 Marines under the Command of Sir Richard Levison. Tir-Oen, who had design'd, as afterwards it appear'd, to conduct the Spaniards and 800 Irish, by the Favour of the Night, into Kingsale, at break of Day discover'd the Marshal and Sir H. Danvers, with their Troops of Horse, and Poer at the Foot of the Hill, with his Regiment of Foot: Being therefore baulked of his Design, he made an Halt, and soon after made his Hautboys sound a Retreat.

d'Aquila's Letters intercepted.

1601. Ann. 44.

Rebels retreat, and are pursu'd.

As ſoon as the Lord-Deputy received an Account that they retreated in Confuſion, he gave Orders to purſue them, and marched himſelf at the Head of his Troops, the better to obſerve their Retreat: But there happen'd to ariſe ſo thick a Fog and ſo violent a Rain, that for ſome time they loſt ſight of them; but ſoon after the Weather cleared up, and he could diſcover that they made a very precipitant Retreat in three large Bodies, and were cover'd by their Horſe: He therefore reſolved to engage them, and ſent back the Preſident with three Cornets of Horſe, to prevent the Spaniards ſallying out of the Town if they ſhould attempt it. The Lord-Deputy purſued them ſo briſkly, that he forced them to make an Halt on the ſide of a large marſhy Bog, at which they could not come but they muſt paſs a Fort: But the Horſe which guarded it being defeated by the Bravery of the Marſhal and the Earl of Clan-Richard, the Engliſh made a reſolute Attack upon the Enemies Horſe; and being joined by Sir William Godolphin, who commanded the Lord-Deputy's Wing, Sir Henry Danvers, Minſham, Taffe, Fleming, and Sir John Berkley Major-General, they renewed the Aſſault with that Vigour, as to put the Enemy's Horſe to flight. It was not thought adviſeable to purſue them, but they rather choſe to rally their Forces and break in upon the main Body of the Enemy's Army, which was in ſo great a Conſternation, that they eaſily made their way through it. Mean while, Tirel with his Forces, and the Spaniards, kept their Ground, and the Lord Deputy brought up his Rear againſt them; and that he might ſhew himſelf an active Soldier as well as an expert General, he charged them with three Companies of Sir Oliver St. John's, under the Command of Roe, and gave them ſuch an Overthrow, that they made a confuſed Retreat to the Iriſh, who immediately abandoned them to the Swords of the Lord Deputy's Troops of Horſe, under the Command of Sir Henry Godolphin, which made a prodigious Slaughter of them. Tir-Oen, O-Donel, and the reſt, fled away as faſt as they could, ſome one way, and ſome another, every one throwing down his Arms, and ſhifting for himſelf. Don Alphonſo O-Campo was taken Priſoner, with three Spaniſh Commanders, and ſix *Enſigns; there were 1200 Men killed, and nine Colours taken, whereof ſix belonged to the Spaniards. The Engliſh loſt but few, but had a great many wounded, and among the reſt, Sir Henry Danvers, Sir William Godolphin and Crofts; ſo very cheap, and yet ſo conſiderable a Victory was this to the Engliſh.

A great Battel on Dec. 21.

* Alferez.

The Lord-Deputy having order'd the Retreat to be ſounded, and Thanks to be return'd to God, over the Bodies of the Slain, conferred the Honour of Knighthood on the Earl of Clan-Richard for his Courage and Service, and return'd to the Camp with Acclamations of Joy and Triumph, finding it ſafe and no way diſorder'd: For the Spaniards in the Town, perceiving that all Poſts were well mann'd and ſecur'd, and had found by Experience, that all their Sallies had turn'd to their own Diſadvantage, were under a diſmal kind of Perplexity and Suſpence: And the Engliſh happen'd, as before, to have Fortune ſtill on their ſide; for the Wind ſtood in a Quarter that would not ſuffer the Reports of the Guns to be heard in the Town.

The good Effects of this Victory.

This Victory was glorious in itſelf, and conſiderable in its Conſequences upon many accounts; for Ireland, which was in a reeling kind of Poſture, and lean'd towards a Defection, was by this means reduc'd; the Spaniards were driven out of Ireland, the Head of the Rebellion, Tir-Oen, was forced into his uſual Places of Retreat in Ulſter; O-Donel was forced to fly into Spain, and the reſt of the Rebels were broken and diſperſed: Beſides which, the Queen's Authority was revived, the Inſolence of diſorderly Perſons curbed and reſtrained, Men of better Principles recovered from their Fears, and a perfect and laſting Peace was ſettled afterwards in all Parts of the Iſland. 1601. Ann. 44.

The next Day the Lord-Deputy commanded Joſias Bodley, the Surveyor of the Works, who had managed his Employment with great Bravery and Diligence during the Fight, to finiſh the Mount which was begun, and to carry on the Trenches nearer the Town: This was ſix Days a doing.

Mean while, D'Aquila ſent a Letter by a Trumpet to the Lord-Deputy, and deſired him to ſend ſome Perſons of Character into the Town, in order to a Capitulation: Sir William Godolphin was pitched on for this purpoſe; to whom D'Aquila ſignified, 'That he had found 'the Lord-Deputy an honourable, tho' a moſt 'inveterate Enemy: That the Iriſh were Weak, 'Uncourteous, and, he was afraid, Falſe and 'Treacherous: That his Catholick Majeſty had 'ſent him to the Aſſiſtance of two Earls, but he 'much queſtion'd if any ſuch were in being, 'ſince a ſingle Skirmiſh had drove one of them 'into Spain, and the other into the North; ſo 'that he could hear no News of either: He was 'therefore willing to treat of a Peace which 'might be advantagious to the Engliſh, provided 'it turned not to the Detriment of Spain, tho' 'he wanted nothing to maintain the Siege, and 'every Day expected freſh Succours to enable 'him to effect the Deſigns he came upon.'

Spaniards deſire to parley.

To be ſhort, after a ſmall Conference, the Spaniards and the Engliſh, who were both heartily weary of the Siege, agreed to the following Articles:

Articles of Capitulation.

'That the Spaniards ſhould deliver up Kingſale 'to the Lord-Deputy, with the Forts and Caſtles 'at Baltimore, Bere-Haven, and Caſtle-Haven: 'That they ſhould march out with their Wives, 'Goods, and Colours flying: That the Engliſh 'ſhould ſupply them with Ships at a reaſonable 'Rate, to tranſport them, at two Voyages, into 'Spain: That D'Aquila ſhould depart laſt: That 'they ſhould not act in a hoſtile manner againſt 'the Queen of England, till they were landed 'in Spain; and if in their Return they touched 'at any Engliſh Port, they ſhould be well and 'civilly treated: That if they lighted on any 'Engliſh Veſſels, they ſhould not be moleſted: 'That ſo long as they were obliged to tarry in 'Ireland for a Wind, they ſhould have what was 'neceſſary for their Money, and no Affronts nor 'Injuries offer'd to them; and for the Ships which 'were to tranſport them, Security ſhould be given, by the Delivery of three Hoſtages, ſuch 'as the Lord-Deputy ſhould approve of.'

The Forty Fifth Year of her Reign. 1602.

Spaniards deliver up the Forts, &c.

Theſe Articles being on the ſecond of January drawn up in Writing, and ſworn to on both Sides, the Spaniards took the Opportunity of good Weather, and ſet ſail from Ireland, their Forces being very much diminiſhed; and the Iriſh were very much diſturbed, that they had by Agreement ſurrender'd to the Engliſh all the Forts and Caſtles, with the Defence and Security of which they had been intruſted. But juſt as they were going to ſurrender Dunboy, O-Suillivant Beare, who had given them Charge of it, ſeized upon it of a ſudden, made it very ſtrong, and by his Letters perſuaded the Spaniards to return again. But the Preſident, for fear the Poſſeſſion of ſo

Except Dunboy.

convenient

1602. Ann. 45. convenient an Harbour should prove an Occasion of reviving the War, hastned thither by Sea, by reason the Land-Passage was very difficult, prevented Tirel, who was ready with some hired Forces to hinder his landing; and after a bloody Siege, he took the Fort, razed it to the Ground, and by that means cut off the Spaniards, whose Return was expected thither.

Rebels reduced. Nevertheless Eugenius O-Hegan, whom the Pope had design'd for the Bishoprick of Ross, by supplying them with Money, and feeding them with the Expectation of fresh Succours from Spain, did so far fix the Minds of such as waver'd in their Resolutions, that they still persisted in their Rebellion. But Wilmot, Governor in Kerry, and the two Brothers, Roger and Gawin Harvey, seized on their Castles in Carbury, and by driving away their Cattle, and putting many of them to the Sword, reduced them to better Order by Force. The President himself seized on Cormac Mac-Dermot by Surprize, who was a great Man in Muskery, and was supported by many Adherents. He was accused as an Abettor of Disturbances, and committed to Custody: But when he saw his Country ruined, his Castles seized on by the English (Wilmot having upon his Escape taken Muckron, his best Seat, as it was by chance all on fire) and his Son being a Prisoner in England, his Wife in Cork, and himself under a double Hazard both of Life and Fortune, he submitted himself, and begged Pardon, which was granted upon his producing Security for his good Behaviour.

Mean while, Samuel Bagnal put Tirel to flight, being lately arrived in Muskery with his Band of hireling Vagabonds, and seized upon his Castles, forced him away into the Mountains of Dermond. Wilmot did at the same time so warmly pursue the Knight of Kerry and his Associates, that they implor'd his Pardon and Protection in the most lamentable Tone imaginable. Tirel being pursued by the Lord Barry and Wilmot, got by some blind Ways into Leimster. Not long after, William-a-Burgh and Suillivant Bear, being surrounded with Fear and Difficulties, left Bear and Bantrey without any Defence, to the Arms of the English. On the other side, Captain Taffe, who was sent out by the President, hotly pursued Eugenius Mac-Carty and Donat Keogh in Carbery, and slew the Bishop, Eugenius O-Hegan, as he was fighting in the Croud with a Sword in one Hand, and a Breviary in t'other.

Bishop O-Heghan slain.

Altho' Ireland was now clear of the Spaniards, the Queen however, having a tender Regard to her Peoples Safety, sent out a Fleet of eight Ships from the Royal Navy, with some others of lesser Burden, to the Coasts of Spain, under the Command of Sir Richard Levison and Sir William Mounson, on purpose to divert the Spaniards from the Thoughts of a new Attempt upon Ireland. Levison set sail on the 19th of March, and Mounson followed him, having made a stay of some few Days, tho' to no purpose, to take the Low-Country Ships along with him. Mean while Levison fell upon a Fleet of 38 Spanish Vessels, with Plate in them from America, and attacked them with his small Squadron, but without effect. When Mounson came in with the rest of the Navy, they spoiled all the Trade on the Coast of Portugal. At length they had Intelligence that a vast Carack of 1600 Tuns, and richly laden from the East-Indies, was arrived at Sesimbria in Portugal near Cape-Spichel; and that there were eleven Gallies there at anchor, eight of them belonging to Spain, and assigned to Frederick Spinola for the Low-Country Service, and the other three were Portuguese Ships. Sesimbria is a small City situate upon a Bay within the Road, built with Stone and fortified with a Castle and twelve great Guns: The Carack lay just under the Fort, and the Gallies on the West-side the Road under a Rock, with their Stems foremost, and had each of them five Guns mounted, so that no Assault could be made without eminent Danger, by reason the Castle, the Carack and Gallies were all so well provided. However, Sir Richard Levison, by the Seamens Consent, was resolutely bent upon making an Assault, and to set the Carack on fire, if they could not take her.

Spanish Plate-Fleet attack'd, but in vain.

1602. Ann. 45.

A Carack and Gallies set on in the Port of Sesimbria.

The next Day therefore, having the advantage of a gentle Breeze, he, according to Agreement, set up a Flag on the Admiral's Main-Top, and Mounson put up another (as is usual at Sea) in the Vice-Admiral's Fore-Top; and entring not long after with five of the Queen's Ships into the Road, they came to anchor just over against the Gallies, and played upon them with their Guns so furiously, that after seven Hours the Marquess of Sancta Cruce retired with the Portuguese Gallies under his Command; but seing Spinola did not follow him, he returned again. But the Gallies being unable to stand the Brunt, endeavoured every one to provide for themselves by flight; two of them were taken and burnt; and there was found in them a great store of Powder design'd for the Netherlands; the rest being torn and batter'd, and most of the Slaves killed, with a great deal of Difficulty reached the Mouth of the River Tayo. Mounson was just preparing to set fire to the great Carack, but Levison prevented him, and advertised the Captain, by Sewall an old Seaman, That the Gallies he depended on were put to flight, and two of them taken; that he was now Master of the Road, and the Castle itself was not able to stand the Force of the English Ships; and how then should his Carack? If therefore they refused a good Treatment when 'twas offer'd them, they were like to be handled with the utmost Severity. The Captain desired some Gentlemen to be sent to him, with whom he might make Conditions at large. Mounson was the Man, and the Spaniards insisted on these Terms: 'That all the Persons in the Carack '(for 300 Gentlemen came on board on purpose 'to defend her) should depart safely with their 'Arms; that their Flag should not be taken 'down; that the Ship and Guns should remain 'to the King's Use, and that all the Lading 'should fall to the English.' Mounson consented that they should all be dismissed within three Days, but would by no means permit that the Spanish Flag should be hoisted in the sight of the English, except at the Ship's Stern; nor would he agree that the Ship should go to the King of Spain: But after a long Dispute, it was agreed, 'That the Portuguese should be dismissed in two 'Days time, and suffer'd to go with unlighted 'Matches, that their Flag should be levelled; 'that the Ship, together with the Guns and Lading, should fairly be deliver'd up just as it 'was, and that in the mean time no Guns should 'be fired upon the English from the Castle.' All the Persons were sent out of the Carack the same Night, except the Captain and some others, who were put ashore early the next Morning. The same Day the Prize was carried out of the Road, and the English taking the advantage of a fair Gale, brought her home, her Cargo being computed, according to the Portuguese Account, at a Million of Ducats, and their Loss in the Enterprize no more than five common Seamen.

Two Gallies taken.

A Parley with the Carack.

Taken.

Mounson was sent back with some Ships to the Coasts of Spain, where he staid till the midst of Winter, to keep them from making any new Descent upon Ireland. Whilst he was making the best of his way for Spain, Frederick Spinola entred on on the 23d of September into the British Channel, and kept along the French Shore with six Gallies, which made their Escape at Sesimbria, designing to get with them into some Port of Flanders: Sir Robert Mansel waited for him with two or three Men of War, and four Hollanders were likewise cruizing on the Road. The Spaniards first discover'd two of the Hollanders Ships, and resolved to set upon them; but happening to spy one of the Queen's Ships not far off, they shifted their Oars, and stood the remaining part of the Day, hoping by the Advantage of the Night to gain their intended Port. Mansel, with the two Dutchmen and his own Ships, gave them chace from eight in the Morning till Sunset. When Night came on, the Gallies alter'd their Course for the English Shore, and came so near it, that some of the Slaves got off their Fetters, leapt overboard, and swam to Land; and before they were aware they fell into a Place where one of the Queen's Ships and the Hollanders lay at anchor. Hereupon Mansel taking it for granted that the Gallies must needs fall in with those Ships; in order to make them keep their Course with the more Assurance, steer'd a little out of the way on purpose to get between the Gallies and the Coast of Flanders.

1602. Ann. 45.

English chace the Spanish Gallies.

They fall in with the Queen's Ships unawares.

The Queen's Ship they lighted upon was called the Answer. Broadgate, the Captain of her, who had prepared to fight, upon the Report of the Guns, which he heard at a distance, bestowed upon them 38 Shot, and the Hollanders gave them as warm a Salute. The Gallies did not fire so much as one Gun, but got away by the help of their Oars; and failing at random, one of them, in the Night-time, fell in with Mansel; he discharged all his Guns at her, and shot down her Main-Mast; and upon hearing a lamentable Cry, made up and offer'd her Quarter by an Interpreter. The other five Gallies came afterwards to her Assistance, at which he let fly a Broad-side, but what Execution it did could not be discover'd, tho' the Night was not so dark as usual. After this there was not the least Noise of shooting heard, till an Holland Vessel fell foul upon a Galley call'd the Lucera or Phosphorus, took away her Rudder, and so disabled her, that she sunk immediately after with almost all the Persons that were in her. Another Dutch Ship falling foul by chance of the Galley call'd Padilla, split her in pieces, and but narrowly escaped the same Disaster herself. Another of the Gallies was cast away thro' the Carelessness of the Sailors, in its way towards Calais. Two more of them put into Newport: Spinola himself, in the Admiral, escaped into Dunkirk with a very valuable Cargo; and after he had refitted the three Gallies, he carried them to Scluis, and the Year following was kill'd with a Cannon-shot in a Sea-fight with the Hollanders, leaving the Character of a very brave Person behind him.

Gallies defeated.

The Death of Spinola.

We have before took notice that the Commission of the Bishop of London, Christopher Perkins, and John Swale, whom the Queen dispatch'd to Embden, Ann. 1600, had no effect. The Queen therefore sent away to Breme these following Persons upon the same Errand, viz. Ralph L. Euers, Sir John Herbert Under-Secretary, Daniel Dun Doctor of Law, and one of the Masters of Requests, and Stephen Lesier was join'd as an Assistant to them. The King of Denmark sent Manderope Presberg, Arnold Whitfield Chancellor of Denmark, and Jonas Carisius Doctor of Law. The English complain'd, That they were debarred the Freedom of Navigation into Muscovy by the Northern Channel, and the Liberty of Fishing upon the Coasts and Islands of that Country; and that they were obliged to pay extravagant Impositions meerly for their Passage thro' the Sound: They demanded therefore, 'That the ancient 'Treaties between Henry VII, King of England, 'and John King of Denmark, Ann. 1490, might 'be revived and put in use; that the precarious 'and exorbitant Demands of new Customs might 'be taken off or remedied, and a fix'd Rate set 'down in Writing, with some stated and certain Laws about Sales and Forfeitures; that 'their Ships might not be detain'd in the Sound, 'longer than was necessary; that the Grievances 'of private Persons might be heard and redress'd; 'and that no Ammunition might be transported 'into Spain.'

A Treaty with the Danes.

Hereupon it was debated on both Sides, 'Whether Princes might lawfully raise their Customs 'as they pleased, contrary to former Treaties? 'Whether this was not against the Laws of Equity, admitting it had been practised; since 'all Customs ought to be founded upon a just 'and equitable Bottom? Whether what has 'been determin'd upon mature and serious Deliberation, and for some time allowed and tolerated on both Sides, can be render'd void and 'null, without a direct Infringement of the 'Power and Prerogative of those Princes who 'establish'd the same at first? Whether those 'Customs impos'd upon the Danes, &c. by the 'English in the Reign of Queen Mary, for Wares 'imported and exported, were not more reasonable than those which the Danes exacted for 'Passage only; they pretending to demand as 'their bare Fee, for securing the Sailors, a Rose-'Noble of every Ship, one Piece in the hundred 'Lastage? Whether Customs are demandable 'for Passage only, since they are paid no where 'else but for the Landing and Sale of Goods? 'Whether the Northern Channel be not free 'for the English to fish in, as well as the Islands 'and Coasts thereof? and, Whether they may 'not sail through it into Muscovy, the Sea being 'open to every body, and an Element that is no 'more in the power of Princes, than the Air it 'self, according to that Expression of the Emperor Antoninus; I am Master indeed of the Continent, but the Sea is under the Disposal of the Law; let therefore the Law of Rhodes determine the Matter? Whether, upon this account, it 'was not against the Law of Nations, to usurp 'such a Dominion over the Sea, seeing Princes 'have no Right at all but in those Seas that lie 'near their own Territories, and that no farther 'than to secure their Trade from Pirates and 'Enemies? Besides that, the Kings of England 'never prohibited Fishing and Navigation in the 'Irish Seas between England and Ireland, though 'they are equally Proprietors of the Coasts on 'both Sides, as the King of Denmark is of Norway and Iceland, who yet pretends to this Royalty upon no other Claim but that. But if 'Payments are to be demanded from the English 'for Passage, the Queen may as reasonably lay 'as high Imposts upon the Danes, that trade 'into her Dominions.'

Queries propounded.

Hereupon the Danes offer'd, 'That since his 'Majesty's Father did, upon the Queen's account, allow that Privilege of Navigation, tho' 'considerably to his own Damage and Inconvenience, the English Merchants might think it 'worth while to re-purchase that Liberty, during 'the Queen's Life, at the Cost of 200 * Rose-'Nobles per An. That the Goods taken on both 'Sides should be restored in a fair and just Proportion.' Then did they proceed to great Remonstrances and Complaints as to the English Pirates, alledging, 'That altho' it was hardly possible to stop the Insolence of Pirates in Times 'of

The Danes Proposals.

* A Piece of Money of about 16 s. 8 d.

1602. Ann. 45.

'of War, yet their might be Punishments inflicted severe enough to restrain them; at least there ought to be Reprisals granted for the recovery of Damages, because Princes are very much concern'd to see that their Subjects receive no Detriment: That the English need not complain that any Ammunition was transported into Spain, since the Danes furnish'd them with so small a Quantity, that the Spaniards reap'd very little Benefit or Service from it.'

When these Things had been canvass'd on both Sides for two Months, and several Papers deliver'd in to the said effect, the Danes told the English all of a sudden, That they had no power to review or re-inforce the old Treaties, to take off or abate the Duties and Customs, or to grant the liberty of Fishing in the Iceland or Norway-Seas, without his Majesty's special Licence and Authority, and upon certain Terms and Conditions; and withal, they forbad the English to fish at the Islands of Faroe, (which was most admir'd at of any thing) and that on the same Penalty they had been debar'd the said Liberty upon heretofore.

A new Inhibition of the Danes.

The English on the other side, protested against this Inhibition as null and void, as also against any other Declaration that they should make contrary to the plain and express tenour of the Treaties. And when they could come to no other Conclusion but this, That the Points in debate should be refer'd to their several Princes respectively, and the Danes promised to interceed effectually with their King to publish the Rates in his Toll-Books, in order to make appear the certainty of his Numbers, Weights and Measures; and that they should not be alter'd at will, contrary to the Rates set down in those Books, which were also to be lodg'd in the Hands of the Custom-House-Officers; And that as to the Point of Forfeitures, no Goods should be seiz'd but what were conceal'd or unmark'd. The English Commissioners express'd themselves satisfied with the Danes Promises, and the whole Business was put off till another time, with a reserve still of all Rights, Dues and Demands to the Queen of England, her Realm and Subjects.

Jesuits and secular-Priests quarrel.

Whilst these Things lay in dispute between the two Crowns, the Popish Ecclesiasticks in England were at Daggers drawing among themselves; for the Jesuits and secular Priests began to bespatter one another in virulent Pamphlets, and dipt their Tongues and Pens in the bitterest Venom. The secular Priests were in a mighty Pet that Blackwel, formerly a Student in Oxford, of Trinity-Colledge, and an absolute Creature of Garnet's, who was Provincial of the Jesuits in England, was made Superintendant over them, and therefore they made bold to disclaim his Authority. On this account, he first strip'd 'em of their Faculties, (as they are term'd) and not long after, upon their Appeal to the Pope, procur'd a Breve for declaring them Schismaticks and Hereticks. But they got clear of this Censure, and that by the Verdict of the whole University of Paris. After which they put out several Books, in which they extoll'd the Queen very highly for having treated the Catholicks with great Gentleness and Candor from the very beginning of her Reign.

They made it appear, 'That in the eleven first Years of her Reign, not one Papist was call'd into Question on the score of Conscience or Religion; and that in the space of ten Years compleat after the Publication of Pius V's Bull, against her, and the Popish Rebellion, there were not above 12 Priests put to Death, some of whom were convicted of Treason, till the Year 1580, the time when the Jesuits had their first footing in England.' Then they prov'd at large, 'That their impious Desings and Practices against the Government put all things into Confusion, prov'd very Prejudicial to the Catholick Interest, and occasion'd the making several severe Acts against the Papists. However, That in the ten Years following, there were not above 50 Priests executed, and 55 more banish'd, (so Merciful was the Queen) though she might have Prosecuted 'em according to Law: That since then there had been English Seminaries erected in Spain, by the Management of Parsons, an English Jesuit; and that there were sent from thence, every Year, a stock of overgrown and mischievous Priests: That this Parsons persuaded the King of Spain to a new Invasion of England and Ireland: That he had printed a Book to assert the Infanta's Title to the Crown of England, and demanded an Oath of the Students of those Seminaries respectively, to maintain the same. That Holt, another Jesuit, incited Hesket to raise a Rebellion, and tamper'd with Cullen, York and Williams to murder the Queen: And that Walpool, a Jesuit, persuaded one Squire to attempt the same by Poison; insomuch that the Queen, who was of opinion that Conscience was a free Principle, and ought not to be forc'd, was oblig'd to use Severity against this sort of Men, that she might not expose her own and the Kingdom's Safety.'

Parsons, whom they nicknam'd Cowbuck, was tax'd for a Bastard; a Fellow sprung from the Lees of the People, a Man of turbulent and seditious Principles, a Sycophant, a prevaricating Hypocrite, a Government-Broker, and what not.

They write against the Queen.

The Libels publish'd by the Jesuits against the Queen they tax'd as false, and charg'd the Authors with Treason against God and her Majesty. They moreover maintain'd with great strength of Argument, that Fire and Sword are no fit Instruments to propagate Religion, which ought to be maintain'd by a Spirit of Mildness and Gentleness. In the last place, they desir'd the English Catholicks to send no more of their Children to be bred up in the English Seminaries, where they were like to have no other Principles infus'd into 'em, but those of Treason and Rebellion.

Amidst these Heats and Contentions, which with what design soever they were carried on, the Bishop of London took care to improve and cherish with all the Art imaginable: The Privy-Council easily perceiv'd, that the Jesuits and the greater part of the Seculars, had this private Aim, to draw off the Queen's Subjects from their Obedience, and to excite the People to maintain the Popish Religion by force. The Queen did therefore issue out a Proclamation, commanding the Jesuits, and secular Priests their Adherents, immediately to depart the Land; and those of the more indifferent and moderate Party, to be gone in two Months, unless they would take the Oaths of Allegiance. And that neither they, nor any of their Order should return into England, on pain of suffering the utmost Penalties of the Laws.

A Proclamation against the Jesuits and Seculars.

And without doubt there was a kind of Providence in the publishing of this Order, since it prevented a notorious Villainy at that time upon the Anvil: For, whilst these things were in agitation, Thomas Winter, (as he afterwards confess'd himself) and Tesmund a Jesuit, were sent over into Spain by the Directions of some of them, where they carried on very dangerous Designs, relating to the Murder of the Queen, and the Exclusion of James King of 1602. Ann. 45.

Scots from his Rightful Claim to the Crown of England.

And while these Attempts were forging in England, the mutinous Soldiers in the Netherlands were up in Arms against the Archduke, and several in France against the King; so that all the Princes together seem'd to lie under the Influence of some ill Planet.

Biron beheaded in France. In France the Duke de Biron lost his Head, for carrying on a dangerous and wicked Design against his Country, and throwing out some provoking Expressions against the King. I know not the Particulars of his Confession; but great Discoveries he made, and amongst others, something that so ruffled the Duke of Bovillon, that when he was commanded to appear before the King, he refus'd it; but apprehending the King's Displeasure, and the great Interest of his Adversaries at Court, he retir'd into Germany. Hereupon the King complain'd of him very heartily to Queen Elizabeth, 'As if he thought his Marriage with Mary of Florence unlawful, the Pope's Dispensation good for nothing, and on consequence, his Son a Bastard: That he had design'd the Reversion of the Crown for the Prince of Conde, aim'd at the Destruction of all the Catholicks of the first Quality, and conspired to betray the Spaniards for a Price to the United Provinces: That he refus'd to be tried by the Parliament of Paris, and had made his Appeal to the Chamber at Chastres, which could pretend to no manner of Cognisance in such Matters; and had excepted against his Accusers, which is not allowable in cases of High-Treason: That these were but Tricks and Stratagems to evade a Trial, and lift himself into the Regal Authority; and that he therefore ask'd Queen Elizabeth's Advice, what was best to be done upon this Occasion.'

French King's complaint to Queen Elizabeth.

Her Answer. She return'd him Answer by her Residentiary Ambassador in France, 'That she was much concern'd to hear these Things; but took it withal for a great Honour to be intrusted with Matters of that high Concernment. She commended at the same time his Evenness of Temper, in hearkning rather to the Advices of his Friends at such a Juncture, than to the Suggestions of a private Person.' As for the Advice he was pleas'd to ask, her Answer was, 'That if the Proofs against him were as evident as the Impeachment was scandalous, he would do well to proceed against him according to Law; but till Matters of Fact were clearly made out, it would be unsafe for her to direct any thing, for fear of offending God, her Conscience, or an innocent Person; lest, however, she should happen to disoblige the King, should he entertain a Thought that she was not duly concern'd for his Safety. She thought therefore that Silence was the best Argument in so doubtful a Point. However, she intreated the King to consult his own Reason and Conscience as closely as might be, and to examin well the Evidences and Confessions, whereby they came from Persons of Credit and Probity, and free from all suspicion of Bribery and Corruption, forasmuch as no Man stands free from the Attacks of Malice and Slander. And she insinuated at the same time, That bare Allegations are but slender Proofs to influence the Conscience of an unbyass'd Judge against a Person of so fair a Character for Virtue. That the Crimes objected, till farther Proof, were much too black and heinous to be with any colour or shew of Probability imputed to a Person of his Character. For, who would believe that a Person of so sober and religious an Education, and who had shewn himself so stanch a Loyalist to the King, and so true a Friend to his Country, in all the Difficulties which had attended both, could ever have harbour'd such vile Designs against his Sovereign, a Prince of that singular Desert; or that he should ever join with a Cabal of Persons of broken Fortunes and Estates, between whom and himself there did not appear the least conformity of Temper or Interest, Religion or Principle, and from whom he could expect nothing but Baseness and Falsehood? That it was to be fear'd the Spaniards had the chief hand in these Suggestions, on purpose to imbroil the French once more in the Inconveniencies of a civil War.'

The King heard all this with great Dissatisfaction, and thereupon let fall Expressions to this purpose: That the Queen thought better of Bouillon than he deserv'd; that he was one of the principal Abettors of the Earl of Essex's design upon the Queen and her Privy-Council; and that when he charged him therewith, he was not able to deny it, but gave him a Smile instead of an Answer. The Crimes charg'd upon him, he affirm'd most solemnly to be really true, and reckon'd the several Favours he had confer'd upon him, viz. 'That he had made him one of the Houshold, contriv'd an advantagious Match for him with an Heiress of the House of Bouillon, gave him the possession of Sedan, made him one of the Gentlemen of his Privy Chamber, and advanc'd him to the Honour of a Marshal and a Duke: That he was very lately resolv'd to have shew'd him Mercy, if he would have ask'd for it: But since he scorn'd to ask Pardon, and the Guilt of his Conscience had driven him out of the Kingdom, he had no reason to shew him any farther Favour. He added moreover, That he had interpos'd with the Queen in favour of the Earl of Essex, in an Instance not unlike this, but had desisted when he found his Crime was so notorious.'

The King's Reply.

The Ambassador replied, That the Queen entertain'd a good Opinion of the Duke chiefly for these Reasons: 'Because he had hitherto, upon all Occasions, signaliz'd his Courage and good Affection to his Prince and Country: That she should be sorry to find any Truth in the Matters he stood charg'd with, as in the Earl of Essex's case she had done; and, if so, she should have an absolute Detestation for him. And as for the Advice she presum'd to give, it was purely owing to the Regard she had for the King's Safety, which she tender'd no otherwise than her own.'

Queen's Answer.

But, if any Credit may be given to the French Writers, and the more exact Observers among the English, Biron, Bouillon and some others, who thought that they had secur'd the King's Crown and Dignity at the hazard of their Lives and Fortunes, when they saw him shew more Favour and Countenance to those who but lately plotted his Ruin, and admit them to his Cabinet before others, as if they had been Men of the greatest Desert and best confirm'd Principles, and would wipe off their past Crimes by their future good Behaviour; and observing likewise, that the Stream of all Preferments ran in their Channel, and that they were intrusted with those very Governments, which in the late Confusions they had seiz'd upon; they could not forbear shewing some Disgust, when they found themselves suspected, as it were, for Traitors: And thereupon, as well as upon some other Accounts, imagining they had deserv'd a much better Treatment at his hands, they began to contrive together how to intail their Governments upon themselves and their Heirs. And when they could not compass their Intentions by fair means

1602. Ann. 45. means, they grew more daring and insolent than profess'd Enemies: For some of them were not asham'd to asperse the King, in a most virulent manner, in some Letters sent by them to the Queen; not only as an ungrateful Person, but also as a weak Prince, and a Coward; and that his way of Conquests was not by real Bravery, but meer Bribes and Promises. The Queen notwithstanding, having a great Concern for the King's Honour and Security, and withal a compassionate Sense of the frequent, dangerous and sudden Revolts of the French, fail'd not to cry him up as the great Preserver and Restorer of the almost-wither'd Monarchy of France.

I have mention'd these Passages in respect to the Memory and Merit of the Queen's judicious and prudent Advices to this Prince, her constant Friendship to an old Ally, and one who was once of the same Religion as well as Interest, and her prudent Management and Instructions for the Advantage of them both. About the same time she sent some Succours to Geneva, the Nursery of the Reformation; which was at present assaulted by Stratagem and Force, by the Duke of Savoy; the Bishops and People all over England contributing very bountifully towards its Relief.

Death of Dr. Nowel. This Year died in the Month of February, at a very great Age, Alexander Nowel, Doctor of Divinity and Dean of St. Paul's, who in Queen Mary's Reign liv'd an Exile in Germany, for the sake of his Religion; which, after his Return he strenuously asserted by his Sermons and other learn'd Discourses. He gave 200*l. per an.* to Brazen-Nose-College in Oxford; where he had his Education, for the Maintenance of 13 Students; and was in his whole Life a shining Pattern of Sobriety and Vertue. He was succeeded by John Overal, Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge, and a Person of extraordinary Learning; he being recommended very highly to the Queen, by Sir Fulk Grevil, who was a mighty Favourer of learned Men.

I must now look back, and take a View of what was transacted in Ireland this Year. After the Spaniards were driven thence, Ter-Oen fled as fast as his Fear carry'd him, cross the Country, to recover his Lurking-places in Ulster, and had a great many Men swept away, by the Floods and Swelling of the Tides, occasion'd by the Winter-Rains: And he now began to give up his Hopes, and to fill himself with the most dismal Apprehensions; for an ill Conscience would allow him no Peace, but made him afraid of his own Shadow; insomuch that he was every day looking out for new Places to abscond in, and quitted his Shelter, as soon as he had attain'd it.

Tir-Oen in great Perplexity.

The Lord Deputy, to refresh his Soldiers, who were miserably harrass'd, put them into Winter-Quarters; and having dispos'd Things in Munster, return'd to Dublin. As soon as the sharp Weather was over, he return'd again by easy Marches, to infuse the greater Terror, with a good Army, into Ulster; designing, as he had done before, to surround the Rebels there, by erecting Forts, and placing Garrisons about 'em to trepan and hem them in: He transported his Army over Black-water by Flotes of Timber fastned together; and finding a Ford, not before discover'd, beneath the old Fort, he built a Sconce there, which he call'd by his own Christian Name, Charlemount. Tir-Oen being alarm'd hereat, set fire to his own House at Dun-gannon: The Lord-Deputy march'd forward, and as soon as Sir Henry Docwray join'd him with his Forces from Lough-Foil, he sent Detachments into all the Country, cut down the standing Corn, set Fire to the Villages and Houses, and drove away the Cattle all about.

L. Deputy builds Fort Charlemount.

1602. Ann. 45. The Forts in Lough-Crew, Lough-Reah, and Moberlecow, (where Sir John Berkley, a Gentleman of good Courage, was shot) were deliver'd up to the Lord-Deputy, who placed a Fort, and a Garrison in it, at Lough-Eaugh, or Lough-Sidney, which he call'd Montjoy, from his own Title, and made Sir Arthur Chichester, Knight, Governour thereof; who, on the score of his great Courage and Desert, did afterwards succeed the Lord-Deputy.

He sent Sir Henry Docwray back to Derry, and he took O-Cahan into favour, after he had surrender'd a great part of his Territory to the Queen's Use; on condition he might hold the rest by Letters-Patents. Then, by the Lord-Deputy's Orders, he wasted Omye, and made a prodigious Slaughter; driving away Cormack-Mac-Baron's Cattle, tho' with some Hazard to himself. After this he was call'd back by the Lord-Deputy; and when he had taken the Castle of Agar, was sent home to his own Charge, and with him Sir Henry Folliot, whom he made Governour of Balishanon; first with the Limitation of his Deputy, but not long after with a full and plenary Authority, (contrary to all Expectation) the English very much admiring that he was preferr'd before Docwray, who was the Instrument of reducing Balishanon at the first. At the same time (to the equal Surprize of the Irish) he took into his Protection Roderick O-Donel, a notorious Rebel, and let alone Neal Garve, who had hitherto stood firm to the English, and was so provoked by the Neglect, that in a moody Humour he took upon him the Title of O-Donel, (which prov'd fatal to him) and began to tyrannize over the People, and exact from them that Oath, which was the Queen's proper Right.

Docwray plagues the Rebels.

Neal-Garve takes the Title of O-donel.

Just before the Close of the Year, Sir Arthur Chichester and Sir Henry Docwray resolv'd to attack Tir-Oen on all sides, who was then skulking in the woody Valleys: But all the Avenues and Passages were so miry, the March so troublesome, by reason of the Thickness of the Trees; and withal, the Weather was so foul, and the Scouts so false, that they were forced to desist from their Design. But in conclusion, the Garrisons which were settled up and down by the Lord-Deputy, did so annoy and disturb the Rebels, by frequent and repeated Attacks, and the several Marches and Countermarches which they made; that finding themselves begirt and surrounded on all sides, and reduced every day to greater Extremities; and that they were forced likewise to skulk and hide, like a parcel of Wild-Beasts, in the Woods and Thickets; a great number of them began to change Sides, as their Fortune had done before them; and strove who should be foremost in submitting themselves, tho' with what Caution they could, to the Lord Deputy: They complain'd withal, that Tir Oen had exposed the Nation to Ruin, purely to cherish a private Disgust; and that this War was carry'd on, to answer his Ends or Interest; but would be sure to prove of the worst Consequence to every body else. Those who submitted were more favourably treated by the Lord-Deputy; whilst, contrary to his Promise, he took but little Notice of such as adhered faithfully to the Queen's Interest: But perhaps he thought it necessary, to give some Respite to a languishing Government, rather than by an over hasty Cure occasion its Wounds to bleed afresh. Nor was Tir-Oen in the least ignorant, that his bad Fortune had drawn off his Adherents, and diminish'd his Forces: So that being tired out with his ill Successes, he resolv'd to prevent farther Mischief, out of a Principle of Self preservation, consistent enough with the greatest Courage:

Several of the Rebels submit.

He

1602. Ann. 45.

Tir-Oen craves Pardon. 'Tis granted on Condition.

He therefore ply'd the Queen and the Lord Deputy with submissive Letters; humbly imploring Pardon for his great Offences; and gave withal, such pregnant Evidences of his Sorrow and Concern for what was past, that the Queen empowred the Lord-Deputy to receive him into Favour, provided he would ask it upon his Knees, with the same Submissiveness he had express'd in his Letters.

1603.

The Six and fortieth Year of her Reign.

Tir-Oen had no sooner receiv'd Information hereof, but he earnestly press'd the Dispatch of the Business, by the Application of Arthur Mac-Baron, his Brother, and some others. And, after several Denials, at last, upon Promise that he would submit his Life and Estate entirely to the Queen's Mercy, the Lord-Deputy permitted him to come to Millefont, having by some of his Friends been inform'd of the Queen's Indisposition, which was the more dangerous, because of her advanc'd Age. Hither he came as fast as he could, with one or two more in his Company; and being admitted into the Presence-Chamber, (where the Lord-Deputy sat in a Chair of State, with a great many Swordsmen about him) he fell on his Knees, at the very Threshold, with a down-cast Aspect, and in an Habit as abject and careless. After he had for some time continued in that Posture, the Lord-Deputy made a Sign to him to come nearer: He got up accordingly, and making a few nearer Approaches, fell once more upon his Knees, and spoke to this purpose: 'I acknowledge my Sin against God, and my Offence against my most gracious Queen and Sovereign; to whose Royal Clemency I entirely refer myself, and give up my Life and Fortune to her Majesty's Disposal. And as I have been sensible of her Goodness formerly, and have at present felt the Influence of her Power, so I humbly intreat her to make me in some degree the Subject of her Royal Compassion, that I may stand as a Monument of her Clemency to future Ages: I have yet before me time enough, and do not want either Strength or Resolution to expiate my Fault, by some good Service for the future.' As he was going on, and making some Complaints of the Injuries he had receiv'd through the Ill-will of some particular Persons, the Lord-Deputy interrupted him, and said, That there was no Colour to be used for an Offence like his: And after he had spoken a very little more to him, with a Brow of Authority, (which is a Soldier's best Rhetorick) he order'd him to withdraw; and the next day he brought him with him to Dublin, designing to bring him over to the Queen, that she might dispose of him at her Pleasure.

Tir-Oen absolutely submits.

Rebellion suppress'd.

Thus was Tir-Oen's Rebellion happily extinguish'd, the eighth Year after it broke out; thro' the Queen's better Fortune, and the good Conduct of the Lord Montjoy Lord-Deputy, who was afterwards created, by King James, Earl of Devonshire. It commenced at first upon personal Disgusts, with a little Touch of Ambition at the bottom: It was fomented and kept up by the Neglect and Stingyness of England: It ran all over Ireland, on the Pretence of restoring Popery, and the Prospect of unbounded Liberty: It got Strength by the Weakness and Credulity of some, and the private Countenance of others, that were in place; and gain'd more Ground by one or two fortunate Successes, back'd by the Spaniard's Gold and Forces, and the Pope's Indulgences. It was protracted and spun out by the ill tim'd Emulations of the English, the lodging of the Government in two Hands, and the Avarice of the old Soldiers, who made the War a kind of Trade: To which we may add, the subtile Stratagems of Tir-Oen, his feign'd Submissions and treacherous Capitulations, the Protections granted to Offenders, the Difficulty and Straitness of the Roads and Passages; and, in the last place, the desperate Temper of the Irish, who trusted more to the Swiftness of their Heels, than the Strength of ther Hands.

Rise and Growth of it.

Queen falls sick at Windsor.

The Queen, who had hitherto enjoy'd a good Stock of Health, through her exact Temperance both as to Wine and Diet, (which she used to say was the noblest part of Physick) being in her climacterical Year, viz. the 70th Year of her Age; began to perceive in herself some Weakness and Decay of Health and Spirits, and the ill Weather increas'd her Indisposition; till on the last of January, which prov'd a very stormy day, she remov'd from Westminster to Richmond, to enjoy there the Remains of Life with more Freedom, and better Opportunities for the Service of God. She happen'd on that very day (whether from some Reflexions upon her Death, or Presages as to what might follow) to say to the Lord-Admiral, for whom she had a particular Respect, My Throne has been held by Princes in the way of Succession, and ought not to go to any but my next and immediate Heir. And the Courtiers made it their Observation, that the Queen was never more constant to the Service of the Chappel, than at present: They likewise report, that she then commanded the Ring in which she had been espoused in Form to her Kingdom, at her Coronation, and had never been took off before, to be filed from her Finger; because it was so grown into the Flesh, that it could not be got off any other way: And this was look'd on as a very melancholy Omen, and portending no less than a Dissolution of her Marriage with the State, which by that Emblem she had contracted. In the beginning of her Sickness, the Almonds of her Throat swell'd, but soon came down again: After that her Appetite went off by degrees, and she gave her self to a Melancholy, which by the Effects appear'd owing to a Cause as peculiar as powerful: Whether it was the Violence of her Distemper, or the Loss of Essex, (as his Friends flatter'd themselves) or that she had been over-persuaded to pardon Tir-Oen, after so vast an Expence in supporting the Irish War; or that she had heard some Rumours, or receiv'd some Intelligence from the French King, that many of the Nobility did, by private Letters, court and caress the K. of Scots, who was adored by them as the Rising Sun; whilst she was disregarded, as being just upon her Declension: This she seem'd to give too much Credit to, (as indeed both her Age and her Sex dispos'd her to be jealous) and perhaps there was Reason enough: For some of the Court-Nobility (not to mention the Ladies) most unhandsomely forsook her, when they had the least Reason to have done it; for the Queen was still the same, tho' the Courtiers were chang'd; and 'tis probable they withdrew their Respect, either because her Majesty was very antient, or they tired with the Length of her Reign, (for long Possession lessens the Value of the best things) or else perhaps they long'd for a Change, and grew out of Humour with the present times, in hopes of seeing finer Days hereafter; as if all past Favours were to be forgot, as being a Clog upon the Memory of ungrateful Persons. Nor is it impossible but this might be a kind of Court Stratagem to quarrel with the present Administration, on purpose to curry Favour with the Successor, out of a false Maxim, that the succeeding Prince takes a kind of Pleasure in the Disparagement of his Predecessor,

Her Coronation-Ring took off.

She grows melancholy.

1603. Ann. 46. ceffor. And in truth, this was a Courfe they purfued fo openly, that they fell at laft into Quarrels among themfelves; and fome were for fending for the Succeffor, whilft the Queen's Recovery was yet uncertain: infomuch that they feemed to have made him already a Prefent of their Affections, as much as could be done at that Diftance. Hereupon the Queen looked upon herfelf as an helplefs and abandon'd Perfon; and would, in an Excefs of Paffion, drop now and then an Expreffion to this purpofe: They have now got me in a Yoak: I have no body left me that I can truft; and my Condition is the perfect Reverfe of what it was. And to imbitter her Sorrows yet more, they perfuaded her that fhe had loft much of her Intereft in the Hearts of her People: Whereas they, having a natural kind of Grudge to thofe in Power, complain'd moft of all, that an exorbitant one was lodged in fome who were too near the Queen's Perfon, and indeed had almoft ftollen away her Prerogative; and that others perceiving the Queen's Decay, were making the beft Markets for themfelves, as is ufual in fuch Cafes.

Queen grows worfe. As foon as the Rumour was confirm'd that the Queen's Illnefs increafed upon her, and that fhe was now greatly averfe to Phyfick, as indeed fhe had ever appeared in her younger Days; 'tis hardly credible, with how forward a Zeal, all Ranks and Conditions of Men, Puritans, Papifts, and others, as they were led on by particular Views and Expectations, hafted away, at all Times and Hours, by Sea and Land, into Scotland, to pay their Adorations to the Rifing-Sun, the young King: whofe Pretenfions the Queen always favour'd at the bottom, though fhe was too prudent to lay open her Thoughts. And in truth, Perfons of all Degrees and Qualities feem'd to concur in the fame Sentiments, and had with great Satisfaction and Regard confider'd and look'd upon him as the undoubted Heir of the Crown: though at the fame time there went about fome falfe Reports of a Marriage of his Uncle's Daughter, the Lady Arbella; and the French Ambaffador did all he could to raife Commotions, left the two Kingdoms of Britain, England and Scotland, which were as yet divided, fhould come to an Union. In the beginning of March fhe was feized with a kind of Stupour or Heavinefs, join'd with a Pettifhnefs common enough to ancient Perfons: infomuch as fhe would frequently fit in a filent Pofture, and refrain from eating; as having fequefter'd herfelf for Thought and Meditation. She would admit of no Difcourfe, unlefs with the Archbifhop of Canterbury, who join'd with her in Prayer and other Young King courted by all Parties.

Devotions, which fhe perform'd with great Fervour, till her Speech left her; and then fhe was very attentive to his Grace, whilft he pray'd by her. About this time the Lord-Admiral having acquainted the reft of the Council with what the Queen had told him in private, when fhe went laft from Weftminfter, in relation to her Succeffor; they all thought it convenient, that himfelf, with the Lord-Keeper and Secretary, fhould wait upon her Majefty, and acquaint her, that they were come in the Name of the reft, to learn her Pleafure, in reference to the Succeffion. The Queen anfwer'd, with a faint Voice: That fhe had already declared, That as fhe had held a Regal Scepter, fo fhe defired no other than a Royal Succeffor. And the Secretary requefting her to explain herfelf; I would (faid fhe) have a King fucceed me, and who fhould that be, but my neareft Kinfman, the King of Scots? The Archbifhop then advifing her to fix her Thoughts upon God; fhe reply'd, That fhe did fo, nor did her Mind in the leaft wander from him. When fhe could no longer exprefs her Piety any other way, fhe lift up her Eyes and Hands to her Maker, as a Token where her Thoughts were centred; and doubtlefs the Concern fhe was in at her Incapacity to fend up any other Prayers, did in God's account fupply the Place of an articulate Devotion; and gave apparent Signs of a devout and well-prepared Heart to the Standers-by. 1603. Ann. 46.

Queen declares her Succeffor.

She dies. On the 24th of March, being the Eve of the Annunciation, fhe enjoy'd a bleffed Remove from this World to a better; and refign'd that Breath into her Maker's Hands, which fhe had received on the Eve of the bleffed Virgin's Nativity. She took leave of her Crown and Life in fuch a way, that her Deceafe was the fame, which Auguftus wifh'd for, happy and peaceable; after a glorious Reign of 44 Years and 4 Months, and in the 70th Year of her Age: A Period never yet attain'd by any of the Kings of England.

King James proclaim'd. Her Lofs, which was very confiderable to the Englifh Nation, was in fome meafure compenfated by the mighty Hopes which were conceiv'd of her Succeffor King James; who was, not many Hours after, proclaimed KING, with the joyful Shouts and Acclamations of the People. However, 'tis not poffible, that any Succeffion of Times or Perfons fhould erafe the Memory of fo excellent a Princefs: The Reputation of her Vertues does ftill furvive, and cannot fail of defcending to Pofterity; fhe being a Perfon, who (to ufe her Succeffor's own Expreffion) exceeded all the Princes fince Auguftus's Reign, in the Felicity and Prudence of her Adminiftration.

F I N I S.

AN APPENDIX TO Queen Elizabeth's Life.

A Declaration of the Causes moving the Queen of England to give Aid to the Defence of the People afflicted and oppressed in the Low-Countries.

Kings and Princes Sovereigns are to yield account of their Actions only to Almighty God, the King of Kings.

ALtho' Kings and Princes Sovereigns, owing their Homage and Service only to the Almighty God, the King of all Kings, are in that respect not bound to yield Account, or render the Reasons of their Actions to any other but to God, their only Sovereign Lord; and that amongst the most Ancient and Christian Monarchs, the same Lord God hath committed to us the Sovereignty of this Realm of England, and other our Dominions, which we hold immediately of the same Almighty Lord, and so thereby accountable only to his Divine Majesty; yet we are, notwithstanding this our Prerogative, at this time especially, moved, for divers Reasons hereafter briefly remember'd, to publish not only to our own natural loving Subjects, but also to all others our Neighbours, especially to such Princes and States as are our Confederates, or have for their Subjects cause of Commerce with our Countries and People, what our Intention is at this time, and upon what just and reasonable Grounds we are moved to give Aid to our next Neighbours, the natural People of the Low-Countries, being by long Wars and Persecutions, of strong Nations there, lamentably afflicted, and in present Danger to be brought into a perpetual Servitude.

Natural Causes of ancient continual Traffick betwixt the People of England and them of the Low-Countries.

First, It is to be understood, (which percase is not perfectly known to a great number of Persons) that there hath been, time out of mind, even by the natural Situation of those Low-Countries and our Realm of England, one directly opposite to the other; and by reason of the ready crossing of the Seas, and multitudes of large and commodious Havens respectively on both sides, a continual Traffick and Commerce betwixt the People of England, and the natural People of these Low-Countries, and so continued in all ancient Times, when the several Provinces thereof, as Flanders, Holland, and Zealand, and other Countries to them adjoining, were ruled and possessed by several Lords, and not united together, as of late Years they have been by Intermarriages, and at length by Concurrences of many and sundry Titles have also been reduced to be under the Government of their Lords that succeeded to the Dukedom of Burgundy, whereby there hath been in former Ages many special Alliances and Confederations, not only betwixt the Kings of England, our Progenitors, and the Lords of the said Countries of Flanders, Holland, Zealand, and their Adherents; but also betwixt the very natural Subjects of both Countries, as the Prelates, Noblemen, Citizens, Burgesses, and other Commonalties of the great Cities and Port-Towns of either Country reciprocally, by special Obligations and Stipulations under their Seals interchangeably, for Maintenance both of Commerce and Intercourse of Merchants, and also of special mutual Amity to be observed betwixt the People and Inhabitants of both Parties as well Ecclesiastical as Secular: And very express Provision in such Treaties contained for mutual Favours, Affections, and all other friendly Offices, to be used and prosecuted by the People of the one Nation towards the other. By which mutual Bonds, there hath continued perpetual Unions of the Peoples Hearts together, and so by way of continual Intercourses, from Age to Age, the same mutual Love hath been inviolably kept and exercised, as it had been by the Work of Nature, and never utterly dissolved, nor yet for any long time discontinued, however the Kings and the Lords of the Countries sometimes (tho' very rarely) have been at difference, by sinister means of some other Princes, their Neighbours, envying the Felicity of these two Countries.

Confederations both betwixt the Kings of England and Lords of the Low-Countries, and also the Subjects of both Countries.

The People of both the Countries bound by special Obligations interchangeably for mutual Favours & friendly Offices.

Treaties extant of ancient time, betwixt the Kings of England and the Dukes of Burgundy, for the b twixt their Countries.

And for Maintenance and Testimony of these natural Unions of the People of these Kingdoms and Countries in perpetual Amity, there are extant sundry authentick Treaties and Transactions for mutual Commerce, Intercourse and strict Amity of ancient Times: As for Example, Some very solemnly accorded in the Times of Hen. VI, our Progenitor, and Philip II, Duke of Burgundy, and Inheritor to the County of Flanders by the Lady Margaret his Grandmother, which was above 140 Years past, and the same also renewed by the noble Duke Charles his Son, Father to the King of Spain's Grandmother, and Husband to the Lady Margaret, Sister to our Great Grandfather King Edward IV, and after that, of new often-oftentimes renewed by our most noble and sage Grandfather King Henry VII, and the Archduke Philip, Grandfather to the King of Spain now being; and in later Times, often renewed betwixt our Father of noble Memory King Henry VIII, and Charles V, Emperor of Almaigne, Father also to the present King of Spain.

Conventions for the Subjects of eitherside to shew mutual Favours one to the other.

In all which Treaties, Transactions and Confederations of Amity and mutual Commerce, it was also at all times specially and principally contained in express Words, by Conventions, Concords and Conclusions, that the natural People and Subjects of either side, should shew mutual Favours and Duties one to the other, and should safely, freely and securely Commerce together in every their Countries, and so hath the same mutual and natural Concourse and Commerce been without Interruption continued in many Ages, far above the like Example of any other Countries in Christendom, to the Honour and Strength of the Princes, and to the singular great Benefit and Inriching of their People, until of late Years that the King of Spain, departing out of his Low-Countries into Spain, hath been (as it is to be thought) counselled by his Counsellors of Spain, to appoint Spaniards, Foreigners and Strangers of strange Blood, Men more exercised in Wars than in peaceable Government, and some of them notably delighted in Blood, as hath appeared by their Actions, to be the chiefest Governors of all his said Low-Countries, contrary to the ancient Laws and Customs thereof, having great plenty of noble, valiant and faithful Persons naturally born, and such as the Emperor Charles, and the King himself, had to their great Honours used in their Service, able to have been employed in the Rule of those Countries. But these Spaniards, being mere Strangers, having no natural Regard in their Government to the Maintenance of those Countries and People in their ancient and natural Manner of peaceable Living, as the most noble and wise Emperor Charles, yea, and as his Son King Philip himself had, whilst he remain'd in those Countries, and used the Counsels of the States and natural Nobility of the Countries, not violating the ancient Liberties of the Countries; but contrariwise, these Spaniards being exalted to absolute Government, by Ambition and for private Lucre, have violently broken the ancient Laws and Liberties of all the Countries, and in a tyrannous sort have banished, killed and destroyed, without order of Law, within the space of a few Months, many of the most ancient and principal Persons of the natural Nobility that were most worthy of Government. And howsoever in the beginning of these cruel Persecutions, the pretence thereof was for Maintenance of the Romish Religion, yet they spared not to deprive very many Catholicks and Ecclesiastical Persons of their Franchises and Privileges; and of the chiefest that were executed of the Nobility, none was in the whole Country more affected to that Religion than was the noble and valiant Count of Egmond, the very Glory of that Country; who neither for his singular Victories in the Service for the King of Spain can be forgotten in the true Histories, nor for the Cruelties used for his Destruction to be for ever lamented in the Hearts of the natural People of that Country. And farthermore, to bring these whole Countries in Servitude to Spain, these foreign Governors have by long intestine War, with multitudes of Spaniards, and with some few Italians and Almains, made the greater part of the said Countries (which with their Riches, by common Estimation, answer'd the Emperor Charles equal to his Indies) in a manner desolate; and have also lamentably destroyed by Sword, Famine, and other cruel manners of Death, a great part of the natural People, and now the rich Towns and strong Places being desolate of their natural Inhabitants, are held and kept chiefly with Force by the Spaniards.

Spaniards & Strangers lately appointed Governors in the Low-Countries, to the Violation of the Liberties of the Country.

The Destruction of the Nobility & the People of the Countries by the Spanish Government.

The lamentable violent Death of the Count of Egmond, the Glory of those Countries.

The rich Towns & Strengths with the Wealth thereof, possessed by the Spaniards.

All which pitiful Miseries and horrible Calamities of these most rich Countries and People, are of all their Neighbours at this day, even of such as in ancient Time have been at frequent Discord with them, through natural Compassion very greatly pitied, which appear'd specially this present Year, when the French King pretended to have received them to his Protection, had not (as the States of the Country and their Deputies were answer'd) that certain, untimely and unlook'd-for Complot of the House of Guise, stir'd and maintain'd by Money out of Spain, disturb'd the good and general Peace of France, and thereby urged the King to forbear from the Resolution he had made, not only to aid the oppressed People of the Low-Countries against the Spaniards, but also to have accepted them as his own Subjects. But in very truth, howsoever they were pitied, and in a sort for a time comforted and kept in hope in France by the French King, who also hath oftentimes earnestly sollicited us as Queen of England, both by Message and Writing, to be careful of their Defence: Yet in respect that they were otherwise more streightly knit in ancient Friendship to this Realm than to any other Country, we are sure that they could be pitied of none for this long time with more Cause and Grief generally, than of our Subjects of this our Realm of England, being their most ancient Allies and familiar Neighbours, and that in such manner, as this our Realm of England and these Countries have been by common Language of long time resembled and termed as Man and Wife. And for these urgent Causes, and many others, we have by many friendly Messages and Ambassadors, by many Letters and Writings to the said King of Spain, our Brother and Ally, declar'd our Compassion of this so evil and cruel Usage of his natural and loyal People by sundry his martial Governors, and other his Men of War, all Strangers to these his Countries. And farthermore, as a good loving Sister to him, and a natural good Neighbour to his Low-Countries and People, we have often, and often again, most friendly warned him, That if he did not otherwise by his Wisdom and Princely Clemency restrain the Tyranny of his Governors, and Cruelty of his Men of War, we feared that the People of his Countries should be forced, for safety of their Lives, and for continuance of their native Country in their former State of their Liberties, to seek the Protection of some other foreign Lord, or rather to yield themselves wholly to the Sovereignty of some mighty Prince, as by the ancient Laws of their Countries, and by special Privileges granted by some of the Lords and Dukes of the Countries to the People, they do pretend and affirm, that in such cases of general Injustice, and upon such violent breaking of their Privileges, they are free from their former Homages, and at liberty to make choice of any other Prince to be their Prince and Head. The proof whereof, by Examples past, is to be seen and read in the ancient Histories of divers Alterations, of the Lords and Ladies of the Countries of Brabant, Flanders, Holland and Zealand, and other Countries to them united by the States and People of the Countries, and that by some such Alteration, as the Stories do testify, Philip the Duke of Burgundy came to his Title, from which the King of Fr. King offers to have aided and received to his Subjection the oppressed People of the Low-Countries.

The Q. of England's continual friendly Advices to the K. of Spain for restraining of the Tyranny of his Governors.

of Spain's Intereft is derived; but the farther Difcuffion hereof, we leave to the View of the Monuments and Records of the Countries. And now for the Purpofes to ftay them from yielding themfelves in any like fort to the Sovereignty of any other ftrange Prince, certain Years paft, upon the earneft Requeft of fundry of the greateft Perfons of Degree in thofe Countries, and moft obedient Subjects to the King, fuch as were the Duke of Afcot, and the Marquefs of Havery, yet living, and of fuch others as had principal Offices in thofe Countries in the time of the Emperor Charles, we yielded at their importunate Requefts, to grant them Prefts of Money, only to continue them as his Subjects, and to maintain themfelves in their juft Defence againft the Violence and Cruelties of the Spaniards their Oppreffors, thereby ftaying them from yielding their Subjection to any other Prince from the faid King of Spain: And during the time of that our Aid given to them, and their ftay in their Obedience to the K. of Spain, we did freely acquaint the fame King with our Actions, and did ftill continue our friendly Advices to him, to move him to command his Governors and Men of War, not to ufe fuch infolent Cruelties againft his People, as might make them to defpair of his Favours, and feek fome other Lord.

The Q. of England's Means ufed to ftay the States of the Low-Countries from yielding their Subjection to any other foreign Prince.

And in thefe kind of Perfuafions and Actions we continued many Years, not only for Compaffion of the miferable State of the Countries, but of a natural Difpofition to have the ancient Conditions of ftrait Amity and Commerce for our Kingdoms and People to continue with the States and the People of the faid Dukedom of Burgundy and the Appendants, and namely, with our next Neighbours the Countries of Flanders, Holland, and Zealand. For we did manifeftly fee, if the Nation of Spain fhould make a Conqueft of thofe Countries, as was and yet is apparently intended, and plant themfelves there as they have done in Naples and other Countries, adding thereto the late Examples of the violent hoftile Enterprize of a Power of Spaniards, being fent within thefe few Years by the King of Spain and the Pope into our Realm of Ireland, with an intent manifeftly confeffed by the Captains, that thofe Numbers were fent aforehand to feize upon fome Strength there, to the intent with other greater Forces to purfue a Conqueft thereof; we did, we fay again, manifeftly fee in what Danger our Self, our Countries and People might fhortly be, if in convenient time we did not fpeedily otherwife regard to prevent or ftay the fame. And yet notwithftanding our faid often Requefts and Advices given to the King of Spain, manifeftly for his own Weal and Honour, we found him by his Council of Spain fo unwilling in any fort to incline to our friendly Counfel, that his Governors and Chieftains in his Low-Countries increafed their Cruelties towards his own afflicted People, and his Officers in Spain offer'd daily greater Injuries to ours, reforting thither for Traffick; yea, they of his Council in Spain, would not permit our exprefs Meffenger with our Letters to come to the King their Mafter's Prefence; a Matter very ftrange, and againft the Law of Nations.

The Enterprize of the Spaniards in Ireland fent by the K. of Spain and the Pope.

The Refufal of the Q.'s Meffenger and her Letters to the King of Spain.

And the caufe of this our writing and fending to the King, proceeded of Matter that was worthy to be known to the King, and not unmeet now alfo to be declared to the World, to fhew both our good Difpofition towards the King, in imparting to him our Griefs, and to let it appear how evil we have been ufed by his Minifters, as in fome part may appear by this that followeth. Altho' we could not have thefe many Years paft any of our Servants whom we fent at fundry times as our Ambaffadors to the King our good Brother as was meet, fuffer'd to continue there without many Injuries and Indignities offer'd to their Families, and divers times to their own Perfons by the greateft of his Counfellors, fo as they were conftrain'd to leave their Places, and fome expell'd, and in a fort banifh'd the Country, without caufe given by them, or notified to us; yet we, minding to continue very good Friendfhip with the King, as his good Sifter, did of long time and many Years give favourable Allowance of all that came as his Ambaffadors to us, faving only upon manifeft dangerous Practices attempted by two of them to trouble our State, whereof the one was Girald Defpes, a very turbulent-fpirited Perfon, and altogether unskilful and unapt to deal in Princes Affairs being in Amity, as at his return into Spain he was fo there alfo reputed; the other and laft was Bernardin de Mendoza, one whom we did accept and ufe with great Favour a long time, as was manifeftly feen in our Court, and we think cannot be denied by himfelf, but yet of late Years (we know not by what Direction) we found him [illegible] fecret great Favourer to fundry our evil-difpofed and feditious Subjects, not only to fuch as lurked in our Realm, but alfo to fuch as fled the fame, being notorioufly condemned as open Rebels and Traitors, with whom, by his Letters, Meffages, and fecret Counfels, he did in the end devife how with a power of Men, partly to come out of Spain, partly out of the Low-Countries, whereof he gave them great Comfort in the King's Name, an Invafion might be made into our Realm, fetting down in Writing the manner how the fame fhould be done, with what Number of Men and Ships, and upon what Coafts, Ports and Places of our Realm by fpecial Name, and who the Perfons fhould be in our Realm of no fmall Account, that fhould favour this Invafion, and take part with the Invaders, with many other Circumftances declaring his full fet Purpofe and Labours taken, to trouble us and our Realm very dangeroufly, as hath been moft clearly proved and confeffed by fuch as were in that Confederacy with him, whereof fome are fled and now do frequent his Company in France, and fome were taken, who confeffed at great length by writing the whole Courfe herein held by the faid Ambaffador, as was manifeftly of late time publifh'd to the World upon Francis Throgmorton's, a principal Traitor's, Examination. And when we found manifeftly this Ambaffador fo dangerous an Inftrument, or rather a Head to a Rebellion and Invafion, and that for a Year or more together he never brought to us any Letter from the King his Mafter, notwithftanding our often requeft made to him, That he would by fome Letter from the King to us, let it appear, that it was the King's will that he fhould deal with us in his Mafter's Name in fundry things that he propounded to us as his Ambaffador, which we did judge to be contrary to the King his Mafter's will; we did finally caufe him to be charged with thefe dangerous Practices, and made it patent to him how, and by whom, with many other Circumftances, we knew it, and therefore caufed him in very gentle fort to be content within fome reafonable time to depart out of our Realm, the rather for his own Safety, as one in very deed mortally hated of our People; for the which we granted him favourable Conduct, both to the Sea and over the Sea; and thereupon we did fpeedily fend a Servant of ours into Spain with our Letters to the King, only to certify him of this Accident, and to make the whole matter apparent unto him; and this was the

The juft Caufes of difmiffing of Bernardin Mendoza out of England.

He is favourably licenced to depart the Realm.

the Meſſenger aforemention'd, that might not be ſuffer'd to deliver our Meſſage or our Letters to the King.

And beſides theſe Indignities, it is moſt manifeſt how his Miniſters alſo have both heretofore many times, and now lately practiſed here in England by means of certain Rebels, to have procur'd ſundry Invaſions of our Realm, by their Forces out of Spain and the Low-Countries. Very hard Recompences (we may ſay) for ſo many our good Offices. Hereupon we hope no reaſonable Perſon can blame us, if we have diſpoſed ourſelves to change this our former courſe, and more carefully to look to the Safety of our ſelf and our People: And finding our own Dangers indeed very great and imminent, we have been the more urgently provok'd to attempt and accelerate ſome good Remedy, for that beſides many other Advices given us both at home and from abroad, in due time to withſtand theſe Dangers, we have found the general Diſpoſition of all our own faithful People very ready in this caſe, and earneſt in offering to us both in Parliaments and otherwiſe, their Services with their Bodies and Blood, and their Aids with their Lands and Goods, to withſtand and prevent this preſent common Danger to our Realm and themſelves, evidently ſeen and feared by the ſubverting and rooting up of the ancient Nation of theſe Low-Countries, and by planting the Spaniſh Nation and Men of War, Enemies to our Countries, there ſo near unto us. And beſides theſe Occaſions and Conſiderations, we did alſo call to our Remembrance our former fortunate Proceeding by God's ſpecial Favour, in the beginning of our Reign, in remedying of a like Miſchief that was intended againſt us in Scotland by certain Frenchmen, who then were directed only by the Houſe of Guiſe, by colour of the Marriage of their Niece the Queen of Scots with the Dolphin of France, in like manner as the Offſprings of the ſaid Houſe have even now lately ſought to attain to the like inordinate Power in France; a matter of ſome Conſequence for ourſelves to conſider, altho' we hope the King our good Brother profeſſing ſincere Friendſhip towards us, as we profeſs the like to him, will moderate this aſpiring Greatneſs of that Houſe, that neither himſelf nor the Princes of his Blood be over-ruled, nor we (minding to continue perfect Friendſhip with the King and his Blood), be by the ſaid Houſe of Guiſe and their Faction diſquieted or diſturb'd in our Countries. But now to return to this like Example of Scotland aforeſaid, when the French had in like manner (as the Spaniards have now of long time attempted in the Low-Countries) ſought by force to have ſubdued the People there, and brought them into a Servitude to the Crown of France, and alſo by the ambitious Deſires of the ſaid Houſe of Guiſe, to have proceeded to a War by way of Scotland, for the Conqueſt of our Crown for their Niece the Queen of Scots (a matter moſt manifeſt to the common knowledge of the World); it pleaſed Almighty God, as it remaineth in good memory to our Honour and Comfort, to further our Intention and honourable and juſt Actions at that time in ſuch ſort, as by our aiding them of the Nation of Scotland being ſore oppreſſed with the French, and univerſally requiring our Aid, we procur'd to that Realm (though to our great Coſt) a full deliverance of the Force of Strangers and Danger of Servitude, and reſtored Peace to the whole Country, which hath continu'd there ever ſince many Years, ſaving that at ſome time of Partialities of certain of the Noblemen, as hath been uſual in that Country, in the minority of the young King there hath riſen ſome inward Troubles, which for the moſt part we have in favour of the King and his Governors uſed means to pacifie; ſo as at this day ſuch is the Quietneſs in Scotland, as the King our dear Brother and Couſin, by Name James VI, a Prince of great hope for many good Princely Reſpects, reigneth there in honour and love of his People, and in very good and perfect Amity with us and our Country. And ſo our Actions at that time came to ſo good Succeſs by the goodneſs of God, as both our own Realm and that of Scotland hath ever ſince remained in better Amity and Peace than can be remember'd theſe many hundred Years before, and yet nothing hereby done by us, nor any cauſe juſtly given, but that alſo the French Kings that have ſince ſucceeded, which have been three in number, and all Brethren, have made and concluded divers Treaties for good Peace with us, which preſently continue in force on both Parties, notwithſtanding our foreſaid Actions attempted for removing out of Scotland of the ſaid French Forces, ſo tranſported by the only Direction of the Houſe of Guiſe.

The Queen of England's proceeding for the delivery of Scotland from the Servitude whereinto the Houſe of Guiſe meant to have brought it.

Scotland reſtor'd to the ancient Freedom, and ſo poſſeſſed by the preſent King, by means only of the Queen of England.

And therefore, to conclude for the Declaration of our preſent Intention at this time, we hope it ſhall of all Perſons abroad be well interpreted, as we know it will be of ſuch as are not led by Partiality, that upon the often and continual lamentable Requeſts made to us by the univerſal States of the Countries of Holland, Zealand, Guelders, and other Provinces with them united (being deſperate of the King of Spain's Favours) for our Succours to be yielded to them, only for their Defence againſt the Spaniards and other Strangers, and therewith finding manifeſtly by our often and importunate Requeſts and Advices given to the King of Spain, no hope of Relief of theſe their Miſeries, but rather an increaſe thereof by daily conqueſts of their Towns and ſlaughter of their People; (though in very truth we cannot impute the increaſe of any late Cruelties to the Perſon of him that now hath the Title of General Governor, ſhewing his natural Diſpoſition more inclinable to Mercy and Clemency, than it ſeemeth he can direct the Hearts of the Spaniards under him to, that have been ſo long trained in ſhedding of Blood under the former Spaniſh Governors) and joining thereunto our own Danger at hand, by the Overthrow and Deſtruction of our Neighbours, and acceſs and planting of the great Forces of the Spaniards ſo near to our Countries, with precedent Arguments of many troubleſome Attempts againſt our Realm: We did therefore, by good Advice and after long deliberation, determine to ſend certain Companies of Soldiers to aid the natural People of thoſe Countries, only to defend them and their Towns from Sacking and Deſolation, and thereby to procure them Safety, to the honour of God, whom they deſire to ſerve ſincerely as Chriſtian People, according to his holy Word, and to enjoy their ancient Liberties for them and their Poſterity, and ſo conſequently to preſerve and continue the lawful and ancient Commerce betwixt our People and thoſe Countries and ours.

The concluſion of the Cauſes of ſending of certain Companies of Engliſh Soldiers to the defence of the oppreſſed People of the Low-Countries, and to withſtand the Attempts againſt this Realm.

Engliſh Power ſent only to defend.

And ſo we hope our Intention herein, and our ſubſequent Actions, will be, by God's Favour, both honourably and charitably interpreted of all Perſons, (ſaving of the Oppreſſors themſelves and their Partiſans) in that we mean not hereby, either for Ambition or Malice, (the two Roots of all Injuſtice) to make any particular Profit hereof to our ſelf or to our People, only deſiring at this time to obtain, by God's Favour, for the Countries, ' A deliverance of them from War by ' the Spaniards and Foreigners, with a reſtitution ' of Three ſpecial Things reaſonably deſired by the Queen of England.

1. The end of Wars, withrestitution of the Low-Countries to their ancient Liberties. 2. Surety from invasion of her own Realm. 3. And renewing of mutual Traffick between the Countries.

'of their ancient Liberties and Government by 'some Christian Peace; And thereby, a Surety 'for our selves and our Realm to be free from 'invading Neighbours; And our People to enjoy in those Countries their lawful Commerce 'and Intercourse of Friendship and Merchandize, according to the ancient Usage and 'Treaties of Intercourse made betwixt our Progenitors, and the Lords and Earls of those 'Countries, and betwixt our People and the 'People of those Countries.'

Causes of taking some Towns into her Majesty's Custody.

And tho' our farther Intention also is or may be to take into our Guard some few Towns upon the Sea-side next opposite to our Realm, which otherwise might be in danger to be taken by the Strangers, Enemies of the Country; yet therein considering we have no meaning at this time to take and restrain the same to our own proper Use, we hope that all Persons will think it agreeable with good Reason and princely Policy, that we should have the guard and use of some such Places for sure Access and Recess of our People and Soldiers in safety, and for furniture of them with Victuals and other things requisite and necessary, whilst it shall be needful for them to continue in these Countries for the aiding thereof in these their great Calamities, Miseries and eminent Danger, and until the Countries may be deliver'd of such strange Forces as do now oppress them, and recover their ancient lawful Liberties and manner of Government to live in Peace as they have heretofore done, and do now most earnestly in lamentable manner desire to do, which are the only very true ends of all our Actions now intended, howsoever malicious Tongues may utter their canker'd Conceits to the contrary, as at this day the World aboundeth with such blasphemous Reports in Writings and infamous Libels, as in no Age the Devil hath more abounded with notable Spirits replenished with all Wickedness to utter his Rage against Professors of Christian Religion. But thereof we leave the Revenge to God the searcher of Hearts, hoping that he, beholding the Sincerity of our Heart, will grant good Success to our Intentions, whereby a Christian Peace may ensue to his divine Honour, and Comfort to all them that love Peace truly, and will seek it sincerely.

An Addition to the DECLARATION, Touching the Slanders published of her Majesty.

AFter we had finish'd our Declaration, there came to our hands a Pamphlet written in Italian, printed at Milan, intitl'd, Nuovo Adviso, directed to the Archbishop of Milan, containing a Report of the Expugnation of Antwerp by the Prince of Parma: By the which we found our self most maliciously charged with two notable Crimes, no less hateful to the World than most repugnant and contrary to our own natural Inclination. The one, with Ingratitude towards the King of Spain, who (as the Author saith) saved our Life, being justly, by Sentence, adjudged to Death in our Sister's time. The other, that there were some Persons procur'd to be corrupted with great Promises, and that with our Intelligence, as the Reporter addeth in a Parenthesis in these Words (as it was said), that the Life of the Prince of Parma should be taken away. And for the better proving and countenancing of this horrible Lye, it is farther added in the said Pamphlet, That it pleased the Lord God to discover this, and bring two of the wicked Persons to Justice. Now, knowing how Men are maliciously bent in this declining Age of the World, both to judge, speak and write maliciously, falsely and irreverently of Princes; and holding nothing so dear unto us, as the conservations of our Reputation and Honour to be blameless; we found it very expedient, not to suffer two such horrible Imputations to pass under Silence, lest for lack of Answer it might argue a kind of Guiltiness, and did therefore think, that what might be alledg'd by us for our Justification in that behalf, might most aptly be join'd unto this former Declaration now to be publish'd, to lay open before the World the manner and ground of our Proceeding in the Causes of the Low-Countries.

And for answer of the first Point wherewith we are charged touching our Ingratitude towards the King of Spain, as we do most willingly acknowledge that we were beholding unto him in the time of our late Sister, which we then did acknowledge very thankfully, and have sought many ways since, in like sort, to requite, as in our former Declaration by our Actions may appear; so do we utterly deny, as a most manifest untruth, that ever he was the cause of the saving of our Life, as a Person by course of Justice sentenced unto Death, who ever carried our self towards our said Sister in dutiful sort, as our Loyalty was never called in question, much less any Sentence of Death pronounced against us: A matter such, as in respect of the ordinary course of Proceeding, as by process in Law, by place of Trial, by the Judge that should pronounce such Sentence, and other necessary Circumstances in like cases usual, especially against one of our Quality, as it could not but have been publickly known, if any such thing had been put in execution. This then being true, we leave to the World to judge how maliciously and injuriously the Author of the said Pamphlet dealeth with us, in charging us by so notable an untruth with a Vice that of all others we do most hate and abhor. And therefore by the manifest untruth of this Imputation, Men not transported with Passion may easily discern what untruth is contain'd in the second, by the which we are charged to have been acquainted with an intended attempt against the Life of the said Prince. A matter, if any such thing should have been by us intended, must have proceeded either of a misliking we had of his Person, or that the prosecution of the Wars into the Low Countries was so committed unto him, as no other might prosecute the same but he.

And first for his Person: We could never learn that he hath at any time, by Act or Speech, done any thing that might justly breed a mislike in us towards him, much less a hatred against his Person in so high a degree, as to be either privy or assenting to the taking away of his Life: Besides, he is one of whom we have ever had an honourable Conceit, in respect of those singular rare Parts we always have noted in him, which hath won unto him as great Reputation, as any Man this day living carrieth of his Degree and Quality; and so have we always deliver'd out by Speech unto the World, when any Occasion hath been offer'd to make mention of him. Now, touching the Prosecution committed unto him of the Wars in the Low Countries, as all Men of Judgment know, that the taking away of his Life carrieth no likelihood that the same shall work any end of the said Prosecution; so is it manifestly known, that no Man hath dealt more Honourably than the said Prince, either in duly observing of his Promise, or extending Grace and Mercy where Merit and Desert hath craved the fame; and therefore no greater Impiety by any could be wrought, nor nothing more prejudicial to our felf (fo long as the King fhall continue the profecution of the Caufe in that forcible fort he now doth) than to be an Inftrument to take him away from thence by fuch violent means, that hath dealt in a more honourable and gracious fort in the Charge committed unto him, than any other that hath ever gone before him, or is likely to fucceed after him.

Now therefore, how unlikely it is, that we, having neither caufe to miflike of his Perfon, nor that the profecution of the Wars fhould ceafe by lofs of him, fhould be either Author, or any way affenting to fo horrible a Fact, we refer to the Judgment of fuch as look into Caufes, not with the Eyes of their Affection, but do meafure and weigh things according to Honour and Reafon. Befides, it is likely if it had been true that we had been any way chargeable, (as the Author reporteth) the Confeffions of the Parties executed, (importing fuch matter as by him is alledg'd) would have been both produced and publifhed; for Malice leaveth nothing unfearchable, that may nourifh the Venom of that Humour.

The beft Courfe therefore that both we and all other Princes can hold in this unfortunate Age, that overfloweth with numbers of malignant Spirits, is, through the Grace and Goodnefs of Almighty God, to direct our courfe in fuch fort, as they may rather fhew their Wills through Malice, than with juft caufe by defert to fay ill, or deface Princes either by Speech or Writing; affuring ourfelves, that befides the Punifhment that fuch wicked and infamous Libellors fhall receive at the hands of the Almighty for depraving of Princes and lawful Magiftrates, who are God's Minifters, they both are and always fhall be thought by all good Men, unworthy to live upon the face of the Earth.

Given at Richmount the firft of October 1585, and the 27*th Year of the Reign of our Sovereign Lady the Queen, to be publifh'd.*

Vid. p. 401.

The Order of the Rites and Ceremonies ufed at the Confecration of the moft Reverend Father in Chrift Matthew Parker, Archbifhop of Canterbury, in the Chappel at his Mannor of Lambeth, on Sunday the 17*th of* December, 1559.

Imprimis, THE Chappel was hung towards the Eaft with Tapeftry, the Floor cover'd with red Cloth, and a Table for the Communion-Service was plac'd in the Eaftern part of the Chappel, on which was laid a Tapeftry Carpet and a Cufhion.

On the South-fide of the Eaftern-part of the Chappel were placed four Chairs for the four Bifhops appointed to confecrate the Archbifhop.

Before thefe Chairs was placed a Footftool cover'd with Tapeftry, and on it were laid Cufhions for the Bifhops to kneel on.

In like manner was a Chair and Footftool, with a Cufhion, plac'd on the North-fide of the Eaftern-part of the faid Chappel for the Archbifhop.

Every thing being thus prepar'd, about five or fix of the Clock in the Morning the Archbifhop came into the Chappel at the Weftern-Gate, in his fcarlet Robes, with his Hood on; before him were carried four Tapers, and with him came the four Bifhops appointed to affift at his Confecration, to wit, William Barlow late Bifhop of Bath and Wells, but now of Chichefter, John Scory late of Chichefter, but now Elect of Hereford, Miles Coverdale late Bifhop of Exeter, and John Hodskinne Suffragan of Bedford.* Which Bifhops having taken their feveral Seats according to their Order: The Morning Prayer was read with a diftinct Voice by Andrew Pierfon the Archbifhop's Chaplain; after Prayers the aforefaid John Scory went up to the Pulpit, and made an excellent Sermon on this Text; 1 Pet. 5. 1. The Elders which are among you I exhort, who am alfo an Elder, &c.

After Sermon the Archbifhop and the four Bifhops went out of the Chappel into the Veftry to prepare themfelves for the Communion, and very foon after return'd into the Chappel again by the Weftern-Door thus dreffed. The Archbifhop had on a Linnen Surplice. The Bifhop of Chichefter elect, who adminifter'd the Sacrament, had on a filk Cope, and he was affifted therein by two of the Archbifhop's Chaplains likewife with filk Copes on, viz. Nicholas Bullingham Archdeacon of Lincoln, and Edmund Geft Archdeacon of Canterbury. The elect Bifhop of Hereford and the Suffragan of Bedford had Linnen Surplices on.

But Miles Coverdale wore nothing over his long Cloth Gown.

Being thus cloathed and provided, they proceeded to the Communion-Table; the Archbifhop being on his Knees at the lowermoft Step of the Chappel.

After the Gofpel was read, the aforefaid Bifhop elect of Hereford, Suffragan of Bedford, and Miles Coverdale brought the Archbifhop to the Bifhop of Chichefter elect, fitting near the Communion-Table in a Chair, and faid thus.

Moft Reverend Father in God, we prefent unto you this godly and well-learned Man to be Ordained and Confecrated an Archbifhop.

After they had thus faid, the Queen's Mandate for Confecrating him Archbifhop was produced and read by Thomas Yale Doctor of the Laws; then the Oath of Supremacy (appointed by Act of Parliament 1 Eliz.) was tender'd the Archbifhop; which after he had folemnly taken and fworn to upon the holy Evangelifts, the Bifhop of Chichefter elect mov'd the Congregation to pray, and then proceeded to fing the Litany, the Choir finging the Refponfes. Which being done, fome Queftions were ask'd the Archbifhop by the Bifhop of Chichefter elect; and after fome Prayers and Suffrages, according to the Form appointed by Authority of Parliament to be ufed on thefe Occafions, the Bifhops of Chichefter, Hereford, Suffragan of Bedford, and Miles Coverdale laying their Hands on the Archbifhop's Head, faid, Receive the Holy Ghoft; and remember that thou ftir up the Grace of God, which is given thee by this Impofition of our Hands: For God hath not given us the Spirit of Fear, but of Power, and Love, and Sobernefs. When they had faid this, they deliver'd a Bible into the Archbifhop's Hands, faying thefe Words, Give heed unto Reading, Exhortation, and Doctrine. Think upon the things contained in this Book. Be diligent in them, that the Increafe coming thereby may be manifeft unto all Men. Take heed unto thy felf, and to Doctrine, and be diligent in doing them; for by fo doing thou fhalt both fave thy felf, and them that hear thee, through Jefus Chrift our Lord. When they had faid thus, the Bifhop of Chichefter went on to the remaining part of the Communion Service, (without putting a Crofier into the Archbishop's Hand) and the Archbishop, the aforesaid Bishops, and several others, receiv'd the Communion together.

into

The Solemnity being thus over, the Archbishop, accompanied with the four Bishops who had consecrated him, went out at the North-Door of the Eastern-part of the Chappel, and soon after return'd through the same Door, with the said Bishops, in his Episcopal Habit, with his Rochet and other Robes, and about his Neck was a Tippet of fine Sables Furs. In the same manner were the Bishops of Chichester and Hereford cloathed in their Episcopal Habits; but Coverdale and the Suffragan of Bedford wore only their usual long Gowns. Then the Archbishop, going towards the Western-Gate of the Chappel, gave white Staves to Thomas Doyle his Steward, John Baker his Treasurer, and John March his Comptroller; by which Ceremony he confirm'd them in their said Employments,

All things being in the said manner finish'd in Order above describ'd, the Archbishop went out of the Chappel at the Western-Door; those of his Family and Relations of better Note and Quality going before, and the rest following after him.

All these things were done and perform'd in the Presence of the Reverend Fathers in Christ, Edmund Gryndal elect Bishop of London, Rich. Cox elect Bishop of Ely, Edwin Sandes elect Bishop of Worcester, Anthony Huse Esq; chief Register of the Province of Canterbury, Thomas Argal Register of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, Thomas Willet and John Incent Publick-Notaries, and several others.

The Record from which this Account is translated is in the Registry of the See of Canterbury, and a Copy of it (found among Archbishop Parker's MSS) in Bennet-College-Library in Cambridge, (of which College he had been Fellow and Master, and to which he left his Books and Papers) and the Letter, manner of Writing, and all other Circumstances, bring such Conviction that they are genuine, that the learned University of Cambridge, have given their solemn and unanimous Attestation to the Record, as the Reader may see annex'd to Mr. Brown's Latin Sermons in Vindication of the Orders of the Church of England, intitl'd, Concio ad Clerum habita coram Academia Cantabrigiensi, Junii 11. 1687. A Thomâ Brown, &c. Printed at Cambridge 1688. And tho' this be a most evident Proof of this Consecration, since it is a Rule in the Law, Instrumenta publica potiora sunt Testibus, that publick Deeds and Records are better Proof than Witnesses; yet by the Providence of God, when the Story of the Nag's Head Ordination was trump'd up and maintain'd, in which time Mr. Mason wrote his excellent Book De Ministerio Anglicano, the Right Honourable Charles Howard Earl of Nottingham was alive, who was present at the Consecration of Archbishop Parker at Lambeth, and bore witness to the truth of it; a Testimony worth that of an hundred Neals, on whose Report alone the Fable of the Nag's Head Ordination was rais'd, and whose only credit it has hitherto had for its support.

Nor was the Ordination of Archbishop Parker regularly perform'd with respect to the Place and Ceremonies used only, but likewise with regard to the Persons consecrating him, who had been duly ordain'd Bishops themselves before: These Persons were Barlow, Scory, Coverdale and the Suffragan of Bedford. As for Barlow, we are assur'd he was successively Bishop of St. Asaph, St. Davids, Bath and Wells, and Chichester, that he was acknowledg'd a Bishop by all Estates of Men in the Kingdom; that for his Temporalties he did Homage to the King; that he sat in Parliament among the Spiritual Lords; that he exercis'd the Jurisdiction of a Bishop, and (what was the worst Mark of all) that he alienated some of his Mannors to the Crown, tho' there be no particular Register by whom he was consecrated in Henry VIII's time, * more than in general, that he was made a Bishop in those Days. || J. Scory was consecrated Bishop of Chichester, and Miles Coverdale of Exeter. August 30. 1551, by Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury, Nicholas Bishop of London, and John Suffragan of Bedford. * And John Hodskinne was consecrated Suffragan of Bedford, Dec. 9. 29 Hen. 8, by John Bishop of London, John Bishop of Rochester, and Robert Bishop of S. Asaph. All which puts the Canonical Succession of the Bishops of the Church of England beyond dispute.

*Register Cranmer, p. 179.

|| Ib. 334.

* Ib. 204.

Vid. p. 370.

The Answer of the Queen's Highness to the Petition propounded unto her by the Lower-House, concerning her Marriage. Friday, Feb. 10. 1558.

AS I have good cause, so do I give you all my hearty Thanks for the good Zeal and loving Care you seem to have, as well towards me, as to the whole Estate of your Country. Your Petition, I perceive, consisteth of three Parts, and my Answer to the same shall depend of two.

And to the first Part, I may say unto you, That from my Years of Understanding, sith I first had consideration of myself to be born a Servant of Almighty God, I happily chose this kind of Life in the which I yet live; which, I assure you, for mine own part, hath hitherto best contented my self, and I trust hath been most acceptable unto God; from the which, if either Ambition of high Estate offer'd to me in Marriage, by the pleasure and appointment of my Prince, (whereof I have some Record in this Presence, as you our Treasurer well know) or if eschewing the danger of mine Enemies, or the avoiding of the peril of Death, whose Messenger, or rather a continual Watchman, the Prince's Indignation was no little time daily before mine Eyes, (by whose means (although I know, or justly may suspect) yet I will not now utter, or if the whole cause were in my Sister herself, I will not now burthen her therewith, because I will not charge the dead) if any of these, I say, could have drawn or disswaded me from this kind of Life, I had not now remain'd in this Estate, wherein you see me. But so constant have I always continued in this Determination, although my Youth and Words may seem to some hardly to agree together, yet is it most true, that at this day I stand free from any other meaning, that either I have had in Times past, or have at this present; with which Trade of Life I am so throughly acquainted, that I trust God, who hath hitherto herein preserv'd and led me by the Hand, will not of his Goodness suffer me to go alone.

For the other part, the manner of your Petition I do well like, and take it in good part, because it is simple, and containeth no Limitation of Place or Person: If it had been otherwise, I must needs have misliked it very much, and thought it in you a very great Presumption, being unfitting and altogether unmeet for you to require them, that may command; or those to appoint, whose Parts are to desire; or such to bind and limit, whose Duties are to obey, or to take upon you to draw my Love to your Liking, or frame my Will according to your Fantasie: For a Guerdon constrain'd, and Gift freely given, can never agree together. Nevertheless, if any of you be insuspect, whensoever it may please God to incline my Heart to another kind of Life; you may well assure yourselves, my Meaning is not to determine any thing, wherewith the Realm may or shall have just Cause to be discontent. And therefore put that clean out of your Heart. For I assure you (what Credit my Assurance may have with you, I cannot tell, but what Credit it shall deserve to have, the Sequel shall declare) I will never in that matter conclude any thing, that shall be prejudicial to the Realm. For the Weal, Good and Safety whereof, I will never shun to spend my Life; and whomsoever it shall be my Chance to light upon, I trust he shall be such, as shall be as careful for the Realm, as you; I will not say as myself, because I cannot so certainly determine of any other, but by my Desire he shall be such as shall be as careful for the Preservation of the Realm and you, as myself. And albeit it might please Almighty God to continue me still in this Mind, to live out of the State of Marriage, yet is it not to be fear'd, but he will so work in my Heart, and in your Wisdom, as good Provision, by his Help, may be made, whereby the Realm shall not remain destitute of any Heir that may be a fit Governour, and peradventure more beneficial to the Realm, than such Offspring as may come of me: For though I be never so careful of your well-doing, and mind ever so to be, yet may my Issue grow out of kind, and become perhaps ungracious. And in the end, this shall be for me sufficient, that a Marble-Stone shall declare, that a Queen having reign'd such a time, lived and died a Virgin. And here I end, and take your coming to me in good part, and give unto all my hearty Thanks; more yet for your Zeal and good Meaning, than for your Petition.

bind

And under her Majesty's Answer aforesaid, was subscribed in the same Hand, as followeth:

This copied out of a printed Copy, garnish'd with gilt Letters, given to the Honourable the Lady Stafford, of her Majesty's Privy-Chamber, and written out by Alex. Evesham, 1590.

By which Subscription, the Authentickness of this Copy doth sufficiently appear.

At the End of the Session April 10. 1563.
The Lord-Keeper said to Mr. Speaker,

— And touching your Request before this made to her (the Queen) for her Marriage and Succession, because it is of such Importance, whereby I doubted my own opening thereof; and therefore desired her Majesty, that her Meaning might be written, which she hath done and delivered to me to be read, as followeth:

Since there can be no duer Debt than Princes Words; which I would observe, therefore I answer to the same; thus it is. The two Petitions, which you made unto me, do contain two things; My Marriage, and Succession after me. For the first, if I had let slip too much time, or if my Strength had been decay'd, you might the better have spoke therein; or if any think I never meant to try that Life, they be deceived: but if I may hereafter bend my Mind thereunto, the rather for fulfilling your Request, I shall be therewith very well content.

For the second, the Greatness thereof maketh me to say and pray, that I may linger here in this Vale of Misery for your Comfort, wherein I have Witness of my Study and Travail, for your Surety; and I cannot with Nunc dimittis end my Life, without I see some Foundation of your Surety, after my Grave-Stone.

Vid. p. 399.

The Petition of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, to her Majesty, upon the two great Matters of Marriage and Succession, deliver'd by the Lord-Keeper, in Parliament, on November 5. 1556,

MOST humbly beseecheth your excellent Majesty, your faithful, loving and obedient Subjects, all your Lords both Spiritual and Temporal, assembled in Parliament in your Upper House; to be so much their good Lady and Sovereign, as according to your accustomed Benignity, to grant a gracious and favourable Hearing to their Petitions and Suits, which with all Humbleness and Obedience, they are come hither to present to your Majesty by my Mouth, in Matters very nearly and dearly touching your most royal Person, the imperial Crown of this your Realm, and universal Weal of the same; which Suits, for that they tend to the Surety and Preservation of these three things, your Person, Crown, and Realm, the dearest Jewel that my Lords have in the Earth; therefore they think themselves, for divers respects, greatly bound to make these Petitions; as first by their Duty to God, then by their Allegiance to your Highness, and lastly by the Faith they ought to bear to their natural Country. And like as, most gracious Sovereign, by these Bonds they should have been bound to make the like Petition, upon like occasion, to any Prince, that it should have pleas'd God to have appointed to reign over them; so they think themselves doubly bound to make the same to your Majesty, considering that besides the Bond before-mentioned, they stand also bound so to do, by the great and manifold Benefits they have and do receive daily at your Highness's Hands; which, shortly to speak, be as great as the Fruits of Peace, common Quiet and Justice can give: and this with great Care and Charge to yourself. And thus, my Lords diversly bound, as your Majesty hath heard, are now to open to your Highness their humble Petitions and Suits, consisting in two Points chiefly; which not sundrily, or the one without the other, but both jointly they desire your Highness to assent to: The former is, that it would please your Majesty to dispose yourself to marry, where it shall please you, with whom it shall please you, and as soon as it shall please you. The second, that some such Limitation might be made, how the imperial Crown of this Realm should remain, if God call your Highness without Heir of your Body, (which our Lord defend) so as these Lords and Nobles, and other your Subjects then living might sufficiently understand, to whom they should owe their Allegiance and Duty due to be done by Subjects; and that they might, by your Majesty's Licence, and with your Favour, treat and confer together this Parliament-time, for the well doing of this. The former of these two, which is your Marriage, they do in their Hearts most earnestly wish and pray, as a thing that must needs breed and bring great and singular Comfort to yourself, and unspeakable Joy and Gladness to all true English Hearts. But the second carrieth with it such Necessity, that without it they cannot see how the Safety of your royal Person, the Preservation of your imperial Crown and Realm, shall be, or can be sufficiently and certainly provided for. Most gracious and sovereign Lady, the lamentable and pitiful State and Condition, wherein all your Nobles and Counsellors of late were, when it pleased God to lay his heavy Hand upon you, and the Amazedness that most Men of Understanding were by the Fruit of that Sickness brought into, is one Cause of this their Petition; the second, the Aptness and Opportunity of the Time, by reason of this Parliament, whereby both such Advice, Consideration and Consent, as is requisite in so great and weighty a Cause, may be better heard and used, than at any other time, when no Parliament is. The third, for that the assenting and performing of these Petitions, cannot, as they think, but breed great Terrour to our Enemies, and therefore must of necessity bring great Surety to your Person; and especially by Addition of such Laws, as may be join'd with this Limitation, for a certain and sure observing it, and preserving of your Majesty against all Practices and Chances. The fourth Cause, for that the like (as it is supposed) hath been done by divers of your noble Progenitors, both of old time and of late days, and also by other Princes your Neighbours, of the greatest Estate in Europe; and for that Experience hath taught, that Good hath come of it. The fifth, for that it appeareth by Histories, how that in times past, Persons inheritable to Crowns being Votaries and Religious, to avoid such Dangers as might have happen'd for Want of Succession to Kingdoms, have left their Vows and Monasteries, and taken themselves to Marriage, as Constantia a Nun, Heir to the Kingdom of Sicily, marry'd after fifty Years of Age, to Henry VI. Emperour of that Name, and had Issue Frederick II; and likewise Peter of Arragon, being a Monk, marry'd, the better to establish and pacify that Kingdom. Again, Antoninus Pius is as much commended, for that not two Days before his Death, he said to his Council, læto animo morior, quoniam filium vobis relinquo. Pyrrhus is of all godly Men detested, for saying he would leave his Realm to him that had the sharpest Sword. What but Want of a Successor known, made an end of so great an Empire as Alexander the Great did leave at his Death? The sixth Cause is, for that my Lords do judge, the performing of this will breed such an universal Gladness in the Hearts of all your true and loving Subjects, that likely and probably you shall find them in all Commandments ready and glad to adventure their Goods, Lands and Lives in your Service, according to their bounden Duties; which of necessity must breed great Surety to your Majesty. The seventh Cause, because the not doing of this (if God should call your Highness without Heir of your Body, which God grant never be seen, if it be his Will) and yet your Majesty right well knoweth, that Princes and their Offspring, be they never so great, never so strong, never so like to live, be yet mortal, and subject every day, yea every Hour, to God's Call; my Lords think, this happening, and no Limitation made, cannot by their Judgments, but be the Occasion of very evident and great Danger and Peril to all Estates and Sorts of Men of this Realm, by the Factions, Seditions and intestine War, that will grow through Want of understanding to whom they should yield Allegiance and Duty; whereby much innocent Blood is most like to be shed, and many of those to lose their Lives, that now would gladly bestow them for your sake, in your Majesty's Service. The eighth, for that the not performing of this, the other happening, doth leave the Realm without Government, which is the greatest Danger that can happen to any Kingdom; for every Prince is anima legis, and so reputed in Law; and therefore upon the Death of Princes the Law dies; all the Offices of Justice, whereby the Laws are to be executed, do cease; all Writs and Commandments to call Parties to the Execution of Justice, do hang in suspense; all Commissions for the Peace, and for the Punishment of Offenders do determine, and lose their Force: whereby it followeth consequently, that Strength and Will must rule, and neither Law nor Reason, during such a Vacation and Inter-reign; wherein such an Incertainty of Succession is like to last so long, as it is to be feared (if God's Mercy be not the greater) that thereby we may become a Prey to Strangers, (which our Lord defend) or at least lose the great Honour and Estimation that long time hath pertained to us. And like as, most gracious Sovereign, my Lords have been moved for the worldly respect aforesaid, to make their humble Petitions to your Majesty; so by the Examples, Counsels, yea and Commandments, that they have heard out of the sacred Scriptures, and for Conscience sake they feel themselves constrain'd, and enforced to do the like. God, your Highness knoweth, by the Course of the Scriptures, hath declared Succession and having of Children to be one of the principal Benedictions in this Life; and on the contrary, he hath pronounced contrary-wise. And therefore Abraham pray'd to God for Issue, fearing that Eliazar, his Steward, should have been his Heir; and had Promise that Kings should proceed of his Body. Hannah, the Mother of Samuel, pray'd to God with Tears for Issue: And Elizabeth (whose Name your Majesty beareth) Mother to John the Baptist, was joyful when God had blessed her with Fruit, accounting herself thereby to be delivered from Reproach. And as this is a Blessing in private Houses, so is it much more in Kingdoms, as it plainly appeareth in the two Kingdoms of Israel and Judah. Unto the Kingdom of Judah, containing but two Tribes or thereabouts, God gave lineal Succession by Descent of Kings, and therefore they continued a long time. The Kingdom of Israel, containing ten Tribes or thereabouts, often destitute of lawful Heirs, the one half of the People following the one, and the other half following the other, by Wars and Seditions weaken'd, came soon to Ruin, as plainly appeareth by the third and fourth Book of Kings. And again, in the time of the Judges, because there was no ordinary Succession, the People were oftentimes overcome, and carry'd into Captivity. Besides, it is plain by the Scriptures, that godly Governours, and Princes (as Fathers of their Countries) have always been careful to avoid the great Evil that might ensue, through Want of Limitation of Succession; therefore Moses did enjoin Joshua to be his Successor, and David his Son Solomon; whereby a Sedition was appeased, begotten by Adonijah: Of this there be many Examples. Farther, seeing it may be easily gather'd by Experience of all Ages past, that Civil Wars, Effusion of Christian Blood, and consequently Ruins of Kingdoms, do follow; where Realms be left, without a Certainty of Succession: And your Majesty is also inform'd of the same, and sued unto for Redress. If therefore now no sufficient Remedy should be by your Highness provided, that then it should be a dangerous Burden before God to your Majesty, and you were to yield a strict Account to God for the same; considering you are placed, as the Prophet Ezekiel saith, in altissimo speculo of this Common-wealth, and see the Sword coming, and provide no remedy for the defence of it. Laftly, the Spirit of God pronounceth by the Mouth of St. Paul to Timothy, That, Whosoever maketh no due Provision for his Family, is in very great danger to Godward; and alfo by the Mouth of St. John, That, whosoever seeth but one Brother in necessity, and doth shut up the Bowels of Pity and Compassion from him hath not the Love of God remaining in him: whereby it is plain and manifeft, how fearful a thing it were, if this whole Realm, containing fo many Families, were not in a perilous Cafe upon their Suit provided ... or if the Bowels of Mercy fhould be fhut up from fo many Thoufands, which every way were like to fall into moft extream Miferies, if God fhould call your Highnefs without certainty of Succeffion; which we pray to God may never happen. Moft Excellent Princefs, the places of Scripture containing the faid Threatnings, be fet forth with more fharp Words, than be here exprefs'd. Thus Moft Gracious Sovereign, your Lords and Nobles, both Spiritual and Temporal, have as briefly as they can, firft fhew'd to your Majefty, how diverfly they take themfelves bound, to make thefe their humble Petitions unto you: and then, what their Petitions be, and after that, what Reafons for Worldly Refpects, and what by the Scriptures and for Confcience fake, have mov'd them thus to do, which here upon their Knees, according to their Bounden Duty, they moft humbly and earneftly pray your Majefty to have Confideration of in time, and to give them fuch favourable and comfortable Anfwer to the fame, that fome good Effect and Conclufion may grow before the end of the Seffion of this Parliament, the uttermoft Day of their greateft hope, whereby this Common-Wealth, which your Highnefs found to be Lateritia as Augustus did his, and by your great Providence is now come to be Marmorea, fhall not for want of performing this, if God fhall call your Highnefs, without Heir of your Body, be in more dangerous Eftate and Condition, than ever it was that any Man can remember. True it is, that this Suit is made by my Lords, not without great hope of good Succefs, by reafon of the Experience that they have had of your bountiful Goodnefs fhew'd to them, and the reft of your Loving Subjects, divers and fundry ways, fince the beginning of your Reign, which they pray to God long to continue, to his Honour, with all Felicity.

Her Majefty's Anfwer.

SInce there can be no duer than a Prince's Word, to keep that unfpotted, for my part, as one that would be loth that the felf fame thing that keepeth Merchants Credit from craze, fhould be the Caufe that a Prince's Speech fhould merit blame, and fo their Honour quail; therefore I will an Anfwer give, and this it is: The two Petitions that you prefented me (which muft doubtlefs relate to the feveral parts of one and the fame Petition, viz. the Marriage and the Succeffion, and might not improperly be fo call'd tho' couch'd in one Body, and as the Words alfo following do in manner explain it) exprefs'd many Words, which contain'd in Sum thefe two Things, as of your Cares the greateft, my Marriage and my Succeffion. Of which two I think the laft beft to be touch'd, and of the other a filent Thought may ferve. For I thought it had been fo defir'd, as none other Trees Bloffom fhould have been minded, or ever any hope of any Fruit had been denied you. And yet by the way, if any here doubt that I am by Vow or Determination, bent never to trade in that kind of Life, put out that kind of Herefie; for your Belief is therein awry. For tho' I can think it beft for a private Woman, yet I do ftrive with myfelf not to think it meet for a Prince, and if I can bend my liking to your need, I will not refift fuch a Mind.

But to the laft, think not that you had needed this Defire, if I had feen a time fo fit, and it fo ripe to be denounced. The greatnefs of the Caufe, therefore, and need of your Returns, doth make me fay that which I think the wife may eafily ghefs, that as a fhort time, for fo long continuance, ought not to pafs by roat, as many tell their Tales, even fo, as Caufe by Conference with the Learned, fhall fhew me Matter worth the Utterance for your Behoof, fo fhall I more gladly purfue your Good, after my Days, than with all my Prayers, whilft I live, be means to linger my living Thread. And thus much more than I thought, will I add for your Comfort: I have good Record in this Place, that other means than you mention, have been thought of, perchance for your Good, as much as for my Surety no lefs, which if prefently and conveniently could have been executed, it had not been now deferr'd or overflipped. But I hope I fhall die in quiet with Nunc Dimittis; which cannot be, without that I fee fome Glimpfe of your following Surety, after my graved Bones.

Vid. p. 399.

The Queen's Speech at the Diffolution of the Parliament, on Thurfday the 2d of January, 1566.

MY Lords, and others the Commons of this Affembly, Altho' the Lord Keeper hath according to Order, very well anfwered in my Name, yet as a Periphrafis, I have a few words farther, to fpeak unto you: Notwithftanding I have not been ufed, nor love to do it, in fuch open Affemblies; yet now (not to the end to amend his talk) but remembring that commonly a Prince's own Words be better printed in the hearers Memory, than thofe fpoken by Her Command, I mean to fay thus much unto you. I have in this Affembly found fo much Diffimulation, where I always profefs'd Plainnefs, that I marvel thereat, yea two Faces under one Hood, and the Body rotten, being covered with two Vizors, Succeffion and Liberty, which they determin'd muft be either prefently granted, denied or deferr'd; in granting whereof, they had their defires, and denying and deferring thereof (thofe things being fo plaufable, as indeed to all Men they are) they thought to work me that Mifchief, which never Foreign Enemy could bring to pafs, which is the Hatred of my Commons. But alas! they began to pierce the Veffel before the Wine was fined, and began a thing not forfeeing the End, how by this means I have feen my Well-wifhers from my Enemies, and can, as me feemeth, very well divide the Houfe into four. Firft the Broachers and Workers thereof, who are in the greateft Faults; Secondly, the Speakers, who by eloquent Tales perfuaded others, are in the next Degree; Thirdly, the Agreers, who being fo light of Credit, that the Eloquence of the Tales fo overcame them, that they gave more credit thereunto, than to their own Wits; And laftly, thofe that fate ftill mute, and meddl'd not therewith, but rather wonder'd, difallowing the matter; who in my opinion are moft to be excus'd. But do you think, that either I am unmindful of your Surety by Succeffion, wherein is all my Care, confidering I know my felf to be mortal? No, I warrant you: Or that I went about to break your Liberties? No; it never was in my Meaning, but to ftay you before you fell into the Ditch. For all things have their time; and although perhaps you may have after me, one better Learned, or Wifer; yet I affure you, none more careful over you: And therefore henceforth, whether I live to fee the like Affembly or no, or whoever it be, yet beware however you prove your Princes Patience, as you have now done mine

And now to conclude, all this notwithstanding (not meaning to make a Lent of Christmas) the most part of you may assure yourselves, that you depart in your Princes grace.

Vid. p. 442.

Reasons to prove the Queens Majesty bound in Conscience to proceed with Severity, in the Case of the late Queen of Scots.

THE Word of GOD, which is the only Director of Consciences, and a certain Rule for all Estates and Offices, doth often and most earnestly teach, that godly Princes, or Magistrates, not only in Conscience safely may, but also in Duty towards God, ought severely and uprightly to administer Justice. For this is one of the principal Causes, for the which the Providence and Wisdom of God hath ordain'd Magistrates in Common-Wealths, that they might by Justice and Punishment, according to the greatness of the Offences, repress the Wickedness of Mankind, whereunto by Corruption of Nature they are inclin'd. The Magistrate (as St. Paul saith, Rom. 12.) is the Minister of God, and Revenger of Wrath towards him that hath done evil, &c. And St. Peter, 1 Peter 2. Be subject to the King as to the Chief, or to the under Rulers as sent of him ad vindictam nocentium, to the Punishment or Revengement [of] Offenders, and to the Praise of them that do well.

If the Magistrate doth not this, God threatneth heavy Punishment: When you were (saith Wisdom to Princes, Sap 6.) the Ministers of his Kingdom, you have not executed Judgement rightly, nor kept the Law, nor walked according to his Will; horrible therefore and right soon shall he appear unto you; for a hard Judgement shall they have that bare Rule. Potentes potenter tormenta patientur. Now then if the Magistrate be the Minister of God, in his Name and Authority to punish the Wicked according to the measure of their Offences, and are threatned grievous Punishment if they do not; and on the other party, the late Scottish Queen hath offended in two highest Degrees, both concerning God's Religion, and the disinheriting and destruction of our Prince: We see not but her Majesty must needs offend in Conscience before God, if she do not punish her according to the measure of her Offence, in the highest Degree. Small punishment for great Offences, in respect of any Person, is Partiality and slack Justice, which God, above all things, in Judgment forbiddeth; Consider not (says God) the Person of the Poor, nor honour the Countenance of the Rich, Levit. 19.

It is not Good (saith Solomon, Prov. 18.) to consider the Person of the Wicked, thereby to decline from the Judgement. And Jesus Sirach, Make no labour to be a Judge, except thou hast that Stoutness, that thou mayest mightily put down Wickedness: For if thou stand in Awe of the Mighty, thou canst not but fail in giving Sentence, Eccl. 7.

Wherefore whether the late Queen of Scots, be Queen or Subject, be Stranger or Citizen, be Kin or not Kin, by God's Word, for so great Offences she should have the just deserv'd Punishment, and that in the highest degree.

The second Reason, when God by his just Providence doth commit any grievous Offender into the hands of the Prince or Magistrate, as to his Minister, to be punished, he ought to fear the heavy Displeasure of God, if by any colour he do omit the same. Non enim hominis judicium est, sed Dei; & maledictus est, qui facit opus Domini fraudulenter aut negligenter: For God often brings Sinners to punishment for other Offences than those that are known and appear to the World. And therefore hath he shew'd himself grievously displeas'd, when such, by colour of Mercy and Pity, have escap'd just Judgment.

Because Saul spared Agag, (1 Reg. 15.) although he were a King, God took, from the same Saul, his good Spirit, and transferr'd the Kingdom of Israel from him, and from his Heirs for ever.

When Achab spared Benhadad the King of Syria, by his unreasonable Clemency, though he were a great Prince, God will'd the Prophet to say unto him, Because thou hast let escape out of thy Hands the Man that I would have to destroy, thy Life shall go for his life, and thy People for his People.

In these Examples, great pretence might be made for Mercy, for sparing of them, and great reproach of Bloodiness and Cruelty in the contrary; but we see how God punished them.

The late Queen of Scots being a notorious Offender divers ways, both before she came into this Land and afterwards also, hath been by God's special and remarkable Providence, put into the Queen's Majesties hand to be punish'd, and that, far more notably than Agag and Benhadad were put into the hands of Saul and Achab; therefore it is greatly to be fear'd, if she escape as Benhadad did, under pretence of Mercy, and favourable dealing, that God's heavy Displeasure will for the same, light both upon the Prince and the Realm, as it did upon Achab and the Israelites shortly after. This Sentence of the Prophet (as it is for certain reported) was spoken to the Lord James, now Regent in Scotland, when with too much lenity he proceeded therein; it hath followed too true in him. The Lord turn it from our Gracious Sovereign.

The Third Reason: Every good Prince ought, by God's Commandment, to punish even with Death, all such as do seek to seduce the People of God from his true Worship, unto Superstition and Idolatry. For that Offence God hath always most grievously punished, as committed against the first Table, Deut. 13. His Words are these: If thy Brother the Son of thy Mother, or thine own Son, or thy Daughter, or thy Wife that lieth within thy Bosom, or thy Friend which is as thy own Soul unto thee, shall entice thee, saying, let us go and serve strange Gods, &c. Thou shalt not consent unto him, nor hearken unto him; thine Eye shall not pity him, neither shalt thou have Compassion on him, nor keep him secret, but cause him to be slain; thine own hand shall be first upon him to kill him, &c. And afterwards addeth: And all Israel shall fear to do any more any such Wickedness.

The residue of that Chapter, afterwards containeth more grievous Matter, which we would wish all them to read, that in great Offences under the colour of Pity, are loth to have sharp Punishment used. Here you may perceive that God willeth his Magistrate not to spare either Brother or Sister, Son or Daughter, Wife, or Friend be he never so nigh, if he seek to seduce the People of God from his true Worship; much less is an Enemy and Traitor to be spared: Yea, and he addeth the Cause, why he would have such sharp Punishment used in such Cases, That Israel may fear to do the like.

But the late Queen of Scots, hath not only sought and wrought, by all means she can, to seduce the People of God in this Realm, from true Religion, but is the only hope of all the Adversaries of God, throughout all Europe, and the Instrument whereby they trust to overcome the Gospel of Christ in all Countries. And therefore if she have not that Punishment, which God in this place aforemention'd, appointeth; it is of all Christian hearts to be feared, that God's just Plague will light both upon the Magistrates and Subjects; but that by our slackness and remiss Justice, we give occasion of the overthrow of God's Glory and Truth in his Church, mercifully restor'd unto us in those latter Days.

Con-

Euſeb. lib. 2. De Vita Conſtantini.

Conſtantinus Magnus cauſed Licinius to be put to death, being not his Subject but his Fellow Emperor, for that the ſaid Licinius laboured to ſubvert Chriſtian Religion. And the ſame Conſtantinus, is for the ſame in all Hiſtories highly commended. Much more ſhall it be lawful for the Queen's Majeſty to execute this Woman, who beſides the Subverſion of Religion, hath ſought the Life of the ſame our Gracious Sovereign.

The Fourth Reaſon: It is dangerous for any Perſon, being a Prince, both for his own State, as alſo for the Puniſhment which may come from God's hand, by ſlackneſs of Juſtice in great Offences, to give occaſion, by hope of Impunity, of the Increaſe of like Wickedneſs.

Joab being ſpared of David for murdering Abner, killed Amaſa alſo. Becauſe Amnon was winked at by his Father, for committing Rape and Inceſt with his own Siſter, Abſalom, under hope of like Impunity, was embolden'd to murder his Brother Amnon.

But look, I pray you, how grievouſly God puniſh'd that ſlack Juſtice of David, colour'd with a tender Heart towards his Children. Did he not ſuffer, yea and by his juſt Judgment raiſe one of his own Sons, towards whom he uſed that exceſſive Tenderneſs and Pity, to rebel againſt him, and drive him out of his own Kingdom. The late Scottiſh Queen hath heap'd up together all the Sins of the licentious Sons of David; Adulteries, Murders, Conſpiracies, Treaſons, and Blaſphemies againſt God alſo; and if ſhe eſcape with ſmall Puniſhment, her Majeſty in Conſcience ought, as alſo good and faithful Subjects to fear that God will reſerve her as an Inſtrument to put her from the Royal Seat of this Kingdom, and to plague the unthankful and naughty Subjects: Quod omen ut Deus avertat precamur. Shall we think that God will not plague it? Surely our Hearts do fear he will do it grievouſly.

The Fifth Reaſon: A Prince ought in Conſcience before God, by all means he can, to ſee to the Quietneſs, and Safety, and good Eſtate of that People, over which God hath appointed him Governour.

For in the Prophets, oftentimes under the Names of Paſtors and Watchmen, he threateneth great Puniſhment to Princes and Governours for the contrary; eſpecially in Ezechiel, 33, and 34. And ſignifieth, that if his People periſh, either in Soul or Body, by ſlackneſs in adminiſtring Juſtice, or by any other Miſgovernment, God will require their Blood at the Prince's hands, which Places, as they may be applied to Prophets and Teachers, ſo do they not exclude, but principally comprehend Kings and Magiſtrates, as Hieronymus noteth in Ezechiel, ch. 33. the Words of the Prophet are theſe, viz. If the Watchmen ſee the Sword and blow not the Trumpet, ſo that the People is not warned; if the Sword come then, and take any Man from among them, the ſame ſhall be taken away in his own Sin from among them, but his Blood will I require at the Watchman's hands.

And again, Woe unto the Shepherds that deſtroy and ſcatter my Flock, ſaith the Lord, &c. You ſcatter and thruſt out of my Flock, and do not look upon them: Therefore will I viſit this Wickedneſs of your Imaginations, &c. Jer. 23. By theſe and ſuch other Words in many Places, God ſignifieth, if his People periſh either in Body or Soul, by the ſlack or remiſs Government of them that are appointed Rulers over them, and as it were Shepherds and Herdmen to keep them from Danger, that he will require the Blood of his People at their hands.

But the late Scottiſh Queen with her Allies, by the pretended Title, and other wicked deviliſh, and traiterous Devices and Workings, is like to bring Confuſion to this Realm of England, and the People thereof, as evidently appeareth to all good and faithful Subjects. Therefore the Prince offendeth grievouſly before God, and is in danger of the Blood of God's People, if for the Safety of the ſame ſhe do not cut her off.

3. Reg. 2. Solomon, a wiſe and godly Prince, ſpared not his own Natural, yea and his elder Brother Adonijah, for ſuſpicion and likelihood of Treaſon, and for a Marriage propoſed only, but put him to death for the ſame, and that ſpeedily without Courſe of Judgment, leſt by Delay, Trouble and Danger might have enſued, not only to his own Perſon, being Prince and chief Miniſter of God in that Land, but alſo to that People, over which he had great Charge, and for Safety whereof in Conſcience he was bound to deal. He would have thought it a great Burden to his Conſcience, if by the ſparing of one Man's Life, were he never ſo nigh of Blood to him, he would have hazarded the Seat on which God had placed him, and the Blood of many Thouſands of his People, which by a Rebellion might have been ſpent.

But this Woman and her greatly deſired Huſband, as ſhe pretendeth, have put far more heinous matters in execution: Wherefore her Caſe ſtanding as it doth, there is no Scruple in Conſcience to proceed with Severity, but great danger in Conſcience for dealing too mildly, and contrary to the Order of Juſtice, making the Puniſhment leſs than the Offence, with the Danger of her Majeſty's own Perſon, the Hazard of the Realm, and Subverſion of God's Truth.

The Sixth Reaſon: It is dangerous for any Chriſtian Prince, and contrary to the Word of God, with colour of Mercy and Pity, to do that, whereby he ſhall diſcourage and kill the Hearts, not only of his own good Subjects and faithful Counſellors, but alſo of all other Nations faithfully profeſſing God's Religion and his true Worſhip, as may well appear in the Example of David.

David having this Infirmity of too much Pity and indulgency towards Offendors, which is not of any Prince to be follow'd, did forbid that his Traiterous Son Abſolom ſhould be ſlain; and when he was kill'd, effeminately he bewailed the ſame, to the diſcouraging of his People: but he was ſharply rebuked by Joab, his Counſellor, ſaying, Thou haſt ſhamed this Day the Faces of thy Servants which have ſaved thy Life, and the life of thy Sons, &c. Thou loveſt thoſe that hate thee, and thou ſheweſt this day that thou paſſeſt not for thy Captains and thy Servants; and now I perceive if Abſolom had lived and we all had been ſlain, it would have pleaſed thee well.

What Inconvenience was like to follow unto David by this doing, and what other good Direction may be taken out of this Hiſtory well conſidered, for brevity's ſake we leave to the Conſideration of Wiſe Princes and Governours. When David was ſo much moved with theſe Words that he was contented to take another Courſe, which turned both to the Comfort of his Subjects and his own benefit, the Application needeth not.

If David were moved thus to do to the comfort of his own Subjects only, and the abaſhing of his own private Rebels; how much more have we to deſire God to move the Queen's Majeſty, by the execution of this Lady, to glad the hearts of all true Chriſtians in Europe, and to abaſh and damp the Minds of the Enemies of God, and Friends of Antichriſt.

Object. It may be objected, that thus to proceed is not Honourable for the Queen's Majeſty.

Reſponſ. The Shadow of Honour (as may evidently appear) deceived upon the like occaſion, both King Saul in ſparing Agag King of Amalek, and King Achab in receiving to his Mercy King Benhadad, as it is in the Example in the ſecond Reaſon mentioned, who did pretend great Honour in ſaving a King, and thought Diſhonour in the contrary, that one

King ſhould kill another; but Man's Judgment and God's in ſuch Caſes are far diverſe; for indeed, execution of Juſtice upon any Perſon whatſoever, is, and ever hath been accounted Honourable.

Joſhua, a worthy Prince and Governour, put to death at one time Five Kings, and that, as might appear rudely, cauſing his Soldiers to ſet their Feet on their Necks and ſlay them, and willed them to be ſtout and not to fear to do it. Joſhua, 10.

We find alſo in Scriptures that in this Zeal of Juſtice two Wicked Queens, Jezebel and Athalia, both inferior in Miſchief to this late Queen, have been by God's Magiſtrates executed, and the ſame Execution commended in Scripture.

Object. It may be farther objected, that the Queen's Majeſty in ſo doing ſhould exceed the Limits and Bounds of Mercy and Clemency.

Reſp. Indeed, a Prince ſhould be merciful, but he ſhould be juſt alſo. It is ſaid, Miſericordia & veritas cuſtodiunt regem; but in the next Chapter it followeth, Qui ſequitur juſtitiam & miſericordiam, inveniet vitam. Prov. 20.

The Prince in Government muſt be like unto him who is not only amiable by Mercy, but terrible alſo by Juſtice, and therefore is call'd, Miſericors & juſtus Dominus.

Mercy oftentimes ſheweth itſelf in the Image of Juſtice; yea, and Juſtice in Scriptures is by God called Mercy, Pſa. 136. Who ſmote Egypt with their firſt born, for his mercy endureth for ever. In that Pſalm the Smiting of Egypt with terrible Plagues, the Deſtruction of Pharaoh, the Killing of great and mighty Kings are called the merciful Works of God, as indeed they were, but Mercy towards the People of God, and not towards the Enemies of God and his People.

Therefore, as the Queen's Majeſty indeed is merciful, ſo we muſt humbly deſire her, that ſhe will open her Mercy towards God's People and her good Subjects, in diſpatching thoſe Enemies that ſeek the Confuſion of God's Cauſe amongſt us, and of this noble Realm.

It may alſo be ſaid, that to ſpare one Perſon, being an Enemy, a Stranger, a profeſs'd Member of Antichriſt, and convicted of ſo many heinous Crimes, with the evident Peril of ſo many thouſands of Bodies and Souls of good and faithful Subjects, may juſtly be termed, Crudelis miſericordia.

Petiliano objiciente, Deum non delectari humano ſanguine: Reſpondet, legimus multos à famulo Dei Moiſe miſericorditer interfectos. Numquid crudelis effectus eſt, cum de monte deſcendens tot millia juberet occidi? Auguſt. contra literas Petiliani, lib. 2. c. 86.

Saul & Jehoſaphat reges fuerunt populi Dei, & dum miſericordiam iis quos Deus oderat præſtiterunt, Dei offenſam in opere pietatis incurrerunt; è contrario Phinehas filiique Levi gratiam Dei humanâ cæde & ſuorum parricidio meruerunt. Hierom.

The ſame Hierom de origine animæ, ſaith the like, ſparing of evil Perſons is miſericors inobedientia.

St. Auguſtine alſo ſaith, ſicut eſt miſericordia puniens, eſt etiam crudelitas parcens.

Object. But haply it may be that ſome may diſcredit theſe Reaſons by the Perſons, when they cannot by the Matter; and will put in her Majeſty's mind, that we in perſuading her, reſpect our own danger and fear of Peril coming to us, and not right and true Judgment: Yea, and that it may appear very unſeemly and worthy ſharp Reproof in a Biſhop to excite a Prince to Cruelty and Blood, contrary to her merciful Inclination.

Reſp. As touching the firſt Branch, ſurely we ſee not any great continuance of Danger likely to come unto us, more than to all good Subjects, while this State ſtandeth; and the State cannot lightly alter without the certain Peril both of our Prince and Country.

Now, if our Danger be joined with the Danger of our gracious Sovereign and natural Country, we ſee not how we can be accounted godly Biſhops or faithful Subjects, if in common Peril we ſhould not cry and give Warning; or on the other ſide, how they can be thought to have true Hearts towards God and towards their Prince and Country, that will miſlike with us for ſo doing, and ſeek thereby to diſcredit us.

As touching the ſecond Branch, God forbid that we ſhould be Inſtruments to incenſe a merciful Prince to Cruelty and Bloodineſs; neither can we think well of them or judge that they have true meaning Hearts, that in the Miniſter of God and Officer, do term Juſtice and right Puniſhment by the Name of Bloodineſs and Cruelty. God, I truſt, in time, ſhall open her Eyes to ſee and eſpy their cruel Purpoſes, under the Cloak of extolling Mercy.

When the Prince or Magiſtrate is ſlack in Puniſhing the ſinful and wicked, the Biſhop and Preacher is bound in Conſcience before God, to exhort him to more diligent and ſevere Dealing therein, leſt the Blood both of Prince and People be required at his Hands.

3. Reg. 20. May the Prophet be accounted cruel to excite Ahab to bloodineſs, which ſo ſharply rebuked him for his Clemency ſhewed towards Benhadad? May Samuel juſtly be named cruel, becauſe in like caſe he reproved Saul for ſparing the Life of King Agag, and killed the ſame Agag with his own Hands in the ſight of the Prince.

What ſhall we ſay of the Prophet Elias, ſhall we call him Cruel becauſe in the Zeal of Juſtice he killed all the falſe Prophets of Baal? Did not God approve his Fact with the miraculous ſending of abundance of Rain after three Years continual Drought? But to thoſe Men, I think, God himſelf and his Angels will ſeem cruel, and his Juſtice cruelty; that they under colour of Mercy might be ſpared until time will ſerve to ſatisfie their own cruel Hearts.

An Argument perſuading that the Queen's Majeſty ought to have in Conſcience a great Care of the Safety of her own Perſon.

EVery Prince being the Miniſter of God and a publick Perſon, ought by God's Word to have an eſpecial Care of his own Safety, more than a private Perſon; and chiefly when the caſe ſo ſtandeth, that ſafety of his Realm and Country, and the true Worſhipping of God by God's diſpoſition may ſeem to depend on him.

But now ſo it is in the Queen's Majeſty, therefore in Conſcience ought ſhe to have a ſingular Care of her ſafety, if not for herſelf ſake, yet at the leaſt for the furtherance of God's Cauſe and ſtay of her Country, to the maintenance whereof ſhe is bound before God.

Moſes wiſhed to be put out of the Book of Life for the ſafeguard of the People. Exod. 32.

Paul wiſh'd to be Anathema for his Brethren. Rom. 10.

Codrus and divers other Heathens gave away their Lives for the ſafety of their Countries. Contrary-wiſe we wiſh, and are humble Suitors, that it may pleaſe her Majeſty to preſerve her own Life, and to cut away the Dangers thereof, if not for her own Cauſe which happily her noble Courage doth ſmally regard, yet, at the leaſt-wiſe, for God's Cauſe, and for her faithful and loving Subjects, whoſe Life and good Eſtate dependeth on her.

Object. It may be objected, that her Majeſty repoſeth her Truſt and Confidence in the Providence of God, and therefore maketh light of all Attempts that her Enemies can work againſt her.

Reſp. Surely, it muſt needs be confeſſed, that the ſame proceedeth both of noble Courage, and of a ſtrong Faith and Truſt in God, and ought indeed to be the Bulwark of Help and Comfort to all good and godly Princes; yet fo far as they feem not withal to tempt God by leaving that Diligence, and thofe ordinary Means whereby he ufeth to fave and deliver.

David knew himfelf to be anointed and appointed Ifrael by God himfelf, yet he did not rafhly caft himfelf into the Hands of Saul his Enemy.

Jehofaphat and Hezechias in their great Diftreffes, undoubtedly had their Truft and Confidence in God, but they ceafed not both to fhun and cut off all thofe things whereby Danger might grow, and to ufe all means whereby their Safety might be holpen.

It is alledged by Chrift, Thou fhalt not tempt the Lord thy God; but furely it might have been as fafe for Chrift without tempting God, to have caft himfelf down from the Pinacle of the Temple, as for the Queen's Majefty to fuffer in her Bofom a poifonous Serpent, that ceafeth not continually to thruft the Sting of her venomous Workings into her Majefty's Safety and Poffeffion of her Crown. It is well faid, Principum Securitas paucorum vitâ redimenda eft.

There are divers Hiftories, yea and Examples of late time, whereby it hath been declar'd, that the tempting Confidence of God's Providence, not fhunning evident occafion of Danger, hath fell out to the extream hurt of the Parties, and on fuch as have depended on them, which we think not meet to recite, left they fhould feem in this cafe Ominofa, as God for his great Mercies fake forbid that they fhould be.

Many Reafons, Authorities and Examples more befides this may be taken out of the holy Scriptures for confirmation of this Purpofe; but for tedioufnefs we thought good to omit them, and leave the refidue to God.

In the 20th Chapter of Leviticus, there is much like matter, and that in as earneft manner fet forth; neither can any in Confcience think that this Punifhment was here appointed by God fo grievous, only for thofe that then reduced the People of God to Gentilifh and Heathenifh Idolatry; for Idolatry and falfe Worfhip, by whomfoever it begun, tho' they bear the Name of the Church or of the People never fo much, it is a direct Offence againft the firft Table; and therefore in God's judgment worthy no lefs Punifhment; yea their Offence muft needs be more heinous in the fight of God, for that they have had greater opportunity to underftand God's true Worfhip.

Shall any Chriftian Man think that the Worfhip of God appointed in his Law being but the Figure, was more acceptable and pleafant to God than this his true Worfhip in the Faith of JESUS, according to the Gofpel of our Redemption? Or, that the violating of the fame, or feducing of his People from it, is in his judgment lefs difpleafing, or not fo grievoufly to be punifhed as was the breaking of his Law or feducing from it? Shall we think that the gathering a few Sticks on the Sabbath-day is to be punifhed by Death in a poor fimple Perfon? and the feeking to fubvert the Gofpel of Chrift, and to draw the People of God to that idolatrous Doctrine that teacheth to impute the Merit of Chrift's Blood and Paffion to wicked Mens Devices, yea to Stocks, Stones, to Sticks, to Water, to Bells, &c. fhall not be worthy the Punifhment of Death in a noble Perfon? God direct our Judgment otherways.

By thefe Words of God beforerecited, Deut. 13. it is be evident that God willed his Magiftrates to fpare neither Brother, nor Sifter, nor Daughter, nor Wife, nor Friend, though he were never fo nigh, if he fought to feduce the People of God from his true Worfhip; how much lefs is an Enemy, a Traitor and an Adulterer to be fpared?

An humble Petition to her Majefty, and the Reafons gather'd out of the Civil Law by certain appointed by Authority in Parliament, to prove that it ftandeth not only with Juftice, but alfo with the Queen's Majefty's Honour and Safety to proceed criminally againft the pretended Scotch Queen.

WE your Majefty's moft humble and faithful Subjects affembl'd in Parliament for Prefervation of your Royal Perfon and Eftate, do highly acknowledge the great Goodnefs of God that hath chofen and appointed fuch a Sovereign to Reign over us as never Subjects by any Record ever had a better; and therefore our hearty Prayers are daily, and ever fhall be, to Almighty God, long to preferve your moft excellent Majefty in all and moft perfect Felicity that ever Creature had or might have upon Earth. And whereas the higheft and chiefeft States are ever more envied of all fuch as be the worft and greateft Difturbers of God's Monarchy and his anointed Jurifdiction, we cannot but with care of Mind and force of our Bodies feek to redrefs whatfoever fhall be thought hurtful to your Majefty's fafe Quietnefs and moft bleffed Government.

A Queen of late time, and yet through her own Acts now juftly no Queen, a nigh Kinfwoman of your Majefty's, and yet a very unnatural Sifter, Lady Mary Stuart, late Queen of Scots, being driven through Violence and Force of others to take Harbour in your Majefty's Realm for the fafeguard of her Life, hath not only had your Majefty's moft gracious Protection, but alfo was faved within her own Realm, by your Majefty's Authority, from execution of Death for her moft horrible and unnatural Doings there, known throughout Europe to her perpetual Infamy and Shame for ever. And albeit upon her firft coming your Highnefs might both by Law and Juftice have dealt with her judicially for her Attempts made by Writing and otherwife againft the Crown and Dignity, and to the difherifon of your moft Royal Perfon for ever; yet your Majefty in confideration of her long dangerous Troubles in her own Realm, and in hope that fuch great Adverfities would have been good Leffons for her Amendment hereafter, hath not ufed her in any fuch manner as fhe hath deferv'd; but rather forgetting or forgiving after a fort her former Doings, hath dealt with her like a good and natural Sifter. All which notwithftanding, this unnatural Lady (being born out of kind as it fhould feem) hath altogether forgotten God and all Goodnefs, abufing herfelf as it appeareth moft treafonably againft your Majefty's Perfon and State, and feeking and devifing by all means poffible not only to deprive your Majefty of all earthly Dignities and Livings, but alfo of your natural Life; which thing is found by evident Proofs, and by the Judges of your Realm declar'd to be moft horrible and moft wicked Treafon that ever was wrought againft any Prince; for which her Doings your Majefty minding to touch her in Honour, efteemeth her Perfon unworthy of any Hope or Title, Pre-eminence or Dignity within this your Land, and therefore not feeking to deal with her according to her defert, is only contented to have her difabled as a Perfon not capable of Princely Honour. And thus your Majefty ufing this course, thinketh it the meetest way to establish yourself and to quiet your Dominions hereafter, taking away hereby the hope of such as do depend upon the pretended Title, and weakning the whole Strength of that Faction. And for farther assurance of your Majesty's Quietness, your Highness does not mislike to have grievous Pains of High-Treason laid upon all such as shall attempt and maintain her pretended Title by any manner of way.

courfe,

Thus, as evil Men shall be kept back from intermedling in the maintenance of a Title, so may your Majesty's true and faithful Subjects be much emboldned to deal against this pretended Queen and her Adherents, when your Subjects shall see a Law set down for your avail, and your Enemies shall want Forces and wax weak thereby, and your true Subjects greatly hardned for all Offences. Moreover, if the said pretended Queen shall hereafter make any attempt of Treason, the Law so to run, that she should suffer Pains of Death without farther trouble of Parliament. And if any shall enterprize to deliver her out of Prison after her Disablement, either in Your Majesty's Life, or after the same, to be convicted immediately of High-Treason, and herself assenting thereunto to be likewise adjudged as a Traitor in Law. In all which Proceedings your Majesty thinketh to deal both safely and honourably, as well for yourself as for your State. For thereby it seemeth, that neither shall she, nor any for her hereafter, dare deal to do harm, but also all foreign Princes and Nations will think much Honour of such your merciful Proceedings. And lastly, whereas she hath fallen into your Hands from the Violence of others, and so as a Bird followed by a Hawk seeketh Succour at your Majesty's Feet, your Highness thinketh yourself bound in Honour, for that she is your Sister, and a Queen born, not to proceed farther, only to her Disablement, counting it a strong Work for your safety. These be the Reasons which in part may move your Majesty to take this course, as we do conceive; all which notwithstanding, if it might please your most excellent Majesty to suffer your poor and faithful Subjects to enter deeply upon good search of this cause, and by way of reply to make answer with proceeding by just Proofs for your Majesty's safety, we doubt not but with your Highness's favourable acceptance, all that which hitherto hath been utter'd is rather a declaration of that most mild and gracious Nature of yours, than any assurance for your Person and Estate at all.

Reasons answering the former Arguments.

May it therefore please your Majesty,

WHereas it is said, that it standeth to very good Purpose to proceed only in disabling the Scotch Queen for any Claim or Title to the Crown; we take it, by your Majesty's Favour, that such an especially disabling of the Scottish Queen, is in effect a special confirmation of a Right that she should have had, Quia privatio præsupponit habitum. And farther, we do take it for a known truth, that by the Laws and Statutes in this Land now in force, she is already disabled, and therefore it is to small purpose, rem actam agere. And for answer unto the Premises, we say farther, That neither shall this weaken others that are evil-minded, but rather strengthen them in their Mischief, and make them desperate where there is no other Remedy; and a Fire-brand once kindled, and finding apt matter to work upon, will hardly be quenched without a great hazard. Touching the grievous Pains laid upon those that shall deal, those will be little feared by the wicked, whom hope of Gain maketh more bold than such Pains do appal: Besides Nature given to this Nation and all others that are under the Moon, maketh Men oftentimes stir without cause, and as Plato saith, Naturales sunt conversiones rerum pub. Yet they that heretofore have born Armour as Traitors, [illegible] fearing the Law then in force, which [illegible] much restrain them as this or any Law [illegible] made can be able, being desperate, will [illegible] no Laws, especially such an Instrument living by whom all Attempts are to be wrought. Force overthroweth Justice till the cause of all Mischief, which is the hoped help, be clean taken away. And where it is said, that the making of a Law for her disabling emboldneth much your Subjects to deal against her: We answer, that no new Law needeth to encourage good and loyal Subjects against such a Person, who hath broken all the Laws of God and Nature, and is worthy to be out of your Majesty's Protection, because she seeketh still the Disturbance of this noble State, and using often her own Phrase, threatneth that she will stir Coals. Touching a new Law to be made against her, if she should attempt any Evil hereafter, the experience of her former Life is such that no Law has any force with her, that is fully minded to take her Advantage upon any apt Occasion offer'd. And to threaten her with Death if she should seem to make an escape hereafter, is such Advice, that she nothing feareth; for besides she was told at Lough-Leaven, there was no way but Death with her if she would not take her Imprisonment quietly, and live without seeking Liberty, she notwithstanding adventur'd herself with a young Fellow very dishonourably to get away in a Boat. And now since her coming into England she hath wrought divers ways to make an Escape, and employ'd the Heads of the chiefest Estates of your own disloyal Subjects for that purpose. Therefore menacing and but threatning Words of Law shall not keep her back from her malicious intent to subvert your Majesty, and to give a push for the Crown come of her what will. And likely it is that she may escape as well as be taken, for she neither wanteth Wit nor Cunning to make her way. And we have learned in matters of great Hazard to be well advised, and to take always that Order which may be the best. Now there will want no Traitors to be always ready to bring this her Device about, and to do what they can for her Liberty. And such as will not deal in small Matters, will adventure deep for a Kingdom, because the Reward is great when the Service is done. But your Majesty hath regard unto your Honour as much as to your Safety, and thinketh that in taking this course all Princes will speak well of your Highness. May it please your Majesty, we your good Subjects do well like of so honourable a meaning; but we would be loth to see that when you have such regard of Honour, you do thereby lose your State, and so your Life, Honour and All. For if it should fall out that the Scottish Queen escaped your Hands, (which Christ for his Mercies sake forbid) all good Princes would think great want of Judgment and Foresight, first in your Majesty, next in your Council, last of all in the whole Nation; and such a Grief it would be to your Majesty and Subjects, and to all other good Christian Princes throughout Europe, as none could be greater. Again such a matter of Comfort and Triumph it would be to the Adversaries, that that they would account her Escape a miraculous Work of God, and that your Majesty had no Power, tho' Will to keep her safe: And when that day should come, wo be to all true Christians universally, for upon her do depend the chiefest Enemies of Religion, and to this Kingdom: May it please you therefore, most Gracious Queen, to be well advised, and to take sound Counsel when it is given, knowing this for a certain truth, That Evil foreseen and advisedly looked unto, doth ever the less harm: But still your Majesty, considering the great Trouble she hath had, and forgetting, or not greatly esteeming, what Troubles she hath brought unto your Realm, doth by a merciful respect of your most gracious Nature, rather bend to do Good to her, than seek Safeguard to your self. And seeing here your Sister, tho' unnatural, and also a Queen by Birth, altho' not worthy of Life, cannot but rather hazard your own Life, than deal with her according to her Deserts. This your Majesty's Nature being thus known, it behoveth all your good Subjects, most gracious Sovereign, to call and cry to God for his heavenly Assistance, that his Power may be given to you, next after the Advancement of his Glory, to seek assuredly your own Safety; which your Majesty cannot fully do by the means that hath hitherto been taken, or hereafter to be used: Therefore it would please your most excellent Majesty to give ear to the sound Reasons of your most faithful Subjects, and rather deal certainly than by chance; and there is no doubt but your Majesty shall avoid all apparent Dangers, and live in all Safety and Honour, to God's Glory, and to the Comfort of all good Christian Princes universally. Thus much against the Opinion of disabling the Scottish Queen, whereby it appeareth that it will be rather for her Benefit than to her Hurt. And most certain it is, that it will be dangerous for the State divers ways: whereas dealing with her in the first degree according to her Deserts, the same is lawful, safe, necessary and honourable for your Majesty and all Christendom besides. And because it may appear, that this Speech is grounded upon Law and Reason, there shall be Arguments in Law alledged sufficiently for this Matter, as the shortness of time may serve.

Civil Reasons for doubt of Answer.

A Confederate being in the Country of his Confederate, is to be punished as though he were a Subject. Every Person offending, is to be tried in the Place where he committeth the Crime, without exception of Privilege. A King passing through another King's Realm, or there resident, is but a private Person. The Dignity of the Person offending increaseth the Offence. Reatus omnem honorem excludit; a King deposed is not to be taken for a King; and therefore Frederick King of Naples being deprived by the King of Spain, was afterward judged to be no King by Sentence. A King, tho' not deposed, may commit Treason. Deiotarus, a King confederated with the Romans, was criminally judged by Cajus Julius Cesar, for that he conspired to have slain the said Julius Cesar at a Banquet. Joan Queen of Naples was put to Death, for that she gave her Consent to the Murder of her Husband, and caused him to be hanged out at a Window. Henry the Seventh Emperor did give a solemn Judgment of Death at Pisa 1311, against Robert King of Sicily, for that the same King had entred into Conspiracy with the Subjects of the Emperor; and yet was not King Robert within the Jurisdiction of the Emperor at the time of the Conspiracy, neither at the time of the Judgment.

It standeth with the Law of Nature, which is immutable, for any Person to proceed for the Safety of himself and his Charge. Great Offences in the highest degree ought not to be punished for any Affection of Kindred. Justice, Equity and Commonwealth, are to be preferred before the Affection of Kindred; Quia arctiora sunt vincula virtutis quam Sanguinis. An Offence of the highest degree against the Prince, being the Head of the Political Body, is an Offence to every Member of the same, and requireth sharp Punishment for the Preservation of the whole. The Intent of Offences in the highest degree, is punished with Death, although the Execution of the Intent doth not follow. The Benefit and Privilege of safe Conduct is lost by any Crime committed after the Grant made thereof. Administration of Justice cannot but be honourable. All just and honourable Dealings are pleasing to God, and profitable to the Prince and State. Execution of Justice is void of all Injury. It is dangerous for the State to swerve from the Ministration of Justice, and the due Execution of Law. To spare Offenders in the highest degree, is an Injury to the Prince and State of the Realm; Pœna unius salus multorum. The loss of Life is the Penalty appointed for Treason; and the loss of Lands and Goods, with the Possibility of Title, cometh but in consequence and unnecessarily. Punishment ought to be equal with the Fault; and he that ministreth less Punishment than the Fault deserves, doth not execute the Law according to the Rules of Justice.

Reasons to prove, that it standeth not only with Justice, but with the Queen's Majesty's Honour and Safety, to proceed criminally against Mary Stuart, late Queen of Scots; for her Treasons committed against her Majesty and this Realm.

A Confederate being in the Country of his Confederate, for a Crime committed, is there to be punished. Cod. & de captivis, & post termino reversis, verba legis. At si sunt apud nos rei ex civitatibus fœderatis, in eos damnatos animadvertimus. Therefore altho' the Scottish Queen were a Confederate, yet she is to be used in like sort as a Subject. Item, There is no Person, of what degree soever he be, but is there to be tried, where the Crime is committed, without exception of Privilege. Cod. Ubi de criminibus agi oporteat, verba legis. Qua in provincia quis deliquit, aut in qua pecuniarum aut criminum reus sit, ibi judicari debet, & hoc jus perpetuum sit. But the Scottish Queen here hath offended; Ergo. Item, Every Person is to be condemned and adjudged equally: In crimine læsæ majestatis, verba legis. In crimine læsæ majestatis, æqua est omnium conditio. Ad legem Juliam læsæ majestatis. But she hath fallen in crimen læsæ majestatis, Ergo. Item, A King in another King's Territory may commit Treasons as another private Person, Corectus de potestate regia, N° 90. verba. Quaro utrum Rex non habens justum titulum regni incidat in crimen læsæ majestatis. Respondeo, quod sic, secundum Bartol. in legem duodecim tabularum, & in legem prim. ff. de crimine læsæ majestatis. But the Scottish Queen hath offended here in England; Ergo. A King passing through another King's Realm, or there resident, is but a private Person. Bartolus duodecimo libro de dignitatibus, verba. Sed tamen dubitatur tatur ſi Rex vel Baro tranſit per alias partes extra regnum ſuum, utrum poſſit creare milites: & videtur quod non, quia ibi privatus eſt homo ff. de præfecto urbis. ff. de officio præſidis. Præſes in homines provinciæ ſuæ imperium habet, & hoc dum eſt in provincia. 91. Coll. penuit, verba. Quilibet Rex extra ſuum territorium privatus eſt. Lupus in allegatione, Cenſetur adinſtar privati. But the Scottiſh Queen being here in England, is out of her Territory; Ergo, to be punifhed as a private Perfon. Every Perfon, of what Condition foever he be, either Superior or Equal, fubmitting himfelf to the Jurifdiction of another, is to be judged by him to whom he fubmitteth himfelf. L. eſt receptivum ff. de judiciis, verba. Eſt receptivum eoque jure utimur, ut ſi quis major vel æqualis ſubjiciat ſe juriſdictioni alterius, poteſt ei, & adverſus eum jus dici. But the Queen of Scots, altho' fhe were a Queen, and thereby equal, by committing heinous Treafon, hath fubmitted herfelf to the Queen's Jurifdiction. Paulus de caſtro in dictam legem eſt receptivum ff. eo, verba. Ejus enim, major vel æqualis poteſt ſe ſubjicere juriſdictioni ordinaliter alterius judiciis minoris vel paris tacite, ſi judex unius territorii delinquat vel contrahat in territorium alterius judicis vel minoris vel paris, quia ratione delicti vel contractus ſortitur ibi forum. Rota de definitionibus de judiciis, ille qui delinquit, per delictum amiſit mercem imprim. & ſic factus eſt alius privatus; & ſic compar poteſt eum punire: quilibet in ſuo territorio eſt major Alexandro. But the Scottiſh Queen having committed High Treafon within this Realm, hath by Conftruction of Law fubmitted herfelf to this Jurifdiction; and therefore to be punifhed as another private Perfon. And altho' it be faid, that one who is not ſubditus, non poteſt committere crimen læſæ majeſtatis; yet that Saying is to be taken, whereas the Crime is committed out of the Jurifdiction: But if it be committed within the Jurifdiction, then there to be punifhed. Papa in Clementinam de ſententia & re judicata. And albeit the Pope did reverfe the fame Sentence; yet he faith, that if the Party had been within the Jurifdiction of the Superior at the time of the Crime committed, and Judgment to the Party offended, he had been juftly condemned, &c Verba Papæ. Quod ſi Rex infra diſtrictum imperiale fuiſſet inventus delinquens, potuiſſet contra eum ſententia dici. Lo here the Pope declareth plainly, that fhe here offending, may juftly here be punifhed in pæna capitis. Item, a King depofed is not afterwards to be taken for a King. Thomas de Turrecremeta definitione 65. Rex regno privatus non eſt amplius Rex. But the Queen of Scots is deprived; Ergo. The Benefit or Privilege of fafe Conduct is loft, when any Crime is committed after the fafe Conduct granted. Angelus de maleficiis, in verbo publica fama. But the Queen of Scots hath committed againft the fafe Conduct, fince her coming into the Realm; Ergo. The Will and Mind in Treafons is punifhed equally as the Act. Cod. ad legem Juliam læſæ majeſtatis, verba legis. In crimine læſæ majeſtatis voluntatem ſceleris æque ac effectum puniri jura voluerunt. But the Scottiſh Queen hath not only had the Affection, but hath notorioufly proceeded to the Actions; Ergo. Neither is it any new or rare thing for Kings and Queens to be adjudged and condemned for Treafon; for Henry VII, Emperor, did give a folemn Judgment of Death at Piſa, A. D. 1311, againft Robert King of Sicily. Deiotarus was likewife condemned by Julius Cæſar; and Joan Queen of Naples, for murdering her Husband, and hanging him out of a Window.

Punifhment ought to be equal to the Offences committed. SS. de pœnis. But Death is the Penalty appointed for Treafon. Ergo.

Vid. p. 503.

Her Majeſty's Speech at the Concluſion of the Parliament, on Monday, March 29. 1585.

My Lords, and you of the Lower Houſe;

MY Silence muft not injure the Owner, fo much as to fuppofe a Subftitute fufficient to render you the Thanks that my Heart yieldeth you; not fo much for the fafe keeping of my Life, for which your Care appears fo manifeft, as for the neglecting your private future Peril, not regarding other way than my prefent State.

No Prince herein, I confefs, can be furer tied or fafter bound than I am, with the Link of your Good-will; and can for that but yield a Heart and Head to feek for ever all your beft: yet one Matter toucheth me fo near, as I may not overskip; Religion, the Ground on which all other Matters ought to take root; and being corrupted, may marr all the Tree. And that there be fome Fault-finders with the Order of the Clergy, which fo make a Slander to my felf and the Church, whofe Over-ruler God hath made me; whofe Negligence cannot be excufed, if any Schifms or Errors heretical were fuffered. Thus much I muft fay, that fome Faults and Negligences may grow and be, as in all other great Charges it happeneth; and what Vocation without? All which, if you, my Lords of the Clergy, do not amend, I mean to depofe you. Look ye therefore well to your Charges. This may be amended, without heedlefs or open Exclamations. I am fuppofed to have many Studies, but moft philofophical. I muft yield this to be true, that I fuppofe few (that be no Profeffors) have read more. And I need not tell you, that I am not fo fimple, that I underftand not, nor fo forgetful, that I remember not; and yet amidft my many Volumes, I hope, God's Book hath not been my feldomeft Lectures; in which we find that which, by Reafon (for my part) we ought to believe; that feeing fo great Wickednefs and Griefs in the World, in which we live, but as way-faring Pilgrims; we muft fuppofe, that God would never have made us, but for a better Place, and of much more Comfort, than we find here. I know no Creature that breatheth, whofe Life ftandeth hourly in more Peril for it, than mine own, who entred not into my State, without fight of manifold Dangers of Life and Crown; as one that had the greateft and mightieft to wreftle with. Then it followeth, that I regarded it fo much, as I left my Life behind my Care; and fo you fee that you wrong me too much (if any fuch there be) as doubt my Coldnefs in that behalf: For if I were not perfuaded that mine were the true way of God's Will, God forbid that I fhould live to prefcribe it to you. Take you heed, left Eccleſiaſtes fay not too true, They that fear the hoary Froſt, the Snow ſhall fall upon them. I fee many overbold with God Almighty, making too many fubtile Scannings of his bleffed Will, as Lawyers do with humane Teftaments. The Prefumption is fo great, as I may not fuffer it, (yet mind I not hereby to animate Romaniſts, which what Adverfaries they be to mine Eftate, is fufficiently known) nor tolerate Newfangednefs. I mean to guide them both by God's holy true Rule. In both Parts be Perils, and of the latter I muft pronounce them dangerous to a kingly Rule, to have every Man, according to his own Cenfure, to make a Doom of the Validity and Privity of his Prince's Government, with a common Veil and Cover of

God's

God's Word; whose Followers must not be judged, but by private Mens Exposition. God defend you from such a Ruler, that so evil will guide you. Now I conclude, that your Love and Care neither is nor shall be bestowed upon a careless Prince; but such as but for your Goodwill passeth as little for this World, as who careth least; with Thanks for your free Subsidy, a manifest Show of the Abundance of your Goodwills; the which, I assure you, but to be employ'd to your Weal, I could be better pleas'd to return than receive.

Vid. p. 526.

The Petition of the Lords and Commons to the Queen, for the due and deserved Punishment of Death, to be executed on Mary, commonly called Queen of Scots; for her most execrable Treasons and Offences.

May it please your most excellent Majesty, our most gracious Sovereign;

WE your humble, loving and faithful Subjects, the Lords and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, having of long time, to our intolerable Grief, seen by how manifold, most dangerous and execrable Practices, Mary, the Daughter and Heir of James V. late King of Scots, Dowager of France, commonly call'd the Queen of Scots, hath compassed the Destruction of your Majesty's most sacred and royal Person; in whose Safety (next under God) our chief and only Felicity doth consist: And thereby not only to bereave us of the sincere and true Religion of Almighty God, bringing us and this noble Crown back again into the Thraldom of the Romish Tyranny; but also utterly to ruinate and overthrow the happy State and Common-Weal of this most noble Realm. Which being, from time to time, by the great Mercy and Providence of God, and your Highness's singular Wisdom, foreseen and prevented; your Majesty, of your exceeding great Clemency, and princely Magnanimity, hath either most graciously passed over, or with singular Favour tolerated, (although often and instantly moved by your most loving and faithful Subjects, to the contrary, in times in your Parliaments, and at many other times) and hath also protected and defended the said Scottish Queen from those great Dangers, which her own People, for certain detestable Crimes and Offences to her imputed, hath determined against her. All which notwithstanding, the said Queen was nothing moved with these and many other your Majesty's most gracious Favours toward her; but rather obdurate in Malice, and by Hope of continual Impunity imbolden'd to prosecute her cruel and mischievous Determination, by some speedy and violent Course; and now lately a very dangerous Plot being conceiv'd and set down by Anthony Babington and others, That six desperate and wicked Persons should undertake that wicked and most horrible Enterprize, to take away your Majesty's Life, (whom God, of his infinite Mercy, long preserve) she did not only give her Advice and Direction upon every Point, and all Circumstances concerning the same, make earnest Request to have it perform'd with all Diligence; but did also promise Assurance of large Reward and Recompence to the Doers thereof. Which being inform'd to your Majesty, it pleased your Highness upon the earnest Suit of such as tendred the Safety of your royal Person, and the good and quiet State of this Realm; to direct your Commission, under the great Seal of England, to the Lords and others of your Highness's Privy Council, and certain other Lords of Parliament, of the greatest and most ancient Degree, with some of your principal Judges, to examine, hear and determine the same Cause; and thereupon to give Sentence or Judgment, according to a Statute in that behalf made, in the twenty seventh Year of your most gracious Reign. By Vertue whereof, the more part of the same Commissioners being in Number thirty six, having at sundry times fully heard what was alledged and proved against the said Scottish Queen, in her own Presence, touching the said Crimes and Offences, and what she could say for her Defence and Excuse therein; did, after long Deliberation, give their Sentence and Judgment with one Consent, That the Death and Destruction of your royal Person was imagined and compassed by the said Anthony Babington, with the Privity of the same Scottish Queen; and that she did also compass and imagine the Death and Destruction of your most royal Person. Now, forasmuch as we, your Majesty's most humble, loyal and dutiful Subjects, representing unto your most excellent Majesty, the universal State of your whole People of all degrees in this your Realm; do well perceive, and are fully satisfy'd, that the same Sentence and Judgment is in all things most honourable, just and lawful; and having carefully and effectually, according to our most bounden Duties, weighed and considered, upon what Ground and Cause, so many traiterous Complots and dangerous Practices, against your most royal Person and Estate, and for the invading of this Realm, have, for the space of many Years past, grown and proceeded; do certainly find, and are undoubtedly persuaded, that all the same have been, from time to time, attempted and practised by and from the Scottish Queen, and by her Confederates, Ministers and Favourers, who conceive an assured Hope to atchieve speedily, by your Majesty's untimely Death, that which they have long expected, and whereof, during your Life, (which God long preserve, to our inestimable Comfort) they despair; to wit, to place her the said Scottish Queen in the imperial and kingly Seat of this Realm, and by her to banish and destroy the Professors and Professing of the true Religion of Jesus Christ, and the ancient Nobility of this Land; and to bring this whole State and Common-Weal to foreign Subjection, and utter Ruin and Confusion: which their malicious and traiterous Purpose they will never cease to prosecute, by all possible means they can, so long as they may have their Eyes and Imaginations fixed upon that Lady, the only Ground of their treasonable Hope and Conceits, and the only Seed-plot of all dangerous and traiterous Devices and Practices against your sacred Person. And seeing also what insolent Boldness is grown in the Heart of the same Queen, through your Majesty's former exceeding Favours and Clemencies towards her; and thereupon weighing with heavy and sorrowful Hearts, in what continual Peril, in such like desperate Conspiracies and Practices, your Majesty's most royal and sacred Person and Life (more dear unto us than our own) is and shall be still, without any possible means to prevent it, so long as the said Scottish Queen shall be suffered to continue, and shall not receive that due Punishment which, by Justice and the Laws of this your Realm, she hath so often, and so many ways, for her most wicked and detestable Offences, deserved: Therefore, and for that we find, that if the said Lady shall now escape the due and deserved deserved Punishment of Death, for these her most execrable Treasons and Offences; your Highness's royal Person shall be exposed unto many more, and those more secret and dangerous Conspiracies, than before; and such as shall not or cannot be foreseen or discovered, as these her late Attempts have been; and shall not hereafter be so well able to remove or take away the Ground and Occasion of the same, as now by Justice may and ought to be done: We do most humbly beseech your most excellent Majesty, that, as well in respect of the Continuance of the true Religion now professed amongst us, and of the Safety of your most royal Person and Estate, as in regard of the Preservation and Defence of us Your most Loving, Dutiful and Faithful Subjects, and the whole Common-weal of this Realm, it may please Your Highness to take speedy order, That Declaration of the same Sentence and judgment be made and publish'd by Proclamation, and that thereupon direction be given for further Proceedings against the said Scottish Queen, according to the Effect and true meaning of the said Statute: Because upon advised and great Consultation, we cannot find that there is any possible means to provide for your Majesty's Safety, but by the just and speedy Execution of the said Queen, the Neglecting whereof may procure the heavy Displeasure and Punishment of Almighty God, as by sundry severe Examples of his great Justice in that behalf, left us in the Sacred Scriptures, doth appear. And if the same be not put in present Execution, we your most loving and dutiful Subjects shall thereby (so far as Man's Reason can reach) be brought into utter Despair of the Continuance amongst us of the true Religion of Almighty God, and of your Majesty's Life, and the Safety of all your faithful Subjects, and the good Estate of this most flourishing Common-Weal.

Vid. p. 531.

A Memorial written by the Speaker's own Hand, containing Reasons to move her Majesty to consent to the Execution of the Sentence against Mary late Queen of Scots.

UNless Execution of this just Sentence be done:

I. Your Majesty's Person cannot any while be safe.

II. The Religion cannot long continue among us.

III. The most flourishing present State of this Realm must shortly receive a woful Fall.

IV. And consequently, in sparing her, your Majesty shall not only give Courage and Hardiness to the Enemies of God, of your Majesty's Self, and of your Kingdom; but shall discomfort and daunt with Despair the Hearts of your loving People: and so deservedly provoke the heavy Hand and Wrath of God.

And that summarily for the Reasons ensuing:

I. For as much as concerns the Danger of your Majesty;

Both she and her Favourers think she hath Right, not to succeed, but to enjoy your Crown in Possession; and therefore as she is a most impatient Competitor, (acquainted with Blood) so will she not spare any means that may take you from us, being the only Lett that she enjoyeth not her Desire.

She is harden'd in Malice against your royal Person, notwithstanding that you have done her all Favour, Mercy and Kindness; as well in preserving her Kingdom, as saving her Life and Honour.

And therefore there is no Place for Mercy, where there is no Hope of Amendment, or that she will desist from most wicked Attempts.

The rather, for that her Malice appeareth such, as that she maketh, as it were, her Testament of the same, to be executed after her Death, and appointeth her Executors to perform the same.

She affirmeth it lawful to move Invasion: therefore, as of Invasion Victory may ensue, and of Victory the Death of the Vanquished; so doth she not obscurely profess it lawful to destroy you.

She holds it not only lawful, but honourable also and meritorious, to take your Life, &c. being deprived of your Crown by her holy Father, and therefore she will (as she hath continually done) seek it by all means whatsoever.

She is greedy of your Death, and preferreth it before her own Life: For in her late Direction to some of her Complices, she willed, Whatsoever became of her, the Tragical Execution should be perform'd on you. There is by so much the more Danger to your Person, since the Sentence than before, by how much it behoveth them that would preserve her or advance her, to hasten your Death now or never, before Execution done upon her; as knowing that you, and none else, can give Direction for her Death, and that by your Death the Sentence hath lost the Force of Execution, and otherwise they should come too late, if they take not the present Opportunity to help her.

Her Friends hold Invasion unprofitable while you live, and therefore in their opinion your Death is first and principally to be sought, as the most compendious way to ruin the Realm by Invasion.

Some of the eldest and wisest Papists set it down for a special good Drift, to occupy you with Conceit, that the Preservation of her Life is the Safety of your own; and therefore you may be assured, that they verily think that her Life will be your Death and Destruction.

II. For as much as concerns Religion:

It is most perillous to spare her, who hath continually breathed the Overthrow and Suppression of the same; being poisoned with Popery from her tender Youth, and at her Age joining in that false-term'd Holy League, and ever since and now a profess'd Enemy of the Truth.

She resteth wholly upon Popish Hopes to be delivered and advanced, and is so devoted and doted in that Profession, that she will (as well for Satisfaction of others, as feeding her own Humor) supplant the Gospel, where and whensoever she may. Which Evil is so much the greater, and the more to be avoided, as that it slayeth the Soul, and will spread itself not only over England and Scotland, but also into all Parts beyond the Seas, where the Gospel of God is maintained: The which cannot but be exceedingly weakened, if Defection should be in these two most valiant Kingdoms.

III. For as much as concerns the happy Estate of this Realm:

The Lydians say, Unum Regem agnoscunt Lydii, duos autem tolerare non possunt; so we say, Unam Reginam Elizabetham agnoscunt Angli, duas autem tolerare non possunt. And therefore, since she saith, that she is Queen here, and we neither can nor will acknowledge any other but you to be our Queen: It will follow, if she prevail, she will rather make us Slaves, than take us for her Children; and therefore the Realm sigheth and groaneth under fear of such a Step-Mother.

She hath already provided us a Foster-father and a Nurse, the Pope and the King of Spain, into whose hands if it should mishappen us to fall, what can we else look for, but Ruin, Destruction, and utter Extirpation of Goods, Lands, Lives, Honour and all.

Whilst she shall live, the Enemies of the State will hope and gape after your Death. By your Death they trust to make Invasion profitable for them; which cannot be, but the same should be most lamentable for us: And therefore it is meet to cut off the Head of that Hope.

As she hath already, by her poisoned Baits, brought to Destruction more Noblemen and their Houses, and a great multitude of Subjects, during her being here, than she would have done if she had been in possession of her own Country, and armed in the Field against us; so will she still be continually cause of the like Spoil; to the greatest Loss and Peril of this Estate: And therefore this Realm neither can or may endure her.

Her Secretaries do write and print, that we be at our Wits end, Worlds end, if she overlive your Majesty; meaning thereby, that the End of our World is the beginning of theirs: And therefore, take her away, and their World will be at an end, before it begin.

Since the sparing of her in the 14th Year of your Reign, Popish Traitors and Recusants have multiplied exceedingly; and if you spare her now again, they will grow both innumerable and invincible also.

IV. And therefore now in the fourth Place:

Mercy in this case would in the end prove Cruelty against us all. Nam est quædam crudelis Misericordia. And therefore to spare her is to spill her.

She is only a Cousin to you in a remote degree, but we be the Sons and Children of this Land; whereof you be not only the natural Mother, but also the wedded Spouse. And therefore much more is due from you to us all, than alone to her. It would exceedingly grieve and wound the Hearts of your loving Subjects, if they should see so horrible Vice not condignly punished: If any be wavering, it will win them to the worser Part, and many will seek to make their own Peace. Wherefore as well for the Comfort of the one, as Stay of the other, and retaining of all, it is most needful that Justice be done upon her.

Thousands of your loving Subjects of all Degrees, which have for special Zeal of your Safety made Oath, before God, to pursue to Death by all forcible and possible Means, such as she is, by just Sentence, found to be; cannot save their Oaths, if you keep her alive: For then either we must take her Life from her without direction, which will be to our extream Danger by the offence of your Law; or else we must suffer her to live against our express Oath, which will be to the uttermost Peril of our own Souls; wherewith no Act of Parliament, nor Power of Man whatsoever, can in any wise dispense. And therefore, seeing it resteth in you, by a most worthy and just Execution of this Sentence, to keep us upright, and free us in both, we most humbly and earnestly beseech you, &c. that speedy Justice be done upon her, whereby your self may be safe, the State of your Realm preserved, and we not only deliver'd from this Trouble of Conscience, but also recomforted to endeavour our selves, and all ours, into whatsoever other Peril, for the Preservation and safety of you.

Lastly, God's Vengeance against Saul for sparing Agag, against Ahab for sparing the Life of Benhadad, is apparent; for they were both by the just Judgment of God deprived of their Kingdom, for sparing those wicked Princes whom God had deliver'd into their hands of purpose to be slain to Death by them, as by the Ministers of his eternal and divine Justice.

How much those Magistrates were commended, that put to Death those mischievous and wicked Queens, Jezebel and Athaliah!

How wisely proceeded Solomon to Punishment, in putting to Death his own natural and elder Brother Adonias, for the only intention of a Marriage which gave suspicion of Treason! whereas there is no more desired of your Majesty, than the very Pope (now your sworn Enemy) some of these late Conspirators, and this wicked Lady her self have thought fit to fall upon her. He in like case gave Sentence, Vita Conradini, mors Carolo; mors Conradini, vita Carolo. They in their best Minds and Remorse of Conscience setting down the best means of your Safety, said, He that hath no Arms cannot fight, and he that hath no Legs cannot run away, but he that hath no Head can do no harm. Pisces primum à capite fœtent. She by her voluntary subscribing to the late Association, &c. gave this Sentence against herself.

And after in her Letters of these Treasons to Babington, wrote, That if she were discover'd, it would give sufficient cause to you to keep her in continual close Prison. By which Words she could mean nothing else but Pains of Death.

Therefore we seeing on the one Side how you have, to the offence of mighty Princes, advanced Religion; with what tender care, and more than Motherly Piety you have always cherish'd us the Children of this Land, with what Honour and Renown you have restored the ancient Rights of the Crown, with what Peace and Justice you have govern'd, and with what Store and Plenty you have reign'd over us.

On the other Side, seeing that this Enemy of our Felicity seeks to undermine the Religion, &c. to supplant us, and plant Strangers in the Place, to transfer the Rights of the Crown to that Italian Priest, and the Crown to herself, or to some other, from you; and therefore lieth in continual wait for to take away your Life, &c.

Therefore we pray you, &c. for the Cause of God, his Church, this Realm, ourselves and yourself; that you will no longer be careless of your Life, or sovereign Safety; nor longer suffer Religion to be threatned, the Realm to stand in Danger, nor us to dwell in Fear: But as Justice hath given rightful Sentence, &c. so you will grant Execution. That as her Life threatneth your Death, so her Death may, by God's Favour, prolong your Life; and that this Evil being taken away from the Earth, we may praise God for our Deliverance, and pray him for our Continuance; and with the Psalmist say, Dominus fecit Judicium, and, The ungodly is trapped in the works of her own hand.

And so pray God to incline your Heart to our just Desires, &c.

Vid.

Vid. p. 571.

The Queen's Speech at the Dissolution of the Parliament, April 10. 1593.

THis Kingdom hath had many wise, noble, and victorious Princes: I will not compare with any of them in Wisdom, Fortitude, and other Virtues; but, saving the Duty of a Child that is not to compare with his Father, in Love, Care, Sincerity, and Justice, I will compare with any Prince that ever you had, or shall have. It may be thought Simplicity in me, That all this time of my Reign, I have not sought to advance my Territories, and enlarge my Dominions; for Opportunity hath served me to do it. I acknowledge my Womanhood and Weakness in that respect: But it hath not been the Hardness to obtain, or doubt how to keep the Things so obtained, that only hath with-held me from these Attempts: My Mind was never to invade my Neighbours, or to usurp over any. I am contented to reign over my own, and to rule as a just Prince. Yet the King of Spain doth challenge me to be the Quarreller, and the Beginner of all these Wars. He doth me the greatest Wrong that can be; for my Conscience doth not accuse my Thoughts, wherein I have done him the least Injury; so that I am perswaded in my Conscience, if he knew what I know, he would be sorry himself for the Wrong he hath done me. I fear not all his Threatnings: His great Preparations and mighty Forces do not stir me; for though he come against me with a greater Power than ever was his Invincible Navy, I doubt not but (God assisting me, upon whom I always trust) I shall be able to defeat and overthrow him. For my Cause is just. I heard say, when he attempted his last Invasion, some upon the Sea-coasts forsook their Towns, and fled up higher into the Country, and left all naked and exposed to his Entrance. But I swear unto you, by God, if I knew those Persons, or may know of any that shall do so hereafter, I will make them know and feel, what it is to be so fearful in so urgent a Cause. The Subsidy you give me I accept thankfully, if you give me your Good-will with it: But if the Necessity of the Time and your Preservations did not require it, I would refuse it. But let me tell you, the Sum is not so much, but that it is needful for a Prince to have so much always lying in her Coffers, for your Defence in time of need; and not to be driven to get it when she should use it. You that are Lieutenants and Gentlemen of Command in your Countries, I require you to take care and special order, that the People be well armed, and in readiness upon all Occasions. You that be Judges and Justices of Peace, I command and straitly charge you, that you see the Law to be duly executed, and that you make them living Laws, when we have put Life into them.

Vid. p. 648.

The Speaker's Speech to the Queen, in the Council-Chamber, on Monday, the 30. of November, 1601. and the Queen's Answer.

Most sacred and most gracious Sovereign,

WE your faithful, loyal, and obedient Subjects, and Commons here present, vouchsafed of your especial Goodness (to our unspeakable Comfort) Access to your sacred Presence, do in all Duty and Humbleness come to present that which no Words can express, most humble and thankful Acknowledgement of your most gracious Message; and most bounden and humble Thanks for your Majesty's most abundant Goodness, extended and performed to us. We cannot say, most gracious Sovereign, we have called and been heard, we have complained and been helped; though in all Duty and Thankfulness we acknowledge, your sacred Ears are ever open and ever bowed down to hear us, and your blessed Hands ever stretched out to relieve us: We acknowledge, sacred Sovereign, in all Duty and Thankfulness we acknowledge, That before we call, your preventing Grace and all-deserving Goodness doth watch over us for our Good; more ready to give than we can desire, much less deserve. That Attribute which is most proper unto God, to perform all he promiseth, appertaineth also unto you our most gracious Sovereign Queen of all Truth, of all Constancy, of all Goodness, never wearied in doing good unto us (the Deeds themselves do speak) most careful to provide all good Things for us; most gracious, most tender to remove all Grievances from us; which all your Princely Actions have ever shew'd, and even now your most gracious published Proclamation, of your own only meer Motion and special Grace, for the good of all your People, doth witness to us. We come not, sacred Sovereign, one of ten to render Thanks, and the rest to go away unthankful; but all of us, in all Duty and Thankfulness, do throw down our selves at the feet of your Majesty, do praise God and bless your Majesty. Neither do we present our Thanks in Words or any outward Thing, which can be no sufficient Retribution for so great Goodness: But in all Duty and Thankfulness, prostrate at your Feet, we present our most loyal and thankful Hearts, even the last drop of Blood in our Hearts, and the last spirit of Breath in our Nostrils, to be poured out, to be breathed up for your Safety.

And after three low Reverences made, he with the rest kneeled down; and her Majesty began thus to answer herself, viz.

Mr. Speaker,

WE have heard your Declaration, and perceive your care of our State, by falling into the Considerations of a grateful Acknowledgment of such Benefits as you have received; and that your coming is to present Thanks unto us, which I accept with no less Joy, than your Loves can have desire to offer such a Present. I do assure you, that there is no Prince that loveth his Subjects better, or whose Love can countervail our Love: There is no Jewel, be it of never so rich a Price, which I prefer before this Jewel, I mean your Love; for I do more esteem it than any Treasure or Riches: For that we know how to prize, but Love and Thanks I count inestimable. And though God hath raised me high, yet this I count the glory of my Crown, That I have reigned with your Loves. This makes that I do not so much rejoice, that God hath made me to be a Queen, as to be a Queen over so thankful a People. Therefore I have cause to wish nothing more than to content the Subject, and that is a Duty which I owe. Neither do I desire to live longer Days, than that I may see your Prosperity; and that is my only Desire. And as I am that Person, that still (yet under God) hath deliver'd you; so I trust, by the almighty Power of God, that

I

I ſhall ſtill be his Inſtrument to preſerve you from Envy, Peril, Diſhonour, Shame, Tyranny, and Oppreſſion, partly by means of your intended Helps, which we take very acceptably, becauſe it manifeſteth the greatneſs of your Loves and Loyalties unto your Sovereign. Of my ſelf I muſt ſay this, I never was any greedy, ſcraping Graſper, nor a ſtrait, faſt-holding Prince, nor yet a Waſter. My Heart was never ſet on worldly Goods, but only for my Subjects Good. What you do beſtow on me, I will not hoard it up, but receive it to beſtow on you again. Yea mine own Properties I count yours, to be expended for your Good. Therefore render unto them for me, I beſeech you, Mr. Speaker, ſuch Thanks as you imagine my Heart yieldeth, but my Tongue cannot expreſs.

Note, that all this while they kneeled: Whereupon her Majeſty ſaid, 'Mr. Speaker, I would 'wiſh you and the reſt to ſtand up, for I ſhall yet 'trouble you with longer Speech'. So they all ſtood up, and ſhe went on in her Speech, Saying, Mr. Speaker, you give me Thanks, but I doubt me I have more cauſe to thank you all, than you me; and I charge you to thank them of the Houſe of Commons from me; for had I not receiv'd a knowledge from you, I might have fallen into the Lap of an Error, only for lack of true Information. Since I was Queen, yet did I never put my Pen to any Grant, but that upon pretext and ſemblance made unto me, that it was both good and beneficial to the Subjects in general, tho' a private Profit to ſome of my ancient Servants who had deſerved well: But the contrary being found by experience, I am exceedingly beholden to ſuch Subjects as would move the ſame at firſt. And I am not ſo Simple to ſuppoſe, but that there be ſome of the lower Houſe, whom theſe Grievances never touch'd; and for them I think they ſpeak out of Zeal to their Countries, and not out of ſpleen or malevolent Affection, as being Parties grieved; and I take it exceeding grateful from them, becauſe it gives us to know, that no Reſpects nor Intereſſes have moved them, other than the Minds they bear to ſuffer no diminution of our Honour, and our Subject's Love unto us. The Zeal of which Affection tending to eaſe my People, and knit their Hearts unto me, I embrace with a princely Care; far above all earthly Treaſure I eſteem my People's Love, more than which I deſire not to merit. That my Grants ſhould be grievous to my People, and Oppreſſions to be priviledged under colour of our Patents, our kingly Dignity ſhall not ſuffer it; yea, when I heard it, I could give no reſt to my Thoughts until I had reform'd it. Shall they think to eſcape unpuniſhed that have thus oppreſſed you, and have been reſpectleſs of their Duty, and regardleſs of our Honour? No, Mr. Speaker, I aſſure you, were it not more for Conſcience Sake than any Glory or Increaſe of Love, that I deſire, the Errors, Troubles, Vexations and Oppreſſions, done by theſe Varlets and lewd Perſons, not worthy the name of Subjects, ſhould not eſcape without condign Puniſhment. But I perceive they dealt with me like Phyſicians, who miniſtring a Drugg, make it more acceptable by giving it a good Aromatical Savour; or when they give Pills, do gild them all over. I have ever uſed to ſet the laſt Judgment-Day before my Eyes, and ſo to rule as I ſhall be judged to Anſwer before a higher Judge. To whoſe Judgment-Seat I do appeal, that never Thought was cheriſh'd in my Heart that tended not to my People's Good. And now, if my kingly Bounty have been abuſed, and my Grants turned to the Hurt of my People, contrary to my Will and Meaning; or if any in Authority under me, have neglected or perverted what I have committed to them, I hope God will not lay their Culps and Offences to my Charge; and though there were Danger in repealing our Grants, yet what Danger would not I rather incurr for your Good, than I would ſuffer them ſtill to continue? I know the Title of a King is a glorious Title; but aſſure yourſelves that the ſhining Glory of princely Authority hath not ſo dazled the Eyes of our Underſtanding, but that we well know and remember, that we alſo are to yield an account of our Actions before the Great Judge. To be a King and wear a Crown is more glorious to them that ſee it, than it is pleaſure to them that bear it. For myſelf, I was never ſo much enticed with the glorious Name of a King, or royal Authority of a Queen, as delighted that God hath made me the Inſtrument to maintain his Truth and Glory; and to defend this Kingdom (as I ſaid) from Peril, Diſhonour, Tyranny, and Oppreſſion. There will never Queen ſit in my Seat with more Zeal to my Country, Care to my Subjects, and that will ſooner, with willingneſs, yield and venture her Life for your Good and Safety, than myſelf. And tho' you have had, and may have many Princes more Mighty and Wiſe ſitting in this Seat, yet you never had or ſhall have any that will be more Careful and Loving. Should I aſcribe any thing to myſelf, and my ſexly Weakneſs, I were not worthy to live then, and of all moſt unworthy of the Mercies I have had from God, who hath ever yet given me an Heart which never yet feared foreign or home Enemies. I ſpeak it to give God the Praiſe as a Teſtimony before you, and not to attribute any thing to myſelf: For I, O Lord, what am I, whom Practices and Perils paſt ſhould not fear! O what can I do (theſe Words ſhe ſpake with a great Emphaſis) that I ſhould ſpeak for any Glory! God forbid. This, Mr. Speaker, I pray you deliver unto the Houſe, to whom heartily recommend me; and ſo I commit you all to your beſt Fortunes and farther Counſels. I pray you, Mr. Comptroller, Mr. Secretary, and you of my Council, that before theſe Gentlemen depart into their Countries, you bring them all to kiſs my Hand.

Vid. p. 637.

The Execution of the Earl of Eſſex in the Tower of London, the 25 of February, Anno. 1600.

ON Wedneſday, commonly call'd Aſh Wedneſday, in the Morning, about One of the Clock, the Lieutenant of the Tower gave warning to the Earl of Eſſex, who was condemn'd the Thurſday before of High-Treaſon, to prepare himſelf for Death, which ſhould be the ſame Day following. He, being then in Bed, preſently upon notice thereof aroſe; Dr. Montford, Dr. Barley, and Mr. Aſhton his Chaplain being with him; and therewithal deſir'd them to joyn with him in thoſe Exerciſes that might beſt benefit him for his Death ſo near approaching. Thereunto they moſt willingly condeſcended, being of purpoſe appointed to be with him, to prepare and make him ready to taſte of that his moſt bitter Cup. The Exerciſes that were uſed, were hearty Prayers, penitent Confeſſions, and comfortable Preachings. The latter was perform'd by Mr. Aſhton, at the requeſt of the other Divines. And thus was the Morning ſpent, until the Hour drew near to finiſh his Courſe.

Againſt

Againſt which Time all things were prepared for the Execution to be done within the Tower. And between the Hours of Seven and Eight of the Clock in the Morning, the Earl was brought by the Lieutenant of the Tower to the Scaffold, which was ſet up in the High-Court where the Church ſtands, having on him a black Velvet-Gown, and a Suit of black Sattin; who coming thereunto, aſcended the Stairs, which were about four Foot high, and three Yards ſquare, with Rails round about; the three Divines going up with him. At his coming upon the Scaffold he carried a moſt conſtant and ſettled Countenance, neither high nor dejected: And ſtepping into the midſt of the Scaffold where the Block lay, with a little motion of Body ſaluted all the Nobles, Knights, and Gentlemen, who ſate on Forms near unto the Stage; viz. the Earls of Cumberland and Hartford, Lord Viſcount Bindon, Lord Thomas Howard, Lord Morley, Lord Compton, and others that were there preſent. And hereupon, with a diſtinct and ſerious Duty, he framed his Speech to this or ſuch like effect: I deſire your Lordſhips, and you, my Chriſtian Brethren, here preſent to ſee my juſt Puniſhment, to be a witneſs that I confeſs to the Glory of God, and the beating down of mine own Fleſh, that I am a grievous Sinner, yea the moſt grievous of all Sinners; and that the number of my Sins are more than the hairs on my Head. I have lived in Wantonneſs, in the Luſts of the Fleſh, all vain Uncleanneſs: I have been full of Pride, Vanity, and Ambition: I do acknowledge this Sin againſt my Sovereign, this bloody Sin, this crying Sin, for which I am now come to die; proteſting that I never meant to hurt my Sovereign, her Perſon, or Dignity. And therefore I deſire you to bear witneſs of theſe my Proteſtations. I never was, I thank God, Atheiſt, to deny God, or to hold any Hereſie againſt the Godhead; nor Papiſt, to aſcribe any thing to my own Works; but hope to be ſaved by the Mercies of God, and the Merits of Jeſus Chriſt my only Saviour, and ſo forward. I believe all the Articles of that Religion and Faith in which I was baptized, and which I have been brought up in, and which I hope to continue to my laſt Gaſp. I was never guilty of Hypocriſy in Religion, but always ſubject to all Imperfections and Corruptions of the Fleſh. I acknowledge myſelf a moſt imperfect Creature. And now I crave Pardon of all the World: Firſt of my Sovereign, next of the State, of the Nobles and People, and eſpecially of the Nobles and Gentlemen that for the Love of me are fallen into this Action againſt their Sovereign and Anointed of God. I heartily forgive all Men, and deſire that they will have a charitable Conceit of me and my Proceedings. I do beſeech God to give her Majeſty a religious and wiſe Heart, and, if it pleaſe him, a long Reign and a proſperous. And now I beſeech your Lordſhips, and you, my Chriſtian Brethren here preſent, to joyn with me in Prayer to God, that he will aſſiſt me in this greateſt Temptation of my Death: For through the weakneſs of my Fleſh I am not able to endure of myſelf, without his eſpecial Grace, this laſt Conflict; and yet the Spirit is moſt willing to undergo this heavy Croſs, to drink of the bitter Cup of Death. And here the Miniſters put him in mind to make Confeſſion of his Faith in ſaying the Creed; the which he did; giving them moſt hearty Thanks therefore; for now, ſaith he, Satan is moſt buſie. And then putting off his Gown, he kneeled down with his Hands lifted up and cloſed together, and his Eyes moſt firmly fixt in the Heavens: He deſired, in moſt effectual Phraſes, that God would give him Power to pray, not with his Tongue and Underſtanding only, but with Faith, Zeal, firm Conſcience and full Aſſurance. For he acknowledg'd, that through his own Ignorance and Dullneſs he could not offer up his Prayers to God as he ought; but he pray'd that he might perform that Chriſtian Duty, and he aſſuredly hoped that God would accept his Willingneſs for the Action; and in moſt effectual manner he craved Strength and Conſtancy of the Almighty, that without all doubting or wavering he might have Confidence and full Aſſurance of all the Mercies promiſed and made in Chriſt Jeſus, even unto the laſt Gaſp of Breath: That Chriſt ought to be the only Object of the eye of the Mind; that his Heart might not be carried away with any worldly Thoughts, but that in his Diſſolution, at his laſt Gaſp, he might have God only before him; and ſuch like moſt heavenly Prayers. He continued moſt fervently until he concluded with the Prayer of all Prayers, which is the Lord's Prayer, which he pronounced with a moſt conſtant Reſolution, all the Aſſembly joining with him in Tongue and Voice, as they before had done in Heart; all the whole Aſſembly pouring down moſt wonderful floods of Tears, with loud Crying and hearty Sobs, making great Lamentation. His Prayers being ended, he deſired the Executioner to tell him how he ſhould fit himſelf for the Block. Then the Executioner ask'd him Forgiveneſs; and he anſwer'd him and forgave him, ſaying, Spare not, nor be afraid, for thou art the Miniſter of Juſtice. Then he pull'd off his Doublet, under which he had a Waſtcoat of Scarlet embroider'd with Gold; and then he proſtrated himſelf, ſaying, I proſtrate myſelf before thee, O Lord my God, beſeeching thee that thy bleſſed Angels may be ready to receive my Soul, ſo ſoon as it is departed from my Body; and I pray you all to joyn with my Spirit, when my Arms are ſtretched out in Prayer unto God. Thus, without Muffle, laying his Head on the Block, his Eyes lifted up towards Heaven, his Arms ſtretched abroad, he ſaid, Lord, into thy Hands I commend my Spirit; Lord Jeſus receive my Soul: Whereat the Executioner doing his Office very ill, took three Strokes before he cut off the Head; and yet neither Arms, nor Body, nor Head ſtirr'd; which the Executioner took up, and ſaid, God ſave the Queen.

THE

THE ANNALS OF Mr. William Camden,

In the Reign of King JAMES I.

Viz. From the Year 1603, to the Year 1623.

Done into English.

1603. ANNO 1603. 1603.

Mar.24. QUEEN Elizabeth being dead, between Two and Three a Clock after Midnight, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, together with the late Counsellors, undertaking the Provisional Administration of the Kingdom, proclaimed King James.

25. They sent Charles Percy and T. H. Somerset to the King with a Letter, signifying the same; and humbly desired him, that he would be pleased to repair into England with all speed.

28. George Carew and Thomas Lake, were sent to inform the King in what posture Affairs stood.

Apr. 6. The King made his Entrance into Berwick.

8. Some Troubles in the Marches, at Waterford, and elsewhere in Ireland. The King comes to York.

10. Southampton, and others, being imprisoned, are set at Liberty.

15. Cecil the Secretary being sent for, set out towards York.

28. The Funeral Rites of Queen Elizabeth are performed.

May— Henry Howard, Thomas Howard, and my Lord Mountjoy, are chosen into the Council at Theobalds.

7. The King taking his Journey from Theobalds, is first received by Sheriff Swinnerton, whose Chaplain R. M. did cast some sharp Reflexions upon the Administration under Elizabeth; after that he is received by the Lord Mayor and Citizens, and is conducted to the Charter-House, where he promiscuously created Eighty Knights.

An Act against Monopolies.

13. Robert Cecil, Robert Sidney, William Knowles, Edward Wotton, are created Barons in the Tower of London.

16. An Act for preserving Deer.

19. An Act for suppressing Insurrections in the Frontiers, or Marches.

June 4. Valentine Thomas, who confessed that he had conspired against the Queen's Life, is condemned and executed.

Ambassadors from several Princes come to Congratulate.

The Earl of Rutland is sent to the King of Denmark to be Godfather to his Son, and carry him a Garter. June 21.

The Plague rages at London.

The Festival of St. George is celebrated, where Prince Henry, the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Southampton, the Earl of Marr, the Earl of Pembroke, are invested with the Order of the Garter. July 2.

Anthony Copley, Griffin Markham, William Watson, and William Clerk, Priests; my Lord Cobham, his Brother George, my Lord Grey, and Sir Walter Raleigh, are taken up on Suspicion of Treason.

The Earl of Southampton is created and restored. 21.

Thomas Howard is created Earl of Suffolk; my Lord Mountjoy, Earl of Devonshire; Thomas Egerton, Baron of Elsmere; William Russel, Henry Grey, John Petre, John Harrington, Henry Danvers, Thomas Gerard, and Robert Spencer, are created Barons at Hampton-Court.

Thomas Edmonds is sent Ambassador to the Archduke.

The King and Queen are crowned, it being then very bad Weather, and the Pestilence mightily raging; for in that Week there died 1103. 24.

It is order'd, That this Day should be strictly observed for the King's Deliverance from the Gowry's Conspiracy; and a Fast is kept every Wednesday throughout the Kingdom. Aug. 8.

My Lord Cobham, my Lord Grey, Sir Walter Raleigh, Griffin Markham, George Brook, Anthony Copley, William Watson, and William Clerk, are convicted of High Treason at Winchester; amongst whom George Brook, and the two Priests, are put to death. Nov. 9.

From the 23d of December 1602, to the 22d of December 1603, there died at London 38244, of which Number there was 30578 of the Plague.

ANNO 1604.

1604.

Feb. 29. WHilst the King began to find fault with some things used in the Liturgy, and thought it convenient that they should be altered, John Whitgift, the Archbishop, died for Grief.

Mar. 13. Henry Howard is created Baron of Marnhill, and Earl of Northampton, by the same Letters-Patents; and my Lord Buckhurst is made Earl of Dorset.

15. The King and Queen pass through the City in great Pomp from the Tower to Westminster.

19. A Parliament is held till the 7th of July.

Thomas Smith, a Merchant of London, is sent Ambassador to Boris Theodorowitz Emperor of Russia.

The Duke of Lenox being Ambassador in France, to him the King complains of H. Wotton, Ambassador at Venice.

Aug. 5. Peace between Spain and England concluded, and proclaimed.

20. Robert Cecil, Baron of Essenden, is created Viscount Cranburn.

Oct. — Ostend taken.

— The Duties for all Merchandize exported and imported, augmented.

24. The King proclaimed King of Great Britain, France and Ireland, that the Name of England might be extinct.

Dec. 10. Richard Bancroft, Bishop of London, is translated to the Archbishoprick of Canterbury.

Richard Vaughan, Bishop of Chester, is translated to the See of London.

The French make frequent Complaints of Depredations or Pyracies committed by the English.

ANNO 1605.

1605.

Jan. 4. PHilip Herbert, Brother to the Earl of Pembroke, marries Susan, Daughter to Edward Earl of Oxford.

Feb. 6. Charles, second Son to the King, is created Duke of York.

Mar. 5. An Act that the Jesuits and Seminary Priests should immediately depart out of the Kingdom; and another to establish the Discipline and Liturgy of the Church of England.

28. The Admiral of England is sent into Spain to confirm the Peace, and Charles Cornwallis along with him to be Ambassador.

29. Philip Prince of Spain is born.

Apr. 19. Edward Earl of Hertford is sent to the Archduke to ratify the Peace.

24. Ulricus Duke of Holstein, and the Earl of Northampton, created Knights of the Garter.

May 4. Robert Cecil is created Earl of Salisbury; Thomas Cecil Baron Burleigh, Earl of Exeter; Philip Herbert Earl of Montgomery; Baron Sidney Viscount Lisle.

Likewise, J. Stanhope, George Carew, Thomas Arundel, and William Cavendish, are created Barons at Greenwich.

July —— The Spaniards arrive at Dover, and are block'd up by the Hollanders.

5. George Lodowic, Landgrave Lettenberg, comes Ambassador from the Emperor Rodolph.

Aug. 1. Edmund Anderson, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, died, to whom Francis Gawdy succeeded.

11. A Proclamation for preventing Legacies for pious Uses to be misapplied.

27. The King and Queen go to see Oxford.

31. Henry Rawlins is installed at Windsor for Christian the Fourth, King of Denmark.

Nov. 5. The Gun-powder Plot is discover'd.

9. A Parliament began.

ANNO 1606.

1606.

THE Earl of Essex married Frances, Daughter to the Earl of Suffolk. Jan.

My Lord Knolles married Elizabeth, eldest Daughter of the said Earl. 1

George Carew is sent Ambassador into France.

Those who are guilty of the Gun-powder-Treason are condemned, and executed on the Thirtieth. 17.

Jo. de Mendoza Marquess of St. Germains, came Ambassador from Spain to the King. Apr. 24.

Henry Garnet, Provincial of the Jesuits, is put to death. May 3.

Robert Earl of Salisbury and Viscount Bindon installed at Windsor. 20.

Henry Lord Mordaunt, and Edward Lord Sturton, are fined in the Star-Chamber. June 3.

A Proclamation for extirpating Jesuits and Seminaries out of the Realm. 10.

Sophia, Daughter to the King, is born, and died the next Day. 22.

Henry Earl of Northumberland is fined 30000 l. and to be imprisoned during Life. 27.

Nicholas Molino, the Venetian Ambassador, returns; and George Justinianus comes in his Place.

Edward Coke made Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas.

A Monument is erected for Queen Elizabeth in Westminster.

Christian King of Denmark comes into England unexpected. July 17.

The King, accompanied with the King of Denmark, passes through the City in most magnificent Pomp. 31.

The King of Denmark departs. Aug. 14.

Francis Prince Vaudemont comes into England; being the Son of the Duke of Lorrain. Sept. 23.

Moorfields reduced into pleasant Walks. The Churches throughout the City beautified.

ANNO 1607.

1607.

JAmes Lord Hay married Honora, Daughter and sole Heiress to Edward Lord Denny. Jan. 6.

The King makes Speeches to both Houses of Parliament, concerning the Union of the Two Kingdoms. Mar. 31.

Prince Joinvil, Brother to the Duke of Guise, came into England. May 8.

The Peasants commit a Riot in Northamptonshire concerning Inclosures, and pull down the Hedges. 15.

Thomas Ravis, Bishop of Glocester, is translated to the See of London. June 2.

Jo. Watts, Lord Mayor of London, entertains the King at a splendid Dinner. 12.

The King pays 60000 l. to the Citizens of London, which Queen Elizabeth owed them. July 3.

Ambassadors from the States. 4.

Thomas Knevet is called to Parliament by the Name of Lord Knevet of Eskrick.

Julius Cæsar St. Omar, Chancellor of the Exchequer, is admitted into the Privy-Council. 5.

The Company of Merchant-Taylors entertain the King at a noble Dinner in their Hall. 16.

The King stands Godfather to James, eldest Son to Thomas Earl of Arundel by his Countess Altheia, third Daughter of Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury. 17.

The Earls Tir-Owen, and Tir-Connel, and other Malecontents, fled out of Scotland. Sept. ---

Mary the King's Daughter died. 16.

The Banquetting-House at Whitehall is new built. Oct. 12.

Jo. Fortescu, late Chancellor of the Exchequer, died. Dec. 23.

ANNO

ANNO 1608.

1608.

Feb. 9. VIscount Haddington married Elizabeth the Daughter of Robert Earl of Essex.

Aldgate rebuilt.

Apr. 17. James Montagu is consecrated Bishop of Bath and Wells.

29 The Oath of Allegiance was enacted.

Henry Earl of Northampton is made Keeper of the Privy-Seal.

May 6. Robert Earl of Salisbury is made Lord Treasurer of England.

20. The Earls of Dunbar and Montgomery are installed at Windsor.

Oct. 9. Richard Neal was consecrated Bishop of Rochester.

Dec. 1. W[illegible] Son to the Earl of Salisbury, married Catherine, the third Daughter of the Earl of Suffolk.

A Proclamation against Pyrates.

ANNO 1609.

1609.

Feb. 19. THE Thames flowed twice in the space of an Hour.

23. Robert Earl of Dorset died.

25. Richard Earl of Dorset married Ann the only Daughter of George Earl of Cumberland.

Mar. --- A Cessation of Arms between Philip III, King of Spain, and the States of the United Provinces, for twelve Years.

— The New-Exchange is erected, which was called Britannica by the King, or Britain's Burse.

June --- The King hears the Cause of Prohibitions, and Complaints against the Officers of the Royal Navy.

The King pays 63000 l. which he had borrowed from the Citizens of London.

ANNO 1610.

1610.

Jan. 31. VIscount Fenton is chosen into the Privy-Council.

May 3. Henry IV, King of France, massacred.

June 4. Henry created Prince of Wales.

The Privileges of the East-India Company are enlarged.

Jesuits and Seminaries are extirpated, and the Oath of Allegiance tender'd to every body.

The League between England and France is renewed.

Oct. 20 Three Bishops of Scotland, Joh. Spotswood of Glasgow, Gavin Hamilton of Galway, and Andrew Lambe of Brechin, are consecrated at Lambeth, according to the Rites of the Church of England.

Christian Prince of Anhalt came into England.

Dec 31. The Parliament is dissolved.

ANNO 1611.

1611.

Apr. 9. RObert Carre is made Viscount Rochester.

George Abbot translated from London to the Archbishoprick of Canterbury.

May 18. An Act for inhancing the Value of Gold Coin.

Charles Duke of York, Thomas Earl of Arundel, and Robert Carre Viscount Rochester, were installed at Windsor.

June 9. Tomson Dean of Windsor is consecrated Bishop of Glocester, and —— Buckeridge Bishop of Rochester.

23. The Archbishop of Canterbury is chosen into the Privy-Council.

Otho, Son and Heir to Maurice Landgrave of Hesse, comes into England.

Sept. 8. Jo. King, Dean of Christ-Church in Oxford, is consecrated Bishop of London.

ANNO 1612.

1612.

THomas Overbury was imprisoned. Apr. 21.

William Wade laying down the Lieutenancy of the Tower, Gervase Elwish succeeds him. May 6.

Robert Earl of Salisbury died. 24.

Roger Earl of Rutland died without Issue, whose Brother Francis succeeded him. June 26.

The Body of Mary Queen of Scotland was translated from Peterborough to Westminster.

Robert Sherley comes from his Embassy to the Sophy of Persia into England.

Sir Tho. Overbury died of a poisoned Glister. Sept. 15.

Frederick the Fifth, Elector Palatine of the Rhine, arrives in England. Oct. 16.

Prince Henry died. Nov. 6.

The Prince Elector Palatine, and Prince Maurice of Nassau, created Knights of the Garter. Dec. 29.

ANNO 1613.

1613.

THE Marriage between Elizabeth the King's Daughter, and the Elector Palatine, is celebrated. Feb. 14.

The Prince Palatine returns into Germany. Apr. 10.

The Londoners send a Colony to Derry and Colrayne, in the Province of Ulster. July —

Jo. Lord Harrington died in Germany.

Edw. Coke, Justice of the Common-Pleas, is constituted Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench. Oct. 25.

Viscount Rochester is created Earl of Somerset; and the same Day Edw. Coke is sworn into the King's Council. Nov. 4.

The Earl of Somerset unfortunately marries Frances Daughter to the Earl of Suffolk. Dec. 26.

ANNO 1614.

1614.

AT One a Clock in the Morning was born to Frederick Elector Palatine, and to Elizabeth Daughter to James King of Great Britain, a Son, who on March 24, being baptized, was called Henry Frederick. Jan. 1.

Ralph Winwood is made Secretary of State; and Thomas Lake is called into the King's Privy-Council. Mar. 29

Sir Walter Raleigh publishes his Universal History.

The Parliament began. Apr. 5.

The Members of the House of Commons take the Sacrament at St. Margaret's, that a Discovery might be made of those who were inclined to the Popish Religion; but none refused it. 7.

The Parliament on a sudden dissolved, and all their Proceedings declared null and void. June 7.

Chutts —— Nevil Lord Abergaveny's Son, Wentworth, Jo. Hoskins, who behaved themselves in a tumultuous manner in the House of Commons, are sent to the Tower of London.

Henry Howard Earl of Northampton died, is buried in the Church belonging to Dover Castle. 15.

Tho. Howard Earl of Suffolk, and Lord Chamberlain to the King, is made Lord Treasurer of England. July 10.

At the same time Robert Carre Earl of Somerset (his Son-in-law) is made Chamberlain to the King.

Lord Grey of Groby deceased at Broadgate in Leicestershire. 16.

Christian King of Denmark comes to London, beyond all Expectation. 21.

The King returns to London to pay him a Visit. 23.

The King of Denmark departs from London, accompanied with the King of Great Britain as far as Gravesend. Aug. 1.

1614. ANNO 1614.

Sept. 11. Edward Phillips, Master of the Rolls, died at London.

13. Julius Cæsar St. Omar is put into his Place.

Edward Earl of Lincoln died.

Oct. 1. Fulk Grevil Kt. was made Chancellor of the Exchequer in the place of Julius Cæsar.

Nov. --- Earl of Arundel returned out of Italy to the Countefs his Wife.

Thomas Earl of Ormond dies, after he had beftowed his Daughter in Marriage to Preston Lord Dingwell, a Scot.

1615. ANNO 1615.

Jan. 1. HEnry Earl of Kent died without Iffue.

Charles Grey his Brother fucceeds him, a Man well ftricken in Years; was buried the 14th of March.

Feb. 25. Arthur Ingram Kt. fworn and admitted to the Office of Cofferer of the King's Houfhold, upon the Refignation of Sir Robert Vernon Kt.

Rudd Bifhop of St. David's died. D. Melborn, Dean of Rochefter, fucceeds him.

Mar. --- The King vifits the Univerfity of Cambridge, where Academical Degrees were proftituted to illiterate Perfons.

7. Proclamations prohibiting the Exportation of Gold and Silver, and the fending of Youths to Seminaries, and for preferving Deer.

Apr. --- Vifcount Fenton and William Lord Knolles admitted into the Order of the Garter.

24. George Villars made Gentleman of the Bedchamber, and knighted.

Oliver St. John is fined 5000 l. in the Star-Chamber.

--- Owen, of the Family of the Owens of Godftow in Oxfordfhire, condemned of High-Treafon, up-
May 17. on the Account of his Opinion, That Princes excommunicated by the Pope may be made away lawfully.

Thomas Parry, Chancellor of the Dutchy of Lancafter, died. Jo. Dacombe fucceeded.

--- Oliver St. John makes his Submiffion in the Star-Chamber.

June 14. James Hays, to whom the King granted the Name and Stile of Lord Hays, that he fhould be
29. next to the Barons of England, but without any Place or Vote in the Parliaments of England; and upon the Recommendation of Henry Earl of Northampton, is at this time (without any outward Ceremony or Solemnity, or delivering Letters Patents under the Great Seal of England, before Witneffes in the Privy-Chamber at Greenwich at Nine a Clock at Night) promoted to the State, Dignity, Degree, and Honour of Baron Hay of Sawley in the County of York, to him, and his Heirs Male of his Body lawfully begotten: And the Learned in the Law informed the King, that this way of creating a Baron was fufficient without Inveftiture, and other Ceremonies, feeing Letters Patents are the very Effence of the Creation.

The next Day Sir Robert Dormer of Wing Kt. being duly created Baron Dormer of Wing, he is 30. introduced in a Furred Scarlet Gown, with a Sword by his fide, between the Lord Sheffield and Lord Compton, in their Parliamentary Robes; the Lord Carew having a Gown on with a Train, the Garter Herald bearing the Letters Patents, delivering the fame to the Chamberlain; which Winwood the Secretary taking from him, read them on his Knees, and at the Word impofuimus (we put on) the King put the Robes upon the new Baron. The Letters being read, the King delivers them into the Hands of Baron Dormer, Trumpets founding, and Drums beating. My June 30.
Lord Sheffield reprimanded Garter, becaufe he faid the Collar of St. George was not to be ufed; forafmuch as the other Companions of the Order did not make ufe of Collars (but in the Creation of the Earls of Hertford and Southampton in the Year —— of Henry VIII, the Earls who introduced made ufe of Collars) the Stile of Baron is not proclaimed, becaufe there was no Dinner, the King removing to Weftminfter.

ANNO 1615. 1615.

Lord Zouch made Baron of the Cinque Ports. July 18.

D. Melborn confecrated Bifhop of St. David's.

The King begins his Progrefs. 21.

The Queen takes a Progrefs towards Salisbury. 24.

Marquefs Bonnivet returns into England. Aug. ---

George Lloyd, Bifhop of Chefter, died.

Thomas Bilfon, Bifhop of Winchefter, is chofen into the King's Council at Farnham Caftle.

An Inquifition made into the Death of Sir Sept. ---
Tho. Overbury, who died in the Tower of London, not without Sufpicion of Poifon, 1613.

Arabella Stuart, Daughter of Charles Earl of 27.
Lenox, Coufin-German of Henry Darnley, Father of King James, died in the Tower of London, was interred at Weftminfter, without any Funeral Pomp, in the Night, in the fame Vault wherein Mary Queen of Scots and Prince Henry were buried. It is the Saying of Charles the Fair, in Papir. Mafs. p. 382. That thofe who die in the King's Prifon, are defervedly deprived of Funeral Pomp, left they fhould be thought to have been thrown into Prifon wrongfully.

On Michaelmas Day the King departs from Greenwich.

The Earl of Lincoln dies.

The Earl of Somerfet is committed to the Cu- Oct. 18.
ftody of the Dean of Weftminfter.

Wefton is brought to the Bar for giving Sir Tho. 19.
Overbury Poifon, and refufed to plead.

On Monday he was again brought to the Bar, 23.
and confeffing the Fact, was condemned.

He is hanged; and after Dinner Somerfet is 25.
examined before the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Lenox, Zouche, and the Lord Chief Juftice, in York-Houfe.

On Simon and Jude he is again examined by 28.
them before Dinner.

Sir Robert Cotton Bar. being examined, is dif- 29.
miffed.

Lumfden, a Scot, is examined; as is alfo Thomas Monfon, as being guilty of Witchcraft; and Gervais Elwifh, Lieutenant of the Tower, is feveral times examined.

Edward Sackvill, Sir Jo. Wentworth Bar. and Sir Jo. Lidcot Kt. are committed to Prifon, and afterwards Sir Jo. Hollys Kt. upon the Account of fome Queftions put to Wefton at the Gallows.

Savery being addicted to Magick, is imprifoned.

The Duke of Lenox is made Steward of the Nov. 1.
King's Houfhold.

Thomas Howard is committed to the Fleet: His Mother the Countefs of Suffolk is confined to her Chamber at home.

The Seals are taken from Somerfet: He is 2. commanded by the Lord Wotton to lay down the Staff, the Badge of the King's Chamberlain, and to appear before the Delegates, by whom he is fent to the Tower; George More being appointed to be Lieutenant.

The King departs from London towards Roy- 7.
fton.

Anne Norton, the Widow of one Turner, Doc- 9.
tor of Phyfick, (concerned in procuring Poifon for Sir Tho. Overbury) is condemned for Witchcraft

1615. ANNO 1615.

craft and Magick at Westminster; which being charged with, she denies.

Nov. 10. Sir John Hollys, Sir John Wentworth Kt. and Bar. and Lumsden, a Scot, are fined in the Star-Chamber; this last 2000 l. for Judgment against Weston, written to defame the King; they 1000 l. each, for Questions propounded to Weston at the Gallows, in order to call in question the Justice of the Court.

11. Anne Turner, being persuaded by one Whitting, a Minister, confesses every Particular, (and more) which she had denied before the Bench.

About this time Edward Earl of Lincoln dies.

14. Anne Turner, a true Penitent, is hanged at Tyburn.

18. Sir Gervais Elwise, Lieutenant of the Tower, is condemned; and on Monday after, being the 20th of the Month, is hanged by the Neck near the Tower.

Robert Cotton delivered a Packet of Overbury's Letters to the Lord Chief Justice.

27. Franklin, who prepared the Poyson, for the same Cause is condemned in Westminster-Hall; and some days after was hanged.

Dec. 3. Robert Abbot, Brother to the Archbishop of Canterbury, was consecrated Bishop of Sarum at Lambeth.

4. Thomas Monson is again brought to his Tryal; and the Indictment being read over, he was, contrary to all Expectation, sent to the Tower, to be indicted of High Treason.

14. The Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Lenox, and the Lord Chief Justice, had a Conference with Somerset in the Tower: They turn'd off Coppinger and Andrews his Servants, and committed them to Prison.

18. Lord Knolles and Lord Haye sent under-hand to Somerset by the King.

23. The King returns to Westminster; and delivering the Staff to the Earl of Pembroke, appoints him to be Chamberlain.

25. On Christmas Day, the King, being sorely troubled with the Gout, was not able to go to Divine Service; but heard a Sermon in private, and took the Sacrament.

1616. ANNO 1616.

Jan. 2. THE Earl of Worcester made Keeper of the Privy Seal; he giving up the Place of Master of Horse into the King's Hands the Day before.

3. Thomas Lake sworn one of the principal Secretaries of State.

Cottington is sent to Spain, to call home John Digby, Extraordinary Ambassador.

4. George Villers was sworn Master of the Horse, in the room of the Earl of Worcester.

13. William Monson, Brother of Thomas, is carried to the Tower towards Night: On which Day Simon Digby comes from Spain with Letters.

19. The Earl of Somerset and his Countess are indicted of Felony; and the Billa Vera is found by the Jury.

The King departs from London towards Royston.

Feb. 12. William Cicil, Lord Roos, married A... eldest Daughter of Thomas Lake Secretary of State.

Mar. 16. The King returns to London.

19. My Lord Binning, a Scot, is chosen into the King's Privy Council.

20. Sir Walter Raleigh is enlarged out of Prison.

John Digby, Envoy in Spain, returns from thence.

ANNO 1616. 1616.

Justs and Turnaments for the Inauguration of King James, and happy Beginning of his Reign; which were to be celebrated on the 24th; but being Sunday, it was put off till Monday.

The Countess of Somerset, from the Custody of William Smith, is sent to the Tower. Mar. 27.

John Digby, who the Week before returned out of Spain, is elected one of the Privy Council, and Vice-Chamberlain of the King's Houshold, in the room of my Lord Stanhope, who was perswaded by the King's Letters to give place. Apr. 3.

The same Day the King retired to Newmarket; after having appointed Oliver St. John Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

Robert Carre of Ancram, and Gibbs, being examined by the Chancellor, are acquitted the next Day. 23.

Francis Earl of Rutland, and George Villers, are admitted into the Order of the Garter. 24.

The King departs from Whitehall after Dinner.

The Peers are summoned by Letters to sentence Somerset. 27.

Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury died. May 8.

Judgment in the Case of the Countess of Somerset and her Husband, which was appointed to be the 15th Day of this Month, the Peers being now assembled in Westminster-Hall, and Scaffolds being there erected, was deferred till the 23d of this Month, because she (as was reported) was indisposed. 14.

Judgment is again deferred to the 24th Day, and the Peers are again summoned. 22.

The Countess of Somerset is brought to Westminster-Hall before 9 of the Clock, the Ax not being carried before her. The Chancellor of England, the Lord High Steward of England appointed for this time, came a little after on Horseback; Servants attending him, and other Noblemen, 6 Serjeants at Law, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery bearing the Letters Patents of the Steward, and Richard Coningsby carrying the White Staff before them, together with the Seal-Bearer. The Two Barons, Norris and Russel, and Two others of the Order of Knighthood, followed after. She confessing her self guilty, is condemned to be hanged. She hath Recourse to the Mercy of God and the King; beseeching the Peers to intercede with the King for her Life; all the By-standers commiserating her Condition. 24.

The Earl of Somerset is conducted to Westminster-Hall a little before 10 of the Clock, having a Cloak on with the George and Garter, the Ax not being carried before him. The Chancellor comes by and by, Coningsby on Horseback bearing the Staff. He is convicted of Felony; and at 9 a Clock the Court is dissolved, Pro more. 25.

Robert Sydney, Lord Lysle, is honoured with the Garter. 26.

George Barbadico, the Venetian Ambassador, dyes in England. 27.

Flushing and Breda Cautionary Towns are delivered up by Viscount Lisle and Sir Horatio Vere, Generals, to the States General. 31.

Commission given to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and others, to enquire who were the Authors of calling the Chancellor into question of Præmunire. June 3.

The Judges of the Realm are taxed by the King, as Invaders of his Prerogative, in presenting to the Livings vacated by making the 5.

Incum-

1616. ANNO 1616.

Incumbent a Bishop, excluding the Patrons in the mean time from their Right.

June 8. The King dined with one Cokain, Alderman of London, and dub'd him Knight.

9. Sir Francis Bacon, the Attorney-General, is chosen one of the Privy Council at Greenwich.

15. The eldest Son of William Earl of Salisbury, being born this 15th Day, was called James by the King his Godfather, with the Treasurer, and my Lady Walden Godmother, at Bishop-Hatfield: The Bishop of Lincoln baptized him.

18. Thomas Bilson, Bishop of Winchester, dyed at Westminster, and was there buried by Night.

20. The King, accompanied with the Princes, goes to the Starchamber: The Peers and Judges receive him at Kings-bridge: He made a very fine Speech, wherein he vindicated the Authority of the Chancellor, as his own; and gave the Judges a gentle Touch, &c. which is expected to be published.

Robinson Bishop of Carlile, and ——— Roland Bishop of Bangor, departed this Life.

July 6. James Montagu is translated to the Bishoprick of Winchester.

The King ordered, That the Arms of the Earl of Somerset, notwithstanding his being condemned of Felony, should not be removed out of the Chapel at Windsor: That Felony should not be reckoned amongst the Disgraces for those who were to be excluded from the Order of St. George; which was without Precedent.

7. Francis Earl of Rutland, George Villers Master of the Horse, and Robert Sidney Viscount Lisle, are Installed at Windsor, the King being present; but there was no Sermon preach'd, although it was Sunday.

Morton Dean of Winchester is consecrated on the same Day Bishop of Chester.

9. The King returns to Westminster towards the Evening; and created Jo. Hollys Baron Houghton of Houghton, and Jo. Roper Baron Roper of Tenham, to them, and their Heirs Male of their Body lawfully begotten.

11. James Haye, Baron Haye of Sawley, is sent Ambassador into France.

A Pardon sealed to the Countess of Somerset, as an Accessary before the Fact.

16. Thomas Earl of Arundell called into the Privy Council at Westminster.

17. My Lord Carew chosen one of the Privy Council.

A Leaden Coffin dug up at Ratcliff, with an Urn or two, with a Piece of Silver Coin with this Inscription, IMP. PUPIENUS MAXIMUS. P. F. AUG. On the Reverse, Two Hands join'd, and PATRES SENATUS.

The Earl of Shrewsbury, who died May 8. was burried at Sheffield.

Aug. 27. George Villers, Master of the Horse, was created at Woodstock, toward the Evening, First Baron of Whaddon in the County of Bucks, (which was the Estate of my Lord Grey, lately banish'd;) being introduced by the Lords Compton and Norris, the Lord Carew carrying the Trabea, or Robe of State, before him; and then Viscount Villers being brought in by the Earl of Suffolk and Viscount Lisle, in a Wastecoat of Scarlet Velvet, Norris carrying the Robes of State of the same Velvet before him, and Compton the Crown; the King sitting upon his Throne, and the Queen and Princes being there present.

Sept. — My Lord Audley is created Earl of Castlehaven in Ireland, that he, being an ancient Baron of England, should have an higher Place than the Irish Barons being now settled in Ireland.

ANNO 1616. 1616.

A Son is born to John Egerton, Son of Thomas Egerton, Baron of Ellesmere, Chancellor of England, by ———. one of the Daughters and Heiresses of Ferdinando Earl of Derby; baptized October 2. the King being Godfather. Sept. 21.

On Michaelmas Day Lancelot Andrews, Bishop of Ely, is admitted into the King's Privy Council. 29.

Sir Edward Coke, Lord Chief Justice of the Kings-Bench, being called before the Chancellor, is banish'd Westminster-Hall, and ordered to answer to some Matters contain'd in his Reports. Oct. 3.

A Committee delegated for creating Charles, Son of the King, Prince of Wales: And they assembled for the nominating of the Knights of the Bath, viz. the Treasurer, the Duke of Lenox, the Chamberlain, and the Earl of Arundell. 5 & 7.

There were Twenty six Knights of the Bath made. Nov. 3.

Charles the King's Son, Duke of Cornwall, is created Prince of Wales. 4.

Thomas Egerton, Baron of Ellesmere, Chancellor of England, a constant and stout Defender of the Rights of the Crown, is created Viscount Brackley. 7.

William Lord Knolles is created Viscount Wallingford, notwithstanding the Honour of Wallingford belongs to the Dutchy of Cornwall: And Philip Stanhope is created Baron Stanhope of Shelford at Westminster in the Evening.

The King departs from London, after he had pronounced the Sentence of turning out Sir Edward Coke, Lord Chief Justice of the King's-Bench. 10.

Sir Henry Montague Kt. the King's Serjeant at Law, and Recorder of the City of London, is put in the Place of Sir Edward Coke, and by the Chancellor sworn Lord Chief Justice in the King's-Bench; which Place his Grandfather, Sir Ed. Montague, had held in the Reign of Henry VIII. 18.

Arthur Lake is consecrated Bishop of Bath, and Lewis Bailie Bishop of Bangor, at Lambeth. Dec. 8.

Jo. Thornbury, Bishop of Bristol, is translated to the See of Worcester.

Antonius de Dominis, Archbishop of Spalato in Dalmatia, detesting the Abuses of the Papists, came into England, and by the King's Special Command is hospitably entertained by the Archbishop of Canterbury. 16.

Parry Bishop of Worcester dies.

The King returns to Whitehall; and presents Tho. Edmunds, returning from his Embassy in France, with the Staff of the Comptroller of the King's Houshold, Lord Wotton being constituted Treasurer to the Houshold; and the next Day, being Sunday, he being sworn, took his Place at the Council-Board above the Vice-Chamberlain. 21.

The same Day the Bishop of Spalato went to the King, and accompanied him to Divine Service.

On Christmas Day Tho. Earl of Arundell, who was educated from his Youth in the Popish Religion, and had lately travell'd all over Italy, detesting the Abuses of the Papists, embraced the Protestant Religion, received the Sacrament in the King's Chapel at Whitehall. 25.

Great Consultations concerning the King's Progress into Scotland. 31.

ANNO

ANNO 1617.

1617. Jan. 5. GEorge Viscount Villers is created Earl of Buckingham in the Presence-Chamber at Whitehall, after Dinner, the Queen and Prince being present.

There happened sharp Disputes and Consultations about Re-instating the Company of Merchant Adventurers, lately put down, which is re-established accordingly.

Some Consultations concerning preparing Money for the King's Journey into Scotland.

Toward the latter end of the Month, the South Winds rage furiously, and the Weather was like Summer; insomuch that Flowers in Gardens and in the Fields appeared, and Thrushes hatch their young Birds, to the Astonishment of all Men.

Febr. 4. ---De Toure, the French King's Ambassador, goes to the King at Westminster.

The same day the Earl of Buckingham is admitted into the Privy-Council. He presently perswades the King, not to go into Scotland; whereupon the King was somewhat angry, but was soon pacified.

12. A Convocation of the Masters of Arts in the University of Oxford, was held at Baynards-Castle in London; and William Earl of Pembroke, whom (he resigning the Chancellorship of England) they chose Chancellor of the University, accepts the Honour.

13. The King sits in the Star-Chamber, and Sentence was pronounced against Billingham and --- Christmas, Two young Men who had offended against the Act concerning Duelling. They are fined 1000 l. The King made an Eloquent Speech against Duels.

15. The French Ambassadors dine with the King: They are entertained at a splendid Supper by my Lord Haye.

22. ----De Toure has his Audience of Leave of the King.

Altham, Baron of the Exchequer, dies.

24. The Chapel of Greenwich-House, Founded by Henry Earl of Northampton, is consecrated by the Bishop of Rochester: The Earls of Arundell and Dorchester; the Bishops of Ely and London; and some belonging to the Mercer's Company, being present.

March 3. Commissioners for the Office of Earl-Marshal of England meet in the College of Heralds, commonly called Darby-Place, and proposed several things concerning augmenting the Stipends of the Heralds, and turning their Wives out of the College and suppressing Abuses. The King gives a Visit to the Chancellor, who was very weak, and desirous to resign his Office by reason of his infirm old Age; and he deliver'd the Seal into the Hands of the King, who wept.

4. The Play-house lately erected in Drury-Lane is pull'd down by the Mob, and all the Apparel torn in pieces.

7. The Great Seal is delivered to Sir Francis Bacon the King's Attorney, in the 54th Year of his Age; whom the King admonished not to seal any thing till after mature Deliberation; to give righteous Judgment between Parties; and that he should not extend the Regal Prerogative too far.

14. The King sets forward on his Journey towards Scotland about Four a Clock in the Afternoon.

Yelverton is made Attorney General, and Coventry Sollicitor.

Anthony Ben is elected Recorder of London, in Coventry's Place.

ANNO 1617.

Lord Viscount Barkley late Chancellor; after the Earl of Buckingham had visited him, and shortly after the Lord-Keeper; and had signified to him that the King intended to give him the Title of an Earl, and designed an Annual Pension for him, expired in the 77th Year of his Age. Perhaps the nearer he saw the Evils coming upon the Commonwealth, like an upright Man, he was less concerned to meet approaching Death. 1617. 15.

A vast Sum of Money is exacted from the Citizens of London, not without murmuring.

James Baron Hay is admitted into the Privy-Council.

The Lord Rosse returns out of Spain.

Sir Edward Noel of Dalby Bar. is made Lord Noel of Ridlington in Rutlandshire (after he had sold Dalby, his ancient Inheritance, to the Earl of Buckingham, for its full worth) without Investiture.

An Act for setting up Staples for Wooll in England. 24.

Sir Walter Raleigh, who thought of taking a Voyage to Guiana, and had equipp'd a Fleet for that purpose, departed from London, although the Spanish Ambassador oppsed it with many Reasons. 28.

John Lord Hunsdon dies. April---

Viscount Berkley, late Chancellor, is buried at Dodleston in Cheshire, without any Funeral Pomp. 5.

The Marquess of Ancre, Marshal of France, is kill'd at Paris, whose dead Corps was cruelly handled by the Mob. 14.

Jacobus Augustus Thuanus, the Glory of France, the Chief of Historians in our Age, died much lamented. May 7.

On the First day of the Term, Sir Francis Bacon, Keeper of the Great Seal, made a solemn Procession in mighty Pomp to Westminster, in the following Order: 1. Clerks and inferior Officers in Chancery, 2. Students in Law. 3. Gentlemen, Servants to the Keeper, Serjeants at Arms, and the Seal-bearer, all on Foot. 4. Himself on Horseback in a Gown of Purple Sattin, between the Treasurer and the Keeper of the Privy-Seal. 5. Earls, Barons, Privy-Councellors. 6. Noblemen of all Ranks. 7. Judges, to whom the next Place to the Privy-Councellors was assign'd.

The Treasurer, and the Keeper of the Privy-Seal took an Oath; the Clerk of the Crown reading the same.

William James, Bishop of Durham, died: Richard Neal, Bishop of Lincoln was put in his Place.

The King enter'd into Scotland. 13.

Into Edinburgh. 16.

Viscount Berkley is created Earl of Bridgwater: The Letters Patents of the Creation are on this Day Signed and Sealed. 28.

On Ascension, Sir Roger Owen died Distracted. 29.

Sir John Bennet, Doctor of Laws, returns from the Archduke, with whom he did expostulate concerning a Libel written (as was credibly reported) by Ericius Puteanus. June 14.

John Digby, Vice-Chamberlain, prepares for his Journey towards Spain.

The Parliament in Scotland is Dissolved. 30.

Jo. Herbert, Secondary, died in Wales, leaving one only Daughter married to William Dodington of Bremer. July---

The King comes to Carlisle out of Scotland, where Marquess Hamilton is chosen one of the King's Privy-Council in England. Aug. 4.

The

1617. ANNO 1617.

Sept. 15. The King comes to Westminster; is received by the Lord-Mayor at Hide-Park.

Sir Edward Coke call'd again into the Privy-Council.

29. Nuptials celebrated at Hampton-Court between Jo. Villers, Brother to the Earl of Buckingham, and Frances the younger Daughter of Sir Edw. Coke, formerly Lord Chief Justice.

Ja. Montagu, Bishop of Winchester, is chosen one of the Privy-Council.

Oct. 20. George Mountain, Dean of Westminster, is chosen Bishop of Lincoln.

27. Ralph Winwood, Secretary of State, died at London, having performed that Office Three Years and about Five Months.

Nov. 1. The Venetian Ambassador goes to his Audience.

3. The Bishop of Winchester entertained the Nobility who accompanied the King, with a noble Banquet at Winchester-House in Southwark, which he had repaired.

4. The Muscovite Ambassador is splendidly entertained by the Citizens of London.

Lord Cobham is sent back to the Tower, being in extream want of all things.

6. Lucy Daughter to the Earl of Northumberland, is married to Ja. Lord Haye of Sawley, at the Wardrobe, London: The King honoured the Wedding with his Presence at Supper.

8. The Wife of Sir Edw. Coke, quondam Lord Chief Justice, entertained the King, Buckingham, and the rest of the Peers, at a splendid Dinner, and not inviting her Husband.

9. The Ambassador from Michael Emperor of Russia makes his Entrance; and presents to the King, Hawks, rich Furs, some small Animals, a Cemiter, and a Persian Bow.

10. The King goes from Whitehall towards Royston.

Francis Goodwin, Bishop of Landaff, was translated to the See of Hereford, Bennet the Bishop being dead; and George Carleton is preferred to the Bishoprick of Landaff.

The King chides the Doctors of Cambridge, about the spreading of the Arminian Sect amongst the Students.

Blount Mountjoy, Bastard Son to the Earl of Devonshire, is created Lord Montjoy of Fort Montjoy in Ireland; and Lambert Baron of Croan.

Dec. --- An Ambassador from Gustavus King of Sweden.

8. The Son of the Prince of Anhalt, who paid a Visit to the French King at Paris, and to ours at Newmarket, went to the Queen at Denmark-House, and is honourably Entertained.

The Saxon Ambassador takes a Journey to Newmarket.

9. Villeroy dies at Rouan, after he had served the Kings of France 50 Years and 27 Days, in the 75th Year of his Age.

14. Nich. Fenton, D. D. Rector of St. Mary-Le-Bow, London, and George Mountain, Dean of Westminster, are Elected: This Last to the See of Lincoln; the First to that of Bristol; and are consecrated Bishops; the Bishops of Canterbury, London, Ely, Rochester, Litchfield, and the Arch-Bishop of Spalato, laying on their Hands, and Dr. Sutton preached.

22. The second Son to the Elector Palatine is born on the 22d Day of O.S. which is the 1st of January N. S.

29. The King receives notification, that his Daughter Elizabeth had brought forth a Son to the Elector. Publick Rejoicings, Bonfires, and Bells ringing.

ANNO 1617. 1617.

My Lord Clifton is committed Prisoner to the Tower, for saying, He was sorry that he had not stabb'd my Lord-Keeper when he pronounced Sentence against him. 30.

ANNO 1618. 1618.

George Villers Earl of Buckingham, is created Marquess of Buckingham, to him, and his Male Heirs of his Body, beyond all expectation, without any Investiture, by Letters Patents delivered into his hand; the Keeper of the Great Seal, Lord Treasurer, Duke of Lenox, Marquess Hamilton, the Lord Chamberlain, the Earl of Arundel, Earl of Montgomery; the Viscounts, Lisle, Wallingford, Fenton, and other Witnesses being present. Jan. 1.

Sir Walter Raleigh took the little Town St. Thomas's, and his Son was there slain. 2.

George Earl of Buckingham entertains the King and several Peers at a splendid Dinner. 3.

The Keeper of the Great Seal is made Chancellor of England, the Seal being delivered again by the Name of the Chancellor. 4.

The same Day the Russia Ambassador feasts with the King.

On Twelfth Day, or Epiphany, the King was entertained at a Play by the Prince, at which the Spanish Ambassador was present, whereat the French Ambassador was very angry. 6.

The King upon his departure from Westminster made Robert Naunton (Master of Requests, Overseer of the Liveries of the Court of Wards) one of the Two Principal Secretaries. 8.

Simon Digby returns with Letters out of Spain. 31.

Peter Alley sent back by Sir Walter Raleigh, signified that he was very sickly; and that several Voluntiers died of their Sickness.

Henry Cary is made Comptroller of the King's Houshold; and Tho. Edmonds is made Treasurer instead of my Lord Wotton. Febr. 1.

The Baron of Winnenberg, Ambassador of the Prince Elector Palatine, goes to the Queen, and invites her, that she, with Prince Charles and other Princes, would stand Godfathers to the new born Prince. 6.

Edward Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, the Eighth of that Family, died without issue, and was buried by Night, the 10th day, at Westminster. 8.

The King comes to Whitehall. 14.

The Isle of Trinity is granted to the Corporation of Hull to fish for Whale against the Russia Company.

The King is troubled with a Defluxion upon his Knees, and could not be present at Sermon.

About this time Theobald de Burgo was created Baron of Brettas in Ireland. 28.

Robert Abbot Bishop of Sarum, Brother to the Archbishop of Canterbury, departed this Life, after his having been in that See Two Years and Three Months. Matthias Fotherby, Prebendary of Canterbury, is chosen in his Place. March 2.

Sir George Sands hang'd for Felony. 4.

The Earl of Abercorn dies in Scotland.

The Lady Roos is set at Liberty from the Custody of the Bishop of London.

Jo. Jeggon, Bishop of Norwich, died, when he had been in that See Fifteen Years: Overball Bishop of Litchfield succeeded him, and Fenton Bishop of Bristol is put in his Place. 13.

The King took a Journey to Okeham, after he had been laid up a Fortnight of the Gout. 16.

Ger. Bridges, Bishop of Oxford, died.

Marreis,

1618. ANNO 1618.

April 8. Marrais, the French Ambassador, had his Audience of Leave from the King.

19. Martin Fotherbey consecrated Bishop of Sarum at Lambeth, by the Laying on of the Hands of the Bishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, and the Bishop of Lincoln.

22. Some Ships hired by the Venetians, are sent.

23. The Archbishop of Spalato was constituted Master of the Savoy, Dr. Belcanquel the Scot resigning up the Place to him.

May 3. Anthony Maxey Dean of Windsor, departed this Life; the Archbishop of Spalato is put in his Place.

7. John Digby returning out of Spain, goes to Court again.

My Lord Laware set sail for Virginia: Arriving at St. Michaels, is splendidly Entertained by the Governor of the Island; but sailing from thence, dies, together with 30 more, not without suspicion of Poyson.

9. The King goes to the Queen at Greenwich, where she then kept her Court.

13. Jo. North, Brother to my Lord North, relates the sad News to the King about the unfortunate Expedition of Sir Walter Raleigh to Guiana; his Son being slain in the Storming of the Spanish Fort: Keimis cutting his own Throat for grief, died. The Fleet dispers'd.

23. Oliver Lambert, Lord Cavan, died.

24. The King put forth an Order to permit every Body (as he had before given leave in the County of Lancaster) who should go to Evening Prayer on the Lord's Day, to divertise themselves with lawful Exercises, with Leaping, Dancing, Playing at Bowls, Shooting with Bows and Arrows; as likewise to rear May-poles, and to use May-games and Morrice-dancing; but those who refused coming to Prayers, were forbidden to use those Sports.

30. Sir Dudley Carleton, Ambassador to the States General, returns into England.

June 9. A Proclamation is publish'd against Sir Walter Raleigh, whereby he is censur'd, for that against all Authority, and contrary to his Commission, he had in a Hostile manner invaded the Spanish Territories in America, and had violated, as much as in him lay, the Peace establish'd between the Two Princes; that the King did not approve of, but detested such Proceeding; and did therefore give full Power to all, that they should produce what they knew of this Action upon their certain knowledge, that he might be proceeded against according to Law; and that those might undergo exemplary Punishment, who should be convicted of so great Wickedness.

25. Tho. Watson entertaining the King very Nobly, is Knighted.

26. The Marquess of Buckingham entertains the King most splendidly at Wandsted-House, which (as is reported) he then presented to the King.

27. William Lord Roos died in the Romish Religion, in the Suburbs of Naples.

30. The King departed from Greenwich.

Randal Mac-Surly returns into Ireland to be created Viscount Dunluse.

July — The King diverts himself with Hunting at Windsor.

— He returns to Whitehall, and the next Day goes to Wandsted.

12. The Treasurer is accused of Mismanagement, or Male-administration, in the Business of the Exchequer.

The Chancellor is created Baron of Verulam; and Four Earls are created by Patent, viz. the Earl of Leicester; Compton, of Northampton; Rich, of Clare; Cavendish, of Devonshire.

ANNO 1618. 1618.

A Riot at the Spanish Ambassador's House, because his Servant had accidentally hurt a little Boy.

Didacus Sarmiento, Count of Gondomart, the King of Spain's Ambassador, departs: In his Journey he is entertained by the Lords, Tenham and Wotton. He sets sail on the 20th, (with the Popish Priests) whom, upon his earnest Request, the King discharged out of Prison. 16.

Humfreys, Secretary to Viscount Wallingford, rifling his Coffers, is committed to Prison. He accuses the Treasurer and others of Bribery. 18.

The Queen removes from Greenwich. —The King comes from Theobalds to London.

The Earl of Suffolk, Treasurer of England, is dismissed from his Place, by taking his Staff from him: Is accused of Bribery, after having perform'd that Office four Years and ten Days; and John Bingly, his under Officer, is committed to Prison. 19.

Jo. Montagu, Bishop of Winchester, died of a Dropsy, having been two Years in the See, in the 50th Year of his Age. 20.

At this time the King proceeds on his Progress from Westminster, after he had nominated the Bishop of Ely to the Bishoprick of Winchester; Fenton, Bishop of Coventry, to Ely; Harsnet, Bishop of Chester, to Coventry; and Dr. Bridgeman, to Chester.

Baron Haye is created Viscount Doncaster without Investiture.

The Earl of Suffolk, most of his Servants being turn'd off, departs, with his Countess, from London. 23.

News is brought concerning the Decease of my Lord Roos at Naples, not without suspicion of Poison. Concerning the taking of Utrecht, by Maurice Prince of Orange, driving out from thence Colonel Ogle, a Favourer of the Arminians, Sir Horatio Vere being put in his Place. Of Boissis a Frenchman's being sent into the Low-Countries to strengthen the Catholick and Arminian Parties; and of sending out Sir Dudley back into Holland to the Synod there to be held. Sir Theodore de Maierne, the King's Physician, lately sent into France by the King, being suspected to have come to disturb Affairs, is commanded to retire forthwith out of the Kingdom of France, by the King's Council: He is the Son of that Maierne who publickly opposed Monarchy. 27.

Viscount Lisle is invested Earl of Leicester, and Baron Compton Earl of Northampton, in a solemn manner, in the Bishop's Palace at Salisbury. My Lord Rich, who aspired to the Title of Earl of Clare, (because the Title of Clare, which is the same with that of Clarence, was a higher Honour than could well suit with a Family in a manner Upstart, and because the Honour of Clare was granted to the Queen before) was created Earl of Warwick by Letters Patents; and the Lord Cavendish, Earl of Devonshire, without any Investiture. Aug. 2.

Sir Walter Raleigh is brought to London, Lewis Steukley, his Keeper, being bribed, thought of making his Escape with him; and being betrayed by some body or other, is intercepted on the Thames, brought back, and thrown into the Tower. 9.

The King went from Salisbury to Cramburn. 11.

About this time a Ship returned from Greenland, which the Hollanders call Spitsberg, from the sharp peaked Mountains, and brought word that the Hollanders had overpower'd the English, had kill'd

1618. ANNO 1618.

Aug. --- kill'd some, and had carried away the Oyl: Which the Londoners, especially, took in ill part, who had fitted out 18 Vessels for this Whale-fishing; and so much the more, because a Report went up and down, that the English had also been oppress'd in the Islands of the East-Indies.

The English and Dutch had a long time contended about the Greenland Fishery, as did also the French and Spaniards, pretending the Law of Nations, since the Seas were free to them. The English claim'd the Propriety, because Sir Hugh Willoughby, an Englishman, in the Year 1553, first found it out. The Danes, because it is under their Dominion by the Confession of the English themselves, who pay them Duty, or Toll, for Fishing, (which they did after the Death of Queen Elizabeth.) The Hollanders affirm, That William Bernardson and Jo. Cornelison, Hollanders, Anno 1596, did first discover this; that the Greenland discover'd by Willoughby was at long distance, this last being under the Latitude of 52 Degrees; the first is extended as far as 75 and 82 Degrees: That the English came not thither till the Year 1608. They urge, that the Sea is free; that the English, contrary to the Right of Nations, and the Laws of Humanity, forbid others to Fish there; whereas the Kings of France hinder none to fish in New France; neither do the Kings of England forbid fishing in the Bays of Ireland: And they complain, that the English threw down the Marks which William Bernardson had set up in memory of the first Discovery; and that they had taken away the Oyl by force of Arms the Year before.

The Rioters at the Spanish Ambassador's House tried at Guildhall: The Father of the little Boy that was hurt, and others, Fined 1000*l.* each, and Imprison'd during the King's Pleasure.

Aug. 12. Sir Walter Raleigh being examined about his Escape, confess'd, that premeditating this Flight, he had trespassed highly against the King. By his unadvised Counsel in invading Guiana, and the Tumult in the Spanish Ambassador's House, some conceiv'd the Hopes of a Match with the Daughter of Spain to be mightily extenuated and lessen'd: For the King of Spain proposed nothing else to himself by matching and disposing of his Children into England and France, than by joining those Kingdoms to him in Affinity, to disjoin and separate them from the United Provinces, and consequently the more easily to reduce them to Obedience.

The Chancellor, and other Commissioners, often meet, and examine Sir Walter Raleigh.

27. Eadge returns from Greenland, or Spitsberg, plunder'd of his Oyl, there being three of his Crew kill'd by the Hollanders; so that the whole Fishing this Year proved ineffectual.

The Princess of Condé was brought to Bed in Prison of two Twins, who died shortly after.

Sept. --- The King comes to Windsor, and from thence, by the Way of Westminster, to Wandsted in Essex.

The Queen was indisposed at Oatelands.

A Proclamation, whereby the Fine and Imprisonment inflicted on the Rioters at the Spanish Ambassador's in Barbican, are remitted, at the Sollicitation of the Spanish Agent.

17. The King at Havering; then taking a Journey to Theobalds, there he Hunts.

The King comes to Hampton-Court.

Le Clerc, Agent for the King of France, is forbid the Court.

ANNO 1618. 1618.

William Becher, Agent for our King in France, is confin'd to his House by special Command.

Gervais, Lord Clifton, laid violent Hands on Oct. --- himself.

An Envoy, or Chiaux, from the Grand Signior, 17.
comes to London. Donatus, Envoy for the Republick of Venice, comes into England.

The same Day there went to the National Synod of Dort, to be held concerning the Arminian Sect, from London, George Carleton, Elected Bishop of Landaff, Dr. Hall Dean of Worcester, Dr. Davenant Master of Queen's-College in Cambridge, and Dr. Ward President of Sidney Sussex College.

An Embargo upon Ships.

The Earl of Oxford returns home out of Italy.

Le Clerc the French Agent departs from London.

Sir Walter Raleigh is given to understand by 24.
the Commissioners, that it was the King's Intent that he should be put to Death; and that therefore he should prepare himself for the same.

He is brought to the King's-Bench Bar that he 28.
might speak, if he had any thing to say, why the Sentence of Death pronounced against him Anno 1603, should not be put in Execution.

He was beheaded in the 66th Year of his 29.
Age.

The King returns to Whitehall towards the 31.
Evening.

He admits Donatus the Venetian Ambassador Nov. 1. to Audience.

The Turkish Ambassador, or Chiaux, has Au- 3.
dience.

The King went to Hampton-Court to visit the 4.
Queen lying Sick of a Dropsie; and returns to Westminster toward the Evening.

The King goes from London to Theobalds. 10.

William Becher, Agent in France, is recalled; 14.
whereupon returning to London, he waits upon the King.

Jo. Digby, Vice-Chamberlain, created Lord 20.
Sherburn.

Deputies from the States come to London to 26.
negotiate some Affairs.

They go to Newmarket, where the Court Dec. 7.
now is.

The King returns from Newmarket to London. 21.

A Council held concerning the Affairs the 22.
Dutch Deputies were sent to negotiate, who have full Power to Treat, but no Authority to conclude any thing about the Fishery.

The Queen continues sick at Hampton-Court, where the King pays her a Visit, and returns to London in the Evening.

Jo. Seldon is brought into Trouble for his History of Tythes.

Baron à Donaw, Ambassador from the Confe- 27.
derate Princes of Germany, is admitted to Audience, who informed the King of abundance of things relating to the Affairs of Germany, and the Bohemian Troubles.

Balcanqual is sent to the National Council, or Synod, for the Church of Scotland; and Doctor Goad is put into the Place of Dean of Worcester.

The Deputies of the States have their Audi- 31.
ence; they desire, that nothing may be yet done as to the Herring Fishing, seeing it is the greatest Support of their Commonwealth, and the only Succour and Relief of the Common People; and that there were now great Troubles amongst them.

ANNO

ANNO 1619.

1619.

Jan. 1. LAncelot Andrews, elected Bishop of Winchester, is sworn by the Chamberlain Dean of the Chappel.

8. The King went from London to Theobalds.

12. That spacious and beautiful Banquetting-House at Whitehall was set on fire by the Negligence of the Keepers.

Thomas Earl of Lincoln dies: His Son Edward succeeds him.

The Lord Cobham dies miserable, and poor: Whose next Heir was William Brook, the Son of George beheaded; which said William, Ann. 1610. in the 7th of King James, was restored with a Clause, That he should not hold the ancient Honour of his Ancestors, and the Title of Baron Cobham, but only from the Grace and Favour of his Majesty.

19. A Tryal in the Star-Chamber between the Secretary of State Lake, and the Countess of Exeter, and a great Dispute arises about the Form of Proceeding.

Uncertain Reports of a great Fleet ready equipped in Spain; whereupon Baron Donaw, who had taken his Leave of the King, was called back.

Richard Wingfeld, Marshal de Camp in Ireland, is made Viscount of Powers-Court under the Great Seal of Ireland.

30. Charles Howard resigned up his Office of Admiral to the Marquess of Buckingham.

Mervin, the Son of ——— a Lawyer, bargained with Franc. Howard for the Place of Vice-Admiral.

Feb. 1. The King returns to Whitehall.

Gabeleone comes to the King as Ambassador Extraordinary from Victor Amadei the Son of the Duke of Savoy, to accommodate Matters between his Majesty and the French King.

The King was pleased to knight —— Fortescue, Jo. Osborn, —— Gaughton, —— Sutton, and William Pitts, late Commissioners for the Navy, and for Domestick Affairs.

The King present at the Tryal in the Star-Chamber between Secretary Lake and the Countess of Exeter.

6. The King visits the Queen at Hampton-Court, accompanied with the Marquess of Buckingham.

The Earl of Nottingham resigns his Place of Admiral into the King's Hands.

The King publishes Meditations on the Lord's Prayer, and dedicates the Book to the Marquess of Buckingham.

13. Sentence given against Tho. Lake by the King and Lords in the Star-Chamber; and he is fined. He was put into the Secretary's Place Jan. 3. 1616. —— He, his Wife, and Daughter Rosse, are committed to the Tower.

The King, for preserving the Honour of the late Admiral, grants him the Place and Precedency of Jo. Moubray, whom Richard II, had created Earl of Nottingham.

15. Tho. Lake, his Wife, and Daughter Rosse, are carried to the Tower; the Seal being taken from him, as also the publick Papers.

16. The King returns to Theobalds, when he had appointed in the Place of Tho. Lake, Geo. Calvert Secretary, who was Clerk of the Crown, whose Prudence and Fidelity in State Matters, Robert Cecil Secretary, was throughly acquainted with, and of whose Assistance also the King made much use, yea, and he judged that he would be a great help to Robert Naunton the other Secretary.

Feb. 22. Lancelot Andrews, Bishop of Ely, is translated to the See of Winchester.

ANNO 1619.

1619.

Queen Anne died of a Dropsy in the Night: Mar. 1.
after her Son Charles had been to pay her a Visit, Anno Ætatis XLV.

The Intrails of the Queen enclosed in a Sexangular Coffin, were carried at Eight a Clock 5.
by her Servants to Westminster: They were deposited in the lower part of the Chappel, in which Queen Elizabeth is buried.

The Bishop of Chester is translated to Coventry, and Bristol to the See of Ely.

The Body of the Queen is conveyed by her 9.
Servants to Somerset-House by Night.

Matthias the Emperor dies. 10.

A Horse Race at Newmarket; at which the 19.
King tarrying too long in his Return from Newmarket, was forced to put in at an Inn at Wichfordbridge by reason of his being indisposed, and came very late in the Night to Royston.

The Prince went to meet his Father, and 22.
shortly after most of the higher sort of Nobility went also, upon the Report of the King's Indisposition.

The King being recover'd, keeps his Easter 28.
at Royston, on whom all the Nobility wait.

About this time the King conferred the Honour of the Earldom of Kelly upon Tho. Areskin Viscount Fenton; and the Honour of Earl of Kellays on my Lord Bunning.

The Archbishop of Canterbury founds an Hos- Apr. 5.
pital, where he was born, at Guilford, and laid the first Stone himself.

About this time Isaac Wake, the King's Am- 16.
bassador to Savoy, is knighted, and honourably rewarded.

His Majesty returns to Ware in a Horse-Litter, 21.
and the next Day is carried in a Coach attended by the Life-Guard to Theobalds.

The Solemnity of St. George's Day is prorogued to the 26th of April.

Complaints presented to his Majesty against the Chancellor.

The Earl of Suffolk, late Treasurer, being several times examined about Bribery, obtains Leave for the Recovery of his Health to return to Walden; but his Countess could not obtain the same.

Wikes, a Fanatick, feigns that he had Revelations, and in a threatning manner denounces Judgments against the King: Whereupon he is committed to Bedlam for a Madman.

William Lake, the Amanuensis of Tho. Lake, is committed to Prison, because he endeavoured to deliver Letters to the Lady Rosse clandestinely, and attempted to fly away; he was accused by the Keeper of the Lady Rosse.

The Earl of Southampton made of the Privy- 30.
Council at the Star-Chamber.

The Marquess de Tremouille, of the Family of May the Ursins, Ambassador from the French King, is entertain'd at Gravesend and conducted to London.

The said Ambassador is conducted by the Mar- 3.
quess of Buckingham to the King at Theobalds, where he is splendidly entertain'd.

Olden Barnevelt on the same 3d Day is beheaded in Holland at the Hague.

James Viscount Doncaster, is sent Ambassador into France.

The English Prelates return home from the 7.
National Synod of Dort.

Overall, Bishop of Norwich, that prodigious Learned Man, died. George Carleton, the Bishop of Chichester, and others, put in for Norwich: Chichester prevails, and Carleton is translated to Chichester.

1619. ANNO 1619.

May ---- George Montaigne, Bishop of Lincoln, is made the King's Almoner, in the place of the Bishop of Winchester, who laid it down against his Will.

13. The Funeral of Queen Anne is celebrated.

20. The French Ambassador is nobly treated at a Banquet at Whitehall by the Duke of Lenox; and the next Day leaves London.

27. The King goes to Theobalds.

June 1. The King returns from Theobalds to Whitehall. ——The Citizens of London congratulate his being restored to his former Health.

In this Month Marquess Hamilton is created Earl of Cambridge, and Baron Everdal in Cumberland; Esme Stuart, Lord d'Albigny, Earl, Marquess, and Baron of Leiton; and Jo. Villiers Viscount Purbeck, and Baron of Stoke, by Letters Patents deliver'd without Investiture.

3. An Ambassador arrives from the Duke of Lorrain.

8. The Lorrain Ambassador is feasted by his Majesty at Greenwich. The Earl of Suffolk returns to London.

13. All the Privy Counsellors, by the King's special Command, partake of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper at Greenwich, in order to shew mutual Charity one to another.

The Earl of Ormond is thrown into Prison for refusing to stand to the Arbitration of his Majesty, concerning the Estate adjudged to the Lord Dingwell.

19. His Majesty keeps his Birth-day.

Thomas Lake is commanded in the Star-Chamber to acknowledge the Sentence given against him to be just; and that he should ask Pardon for the Injury done to the Countess of Exeter.

22. The King is entertained at Wansted by Henry Mildmay, Master of the Jewel-Office.

Thomas Lake refuses to subscribe to the Acknowledgment of Calumnies against the Countess of Exeter, as did his Wife; notwithstanding Rosse the Daughter confessed, that those Calumnies of Incest with Rosse, of Witchcraft, and begging Pardon for the Crimes, were forged, and were written by Arthur Lake, copied by Hobbes, Rosse's Maid, the Father and Mother consenting.

25. The King is entertain'd by Sir Thomas Watson at Howsted, together with the Prince, the Earl of Montgomery, and the Lord Sheffield.

30. The King departs from Greenwich to Oatelands. Field is preferred to the poor See of Landaff.

July 7. The King comes from Windsor to Whitehall.

10. The King rid a Hunting to Wandsted.

13. The King came to Somerset-House, and is said to have visited my Lord Mayor, in order to recommend the Match of my Lord's Daughter with Jo. Villiers.

Lord Dingwell is created Earl of Desmond, in Right of his Wife. The Duke of Lenox is sent into Scotland.

15. Thomas Lake, late Secretary of State, is to have his Enlargement, and to be delivered into the Custody of his Brother, the Bishop of Bath and Wells. The Lady Rosse, his Daughter, is set at Liberty also; but she chose rather to sojourn some time in the Tower, in order to settle her private Affairs. — Sir Henry Wotton conceiving vain Hopes of obtaining the Office of Secretary, returns from his Embassy to Venice.——Great Controversies arising between the English, and Hollanders belonging to the East-India Company, and about Navigation, and Fishing near Greenland, were composed by his Majesty; and the Deputies of Holland are honoured with the Dignity of Knighthood at Theobalds.

ANNO 1619. 1619.

July 15.

The King begins his Journey to Royston, on which Day the Marquess of Buckingham views the Fleet. 19.

Donatus, the Venetian Ambassador in England, is proscribed, or banished by the Republick, for some Money converted to a wrong Use in Savoy: However he skulks secure in London.

Mary Crofton did publick Penance at St. Martins in the Fields for scandalous Words against the Countess of Exeter.

Marquess Hamilton and the Earl of Pembroke took a Journey towards Scotland.

An Enquiry ordered into the Corruptions and Briberies of the Earl of Suffolk, late Lord Treasurer. Aug. 3.

The King comes to Windsor. Sept. 3.

The King's new Gold comes out, with his Head surrounded with a Lawrel; wherefore it soon got the Name of Lawrels amongst the Vulgar; of different Value, viz. Twenty Shillings with XX, Ten Shillings with X, and of Five Shillings with V.

The Lady Baroness Rosse is sent into Custody to Dillington, the Pensioner of the Isle of Wight.

The King dined at Greenwich, being in haste to go to Wandsted. 9.

Frequent Envoys one after another about the Bohemian Affairs; and Reports that the Elector Palatine and the Electress were crowned King and Queen of Bohemia. Oct. —

Thomas Field, Chaplain to the King, is consecrated Bishop of Landaff, in the place of George Carleton, translated to Chichester. — An Ambassador from the Duke of Savoy.

The Earl of Suffolk, late Lord Treasurer of England, with his Lady, are accused in the Star-Chamber, for misapplying the Royal Jewels, for detaining the Money for Machines or Engines of War for the Fleet, and for the Business of Ireland, and for Money extorted from the King's Servants and Pensioners. 20.

Sir John Bingley is also accused of the same Crimes.

They by their Advocates denied every Particular, and pray'd that Evidences might be produced, which was begun to be done on the 21st Day.

Simon Digby returns with Letters from Spain. — The Bishop of Lincoln entertains the King nobly at his House at Bugden.

His Majesty dined at Greenwich, and gives Names to some Ships that were to be launched. Nov. ----

News is brought, That the English had defeated the Hollanders in the East-Indies.

The King sets out from Theobalds after Sermon, designing for Newmarket. 9.

James Balfour, a Scotchman, is created Baron Clan Auley in Formanagh.

Andr. Stuart of Ochiltre created Baron of Castle-Stuart.

A Proclamation for observing the Lent Fast and Friday Fast given at Royston.

The Earl and Countess of Suffolk are fined 30000 l. and to be imprisoned in the Tower during the King's Pleasure. 13.

John Bingley is fined 2000 l. and is to be detained in the Fleet during Pleasure.

The Earl of Suffolk and the Countess his Wife are thrown into the Tower of London. 20.

Liberty is granted to the Earl of Suffolk, as also to Bingley, upon certain Conditions and Restrictions. 29.

Albert

1619.

ANNO 1619.

Dec. 9. Albert Morton came to London, with the News of Frederick Elector Palatine and his Consort's being crowned King and Queen of Bohemia; and some Medals, as Presents.

21. A Son is born to Frederick King of Bohemia, who was named Rupert, in Memory of Rupert the First, Emperor of the Family of the Palatines. —The Elector of Brandenbourg died.

1620.

ANNO 1620.

Jan. 1. Viscount Doncaster returns from his Embassy in Germany, goes to wait upon the King; and acquaints him with the State of the Elected King of Bohemia's and the Emperor's Affairs.

The King's Book of the Inauguration of a King comes out.

5. Lionel Cranfield is chosen one of the Privy-Council.

6. The Baron de Donaw, Ambassador from the King of Bohemia Elect, hath a private Audience of his Majesty.

11. The King departed from London, just when the Nuptials were contracted (as is reported) between the Marquess of Buckingham, and the Daughter of the Earl of Rutland, by Frances Knevet, the Relict of ——— of Bevil of Cornwall.

George Calvert, Secretary of State, and Lionel Cranfield, are made Commissioners for the Office of the Treasurer, the Master of the Rolls being removed.

28. Thomas Lake reads in the Star-Chamber the Acknowledgment of the scandalous Calumnies by which he had unworthily injured the Countess of Exeter. This Acknowledgment was drawn up, and indited by the Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justices, and the Attorney-General, and publickly read by Thomas Lake; wherein he confessed and acknowledged, that Sentence pronounced against him on the 13th of February the Year before, for defending and maintaining his Daughter the Lady Roos, was just, because it was a most base, heinous and scandalous Crime for the said Countess; but that he was seduced by gross Ignorance, Credulity and Indulgence. Moreover he acknowledged, he had grievously offended by imprisoning Luke Hutton and George Williams for his own Profit and Advantage; protesting, that he was heartily sorry for having defended so base, odious and scandalous a Cause; begged Pardon of the Countess for the Fault; and begged also of the Lords, that they would please to interceed for him with the King to procure his Favour and Mercy.

The Earl of Suffolk is received again into some Favour by the King; as were also his Sons.

Feb. 2. The King commands, That Enquiry should be made into the Goods and Chattels, Possessions and Debts, of the Earl of Suffolk, that he might see whether he was capable to pay the Fine.

The Earl of Suffolk's Children are received into Favour.

7. The Earl of Worcester, Keeper of the Privy-Seal, sate in the Court of Requests.

15. The Earl and Countess of Suffolk return to London.

29. The King returns to Whitehall.

Mar 4. The Prince exerciseth himself in running at the Ring.—Marquess Hamilton admitted Gentleman of the King's Bedchamber.

The Prince invites the Peers to a Banquet in Somerset-House, and to a Play.—The same Day

ANNO 1620.

1620.

Count Gundomar, Ambassador of his Catholick Majesty, arrives at Dover.

He is received by the Mayor of Canterbury, and then by the Earl of Dorset. Mar. 6.

He comes ashore at the Tower, and is conducted through the City to Ely-House. 8.

The King returns to Westminster. 10.

The Lady Lake, by reason of her Distemper, is set at Liberty out of the Tower, upon Condition that she should be brought back to the Tower about the beginning of the Term, unless she submitted her self.

Count Gundomar, the Spanish Ambassador, going to the King in Whitehall, the Rails near the Door of the Great Chamber, being broken by the Multitude of People, fell down, and with them the Earl of Arundell, Lord Grey, Lord Gerard; but received no Hurt: The Ambassador himself had like to have fallen, but was supported by the Guard standing by, and escaped the Danger.

He goes to the King again, and after a long Conference goes to wait on the Prince. 13.

The King goes to Hampton-Court. 14.

A running at Tilt on the Anniversary of King James, wherein Prince Charles running twelve Courses at the Ring, got all the Praise. 24.

The King made a Procession with mighty Pomp from the Palace of Westminster to St. Paul's, accompanied with the Bishops, and Peers of the Realm. At Temple-Bar the Lord Mayor and Aldermen received him. Robert Heath, Recorder, congratulates his Entrance into the City. From thence to the North-side the several Companies of Citizens stood within the Rails, all in order, with their Ensigns and Standards as far as St. Paul's; Tapestry Hangings all the while hanging out of the Windows. Neither the younger Sons of Earls, nor Knights of the Privy-Council, were in the Cavalcade, because they could not well agree about Precedency. The Prince went bare Headed. 26.

On the West part, where was the ancient polish'd Brazen Pillar, a Chair is set, and a Cushion; there he fell down on his Knees: When he had risen, the Dean made a Speech. From thence he proceeded through the middle Isle, under a Canopy of State, by the Choir, to the Traverse near Sir Nicholas Bacon's Tomb; from whence, after some short Ejaculations, Prayers and Hymns, they went to the Place which John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, appointed to hear Sermons in. The Bishop of London preached a Sermon: He insisted much upon the Repairing St. Paul's Church. The King returned in the same Order wherein he came.

The King at Hampton-Court remits 1800 l. to the Earl of Nottingham, which he owed to Queen Elizabeth, and himself. Apr. 5.

The Duke of Lenox, Steward of the King's Houshold, held the Court of the Verge in Westminster-Hall. 6.

The Prince, the Marquesses of Buckingham and Hamilton, exercise running at Tilt, or at the Ring, at Westminster, and the Prince bears away the Prize, having run 12 Courses, by the Judgment of the many By-standers, and the Earl of Arundell, Viscount Doncaster, Lord Sheffield, Henry Cary Comptroller, who sate as Judges. 18.

The King silenced 130 Ministers in Scotland, who would not submit to Episcopal Authority; but he received them afterwards into Favour in June. 27.

Letters

1620. ANNO 1620.

Apr.--- Letters of the Ecclesiastical Electors, of the Elector of Saxony, Bavaria, and Landgrave of ——— to Frederick King of Bohemia, that he would resign his new Kingdom, lest he should shortly be forced thereto, because Bohemia is a Fief of the Empire, the determining of which belongs to the Electoral College, without the Assent whereof the Elector Frederick had accepted that Kingdom. The States of Bohemia deny that, and pretend and acknowledge nothing depends on the Emperor but the Feudal Investiture.

The King of Spain constitutes and appoints the Duke of Parma his General in Flanders.

Spinola is about to attempt something against Juliers. The Spaniard in the mean time labours, by the Intercession of our King and the French King, to prolong the Truce with the States.

May 1. The King entertained the Prince and the rest, who exercised running at Tilt, with a splendid Banquet at Whitehall.

2. The King bestowed on Calvert the Secretary, an annual Pension of 1000 l. out of the Custom-House. (He was made Secretary Feb. 15. 1718.)

15. A Proclamation to call home Roger North, who set sail by the King's Authority to inhabit and settle a Colony near the River of the Amazons.

Thomas Lake kissed the King's Hand: His Wife is sent back to the Tower, because she peremptorily refused to submit.

16. The Marquess of Buckingham married Catharine the Daughter of the Earl of Rutland privately at Lumley-House.

17. Frederick Henry is declared Successor to his Father in the Kingdom of Bohemia.

20. The Ambassador from the United Provinces of Germany prefixed this Day to the King, to answer at what time he would do any thing for his Son-in-law of Bohemia.

Lord North is thrown into the Fleet, for persuading his Brother Roger to hasten his Voyage to the River of the Amazons.

The News are confirmed concerning Four English Ships being intercepted by the Hollanders, with a very rich Cargo, and of a great many English being murdered by them in the East-Indies.

Henry of Nassaw, Stadholder of Friesland, died of an Apoplexy at Lewward without Issue.

27. His Majesty appointed the Marquess of Buckingham Lord Lieutenant of Kent, after my Lord Wotton had resign'd; and he presently transfer'd the said Charge upon the Duke of Lenox, by the King's Consent.

June---- The Prince leaping over a Wall at Theobalds, his Foot slipping, hurt his Nose and Forehead grievously, not without the Peril of his Life.

4. His Majesty keeps his Whitsontide at Greenwich, and took the Sacrament, which was administred by the Bishop of Winchester, and the Bishop of Lincoln, who preached his first Sermon before the King. The Court was very thin.

10. ——— Alured, a quondam Clerk to the Lord Ever, President of Wales, presents to the Marquess of Buckingham a curious little Treatise against the Marriage of Prince Charles with the Infanta of Spain: Whereupon the King being angry, threw him into Prison.

11. After Evening Prayer on Trinity-Sunday the King repairs to Westminster.

Sir Horatio Vere is designed for General of the Army that was to be sent into Germany, laying aside Edw. Cecil, who was first designed.

Voluntiers are picked up in the City, by Beat of Drum, to the Bohemian War, under the Command of the Earls of Oxford, Essex, Jo. Wentworth, &c. for Edward Sacvil and the Lord Lisle refused to serve in this War, out of I know not what Ambition and Dissimulation.

ANNO 1620. 1620.

The King celebrates his Birth-day at Windsor, and comes to Wandsted. June 19.

On St. Peter's Day the King heard the Cause of the Prerogative of Honour, or Precedency, the last time, between the younger Sons of Earls and Knights Counsellors; and he adjudged it to the younger Sons of Earls. 29.

Robert Tolson is consecrated Bishop of Sarum at Lambeth, by the Imposition of the Hands of the Bishops of Lincoln, Rochester and Chester. July 9.

Sir Horatio Vere goes to Theobalds to take his Leave of the King, being just upon the point of setting Sail into Germany with 4000 Foot, for defending of the Palatinate. 15.

The King begun his Progress. 18.

The Fine imposed on the Earl of Suffolk is mitigated to 7000 l. which is to be paid to Haddington.

Sad News of the English having sustained great Losses by the Hollanders in the East-Indies; Jordan, the chief Merchant, being killed, and Sir Thomas Gates dead.

General Vere, the Earls of Oxford, Essex, and others, set Sail from Gravesend. 22.

The Commissioners for repairing St. Paul's ordered, that the Houses at the East and West End thereof should be pulled down before the first of August.

Robert Mansell sets Sail out of the Thames with some of the King's Ships, and of Londoners, against Turkish Pyrates infesting the Mediterranean Sea. Aug. ---

News that Spinola was set down with his Army in the Palatinate, and had appointed that to be the Theatre of War. 28.

Lewes Stuckley, who betrayed Sir Walter Raleigh, died in a manner mad. 29.

A South-West Wind blows furiously; it hails; so that Robert Mansell was not able to sail out of the Thames-Mouth with his Fleet. Sept. 2.

He sets Sail, and stops in the Downes. 4.

He supped at Sir Dudley Diggs his House: and on the 6th rid Post to Court, perhaps because he was not sufficiently provided with Mariners and Necessaries. 5.

The King reprimanded the Earl of Worcester, being informed that his Daughter was sent to Bruxells to be made a Nun.

Tilenus, that great Divine, came into England, and published a Book against the Scots that were Zealots for the Geneva Discipline.

The Son of Hotman came into England with him.

News was brought, that Spinola had taken Openheim, Christiac, and Astac in the Palatinate, and had raised a Fort against Mentz.

Robert, the Son of Robert Digby, is made Lord of Geashill. 14.

Richard Boyle, Baron Boyle of Toughall in Ireland, is created Earl of Cork and Viscount Dungarvon, a Match being concluded between his Son and the Daughter of Edward Villers, and between the Daughter of Boyle and the Son and Heir of Villers.

A Proposition was made, that every Earl should contribute 1000 l. Barons 500 l. Baronets ——— Knights ——— for defending the Palatinate against Spinola, the Emperor's General in those Parts. Oct. ---

News

1620. ANNO 1620.

Oct. 8. News is brought, that Spinola had surprized Bagrac, Bing, and Clut. When the Spanish Ambassador was accused underhand to have intimated to the King, that Spinola had no Design upon the Palatinate with his Army, the Marquess of Buckingham, in a Letter sent to the Ambassador, acknowledges, that neither the Ambassador, nor the Spaniard, nor the Archduke, did dissemble with the King; but that every one of them did plainly declare, that he would wage War in the Palatinate.

It is required, that all Officers in the Chancery and Exchequer, all Judges, and Professors of the Law, and other wealthy Persons, should contribute Subsidy-Money for the Relief of the Elector Palatine.

29. The Prince Palatine is routed, and Prague taken.—— News are brought of Dampier's being killed by the Hungarians.

Henry Carvill of St. Maries is arraigned for sending Money under-hand against the Elector Palatine of the Rhine. Hereupon the Spanish Ambassador complains of Nanton the Secretary.

His Majesty came to Westminster very late on All-Souls Eve; and for that reason he went not to Prayers.

Nov. 1. On All-Saints he went to Morning Prayer: He offer'd, touch'd for the Evil; but there was no Sermon preach'd.

5. Gunpowder-Treason Day is observed at Theobalds; and Sheriffs are prick'd.

7. A Parliament is called to begin on the 15th Day of January.

9. William Cavendish, Son to Charles Cavendish, is created Viscount Mansfield, by delivering him Letters Patents, without any Investiture.

10. The Earls of Essex and Oxford, the Lord Gerard, Edward Sackvill, Heidon the Treasurer of the English Army, return into England.

16. Sir Dudley Diggs and Morris Abbot are sent into Holland, to recover the Goods of the English taken in the East-Indies; Rowland Woodward is appointed to be their Secretary.

When the Lady Lake was to come to the Star-Chamber to acknowledge her Fault committed against the Countess of Exeter, she writ Letters to the said Countess: She disparages and affronts the Justice of the Kingdom, and appeals to the Tribunal of the Almighty, in repeating some Verses of the 139th Psalm; whereupon she is committed to the Tower.

29. They receive News, that the Elector Palatine was totally routed, and he was fled into Silesia; and that Prague was taken by the Duke of Bavaria, and Bucquoy; and that the Favourers of the Elector were expelled the City.

These Things were confirmed by the Letters of the Duke of Bavaria to the Elector of Mentz.

Randolph Mac-Surley, who was long since made Viscount Donluse (viz. Anno 1617.) is now created Earl of Antrim.

Oliver St. John, the Lord Lieutenant, is made Viscount Grandison.

Dec. 3. Henry Montagu, Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, (the Staff being delivered to him at New-Market) is made Lord Treasurer of England.

The Rabble are in an Uproar against the Servants of the Spanish Ambassador, for uttering some Words which escaped from the Spaniard, concerning the King of Bohemia's being routed; insomuch that the Chancellor commanded 300 Men to keep Guard all Night about the Ambassador's House, under the Command of Lewis Lewknor and Henry Spiller.

ANNO 1620. 1620.

The King conferred the Titles and Honours of Baron of Kimbolton, and Viscount Magnaville, or Mandevill, upon the Treasurer; perhaps because Kimbolton was formerly the Seat of the Magnavills, who came out of Normandy. Dec. —

It was reported, that in the King of Bohemia's Flight towards Breslaw, his Coaches were taken by the Enemy who pursued; wherein were found the Crown of Bohemia, and other Regalities; and that he designed for Presbourg, to confer with Bethlem Gabor.

The new Treasurer came to the Exchequer, 14. accompanied with Fulk Grevil, Vice-Chancellor, where, before the Chancellor, he took the Oath faithfully to discharge the Office of Treasurer. The Chancellor admonished him, that he would propose to himself the Lord Burghley the Treasurer, and Nicholas Bacon Keeper of the Great Seal, for Examples.

His Majesty gave Leave to the States of Holland to transport 100 Iron Guns, with Appurtenances, and as many to the Spanish Ambassador, not without the Murmuring of the common People.

A Demand made of 20000 l. of the Londoners: They very willingly give 10000 l. which was to be collected by the several Companies.

It was reported, that Robert Mansell had fought the Turkish Pyrates, with bad Success. ——The Lady Lake is set free; I know not upon what Conditions.

The King comes to Westminster: He went not 23. to Chappel, being prevented by the Gout.

Edward Villers is dispatched Ambassador into Bohemia: He departed on the 3d of January.

There was a Proclamation, That none should presume to talk or write sawcily of the Arcana Imperii, or of State Affairs.

Cadenet, Marshal of France, Brother to that great Favourite the Duke de Luines, comes to London with a great Train of Gentlemen: He is received at his Landing at Somerset-House, against whose Coming the Shops in Westminster-Hall were taken away. On Sunday he made his Entry with his Retinue through the Streets in Coaches, and came to the King in the House of Lords. After that, he had private Discourse with his Majesty. ——There were created, Viscount Fielding, and Baron of Newnham-Paddocks; Henry Cary Viscount Faukland, and Baron —— as also Northumberland Grey, Viscount —— in Scotland, Constable of Flamborough. In Ireland also —— Fitz-Williams is created Baron of Liffer, —— Willimot Viscount —— Culfield Baron Charlemont.

Roger North having received a Message from the Hollanders, That the King had called him back by a Proclamation, returned of his own accord, and is committed to the Tower.

ANNO 1621. 1621.

THE King did not go to the Chappel; but the Prince with the Nobles did. After Dinner the French Ambassador visits him. Jan. 1.

The Duke of Lenox nobly entertains the Ambassador at Hampton-Court with Hawking and Hunting.

The King entertains the Ambassador and the 4. French Gentlemen at a sumptuous Dinner in the House of Lords.

They sit at Table in this Order; viz. The King at the middle of the Table, the Ambassador at his Left; at the Head of the Table the Ordinary

1621. ANNO 1621.

Jan. — Ordinary Ambaſſador. The Duke of Alverny went his way, becauſe not admitted to the King's Table. The Prince was not preſent at this Feaſt. —— On Twelfth-Day the King went to Chappel; they had much ado to ſupport him: He offered Gold, Frankincenſe and Myrrhe; and touched 80 of the Evil.

8. Viſcount Doncaſter entertain'd the French Ambaſſador at a noble Supper in Eſſex-Houſe, at which the King was preſent, together with the Prince, the Chancellor, the Treaſurer, &c. —The Ambaſſador has Audience of Leave.

14. The French Ambaſſador, with his Retinue, is rowed down to Greenwich.

A Council of War is held, to which are called the Earls of Oxford, Eſſex and Leiceſter, Viſcount Wilmot, Lord Dacres, Edw. Cecil, Sir Horatio Vere, —— Bingham. Some Matters are propounded by them for the Recovery of the Palatinate.

The King went to Theobalds, on which Day he reproved Naunton the Secretary, and ſuſpends him from the Secretary's Function, becauſe (as 'tis ſaid) he conſulted with the French Ambaſſador about the Marriage of the Princeſs Henrietta, the French King's Siſter, without conſulting the King.

Viſcount Haddington is made Earl of Holderneſs, and Baron of Kingſton; with a further Acceſſion of Honour, That he ſhall wear a Sword before the King on the 5th of Auguſt; that is to ſay, on the Day of Gowry's Conſpiracy.

27. The Lord Chancellor is created with Plenary Inveſtiture Viſcount St. Albans: my Lord Carew carried the Robe of State before him; the Marqueſs of Buckingham held up. —— He gave the King moſt humble Thanks for making him, 1. his Sollicitor; 2. Attorney; 3. Privy Counſellor; 4. Keeper of the Great Seal; 5. Chancellor; 6. Baron Verulam; 7. Viſcount St. Albans.

Feb. 6. Sharp Debates concerning the Liberty of ſpeaking againſt Recuſants; concerning Popiſh Pictures, that they ſhould be removed out of the City; of the great Concourſe of Papiſts to hear Maſs at the Spaniſh Ambaſſador's Chappel; of contributing a Subſidy. It is alſo propounded, That every one of the Lower Houſe ſhould take the Sacrament.

In the Upper Houſe is propoſed ſomething about Iron Guns; of appointing certain Perſons who may hear Complaints of ſeveral ſorts of Injuſtice in the Chancery, and other Courts; as alſo about the Act of Reſumption.

Sheppard, for having ſomewhat freely and ſharply reflected upon the Puritans, was expelled the Houſe; and Flud, for ſaying, that the Prince Palatine had no Right to the Kingdom of Bohemia, is burnt in the Hand.

In the Lower Houſe ſome complain, that there were ſome Guns tranſported into Spain; and this is repreſented to his Majeſty, who anſwered, That he had given Leave to the Spaniſh Ambaſſador to tranſport ſome; as he had alſo done to the States of the United Provinces, and to the Duke of Brunſwick; and that he could not but be as good as his Word, and would perform his Promiſe.

16. This Day the Commons offered two Subſidies to the King; and are very earneſt to have the Laws put in Execution againſt Papiſts, that they ſhould be confined to their Houſes, and be examined.

18. The Houſe partake of the Holy Communion in St. Margaret's, Weſtminſter. Biſhop Uſher preached the Sermon, out of the 10th Chapter, ver. 7. of the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians.

ANNO 1621. 1621.

Several of the Earls and Barons preſent a Petition by the Prince, to prohibit the new Viſcounts of Scotland and Ireland from having a Place in England before the Barons of England. The King took this very ill, and reprimanded the Lord Deſpenſer. Feb. 21.

The ſame Day was begun the Debate concerning Grievances in the Houſe of Commons; and Drake of Devonſhire proved, that Giles Montpeſſon had acted unjuſtly and rigidly againſt Inn-keepers and Ale-ſellers by his Overſeers, the Servants of the Treaſurer and Chancellor, Dixon and Almond.

Some Days before, the King anſwered to the Five Articles againſt Recuſants, wherein the Laws may with Severity be put in Execution againſt them; but yet very cautiouſly, leſt the Popiſh Princes might be incenſed againſt the Reformed Religion, and that he would ſo order Matters with the Spaniſh and French Ambaſſadors, that they ſhould not admit the Engliſh to their Maſſes. He alſo acquainted them, that the French King had a Deſign to beſiege Rochelle; the Duke of Savoy, Geneva; and that the Spaniard had reduced the Valtoline under his Dominion, &c.

Sir Francis Mitchel, lately dubb'd Knight, was with great Diſgrace ſent to the Tower through the City by the Houſe of Commons, for grievous Exaction upon publick Inn-keepers, and Sellers of Beer and Ale.

The Lord Digby ſets ſail from London.

The Barons who had taken Offence, that the Viſcounts of Ireland were preferred before them, were ordered to wait upon the King, and kiſs his Hand: A few of them were admitted, and they ſoundly chid. 24.

News from Italy report, That Pope Paul V, was dead; and that there was elected in his place —— de Ludovicis of Bononia; and that he had aſſumed the Name of Gregory XV. —— The Spaniard propoſed a general Peace to the States of the United Provinces, on theſe following Conditions, viz. 1. If they would acknowledge him for their Protector. 2. If they would forbear any longer to ſail to the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies. 3. If they would permit Catholicks the free Exerciſe of their Religion, and let them have their Churches. 4. If they would open the Navigation between Antwerp and Zeland.

Giles Montpeſſon, when he was ſummoned to appear before the Houſe of Commons, being conſcious to himſelf, fled. There was a Proclamation forthwith iſſued out to apprehend him. Buckingham forſakes him, on whom he moſt relied. Mar. 3.

The Houſe complains, That the Lawyers whom they ſent to appeal, and refer a Matter to the Lords, acted deceitfully, and prevaricated. 9.

His Majeſty hears the Houſe concerning the Prevarication, and after that goes to recreate himſelf in Hawking. 10.

Albert Morton returns out of Germany; but the King did not admit him that Day.

There was ſome quarrelling between the M. of Buckingham, and Southampton and Sheffield, who had interrupted him, for repeating the ſame thing over and over again, and that contrary to the received approved Order in Parliament; but the Prince reconciled them. 14.

The

ANNO 1621.

1621. Mar. — The Bishops of Winchester and Lincoln present, in the Name of all the rest, a Grant of Subsidies passed by the Clergy of the Province of Canterbury to the King at Hampton-Court.——The Chancellor being convicted of Bribery, pretends, as if, being weary of Honour, he would resign his Place, being much loaden with Calumnies.

18. The Waywood of Sandomar's Son, the Ambassador from the King of Poland, goes to the King at Whitehall, and signifies to him in Latin, how great Wars were depending over Christendom by the common Enemy the Turk, occasion'd by the Troubles in Germany.

They vary in their Opinion in Parliament about the Antiquity of the University of Cambridge and Oxford, and which is first to be named in the Grant of Subsidies.

The Chancellor sends Letters by the M. of Buckingham to the Lords of the Parliament; and beseeches them not to condemn an innocent Person upon the false Suggestions of some ill Men before he was heard.

27. The King goes to the Parliament, and pronounces Sentence against Giles Montpesson; the Dignity of his Wife remaining untainted notwithstanding.

28. The Parliament is prorogued to the 18th of April.

29. An Act for proscribing Giles Montpesson; and another for repealing of the Patents of Inns and Alehouses: As also an Act for Gold and Silver Wire; and another about Conformity.

Some London Apprentices, who had rudely handled the Spanish Ambassador, were whipped through the City.

April 6. The King comes to Guildhall, and severely reproves the Magistrates for the Insolence of the Vulgar against Ambassadors; and he threaten'd the Gentlemen within the City of London, and the Parts adjacent, that he would restrain them by a Band of Men in Arms: And a Proclamation was published concerning that Business on the 8th of April.

May 2. The Great Seal of England, together with the Authority of Chancellor, was taken away from the Viscount St. Albans, and delivered to the Treasurer, Chamberlain, Duke of Lenox, and Earl of Arundell.

The Chancellor is sentenced to Prison during his Majesty's Pleasure; is fined 40000 l. is excluded from any Place in Parliament, and in the Judicature; and that he should not come near the Court within twelve Miles.

Sentence was pronounced by the House of Commons against Flud, who disdainfully calumniated the Prince Palatine, and his Princess; but it was revoked by the King, who began to enquire, Whether the House of Commons was a Court of Judicature?

5. Sir Francis Michel is brought to his Tryal, and sentenced to be degraded from the Honour of Knighthood, without any Prejudice to his Wife and Children; that he should have no Office; should be fined 1000 l. should be imprisoned during the King's Pleasure in Finsbury Prison.

The Peers wrangle amongst themselves about bringing Elverton, Quondam Attorney, to his Tryal.

Arundell is sent to the Tower.——Elverton, the outed Attorney, is fined.

Clement Coke, eldest Son to the outed Lord Chief Justice Edward Coke, is committed to the Tower, for his insolent affronting of Morison.

ANNO 1621.

Flud, who had derided the Prince Palatine in a scornful manner, was carried through the City with his Face to the Horse's Tail; set in the Pillory; whipt; branded with the Letter K in his Forehead; is fined, and condemned to perpetual Imprisonment. 1621. May 15.

The outed Chancellor is cast into the Tower, and is set at Liberty two Days after.

Dr. Davenant is advanced to the See of Salisbury in Tolson's Place, whom the King charged not to marry. June —

Melburn, Bishop of St. David's, is translated to the See of Carlisle.——Montaigne, of Lincoln, to the See of London.

Williams, Dean of Westminster, is nominated for Lincoln, and is appointed to be Keeper of the Great Seal.

The Earl of Southampton is delivered up to safe Custody to the Dean of Westminster. Likewise Jo. Selden and Sir Edwin Sandys are committed to the Sheriff of London. 16.

On the last Day of the Term, at Three of the Clock in the Afternoon, Sir Francis Michel was brought by the Sheriffs of London to Westminster-Hall. Presently after came the Commissioners for the Office of the Earl Marshal, viz. the Keeper of the Privy Seal, the Duke of Lenox, the Marquess of Buckingham, the Earl of Arundell, and several Barons that were Spectators. Before these, Sir Francis Michel is brought: After that, the Sentence of Parliament against him is read before him with an audible Voice by Philpot, a Pursuivant; the Spurs are broken in pieces by the Servants of the Earl Marshal, and thrown away: Then the Silver Sword, which ought to have been gilded, is taken from his Side, which was broken over his Head, and thrown away. Last of all, they pronounce him no longer to be a Knight, but a Knave, as was formerly done to Andrew de Herclay, when he was degraded by Anthony Lucy.

Garter, Clarenceux, and Norry, Kings at Arms, sate at the Feet of the Commissioners.

John Williams, Dean of Westminster, is constituted Keeper of the Great Seal, and heard Evening Prayer, Manwaring carrying the Seal before him, and Sutton. July 15.

The Bishop of Bangor is examined, and committed to the Fleet; but is discharged quickly after.——Edward Montagu is created Baron Montagu of Boughton.

Fulk Grevil is created Baron Brook; and Thomas Lord Darcy of Chich is created Viscount Colchester, to himself, and the Heirs of Thomas Savage.

Henry Lord Hunsdon is created Viscount Rochford; Lionel Cranfield is created Baron Cranford of Cranford in Bedfordshire. He married the Daughter of James Bret.

The Earl of Oxford is sent into Custody for his prattling; so is Sir G. Leeds, with Sutcliff Dean of Exeter, Sir Christ. Nevil, and one Brise a Minister.

Marquess Hamilton is sent into Scotland to hold a Parliament; and Viscount Doncaster is sent Extraordinary Ambassador to the French King.

Edward Herbert is recalled from France, because he had treated the Constable Luines very irreverently. Edward Sacvil is appointed in his Place.

George Montaigne is translated from the See of Lincoln to that of London. 18.

The Earl of Northumberland is discharged out of the Prison, in which he had lain for fifteen 1621.

ANNO 1621.

July 18. Years together, at the Discharge of the great Guns.

The Earl of Southampton is set at Liberty at the same time; as are Edwin Sandys and Jo. Selden.

Albert Archduke of Austria died at Bruxells, Anno Ætat. 62. ——— Whilst the Archbishop of Canterbury was a Hunting in Burnhill Park, belonging to my Lord Zouch, near Hertford Bridge, he killed the Keeper by chance with a Cross-Bow. The Quere was, Whether he should incur the Penalty of Irregularity by this involuntary Manslaughter, or Suspension?

Bucquoy, the Warlike Valiant General, was slain at Newhausel by the Hungarians, being surprized by an Ambush.

Aug. 5. Hackwell, the Prince's Chaplain, writ a Book against a Marriage with the Infanta of Spain, which he presented to the Prince, without the King's Knowledge; whereat the King being offended, sent Thomas Murray, the Prince's Chaplain, the Doctor his Brother, and all those who were privy to the Business, to Prison.

The Countess of Bedford returns out of Holland, whither she took a Voyage to pay a Visit to the Queen of Bohemia.

Whilst the King, by the Lord Digby, intercedes with the Emperor and King of Spain, that the outed King of Bohemia might be restored to his Pristine and Hereditary Honour of the Palatinate, he, taking up Arms for the States, wars against them; whereat the King is much displeased, and severely reproves him.

Sept. —— Edward Villers is sent into Germany; returns to the Count Palatine about the end of the Month.

George Chaworth is sent to the Archdutchess, to condole the Death of Archduke Albert.

The Earl of Arundell is made Earl Marshal of England, with an annual Pension of 2000 l.

Robert Mansfell, Admiral of the English Fleet against the Turkish Pyrates, returns out of the Mediterranean, having done nothing remarkable.

Full Grevil, Lord Brook, is made one of the King's Bedchamber: He resigns his Office of Chancellor of the Exchequer to Richard Weston.

——— Suckling is preferred to be Secretary of State.

Oct. —— ——— Cottington, Agent in Spain, is designed Secretary to the Prince, in the place of Murray.

9. The Pyrates of Algiers take about 35 English and Scotch Ships, in Revenge for the War by Robert Mansfell.

On St. Luke's Day Westminster-Hall was overflowed. ——— My Lord Digby returning from Germany, declares to the King and Council what he had transacted with the Emperor.

A Parliament is called in the end of this Month. ——— Arsennius comes from the United States into England, about the East-India Business.

Nov. —— The Archbishop of Canterbury is declared by the Delegates neither to have incurred the Penalty of Irregularity, nor to have done any Scandal to the Church.

11. Dr. Williams, Keeper of the Great Seal, and Dean of Westminster, was consecrated Bishop of Lincoln, in the Collegiate Church of St. Peter, by the laying on of the Hands of the Bishops of London, Worcester, Ely, Oxford, St. David's, Landaff, delegated by the King's special Authority.

18. Dr. Davenant Bishop of Sarum, Valentine Cary Bishop of Exeter, William Laud Bishop of St. David's, are consecrated in the Chappel of the Bishop of London's Palace; the Bishops of London, ANNO 1621.

1621.

Worcester, Oxford, Ely, and Landaff, laid on their Hands. Nov. 18.

A Tumult in the House of Commons, occasion'd by the Imprisonment of Sir Edwin Sandys; nor was it pacify'd till Secretary Calvert declared his Imprisonment not to be for any thing done in Parliament.

A great Disturbance rose in the Lower House against Recusants; and it was decreed, That they should pay double Subsidies, like Foreigners; forasmuch as they shew'd themselves to be Aliens from the Established Religion, and devoted to the Pope. ——— The same Day a third Subsidy is granted.

The King pardons all Misdemeanor to the Archbishop of Canterbury, if any had been by him committed. 22.

Peter Heymore, and another Member, are sent to Sir Edwin Sandys, to enquire whether or no he was committed to Custody for any thing relating to Parliament. Dec. 4.

A Subsidy granted to be paid in February.

The next Day the King sent a Letter to the Lower House, wherein he sharply reproves them for sending to Sir Edwin Sandys; commands them not to intermeddle in the Arcana Imperii; nor debate concerning the Marriage of his Son; that they should not use reproachful Language against his dear Brother of Spain.

The Commons sent some of their Members to his Majesty, to beg Pardon for their meddling with the Arcana Imperii, or that they had debated concerning the Prince's Marriage with the Infanta of Spain. They inform him concerning the Reasons inducing them thereto. They lay open the imminent impending Evils; and what Remedies ought to be applied, by declaring War against the Pope and King of Spain; and by restraining the Papists in England by more severe Laws; and by relieving the Protestants abroad with larger Contributions. 14.

There happened to be some Misunderstanding between the King and the Commons; whereupon a Protestation is made to defend the Liberties. 21.

The Parliament is prorogued till February, and was as good as dissolved.

The King commands Wright, Clerk to the House of Commons, to deliver in the Journal of the House, that he might the more easily perceive the Grievances of the Commonwealth.

Robert Cotton and Thomas Willson are sent to ransack the Writings of Edward Coke, now committed to the Tower.

ANNO 1622.

1622.

Jan. 6. TOby Mathews being sent for, comes into England, of whose Assistance the King stood in need upon certain Matters.

The Parliament is declared to be dissolved.

The King, accompanied with the Prince, goes to Theobalds: In his Journey he had very like to have been drowned, being thrown off his Horse three Miles from Theobalds.

The Marquess of Buckingham, his Marchioness, and Mother, are confirmed, according to Form, by the Bishop of London.

Robert Philips, who so vigorously opposed the Marriage with the Infanta, is sent to the Tower.

The Earl of Somerset is enlarged from his tedious Imprisonment, and is ordered to be confined at Viscount Wallingford's House.

Edw.

ANNO 1622.

1622.

Jan. ---- Edward Coke is taxed of acting dishonestly in the Earl of Suffolk's Case, by concealing some true Confessions, and obtruding false ones.

Thomas Howard, second Son to Thomas Earl of Suffolk, is created Viscount Andover, and Baron of Charleton: He married the Daughter of William Cecil, the younger Son of the Lord Burleigh.

28. The Earl of Oxford and Francis Steward are sent with some Men of War to intercept some Ships belonging to the States returning from the East-Indies; but they escaped into Zeland.

The King gives an Account, in a Book he published, why he dissolved the Parliament.

Feb. 3. The Earl of Oxford sent out to intercept the East-India Vessels belonging to the States; but they having a favourable Wind, escaped.

The King diverts himself in Hawking at Newmarket.

20. Sir Henry Savil, who had been a good Benefactor to the University of Oxford, and to the whole Republick of Letters, died, much lamented by all Learned Men of the Nation, in the 69th Year of his Age. He was buried at Eaton.

Antonius de Dominis, Archbishop of Spalato, grown weary of the King's Bounty, prepares for his Journey towards Rome, having conceived strange Hopes of convoking a General Council, and of composing Matters of Religion. He came into England Anno 1616, in December.

A Holland Ship returning out of the East-Indies, is taken by Mervin, Vice-Admiral, and Porter, (Brother to Sir Endymion) with abundance of Riches.

Richard Weston, Chancellor of the Exchequer, is sent to the Archdutchess.

Count Gondomar designs to return into Spain; and Viscount Doncaster prepares for his Journey into France.

Mar.--- John Suckling is made one of the Principal Secretaries. ——— Viscount Doncaster is sent into France.

Apr.--- Viscount Swartzenburg came Ambassador into England from the Emperor Ferdinando.

The Earl of Pembroke conducted him by Water from Gravesend to Somerset-House.

8. The Emperor's Ambassador, with his Retinue, is admitted to the King's Presence on Sunday, in the House of Lords, with great Solemnity.

He diverts himself at running at the Ring. —He is again entertained at a splendid Dinner in the Parliament House, and takes his Leave of the King.

18. Swartzenburg sets Sail, and Richard Weston with him; and in another Ship the Archbishop of Spalato to his Vomit.

The Earl of Oxford is thrown into the Tower, for Words unadvisedly let fall against our King and the Spaniard.

27. Mar. Antonius Columna, Governor of Cambray, came Ambassador from the King of Spain, in the place of Count Gondomar.

May 2. Sir William Beecher was sent into Germany, together with my Lord Chichester, accompanied with Hottoman Junior.

Foscarini, who had been Ambassador from the Republick of Venice, was barbarously strangled in Prison, and amongst other things, for communicating some Secrets to the Countess of Arundell.

ANNO 1622.

1622.

Doleful News are brought from the Palatinate, That Tilly, General of the Bavarian Forces, and Gonsalvo the Spaniard, had quite routed the Mansfeld Troops, and had plundered their Camp. In the mean time the States ravage over all Brabant. May--- Oliver St. John, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, returned.

Soubize, of the Duke of Rohan's Family, flies for Refuge into England. June --

Viscount Grandison, and ——— Conway, are chosen into the Privy-Council.

Soubize, that notorious Rebel, came into England, to implore Assistance against his Sovereign; but is rejected.

The Pope, as also the Delegates, would by no means consent that Matrimony should be contracted between the Prince and the Infanta.

A Report runs, That Count Gondomar being returned to Spain, was sent to Prison because he so much promoted the Match. ——— They also write from Italy, That the Infanta was to be married to the Grand Duke of Tuscany.

An Act for importing no Foreign Merchandize, save only in English Bottoms. Aug.---

Arthur Chichester, Baron Belfast, returns from the Emperor. Oct.---

A Proclamation, That all Noblemen should stay at home, and exercise Hospitality amongst their People, under a grievous Penalty. Dec.---

On the last Day of December, Arthur Chichester, Baron of Belfast, is sworn into the Privy-Council of England.

ANNO 1623.

1623.

Jan.--- THE King received Sir Horatio Vere so graciously and thankfully, that, forgetting himself, he stood bare to him.

Feb.-- The Thames ebbs and flows four times in a natural Day, to the great Astonishment of many.

Prince Charles, the Marquess of Buckingham, and a few others, cross over into France.

Henry Rich, Captain of the Life-Guard, is created Baron Rich of Kensington, and was sent into France to Prince Charles.

Mar.--- Dr. Wright, Rector of the Church of Sanneng, is consecrated Bishop of Bristol at Lambeth.

Apr. 10. Bonefires through the whole City, for the prosperous Success of Prince Charles in Spain.

May -- Elizabeth, the Relict of Moyle Finch Knight and Baronet, Daughter and sole Heiress to Thomas Heneage, is created Viscountess Finch of Maidstone in Kent, for her, and her Heirs Male.

The Marquess of St. Germains, the Spanish Ambassador, and the King, swear to certain Articles, which Calvert the Secretary read before them.

On the same Day the Plume of Feathers, the Arms of the Prince of Wales, are struck down by a Flash of Lightning, which some took occasion to interpret as an ill Omen; but God forbid.

Aug.-- England congratulates the happy Return of Prince Charles out of Spain, by making of Bonfires.

By the Fall of the Playhouse in Black-Fryers in London, 81 Persons of Quality were killed.

The End of Camden's Annals.

KING JAMES THE I.st

THE LIFE and REIGN OF JAMES, The First, KING of GREAT BRITAIN.

By * ARTHUR WILSON Esq;

The Author's Picture drawn by Himself.

AS others print their Pictures, I will place
My Mind in Frontispiece, plain as my Face;
And every Line that is here drawn, shall be
To Pencil out my Soul's Physiognomy,
Which on a Radiant Height is fixt. My Brow
Frowns not for these Miscarriages below,
Unless I mean to limit, and confine,
Th' Almighty Wisdom to Conceits of mine.
Yet have no envious Eyes against the Crown,
Nor did I strive to pull the Mitre down;
Both may be good; But when Heads swell, Men say,
The rest of the poor Members pine away,
Like Ricket-Bodies, upwards over-grown,
Which is no wholesome Constitution.
The grave mild Presbyter I could admit,
And am no Foe to th' Independent yet;
For I have levell'd my Intents to be
Subservient unto Reason's Sovereignty;
And none of these State-Passions e'er shall rise
Within my Brain, to Rule, and Tyrannize:
For by Truth's sacred Lamp (which I admire)
My Zeal is kindled, not Fanatick Fire.
But I'll avoid these Vapours, whose swoln Spight,
And foaming Poyson, would put out this Light.
Vain Fuellers? they think (who doth not know it)
Their Light's above't, because their Walk's below it.
Such blazing Lights like Exhalations climb,
Then fall, and their best Matter proves but Slime:
For where conceited Goodness finds no Want,
There Holiness becomes Luxuriant.
Now my great Trouble is, that I have shown
Other Mens Faults, with so many of my own;
And all my Care shall be, to shake off quite
The Old Man's Load, for him whose Burthen's light,
And grow to a full Stature, till I be
Form'd like to Christ, or Christ be form'd in me.
Such Pieces are grav'd by a Hand Divine:
For which, I'll give my God this Heart of mine.

Contemnit linguas vita probanda malas.

An. Reg. 1. An. Christi 1603.

THE various Hand of Time began now to sheath the Sword of War, that had been long disputing the Controversy, which Religion and Policy (that Princes mix together) had for many Years so fiercely maintained. The wearing out of that old, but glorious, and most happy Piece of Sovereignty, the late Queen, bating the Spanish Violence, and ending with the Irish Rebellion, and Submission of Tirone, as if the old Genius of Iron-handed War were departed, and a new one crowned with a Palm of Peace, had taken Possession of the English Nation; James VI. King of Scotland, was proclaimed King of England. For tho' Princes that find here a mortal Felicity, love not the Noise of a Successor in their Life-time, yet they are willing (for the Peace of their People) to have one, when they can hear no more of it. That which the Queen could not endure from others, she was well pleased to express her self, and bequeath in her last

An. Reg. 1. An. Christi 1603.

* The Author Arthur Wilson was a Native of Suffolk, of a good Family. He was bred up at Trinity-College in Oxford, where he commenced Master of Arts in 1633. Some Years after he travelled thro' Spain, Germany, Italy and France, with Robert Devereux the last Earl of Essex of that Name, who had a particular Friendship for him, that lasted till that Noble Earl's Death. It was in his Company, and thro' his Acquaintance, that Mr. Wilson became perfectly well inform'd in all the material Transactions of King James's Reign: And it was the Earl of Essex that first put him upon writing the History of it; wherein he had the Use and Perusal of a great many Papers of that Earl's, and of his Father's fast Friend and Fellow-Sufferer the Earl of Southampton, who were both near Spectators, and sometimes Actors in the Affairs of that time.

Tho'

An. Reg. 1. An. Christi 1603.

last Will, as a Legacy to this, then happy Nation. He was thirty six Years of Age when he came to the Crown. How dangerous the Passage had been from his very Infancy to his Middle Age, is not only written in many Histories, but the untamed and untractable Spirits of most of that Nation are a sufficient Witness and Record. The wise Queen found many petty Titles, but none of that Power: Any other Hand that should have reached for the Crown, might a caught a Cloud of Confusion; and those Supporters, and Props, that held up her Greatness, (loth to submit to Equals) made Scaffolds to his Triumphs. In the Wane, or last Quarter of the late Queen, the Court-Motions tended (by an oblique Aspect) towards this Northern Star; and some of her great Council, in her Presence, would glance at the King of Scots as her Successor, which would make her break into Passion, saying, Was this imputed to Essex as a Crime, and is it less in you? Yea, Cecil himself held his Correspondencies, which he was once like to be trapt in. For the Queen taking the Air upon Black-Heath by Greenwich, a Post summoned her to enquire from what Quarter his Business came; and hearing from Scotland, she staid her Coach to receive the Packet: But the Secretary, Sir Robert Cecil, (being in the Coach with her) fearful that some of his secret Conveyances might be discovered, having an active Wit, calls for a Knife suddenly to open it, lest Puts-off, and Delays, might beget Suspicion; and when he came to cut it, he told the Queen, It looked and smelt ill-favouredly, coming out of many nasty Budgets, and was fit to be opened, and aired before she saw it; which Reason meeting with her Disaffection to ill Scents, hindred her smelling out his underhand Contrivances.

Secretary Cecil proclaims King James.

But now he may do it openly, for he was the first that publickly Read, and Proclaimed the late Queen's Will; Posts are sent in haste, yet in so calm and quiet a manner, as if the Loss of so precious a Mistress had stupified the People. And now the great Ones strive who shall be most obsequious, and court their happy Hopes. That Party that had been opposite to the late Earl of Essex (whose Death, as some thought, shortned the Queen's Life) strove to ingratiate themselves, by suppressing them that had any Relation to him; assuring the King, (that always counted him his Martyr) that he aimed at the Crown himself; and Princes apt to be jealous soon take such Impressions. And now I have stirred the Ashes of great Essex, I must revive his Memory with this short Character; for Reports flying upon the airy Wing of the Times, have variously exalted or depressed him, as the serene for him, or the cloudy Fancy against him, waved up and down. He had a gallant and noble Spirit, full of Urbanity and innate Courtesy, which too much took the popular Eye; and being a great Ingrosser of Fame, it procured him many Enemies, which made his Spirit boil into Passion, and that was more suitable to his Enemies Designs than his own; for they lighted their Candle by his Fire, and this Heat being blown by some fiery Spirits about him, gave to the Goodness of his Nature a Tincture of Revenge, which his Enemies made reflect upon the Queen; so that the Coal he strove to bring to burn his Enemies Nests, kindled his own Funeral Pile.

But our King coming through the North, (Banquetting and Feasting by the way) the Applause of the People in so obsequious and submissive a manner (still admiring Change) was checked by an honest plain Scotsman, (unused to hear such humble Acclamations) with a Prophetical Expression; This People will spoil a gud King. The King as unused, so tired with Multitudes, especially in his Hunting, (which he did as he went) caused an Inhibition to be published, to restrain the People from Hunting him. Happily being fearful of so great a Concourse, as this Novelty produced, the old Hatred betwixt the Borderers not yet forgotten, might make him apprehend it to be of a greater Extent; tho' it was generally imputed to a Desire of enjoying his Recreations without Interruption.

The King comes to Theobalds.

At Theobalds, Secretary Cecil's House, the Lord Chancellor Egerton, the Lord Buckhurst Treasurer, the Earl of Nottingham Admiral, and others of the Council to the deceased Queen, met him; and they with him found the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Marr, the Lord Hume, and the Lord Kinloss. These, with others, were made of his Privy-Council. The Bishops forgot not to strengthen themselves, and their Party, against their Opposites, the Nonconformists, who had gotten new Courage upon their Hopes of the

---

Tho' our Author was thus well furnished with what was necessary towards writing the History of King James's Reign, it must be owned, he has done it with an Air of Prejudice, if not, in some Places, of Rancour; which may in part be attributed to his Friendship to his Patron the Earl of Essex; and his Resentments of the Injuries done to that Nobleman by King James and his Favourites; and more particularly by Somerset in the Affair of his Lady, which its no wonder the Earl nor his Friends could never forget.

As to the Style of this History, it's harsh and broken, the Periods often obscure, and sometimes without just Connexion, Faults that were frequent in most of the Writers of that time.

Tho' he finished this History about the Year 1652, when both the Monarchy and Hierarchy were overturn'd, it does not appear he was Enemy to either: On the contrary, In the Picture he draws of himself before the Book, he is so far from pretending Merit for his Activeness in these Matters, a thing usual in Writers of that time, that he values himself for having no hand in pulling down the Mitre and the Crown, which was not the way to make his Court to the Powers then in being.

But nothing could inhance the Value of this History more, than a most wretched one published in Answer to it, by one William Sanderson, intitled, [A Compleat History of Queen Mary of Scotland, and her Son King James of Great Britain.] This Man pretends in several Places to some Secret Memoirs or Discourses with great Men, to make good the Passages of his History: But the Truth is, the whole is nothing else but an ill compiled Collection out of other Authors; wherein he for the most part mistakes or perverts their Meaning. In cursorily reading this History, I have sometimes taken notice of above Four or Five gross Errors, either in Names, Things, or Chronology, in one single Page. And for one Instance among many thousand others, he commits two remarkable Blunders in the compass of a few Lines of his Introduction, saying, That Queen Mary Stuart had Two Brothers that died several Years before their Father, whereas they died but a few Days: And then saying, That upon her Arrival from France she found her State mightily distemper'd under the Protection of the Bastard James and Murray's Government; as if it had not been one and the same Person that was first called Bastard James, and afterwards Earl of Murray; tho' this last Title was not conferred upon him till some Years after.

To return to our Author Wilson: He died at the Earl of Warwick's Seat in Essex about the Year 1653. And we have the following Character of him in Anthony a Wood's Athenæ Oxonienses, who hated his Principles, and seldom spoke well of any one of that Kidney: He was (says he) well skilled in the Mathematicks, Poetry, History, and the Laws of England: His Carriage was very courtly and obliging; and such as became a well bred Gentleman: And tho' he had laid up Materials for his History some time before, he did not perfect it till a little before his Death.

King's

An. Reg. 1. An. Christi 1603.

King's Compliance with them; and the King, to please both sides, went in a smooth way, betwixt them, at first, not leaving out the third Party, the Popish, the most dangerous, whom he closed with also, by entertaining into his Councils, the Lord Thomas Howard, and the Lord Henry Howard, the one Son, the other Brother, to the late Duke of Norfolk, who would have been his Father, but became a Sufferer for his Mother: The one a plain-hearted Man; the other of a subtile and fine Wit, of great Reading and Knowledge, excellent for outward Courtship, famous for secret Insinuation and cunning Flattery: The first a suspected, (though it was otherwise) the last a known Papist, bred up so from his Infancy, yet then converted (as he pretended) by the King, being the closest way to work his own Ends. On these he heaped Honours, making his Son Earl of Suffolk, and his Brother Earl of Northampton. And this Gentleness of the King to the Popish Party, was so pleasant to them, that they sucked in the sweet Hopes of Alteration in Religion, and drunk so deep thereof, that they were almost intoxicated.

Changes beget Hopes.

Now every Man that had but a spark of Hope, struck fire to light himself in the way to Advancement, though it were to the Consumption both of his Estate and Being. The Court being a kind of Lottery, where Men that venture much may draw a Blank, and such as have little may get a Prize. Those whose Hopes were almost quenched, like Water cast upon Lime, burn inward, till it breaks out into Flame; so hard it is for uncomposed Spirits (missing their Aims) to settle upon the Basis of solid Reason. The Earl of Southampton, covered long with the Ashes of great Essex's Ruins, was sent for from the Tower; and the King looked upon him with a smiling Countenance, though displeasing happily to the new Baron of Essingdon, Sir Robert Cecil; yet it was much more to the Lords, Cobham and Grey, and Sir Walter Raleigh, who were forbidden their Attendance. This Damp upon them, being Spirits full of Acrimony, made them break into Murmur, then into Conspiracy, associating themselves with two Romish Priests (Men that could not live upon lingring Hopes) and other discontented Persons, which every Change produces. The Ground of the Design was to set up the Lady Arabella, (a Branch sprung from the same Stem by another Line) and to alter Religion and Government; disposing already to themselves the principal Places of Honour and Profit. The Lord Grey should get Leave to transport two Thousand Men into Holland, with whom he should seize upon the King and Prince; Sir Walter Raleigh was to treat with Count Arembergh for procuring of Moneys; and Cobham to go to the Archduke and the King of Spain, to persuade their Assistance. This Embrion proved Abortive, and they brought their Plea to excuse their attempting it as compleat a one: That the King was not yet Crown'd. * The Arraignment was at Winchester, where strong Proofs meeting weak Denials, they, with others, were found Guilty of High Treason. George Brook, the Lord Cobham's Brother, and the two Priests, suffered for it, the rest found Mercy; the King being loth to soil the first Steps to his Crown with more Blood. But their Pardon carried them to the Tower, where the Lord Grey some Years after died, and in his Death extinguished his Family. The Lord Cobham, Sir Griffin Markham, and others, discharged of Imprisonment, lived miserable and poor, Cobham at home, and the rest abroad. And Raleigh, while he was a Prisoner, having the Idea of the World in his Contemplation, brought it to some Perfection, in his excellent and incomparable History; but when Liberty turned it to Action, it taught him to roam, so, as the Event proved fatal to him.

A Conspiracy against the King.

A Censure upon it.

This Conspiracy put on such a Face, that few or none could discover, or know what to make of it: That the muddy Waters were stirred, was apparent, but it was with such a Mixture, that little could be visible in it. The Lord Grey, Cobham, and Sir Walter Raleigh, were Protestants; Why should they strive to alter Religion, though the Priests, Markham, Brinham, and others might? But it seems they joined together in a Politick way, every one intending his own Ends; Discontent being the Groundwork upon which they built this slight Superstructure, that being huddled together, could not stand long. Raleigh's great Accuser, was a † Letter of Cobham's, which some say after he denied to be his Hand. Some of the Conspirators (it may be) desired to seem formidable, venting their Anger so for being slighted; others strove to make themselves so, that they might have the Glory of enlarging the Roman Power; and they join'd together, thinking their single Strength would not prevail. In this Cloud looking for Juno, they begot a Monster, which having neither Head nor Foot, some part lived, the other died ‖.

While

* Upon their Tryal, Sir Walter Raleigh denying the Fact, pleaded, That tho' it were proved, it could not amount to Treason against King James, being done in the Reign of the late Queen; and no Acts of Parliament made to entail the Crown upon him after her Death.

† Raleigh denied the Letter to be his Hand, but Cobham owned it at first, and afterwards denied it.

‖ This Conspiracy of Sir Walter Raleigh's is variously represented by the Historians and Writers of that Time, but acknowledged by all of them to have been a Riddle of State. I have seen most of the Accounts that have been published on this Subject, and from them, and from some Sheets of Cecil Earl of Salisbury, and a Manuscript of one Buck, who it seems was Secretary to Chancellor Egerton, I take the Case to have been this:

The Earl of Salisbury and Sir Walter Raleigh had been open and declar'd Enemies of the unhappy Earl of Essex, and the chief Promoters of his Ruin: Tho' King James could easily digest the Death of Queen Mary Stuart his Mother, it is notoriously known he never heartily forgave any of Essex's Enemies; which both Cecil and Raleigh were aware of, but took contrary Measures to avoid his Resentment. Raleigh trusting in the Justice of his Procedure in that Affair, made no Steps towards the making his Peace with her Successor, contenting himself with the Favour of that Mistress had raised him, which he enjoy'd to her Death. On the contrary, Cecil, by the Mediation of Hume, that was afterwards Earl of Dunbar, had been long before entirely reconciled to King James, had done him important Services, and kept a Correspondence with him, while Queen Elizabeth was alive.

When King James came into England, Cecil was not only continued in his Places, but, contrary to all Mens Expectations, was indeed made the First Minister of State, and Raleigh neglected. The latter knowing the former to be at least equally concern'd with him in the Fall of Essex, his great Mind could not bear the Distinction made between them by their new Master; and the rather, that Cecil acted the Courtier, in frowning upon his old Friend and Acquaintance, and giving him fresh Mortifications upon every Occasion.

In Buck's Manuscript there is mentioned a Memorial of Raleigh's to King James, wherein he reflects heavily upon Cecil in the Matter of Essex, and vindicating himself, throws the whole Blame upon the other. At the end of that Memorial,

An. Reg. 1.
An. Christi 1603.

While these were provoked with Neglects, others were encouraged with Favours: Many of the Gentry that came out of Scotland with the King were advanced to Honours, as well as those he found here, to shew the Northern Soil as fruitful that way as the Southern: But Knights swarmed in every Corner; the Sword ranged about, and Men bowed in Obedience to it, more in Peace than in War: This Airy Title blew up many a fair Estate. The Scots naturally, by long Converse, affecting the French Vanity, drew on a Garb of Gallantry, (meeting with a plentiful Soil, and an open-handed Prince.) The English, excellent for Imitation, loth to be exceeded in their own Country, maintained their Follies at their own Charge. All this came accompanied with a great Plague, which happened this Year in London, whereof above thirty Thousand died: Yet who will not venture for a Crown; for in the Heat of it, on the 25th of July, being the Day dedicated to St. James, the King, with his Wife Queen Anne, were both crown'd at Westminster, fulfilling that old Prophecy, or rather Fancy, current among the Scots, (as they report) before Edward the First brought the Royal Chair out of Scotland, with the Stone in it, and placed it at Westminster to crown our Kings in; which Stone some old Saws deliver to be the same that Jacob rested his Head on.

The King and Queen crowned.

Ni fallat Fatum
Scoti hunc quocunque locatum
Invenient Lapidem,
Regnare tenentur ibidem.

Englished:

Fate hath design'd,
That wheresoe'er this Stone
The Scots shall find,
There they shall hold the Throne.

But how the Stream of Time runs through the Channel of these Prophetical Fancies, Experience shews: For, 'tis true, if the Scots came so near the Throne, as to enjoy the Stone or Chair where the English Kings are inaugurated, they may hold the Crown: But being only grounded upon Conjecture, these Conceits are commonly made up before they are half moulded, or, like Abortives, are shaped after they are born.

When these Ceremonies were past, the King retired from this Croud of Infection, gave some Admission to Ambassadors, that from all the neighbouring Princes and States came to congratulate this happy Inauguration: For, besides the ordinary Ceremony among Princes, their Reason might tell them, That if his Predecessors were able to grapple with the growing Monarchy of him that coveted to be Universal, and to assist and relieve her Neighbours and Confederates from his Oppression, he would be much more formidable, bringing with him, if nothing else, Bodies of Men, warlike and industrious, hardned with Cold and Labour, and active in the difficultest Attempts, (however of late, by what Divine Judgment I know not, utterly disheartned) to be Helpers, who were formerly Hinderers, to all the English Expeditions; so that in him they courted their own Conveniencies: For certainly, if ever the English Monarchy were in its true Glory and Greatness, it was by this Union. But there is a Period set to all Empires.

The Prince, a little before this, was installed Knight of the Garter, the Earl of Southampton and the young Earl of Essex were restored to the Right of Blood and Inheritance, and Honours were conferred so thick, as if the King intended a new kind of Conquest, by a Proceeding that tended to their and his own Ruin: For, to subdue the Greatness of the Nobility, (who formerly could sweep such a Party of People to them, with their long Trains and Dependencies, that they were able to grapple with Kings,) he, by a Multiplicity of them, made them cheap and invalid in the vulgar Opinion; for nothing is more destructive to Monarchy than lessening the Nobility: Upon their Decline the Commons rise, and Anarchy increases.

Prince Henry made Knight of the Garter.

And now the old Irish Rebel Tirone coming over, (led by his Conqueror the Lord Montjoy) had not only Pardon, but Civilities, and all outward Expressions to gain him; the Edge of the Peoples Hatred being abated by a Proclamation, that no Man should shew him the least Disrespect. The Lord Montjoy, as a Reward for his good Service, was created Earl of Devonshire: And having given way to Creations, they brake in upon us like a Deluge. The King being an inexhaustible Fountain of Honour, cannot be drain'd dry, when other Means of gratifying his Servants may fail. Those he brought with him wanted Means more than Honour; those he found here wanted Honour more than Means: He could and did supply both to Excess. Sir Robert Cecil, the first English Trumpet that proclaimed him, was made Baron of Essingdon, and soon after Viscount Cranborn, and Earl of Salisbury; Sir Robert Sidney Baron of Penshurst, and not long after Viscount Lisle; Sir William Knowles Baron of Grayes, Sir Edward Wotton Baron of Morley, Sir Thomas Egerton (Lord Chancellor) Baron of Elsmere, Sir William Russel Baron of Thornaugh, Sir Henry Grey Baron of Grobie, Sir John Petre Baron of Writtle, Sir John Harington Baron of Exton, Sir Henry D'Anvers Baron of Dantsey, Sir Thomas Gerrard Baron of Gerrard-Bromley, Sir Robert Spencer Baron of Worm-Leighton: The Lord Buckhurst (Lord Treasurer) he made Earl of Dorset; and his old Servant, Sir George Hume, Earl of Dunbar. These, with Suffolk and Northampton, were Nobles of the finest Metal, and first Stamp; and most of them he placed as Jewels about his Tirone comes over.

Noblemen created.

Memorial, he lays open the Conduct of Cecil and his Father the Lord Burleigh, in the Matter of Queen Mary Stuart, and, with a singular Bitterness of Stile, not only vindicates the Memory of Queen Elizabeth, but lays the Death of that unfortunate Queen chiefly at the Door of Cecil and his Father; for which he appeals to Davison, then in Prison, the Man that had dispatched the Warrant for her Execution, contrary to Queen Elizabeth's express Command.

All this had no Influence on King James, and irritated Cecil the more against Raleigh; which helped to sour a Temper that of it self was impatient of Injuries, and for all his other excellent Qualities, was not fitted for this Reverse of Fortune.

This brought him into the Acquaintance and Familiarity of other Men, as discontented as himself, though of different Religions and Interests; and occasion'd probably more Discourses than one, of having Recourse to Foreign Powers to mend their present Fortunes. It's also not unlikely, that the Lady Arabella's Name might, upon these Occasions, be mentioned by Sir Walter Raleigh, as one that had a near Title to the Crown: But that he ever enter'd into any form'd Design of altering the Establish'd Religion (as was said at his Tryal) no body then nor since did ever believe.

Throne:

An. Reg. 1. An. Christi 1603.

Throne: But these were but as an Essay; for they after grew to such a Volume, that some unhappy Fancy pasted up a Pasquil in St. Paul's, wherein he pretended an Art to help weak Memories to a competent Knowledge of the Names of the Nobility.

Reformation in the Church fought for.

As the Papist was different from the Protestant Religion on one side, so was the Puritan (as they then called pious and good Men) on the other; both which were active to attain their own Ends: And the King had the Command of himself, not bitterly to oppose, but gently to sweeten their Hopes for his; thinking himself unsecure betwixt them. The latter were now sollicitous for a more clear Reformation. This the Bishops opposed, as trenching too much upon them; and the King listen'd to (having Experience of it in Scotland) how much it had encroach'd upon him; For he thought their dissenting from the Established Government of the Church, was but to get that Power into a great many Men's Hands, which was now but in one; and that one had Dependance upon him, with whom he might better grapple. The Prelates distilling this Maxim into the King, No Bishop, no Monarch; so strengthening the Mitre by the same Power that upholds the Crown: Yet, to satisfy the Importunity, a Conference‖ is appointed at Hampton-Court, where the Bishops Opponents, Dr. Reynolds, Dr. Sparks, Mr. Knewstubs, and Mr. Chadderton, Men eminent in Learning and Piety in themselves, as well as in the Opinion of the People, did desire, in the Name of the rest of their Party, That the Doctrine of the Church might be preserved in Purity; That good and faithful Pastors might be planted in all Churches; That Church-Government might be sincerely administred; That the Book of Common-Prayer might be fitted to more Encrease of Godliness. Out of some of these Particulars, they insisted upon the Bishops Power of Confirmation; which they would have every Minister capable of in his own Parish. They disputed against the Cross in Baptism, the Ring in Marriage, the Surplice, the Oath ex Officio, and other things that stuck with them; which they hoped to get all purged away, because the King was of a Northern Constitution, where no such things were practised, not yet having felt the King's Pulse, whom the Southern Air of the Bishops Breaths had so wrought upon, that he himself answers most of their Demands, sometimes gently, applying Lenitives, where he found Ingenuity, (for he was Learned and Eloquent,) other times Corrosives, telling them these Oppositions proceeded more from Stubborness in Opinion, than Tenderness of Conscience; and so, betwixt his Arguments and Kingly Authority, menaced them to a Conformity, which prov'd a way of silencing them for the present, (and some of them were content to acquiesce for the future; and the King manag'd this Discourse with such Power, (which they expected not from him, and therefore more danted at,) that Whitgift, Archbishop of Canterbury, (though a holy grave and Pious Man) highly pleas'd with it, with a sugred Bait (which Princes are apt enough to swallow) said, He was verily perswaded, that the King spake by the Spirit of God.

Conference at Hampton-Court.

Archbishop Whitgift dies.

This Conference was on the 14th of January; and this good Man expir'd the 29th of February following, in David's Fulness of Days, leaving a Name like a sweet Perfume behind him. *And Bancroft, a sturdy Piece, succeeded him, but not with the same Spirit; for what Whitgift strove to do with Sweetness and Gentleness, Bancroft did persevere in with Rigour and Severity. Thus the Bishops having gotten the Victory, strove to maintain it; and though not on the suddain, yet by degrees, they press so hard upon the Nonconformists, (whom they held under the Yoke of a Law) that many of them are forc'd to seek Foreign Refuge. They prevail'd not only for themselves here, but by their Means (not long after) the King look'd back into Scotland, and put the Keys there again into the Bishops Hands, unlocking the Passage to the Enjoyment of their Temporal Estates; which swell'd them so high, that in his Son's Time, the Women of Scotland pull'd them out of their tottering Seats.

On the other side, the late Conspiracy of Cobham and Grey had so chilled the King's Blood, that he begins to take notice of the Swarms of Priests that flock'd into the Kingdom: For though the Conspirators were of several Religions, yet in their Correspondence with Foreign Princes, Religion was the Pretence. For in every Alteration of Kingdoms, few are so modest but they will throw in the Hook of their vain Hopes, thinking to get something in the troubled Stream. The Jesuits were not slack (coming with the Seal of the Fisher) in spreading their Nets; but a Proclamation broke through them. The King being contented to let them alone, till they came too near him, willing to comply rather than exasperate; the Safety of his own Person made him look to the Safety of Religion; and to secure both, he found this the best Remedy, declaring to all the World the Cause of this Restriction.

A Proclamation against Jesuits.

†'Having (after some time spent in settling 'the Politick Affairs of this Realm) of late be-'stowed no small Labour in composing certain 'Differences We found among Our Clergy, 'about Rites and Ceremonies heretofore Esta-'blished in this Church of England, and reduc'd 'the same to such an Order and Form, as We 'doubt not but every Spirit, that is led only 'with Piety, and not with Humour, should be 'therein satisfied; it appeared unto Us, in de-'bating these Matters, that a greater Conta-'gion to Our Religion then could proceed from 'these light Differences was eminent, by Per-'sons common Enemies to them both, namely 'the great Numbers of Priests, both Semina-'ries and Jesuits, abounding in this Realm, as 'well of such as were here before Our coming 'to the Crown, as of such as have resorted

‖ This Conference at Hampton-Court was but a Blind to introduce Episcopacy in Scotland, all the Scotch Noblemen then at Court being design'd to be present, and others, both Noblemen and Ministers, being call'd up from Scotland to assist at it, by the King's Letter.

* The Character the Author gives of these two Prelates agrees with them exactly; and there hardly can be found a nearer Parallel then between them and two of their next Successors in the See of Canterbury; Archbishop Abbot, that succeeded Bancroft, imitating the Moderation of Whitgift; and Laud, that succeeded him, the Warmth of Bancroft.

† This seeming or real Severity of King James against the Jesuits and other Seminary Priests of the Romish Church, seems to me to have been in a great part owing to the frequent Representations made to him by Henry IV. of France, and his First Minister Monsieur de Rosny, afterwards made Duke of Sully; for in the Memoires of the latter, there is Mention made of several Intimations given by him to King James and his Ministers, of the Designs of the Missioners in England to disturb the Quiet of his Reign.

An. Reg. 1. An. Chriſti 1603.

'hither ſince, uſing their Functions and Profeſ-'ſions with greater Liberty than heretofore they 'durſt have done; partly upon a vain Confi-'dence of ſome Innovation in Matters of Reli-'gion, to be done by Us, which We never in-'tended, nor gave any Man Cauſe to ſuſpect, 'and partly from the Aſſurance of Our gene-'ral Pardon, granted according to the Cuſtom 'of Our Progenitors, at Our Coronation, for 'Offences paſt in the Days of the late Queen, 'which Pardons many of the ſaid Prieſts have 'procur'd under our Great Seal; and holding 'themſelves thereby free from Danger of the 'Laws, do with great Audacity exerciſe all 'Offices of their Profeſſion, both ſaying Maſſes, 'and perſwading Our Subjects from the Reli-'gion Eſtabliſhed, reconciling them to the 'Church of Rome, and by conſequence ſedu-'cing them from their Duty and Obedience to 'Us. Wherefore We hold Our ſelf obliged, 'both in Conſcience and Wiſdom, to uſe all 'good Means to keep Our Subjects from being 'affected with ſuperſtitious Opinions, which 'are not only pernicious to their own Souls, 'but the ready way to corrupt their Duty and 'Allegiance; which cannot be any way ſo 'ſafely performed, as by keeping from them the 'Inſtruments of that Infection, which are 'Prieſts of all Sorts, ordain'd in Foreign Parts, 'by Authority prohibited by the Laws of the 'Land; concerning whom, therefore We have 'thought fit to publiſh to all Our Subjects this 'open Declaration of Our Pleaſure, &c. wil-'ling and commanding all manner of Jeſuits, 'Seminaries, and other Prieſts whatſoever, ha-'ving Ordination from any Authority by the 'Laws of this Realm prohibited, to take Notice, 'That Our Pleaſure is, that they do, before the '19th of March next, depart forth of Our 'Realm and Dominions. And to that purpoſe 'it ſhall be lawful for all Officers of Our Ports, 'to ſuffer the ſaid Prieſts to depart into Foreign 'Parts, between this and the ſaid 19th Day of 'March; admoniſhing and aſſuring all ſuch Je-'ſuits, Seminaries, and Prieſts, of what Sort 'ſoever, That if any of them after the ſaid 'time ſhall be taken within this Realm, or any 'of Our Dominions, or departing now upon 'this Our Pleaſure ſignified, ſhall hereafter 'return into this Our Realm, or any of Our 'Dominions again, they ſhall be left to the Pe-'nalty of the Laws here being in Force con-'cerning them, without Hope of any Favour 'or Remiſſion from Us, &c. Which though, 'perhaps, it may appear to ſome a great Seve-'verity towards that Sort of Our Subjects, yet 'doubt We not when it ſhall be conſider'd with 'indifferent Judgment, what Cauſe hath mo[ved] 'Us to uſe this Providence, all Men will juſti-'fy Us therein. For to whom it is unknown 'into what Peril Our Perſon was like to be 'drawn, and Our Realm into Confuſion, not 'many Months ſince by Conſpiracy, firſt con-'ceived by Perſons of that Sort; which when 'other Princes ſhall duly obſerve, We aſſure 'Our ſelves they will no way conceive, that 'this Alteration proceedeth from any Change 'of Diſpoſition, but out of Providence, to 'prevent the Perils otherwiſe inevitable; con-'ſidering their abſolute Submiſſion to Foreign 'Juriſdiction at their firſt taking Orders, doth 'leave ſo conditional an Authority to Kings 'over their Subjects, as the ſame Power by 'which they were made, may diſpenſe at Plea-'ſure with the ſtricteſt Bond of Loyalty and 'Love between a King and his People.

* 'Among which Foreign Powers, though 'We acknowledge Our ſelf perſonally ſo much 'beholden to the now Biſhop of Rome, for his 'kind Offices and private temporal Carriages to-'wards Us, in many things, as We ſhall be ever 'ready to requite the ſame towards him, (as 'Biſhop of Rome, in State and Condition of a 'Secular Prince) yet when We conſider and 'obſerve the Courſe and Claim of that See, 'We have no Reaſon to imagine that Princes 'of our Religion and Profeſſion can expect 'any Aſſurance long to continue, unleſs it 'might be aſſented by Mediation of other 'Chriſtian Princes, that ſome good Courſe 'might be taken (by a General Council, free 'and lawfully called) to pluck up thoſe Roots 'of Dangers and Jealouſies which ariſe about 'Religion, as well between Prince and Prince, 'as between them and their Subjects; and to 'make it manifeſt, that no State or Potentate 'either hath or can challenge Power to diſpoſe 'of Earthly Kingdoms or Monarchies, or to 'diſpence with Subjects Obedience to their Na-'tural Sovereigns: In which charitable Action 'there is no Prince living that will be readier 'than We ſhall be to concur, even to the utter-'moſt of Our Power, not only out of particu-'lar Diſpoſition to live peaceably with all States 'and Princes of Chriſtendom, but becauſe ſuch 'a ſettled Amity might (by an Union in Reli-'gion) be eſtabliſhed among Chriſtian Princes, 'as might enable Us all to reſiſt the Common 'Enemy.

Given at Our Palace at Weſtminſter the Two and twentieth Day of February, in the Firſt Year of Our Reign, &c.

* This cautious Manner of King James, his mentioning the then Biſhop of Rome, and the kind Offices he had receiv'd from him, helps to ſet in ſome clearer Light that dark Affair of his Letter to the Pope, when he was but King of the Scots; and which his Scotch Secretary Balmerino, took wiſely upon himſelf.

It's certain King James was willing to have the Pope his Friend, in order to facilitate his Succeſſion to the Crown of England; and it's as certain they had for a long time at Rome Hopes of his Converſion, which Secret Cardinal Bellarmine ſome time after blab'd out; and thereupon put King James to the Neceſſity of laying the Blame on Balmerino.

Bellarmine, in his Anſwer to a Book of King James, took the Freedom to accuſe him of Inconſtancy, and reproach'd him with a Letter of his to Pope Clement VIII. from Scotland, wherein he had recommended to his Holineſs the Biſhop of Vaiſon for a Cardinals Hat; that ſo he might be better able to advance his Affairs in the Court of Rome.

Queen Elizabeth had got Notice of this Letter the very Year it was ſent, and had expoſtulated with King James about it in Terms bitter enough. King James utterly deny'd it, and ſent one Drummond to her, that was ſaid to have carry'd it, who deny'd his Knowledge of any ſuch Letter with the ſolemneſt Oaths. The Matter lay aſleep ever after, till this Book of Cardinal Bellarmine's came out; and poor Balmerino was oblig'd either to take the whole Blame of it upon himſelf, upon Hopes, or rather Aſſurance, of a Pardon, or elſe to loſe his Head for High Treaſon, which the Counter-ſigning of that Letter amounted to by the Laws of his Country.

It was pretty comical to ſee King James expreſs his Abhorrence of correſponding with the Pope, or of giving him the Title of Holineſs, and that both at the Council Board in England, and in his Letter to the Scotch Council, when ſome Years after he made no ſcruple about it, on the Buſineſs of the Spaniſh Match. It's likewiſe remarkable, that Balmerino liv'd to his dying Day in an eaſy Retreat, poſſeſſed of his whole Fortune, and had the Honour of ſeveral Letters from a Maſter it was pretended he had diſobliged in ſo tender a Point.

An. Reg. 1. An. Christi 1603.

This did something allay the Heat and Hopes of the Jesuits, and their Correspondents; but it made way for dark, and more secret Contrivances, which afterwards they put in Practice.

A Proclamation for Uniformity.

On the contrary, another Proclamation came out for Uniformity in Religion according to the Law established, to reduce those to Conformity that had not received Satisfaction at the last Conference. The Bishops thought themselves unsecure, while so many Opposites (unblameable in their Conversations) by their Pens and Preaching gain'd upon the People, striking at the very Root of Hierarchy, that it was a hard Question, whether the Jesuits, whose Principles would advance their Greatness, or these that would pluck it down, were most Odious to them? And now Proclamations are the activest Agents; some go abroad to please the People, some the King. All Monopolies (like Diseases) that crept in, when the good old Queen had not strength enough to keep them out, must be purged away; and such Protections as Licentious Liberty had granted to hinder Proceedings in Law, must be taken off: Saltpetre-men, that will dig up any Man's House by Authority, (where they are not well fee'd) must be restrain'd; and Purveyors, Cart-takers, and such insolent Officers as were Grievances to the People, must be cryed down by Proclamation. A Prince that is invited, or comes newly to a Kingdom, must have his Chariot-Wheels smooth shod. And yet the Liberty of Hunting must be forbidden, the King's Game preserv'd, and a strict Proclamation threatens the Disobeyers. Indeed, take this King's Reign from the beginning to the end, and you shall find Proclamations current Coin; and the People took them for good Payment a great while, 'till the Multitude of them lessened their Valuation.

A Sermon against Ceremonies.

The Bishops could not be so wary, but some Courtier or other would commend a Preacher to the King, if they knew any of excellent Parts; so that some Preached before him that were averse to the Bishop's ways. Among the rest, one Mr. Burges, an excellent Preacher, and a pious Man, moderately touching upon the Ceremonies, said, 'They were like the Roman 'Senator's Glasses, which were not worth a 'Man's Life or Livelihood: For (saith he) this 'Senator invited Augustus Cæsar to a Dinner; 'and as he was coming to the Feast, he heard 'a horrid Out-cry, and saw some Company 'drawing a Man after them, that made that 'Noise: The Emperor demanded the Cause of 'that Violence; it was answer'd, Their Master 'had condemned this Man to the Fish-ponds 'for breaking a Glass, which he set a high Va'lue and Esteem upon. Cæsar commanded a 'stay of the Execution; and when he came to 'the House, he asked the Senator, Whether he 'had Glasses worth a Man's Life? Who answer'd, '(being a great Lover of such Things) That he 'had Glasses he valued at the Price of a Pro'vince. Let me see them (saith Augustus), and 'he brought him up to a Room well furnish'd. 'The Emperor saw them Beautiful to the Eye, 'but knew withal they might be the Cause of 'much Mischief: Therefore he broke them all 'with this Expression, Better all these perish than 'one Man. I will leave it (saith he) to Your Majesty to apply. But the Bishops got this and some other things against him by the end, and silenc'd him for venting any more such Comparisons. So that for many Years after he practised Physick, and grew an excellent Physician. But upon second Considerations he was admitted again to Preach, retaining both his Piety and Integrity, (tho' he writ a Book for the moderate Use of the Ceremonies) ending his Days in a good old Age, at Sutton-Cofield in Warwickshire, after a Journey into the Palatinate, as shall be express'd in its time.

The 5th of August made Holiday.

The 5th of August this Year had a new Title given to it. The King's Deliveries in the North must resound here. * Whether the Gowries attempted upon the King's Person, or the King on theirs, is variously reported. It may be, he retain'd something of his Predecessor, and great Parent, Henry the Seventh, that made Religion give way to Policy, oftentimes cursing and thundring out the Church's Fulminations against his own Ministers, that they might be receiv'd with the more intimate Familiarity with his Foreign Enemies, for the better Discovery of their Designs. I will not say the Celebration of this Holiday had so much Prophaneness, for Fame may be a Slanderer. But where there is a Strength of Policy, there is often a Power of Worldly Wisdom that manages, and sways it. The King forgot not the Services there done him, or the secret Contrivances acted for him; for Erskin and Ramsey, Two of his then Deliverers, were not long after rewarded with Wealth and Honour, the one made Earl of Kellie, the other Earl of Holdrness; the first Prime Gentleman of the Bed-chamber to the King; the second got to his Bed-fellow one of the prime Beauties of the Kingdom, Daughter to Robert Earl of Sussex; and both of them had their Master's Purse at command; yet in our time the one died poor with many Children, and the other poor and childless.

The King's first going abroad was privately to visit some of his Houses; for naturally he did not love to be looked on, and those Formalities of State, which set a Lustre upon Princes in the Peoples Eyes, were but so many burthens to him; for his private Recreations at home, and his Hunting Exercises abroad, both with the least Disturbance, were his Delights. While he remain'd in the Tower, he took Pleasure in baiting Lions; but when he came abroad, he was so troubled with Swarms, that he fear'd to be baited by the People. And the Parliament now drawing on, which was summoned to be the 19th of March, the King, with the Queen and Prince, Four Days before, rode from the Tower to Whitehall; the City and Suburbs being one great Pageant, wherein he must give his Ears leave to suck in their gilded Oratory, tho' never so nauceous to the Stomach. He was not like his Predecessor, the late Queen, of famous Memory, that with a well-pleased Affection, met her People's Acclamations, thinking most highly of her self when she was born upon the Wings of their humble Supplications. He endured this Day's Brunt with Patience, being assured he should never have such another, and his Triumphal riding to the Parliament that followed: but afterwards in his publick Appearances, (especially in his Sports) the Accesses of the People made him so impatient, that he often

The King and Queen ride thro' the City.

* It is no wonder the Author should call in Question the Truth of this Conspiracy so many Years after, since it was not believ'd in Scotland the time it was said to have happen'd: For King James having immediately thereupon issued out a Proclamation for a Day of Publick Thanksgiving, several Ministers, and some of them his own Chaplains, refus'd flatly to observe it, and chose rather to lose their Livings, and be sent to Prison, than to mock God, (to use their own Words) in tendring him Thanks for what they believ'd never was.

An. Reg. 1.
An. Christi 1603.

diſperſed them with Frowns, that we may not ſay with Curſes; ſo various are the Natures of Princes, and their Actions ſo remarkable, that he may paſs for a good Man, that will not paſs for a good Prince.

The Speech he made to the Parliament, both Houſes being met, and the firſt, cannot be waved, tho' it be ſomewhat long, and printed in his own Works: By the Criſis and Conſtitution of it, the Temper of his Mind may be diſcovered; for if ever he ſpake really to his Parliament, it was then; and I ſhall not comment upon it: For I know Princes are made of thoſe frail Elements that other Men are; but this much I will ſay, He had ſtrong Abilities in ſome things, that did dignify the Doer of them; and in other things ſuch Weakneſſes, as would have much advanc'd his Wiſdom to have left undone. But if Worldly Greatneſs, and Glory, may well make Princes more loth to leave them, than they that have leſs, we muſt give them ſome Allowance of Fear to loſe them. The Speech was to this effect:

The King's Speech to the Parliament.

'It did no ſooner pleaſe God to lighten his Hand, and relent the Violence of his devouring Angel againſt the poor People of this City, but as ſoon I did reſolve to call this Parliament, and that for Three Chief and Principal Reaſons. The Firſt whereof is, (and which of it ſelf, altho' there were no more, is not only a ſufficient, but a moſt full and neceſſary Ground and Reaſon for convening of this Aſſembly) the Firſt Reaſon, I ſay, is, That you who are here preſent aſſembled to repreſent the Body of this whole Kingdom, and of all ſorts of People within the ſame, may with your own Ears hear, and that I out of my own Mouth may deliver unto you, the Aſſurance of My due Thankfulneſs for your ſo joyful and general Applauſe, to the declaring and receiving of Me in this Seat, (which God, by My Birth-right, and Lineal Deſcent, had in the fulneſs of time provided for Me) and that immediately after it pleaſed God to call your late Sovereign, of famous Memory, full of Days, but fuller of immortal Trophies of Honour, out of this tranſitory Life. Not that I am able to expreſs by Words, or utter by Eloquence, the vive Image of My own inward Thankfulneſs, but only that out of My own Mouth, you may reſt aſſured to expect that Meaſure of Thankfulneſs at My Hands, which is according to the Infiniteneſs of your Deſerts, and to My Inclination, and Ability, for Requital of the ſame. Shall I ever? nay, can I ever be able, or rather ſo unable in Memory, as to forget your unexpected Readineſs and Alacrity, your ever memorable Reſolution, and your moſt wonderful Conjunction, and Harmony of your Hearts, in declaring and embracing Me as your undoubted and lawful King and Governour? Or ſhall it ever be blotted out of My Mind, how at My firſt Entry into this Kingdom, the People of all ſorts rid and ran, nay, rather flew to meet Me? Their Eyes flaming nothing but Sparkles of Affection, their Mouths and Tongues uttering nothing but Sounds of Joy; their Hands, Feet, and all the reſt of their Members, in their Geſtures, diſcovering a paſſionate Longing and Earneſtneſs to meet, and embrace their new Sovereign. Quid ergo retribuam? Shall I allow in My Self that which I could never bear with in another? No, I muſt plainly and freely confeſs here, in all your Audiences, that I did ever naturally ſo far miſlike a Tongue too ſmooth, and diligent, in paying their Creditors with Lip-payment and Verbal Thanks, as I ever ſuſpected that ſort of People meant not to pay their Debtors in more ſubſtantial ſort of Coin. And therefore for expreſſing of My Thankfulneſs, I muſt reſort unto the other Two Reaſons of My convening of this Parliament, by them in Action to utter My Thankfulneſs: Both the ſaid Reaſons having but one Ground, which is the Deeds, whereby all the Days of My Life I am by God's Grace to expreſs My ſaid Thankfulneſs unto you, but divided in this, That in the Firſt of theſe Two, Mine Actions of Thanks are ſo inſeparably conjoined with My Perſon, as they are in a manner become individually annexed to the ſame. In the other Reaſon, Mine Actions are ſuch, as I may either do them, or leave them undone, altho' by God's Grace I hope never to be weary of the doing them.

'As to the Firſt, it is the Bleſſings which God hath in My Perſon beſtowed upon you all, wherein I proteſt, I do more glory at the ſame for your Weal, than for any particular Reſpect of My own Reputation, or Advancement therein.

1. 'The Firſt then of theſe Bleſſings, which God hath jointly with My Perſon ſent unto you, is, Outward Peace; that is, Peace abroad with all Foreign Neighbours: For I thank God, I may juſtly ſay, That never ſince I was a King, I either receiv'd Wrong of any other Chriſtian Prince or State, or did Wrong to any: I have ever, I praiſe God, yet kept Peace and Amity with all, which hath been ſo far tied to My Perſon, as at My coming here, you are Witneſſes, I found the State embarked in a great and tedious War; and only by Mine Arrival here, and by the Peace in My Perſon, is now Amity kept, where War was before, which is no ſmall Bleſſing to a Chriſtian Commonwealth: For by Peace abroad with their Neighbours, the Towns flouriſh, the Merchants become rich, the Trade doth encreaſe, and the People of all ſorts in the Land enjoy free Liberty to exerciſe themſelves in their ſeveral Vocations, without Peril or Diſturbance. Not that I think this Outward Peace ſo inſeparably tied to My Perſon, as I dare aſſuredly promiſe to My Self, and to you, the certain continuance thereof: But thus far I can very well aſſure you, and in the Word of a King promiſe unto you, That I ſhall never give the firſt Occaſion of the Breach thereof; neither ſhall I ever be moved for any particular, or private Paſſion of Mind, to interrupt your Publick Peace, except I be forced thereunto, either for Reparation of the Honour of the Kingdom, or elſe by Neceſſity for the Weal and Preſervation of the ſame: In which Caſe, a ſecure and honourable War muſt be preferred before an unſecure and diſhonourable Peace. Yet do I hope, by My Experience of the by-paſt Bleſſings of Peace, which God hath ſo long, ever ſince My Birth, beſtowed upon Me, that He will not be weary to continue the ſame, nor repent Him of his Grace towards Me, transferring that Sentence of King David's, upon his by-paſt Victories of War, to mine of Peace; That that God who preſerv'd Me from the devouring Jaws of the Bear, and of the Lion, and deliver'd them into My Hand, ſhall now alſo grant Me Victory over that uncircumcis'd Philiſtine.

2. 'But altho' Outward Peace be a great Bleſſing, yet it is as far inferiour to Peace within, as Civil Wars are more cruel and unnatural than than Wars abroad. And therefore the Second great Bleſſing that God hath with My Perſon ſent unto you, is Peace within, and that in a double Form: Firſt, by My Deſcent lineally out of the Loins of Henry the Seventh, is re-united and confirmed in Me the Union of the Two Princely Roſes of the Two Houſes of Lancaſter and York, whereof that King of happy Memory, was the firſt Uniter, as he was alſo the firſt Ground-layer of the other Peace. (The lamentable and miſerable Events, by the civil and bloody Diſſention betwixt theſe Two Houſes, was ſo great, and ſo late, as it need not be renewed into your Memories) which as it was firſt ſettled and united in Him, ſo it is now re-united and confirm'd in Me; being juſtly and lineally deſcended, not only of that happy Conjunction, but of both the Branches thereof in any Times before. But the Union of theſe Two Princely Houſes is nothing comparable to the Union of the Two ancient and famous Kingdoms, which is the other inward Peace annexed to My Perſon.

An. Reg. 1. An. Chriſti 1603.

'And here I muſt crave your Patience for a little ſpace, to give Me Leave to diſcourſe more particularly of the Benefits that do ariſe of that Union which is made in My Blood, being a Matter that belongeth moſt properly to Me to ſpeak of, as the Head, wherein that great Body is united. And Firſt, If We were to look no higher than to Natural and Phyſical Reaſons, We may eaſily be perſwaded of the great Benefits that by this Union do redound to the whole Iſland: For if Twenty Thouſand Men be a ſtrong Army, is not the double thereof, Forty Thouſand, a ſtronger Army? If a Baron enricheth himſelf with double as many Lands as he had before, is he not double the greater? Nature teacheth Us, That Mountains are made of Motes; and that at firſt, Kingdoms being divided, and every particular Town, or little Country, (as Tyrants or Uſurpers could obtain the Poſſeſſion of a Signiory apart) many of theſe little Kingdoms are now in Proceſs of Time, by the Ordinance of God, join'd into great Monarchies, whereby they are become Powerful within themſelves, to defend themſelves from all Outward Invaſions, and their Head and Governour thereby enabled to redeem them from Foreign Aſſaults, and puniſh private Tranſgreſſions within. Do We not yet remember, that this Kingdom was divided into Seven little Kingdoms, beſides Wales? And is it not now the ſtronger by their Union? And hath not the Union of Wales to England added a greater Strength thereto? Which, tho' it was a great Principality, was nothing comparable, in Greatneſs and Power, to the ancient and famous Kingdom of Scotland. But what ſhall We ſtick upon any Natural Appearance, when it is manifeſt, that God by his Almighty Providence hath pre-ordain'd it ſo to be? Hath not God firſt united theſe Two Kingdoms, both in Language and Religion, and Similitude of Manners? Yea, hath he not made Us all in one Iſland, compaſſed with one Sea, and of it ſelf by Nature ſo indiviſible, as almoſt thoſe that were Borderers themſelves on the late Borders, cannot diſtinguiſh, nor know or diſcern their own Limits? Theſe Two Countries being ſeparated neither by Sea, nor great River, Mountain, nor other Strength of Nature, but only by little ſmall Brooks, or demoliſhed little Walls, ſo as rather they were divided in Apprehenſion, than in Effect; and now in the end and fulneſs of Time united, the Right and Title of both in My Perſon alike lineally deſcended of both the Crowns, whereby it is now become a little World within it ſelf, being intrenched and fortified round about with a natural and yet admirable ſtrong Pond or Ditch, whereby all the former Fears of this Nation are quite cut off: The other part of the Iſland being ever before now, not only the Place of Landing to all Strangers that were to make Invaſion here, but likewiſe moved by the Enemies of this State, by untimely Incurſions to make inforced Diverſion from their Conqueſts, for defending themſelves at home, and keeping ſure their Backdoor, as then it was called, which was the greateſt Hindrance and Let My Predeceſſors of this Nation ever had, in diſturbing them from their many famous and glorious Conqueſts abroad. What God hath conjoin'd then, let no Man ſeparate. I am the Husband, and all the whole Iſland is My lawful Wife; I am the Head, and it is My Body; I am the Shepherd, and it is My Flock: I hope therefore no Man will be ſo unreaſonable as to think, that I, that am a Chriſtian King, under the Goſpel, ſhould be a Polygamiſt, and Husband to Two Wives; that I being the Head, ſhould have a divided and monſtrous Body; or that being the Shepherd of ſo fair a Flock, (whoſe Fold hath no Wall to fence it, but the Four Seas) ſhould have My Flock parted in Two. But as I am aſſur'd, that no honeſt Subject, of whatſoever degree, within My whole Dominions, is leſs glad of this joyful Union, than I am; ſo may the frivolous Objection of any that would be hinderers of this Work (which God hath in My Perſon already eſtabliſhed) be eaſily anſwer'd; which can be none, except ſuch as are either blinded with Ignorance, or elſe tranſported with Malice, being unable to live in a well-govern'd Commonwealth, and only delighting to fiſh in troubled Waters: For if they would ſtand upon their Reputation, and Privileges of any of the Kingdoms, I pray you, were not both the Kingdoms Monarchies from the beginning? And conſequently, could ever the Body be counted without the Head, which was ever unſeparably join'd thereunto: So that as the Honour and Privileges of any of the Kingdoms could not be divided from their Sovereign; ſo are they now confounded and join'd in My Perſon, who am equal and alike kindly Head to both. When this Kingdom of England was divided into ſo many petty Kingdoms, (as I told you before) one of them eat up another, till they were all united into one. And yet, can Wiltſhire or Devonſhire, which were of the Weſt-Saxons, (altho' their Kingdom was of longeſt durance, and did by Conqueſt overcome divers of the reſt of the little Kingdoms) make Claim to Priority of Place or Honour before Suſſex, Eſſex, or other Shires, which were Conquer'd by them? And have We not the like Experience in the Kingdom of France, being compoſed of divers Dutchies, and one after another Conquer'd by the Sword? For even as little Brooks loſe their Names by running and falling into great Rivers, and the very Name and Memory of great Rivers ſwallow'd up in the Ocean; ſo by the Conjunction of divers little Kingdoms into one, are all theſe private Differences and Queſtions ſwallow'd up. And ſince the Succeſs was happy of the Saxon Kingdoms Conquer'd by the Spear of Bellona; how much greater Reaſon have We to expect a happy Iſſue of this greater Union, which is only ly fasten'd and bound up by the Wedding-Ring of Astrea? And as God hath made Scotland the one half of this Island to enjoy My Birth, and the first and most imperfect half of My Life, and you here to enjoy the Perfect and last half thereof; so can I not think, that any would be so injurious to Me, no not in their Thoughts and Wishes, as to cut asunder the one half of Me from the other. But in this Matter I have far enough insisted, resting assured, That in your Hearts and Minds you all applaud this My Discourse.

An. Reg. 1. An. Christi 1603.

3\. 'Now altho' these Blessings (before rehearsed) of inward and outward Peace be great; yet seeing that in all good things, a great part of their Goodness and Estimation is lost, if they have not Appearance of Perpetuity or long Continuance; so hath it pleased Almighty God to accompany My Person also with that Favour, having healthful and hopeful Issue of My Body (whereof some are here present) for Continuance and Propagation of that undoubted Right which is in My Person; under whom I doubt not but it will please God to prosper and continue for many Years this Union, and all other Blessings of inward and outward Peace, which I have brought with Me.

4\. 'But neither Peace outward, nor Peace inward, nor any other Blessing that can follow thereupon, nor Appearance of the Perpetuity thereof, by Propagation in Posterity, are but weak Pillars, and rotten Reeds to lean unto, if God doth not strengthen, and by the Staff of his Blessing make them durable; for in vain doth the Watchman watch the City, if the Lord be not the principal Defence thereof; in vain doth the Builder build the House, if God give not the Success; and in vain (as St. Paul saith) doth Paul plant, and Apollo water, if God give not the Increase: For all Worldly Blessings are but like swift passing Shadows, fading Flowers, or Chaff blown before the Wind, if by the Profession of true Religion, and Works according thereunto, God be not moved to maintain and settle the Thrones of Princes. And altho' since Mine Entry into this Kingdom, I have both by meeting with divers of the Ecclesiastical State, and likewise by divers Proclamations clearly declared My Mind in Points of Religion, yet do I not think it amiss in this so Solemn an Audience, to take Occasion to discover somewhat of the Secrets of My Heart in that Matter: For I shall never (with God's Grace) be ashamed to make publick Profession thereof upon all Occasions, lest God should be ashamed of Me before Men and Angels, especially lest at this time, Men might presume further upon the Misknowledge of My Meaning to trouble this Parliament than were convenient.

'At My first coming, altho' I found but one Religion, and that which by My Self is professed, publickly allow'd, and by the Law maintain'd; yet found I another sort of Religion, besides a private Sect, lurking within the Bowels of this Nation. The first is, the True Religion, which by Me is professed, and by Law is established: The second is, the Falsly called Catholicks, but truly Papists: The third, which I call a Sect rather than a Religion, is the Puritans and Novelists, who do not so far differ from us in Points of Religion, as in their confused Form of Policy and Parity, being ever discontented with the present Government, and impatient to suffer any Superiority, which maketh their Sects insufferable in any well-govern'd Commonwealth. But for My Course towards them, I remit it to My Proclamations made upon that Subject. And now for the Papists, I must put a Difference betwixt Mine own private Profession of My Salvation, and My Politick Government of the Realm for the Weal and Quietness thereof. As for My own Profession, you have Me your Head now among you, of the same Religion that the Body is of: As I am no stranger to you in Blood, no more am I a Stranger to you in Faith, or in Matters concerning the House of God. And altho' this My Profession be according to My Education, wherein (I thank God) I suck'd the Milk of God's Truth, with the Milk of My Nurse; yet I do here protest unto you, That I would never (for such a Conceit of Constancy, or other Prejudicate Opinion) have so firmly kept My first Profession, if I had not found it agreeable to all Reason, and to the Rule of My Conscience. But I was never violent, nor unreasonable in My Profession: I acknowledge the Roman Church to be our Mother Church, altho' defiled with some Infirmities and Corruptions, as the Jews were, before they Crucified Christ. And as I am no Enemy to the Life of a sick Man, because I would have his Body purged of ill Humours; no more am I an Enemy to their Church, because I would have them reform their Errors, not wishing the down-throwing of the Temple, but that it might be purged, and cleansed from Corruption; otherwise how can they wish us to enter, if their House be not first made clean? But as I would be loather to dispense in the least Point of Mine own Conscience, for any Worldly Respect, than the foolishest Precisian of them all; so would I be as sorry to streighten the Politick Government of the Bodies and Minds of all My Subjects to My Private Opinions: Nay, My Mind was ever so free from Persecution, or Inthralling of My Subjects in Matters of Conscience, as I hope those of that Profession within this Kingdom have a Proof since My coming, that I was so far from encreasing their Burthens with Rehoboam, as I have so much as either Time, Occasion, or Law could permit, lighten'd them. And even now at this time, have I been careful to revise and consider deeply upon the Laws made against them, that some Overture might be made to the present Parliament for clearing these Laws by Reason, (which is the Soul of the Law) in case they have been in times past further, or more rigorously extended by Judges, than the Meaning of the Law was, or might tend to the Hurt as well of the Innocent as of the guilty Persons. And as to the Persons of My Subjects which are of that Profession, I must divide them into two Ranks, Clericks and Laicks; For the Laicks, I ever thought them far more excusable than the other sort, because their Religion containeth such an ignorant, doubtful, and implicite kind of Faith, grounded upon their Church, that except they do generally believe whatsoever their Teachers please to affirm, they cannot be thought guilty of these particular Points of Heresies and Corruptions, which their Teachers so wilfully profess. And again, I must subdivide the Laicks into two Ranks, which are, either quiet and well-minded Men, peaceable Subjects, who either being old, retain their first drunk-in Liquor, upon a certain Shamefacedness to be thought curious, or changeable: Or being young Men, through evil Education, have been

An. Reg. 1. An. Christi 1603.

been nurſed and brought up upon ſuch Venom, inſtead of wholeſome Nutriment: And this ſort of People, I would be ſorry to puniſh their Bodies for the Error of their Minds, the Reformation whereof muſt only come of God, and the true Spirit. But the other Rank of Laicks, who either through Curioſity, Affectation of Novelty, or Diſcontentment, have changed their Coats, only to be Factious, Stirrers of Sedition, and Perturbers of the Commonwealth; this giveth a Ground to Me (the Magiſtrate) to take better Heed to their Proceedings, and to correct their Obſtinacy.

'But for the Clericks, I muſt directly ſay and affirm, That as long as they maintain one ſpecial Point of their Doctrine, and another of their Practice, they are no way ſufferable to remain in this Kingdom. The Point of Doctrine is, that arrogant, and ambitious Supremacy of their Head, the Pope, whereby he not only claims to be Spiritual Head of all Chriſtians, but alſo to have an Imperial Civil Power over all Kings and Emperors, Dethroning and Decrowning Princes with his Foot as pleaſeth him, and diſpenſing and diſpoſing of all Kingdoms and Empires at his Appetite. The other Point which they obſerve, in continual Practice, is, the Aſſaſſinates and Murthers of Kings; thinking it no Sin, but rather a Matter of Salvation, to do all Actions of Rebellion and Hoſtility againſt their Natural Sovereign Lord, if he be once curſed, his Subjects diſcharged of their Fidelity, and his Kingdom given a Prey, by that Three-Crown'd Monarch, or rather Monſter, their Head. And in this Point I have no Occaſion to ſpeak further here, ſaying, That I could wiſh from My Heart it would pleaſe God to make Me one of the Members of ſuch a general Chriſtian Union in Religion, as (laying Wilfulneſs aſide on both hands) we might meet in the midſt, which is the Centre, and Perfection of all Things. For if they would leave, and be aſhamed of ſuch new and groſs Corruptions of theirs, as themſelves cannot maintain, nor deny to be worthy of Reformation, I would for My own part be content to meet them in the Mid-way, ſo that all Novelties might be renounced on either ſide. For as my Faith is the True, Ancient, Catholick and Apoſtolick Faith, grounded upon the expreſs Word of God; ſo will I ever yield all Reverence to Antiquity, in the Points of Eccleſiaſtical Polity: And by that Means ſhall I ever, with God's Grace, keep My Self from either being an Heretick in Faith, or Schiſmatick in Matters of Policy.

'But of one thing would I have the Papiſts of this Land to be admoniſhed, That they preſume not ſo much upon My Lenity, (becauſe I would be loth to be thought a Perſecutor) as thereupon to think it lawful for them daily to increaſe their Number and Strength in this Kingdom; whereby, if not in my Time, at leaſt in the Time of My Poſterity, they may be in hope to erect their Religion again. No, let them aſſure themſelves, That as I am a Friend to their Perſons, if they be good Subjects; ſo I am a vowed Enemy, and do denounce Mortal War to their Errors. And as I would be ſorry to be driven, by their ill Behaviour, from the Protection and Conſervation of their Bodies and Lives; ſo will I never ceaſe, as far as I can, to tread down their Errors and wrong Opinions. For I could not permit the Increaſe and Growing of their Religion, without betraying My Self, and My own Conſcience, and this whole Iſland, as well the Part I am come from, as the Part I remain in, in betraying their Liberties, and reducing them to the former Slaviſh Yoke, which both had caſt off before I came among them; as alſo the Liberty of the Crown in My Poſterity, which I ſhould leave again under a new Slavery, being left free to Me by My Predeceſſors. And therefore I would wiſh all good Subjects that are deceived with this Corruption, if they find any Beginnings in themſelves of Knowledge, and Love to the Truth, to foſter the ſame by all lawful Means, and to beware of quenching the Spirit that worketh within them. And if they can find as yet no Motion tending that way, to be ſtudious to read and confer with Learned Men, and to uſe all ſuch Means as may further their Reſolution; aſſuring them, That as long as they are diſconformable in Religion to us, they cannot be but half My Subjects, be able to do but half Service, and I ſhall want the beſt half of them, which is their Souls.

'And here I have Occaſion to ſpeak to you my Lords the Biſhops; for as you my Lord of Durham ſaid very Learnedly to Day in your Sermon, Correction without Inſtruction is but Tyranny: So ought you, and all the Clergy under you, to be more careful, vigilant and diligent, than you have been, to win Souls to God, as well by your Exemplary Life, as Doctrine. And ſince you ſee how careful they are, ſparing neither Labour, Pains, nor extreme Peril of their Perſons, to pervert, (the Devil is ſo buſy a Biſhop;) ye ſhould be the more careful, and wakeful in your Charges. Follow the Rule Preſcribed you by St. Paul, Be careful to exhort and inſtruct, in Seaſon, and out of Seaſon: And where you have been any way ſluggiſh before, now waken your ſelves up again with a new Diligence, remitting the Succeſs to God, who calling them either at the ſecond, third, tenth or twelfth Hour, as they are alike welcome to Him, ſo ſhall they be to Me his Lieutenant here.

Tobie Matthew.

'The third Reaſon of My Convening you at this time, which containeth ſuch Actions of My Thankfulneſs towards you, as I may either do, or leave undone, yet ſhall, with God's Grace, ever preſs to perform all the Days of My Life. It conſiſts in theſe two Points; in making of Laws at certain Times, which is only at ſuch Times as this, in Parliament; or in the careful Execution of the Laws at other Times. As for the Making of them, I will thus far faithfully promiſe unto you, That I will ever prefer the Weal of the Body above any particular or private Ends of My own, thinking ever the Weal of the Commonwealth to be the greateſt Weal, and Worldly Felicity: A Point wherein a lawful King doth directly differ from a Tyrant. But at this time I am only thus far to forewarn you in that Point, That you beware to ſeek the making of too many Laws, for two eſpecial Reaſons: Firſt, becauſe In corruptiſſima Republica plurimæ leges: And the Execution of ſome good Laws is far more profitable in a Commonwealth, than to burthen Men's Memories with making too many of them. And next, becauſe the making of too many Laws in one Parliament will bring in Confuſion, for want of Leiſure wiſely to deliberate before you conclude: For the Biſhop ſaid well to Day, That to Deliberation a large Time would be given; but to Execution a greater Promptneſs was required. As for the Execution of good Laws, it hath

An. Reg. 1. An. Chriſti 1603.

'hath been very wiſely and honourably foreſeen, and ordered by My Predeceſſors in this Kingdom, in planting ſuch a number of Judges, and all ſorts of Magiſtrates, in convenient Places, for Execution of the ſame. And therefore muſt I now turn to you that are Judges, and Magiſtrates under Me, as Mine Eyes and Ears in this Caſe: I can ſay no otherwiſe to you, than as Ezekias the good King of Juda ſaid to their Judges, Remember that the Thrones you ſit on are God's, and neither yours nor mine. And as you muſt be anſwerable to Me, ſo muſt both you and I be anſwerable to God, for the due Execution of our Offices. That Place is no Place for you to utter your Affections in; you muſt not there hate your Foe, nor love your Friend; fear the Offending of the greater Party, or pity the Miſery of the Meaner; ye muſt be Blind, and not ſee Diſtinctions of Perſons; Handleſs, not to receive Bribes; but keep that juſt Temper and Medium in all your Proceedings, that, like a juſt Ballance, ye may neither ſway to the Right hand, nor to the Left. Three principal Qualities are required in you, Knowledge, Courage, and Sincerity, that you may diſcern with Knowledge, execute with Courage, and do both in upright Sincerity. And for my part, I do Vow and Proteſt here in the Preſence of God, and of this honourable Audience, I never ſhall be weary, nor omit occaſion wherein I may ſhew My Carefulneſs of the Execution of good Laws: And as I wiſh you that are Judges, not to be weary in your Office, in doing of it, ſo ſhall I never be weary, with God's Grace, to take Account of you, which is properly My Calling.

'And thus having told you the Three Cauſes of My Convening of this Parliament, all Three tending only to utter My Thankfulneſs, but in divers Forms; the firſt by Word, the other two by Action; I do confeſs, that when I have done, and performed all that in this Speech I have promiſed, Inutilis ſervus ſum. When I have done all that I can for you, I do nothing but that which I am bound to do, and am accountable to God for the contrary. For the Difference betwixt a Rightful King, and an Uſurping Tyrant, is this; That the proud and ambitious Tyrant doth think his Kingdom and People are Ordained for ſatisfaction of his Deſires and unreaſonable Appetite; The righteous and juſt King doth by the contrary, acknowledge himſelf to be Ordained for procuring the Wealth and Proſperity of his People, and that his greateſt and principal worldly Felicity muſt conſiſt in their Proſperity. If you be Rich, I cannot be Poor; if you be happy, I cannot but be Fortunate; and I proteſt, that your Welfare ſhall ever be My greateſt Care and Contentment. And that I am a Servant, is moſt true; that as I am a Head and Governour of all the People in My Dominions, who are My Natural Vaſſals and Subjects, conſidering them in Numbers, and diſtinct Ranks: So if we will take the People as one Body and Maſs, then as the Head is Ordained for the Body, and not the Body for the Head; ſo muſt a righteous King know himſelf to be Ordained for his People, and not his People for him: For although a King and his People be Relata, yet can he be no King if he want People and Subjects. But there be many People in the World that lack a Head; wherefore I will never be aſhamed to confeſs it My principal Honour, to be the great Servant of the Commonwealth; and ever think the Proſperity thereof to be My greateſt Felicity, as I have already ſaid.

'But as it was the whole Body of this Kingdom (with uniform Aſſent and Harmony) which did ſo far oblige me, to ſay My Thankfulneſs due to the whole State. For even as in Matter of Faults, Quod à multis peccatur, impune peccatur; even ſo in the Matter of virtuous and good Deeds, which are done by the willing Conſent and Harmony of the whole Body, no particular Perſon can juſtly claim Thanks, as proper to him, for the ſame: And therefore I muſt here make a little Apology for My ſelf, in that I could not ſatisfie the particular Humors of every Perſon that looked for ſome Advancement or Reward at My Hand, ſince My entry into this Kingdom. Three Kinds of Things were craved of Me, Advancement to Honour, Preferment to Place of Credit about My Perſon, and Reward in Matters of Land or Profit. If I had beſtow'd Honour upon all, no Man could have been advanced to Honour; for the Degrees of Honour do conſiſt in preferring ſome above their Fellows: If every Man had the like Acceſs to My Perſon, then no Man could have it: And if I had beſtowed Lands and Rewards upon every Man, the Fountain of My Liberality would have been ſo Exhauſted, as I ſhould want Means to be Liberal to any Man. Yet was I not ſo ſparing, but I may without vaunting affirm, That I have enlarged My Favour in all the Three Degrees, towards as many and more than ever any King of England did, in ſo ſhort a ſpace. No, I rather crave your Pardon, that I have been ſo bountiful: For, if the Means of the Crown be waſted, whither ſhould I have Recourſe but to you My Subjects, and be Burthenſome to you? Which I ſhould be lotheſt to do of any King alive. Two ſpecial Cauſes moved Me to be ſo open-handed, whereof the one was Reaſonable and Honourable, but the other (I will not be aſhamed to confeſs unto you) proceeded of My own Infirmity. That which was Juſt and Honourable, was That being ſo far beholden to the Body of the whole State, I thought I could not refuſe to let ſome ſmall Brooks run out of the Fountain of My Thankfulneſs to the whole, for refreſhing of particular Perſons that were Members of that Multitude. The other which proceeded out of mine own Infirmity was, The Multitude and Importunity of Suiters. But altho' Reaſon comes by Infuſion in a manner, yet Experience groweth with Time and Labour: And therefore do I not doubt, but Experience will teach the particular Subjects of this Kingdom, not to be ſo importune and undiſcreet in Craving, and Me not to be ſo eaſily and lightly moved in Granting that, which may be harmful to My Eſtate, and conſequently to the whole Kingdom.

'And thus at length having declared unto you My Mind, My Concluſion ſhall only now be, to Excuſe My ſelf, in caſe you have not found ſuch Eloquence in My Speech, as peradventure you might have look'd for at My Hands. I might alledge the great Weight of My Affairs, and My continual Buſineſs, and Diſtraction, that I could never have leiſure to think upon what I was to Speak: And I might alſo alledge, That My firſt Sight of this ſo famous and honourable an Aſſembly, might likewiſe breed ſome Impediment: But 'leaving

'leaving these Excuses, I will plainly and freely, in My manner, tell you the true Cause of it; which is, That it becometh a King, in My Opinion, to use no other Eloquence than Plainness and Sincerity. By plainness, I mean, That his Speeches should be so clear, and void of all Ambiguity, that they may not be thrown, nor rent in sunder, in contrary Senses, like the old Oracles of the Pagan Gods: And by Sincerity, I understand, That Uprightness and Honesty which ought to be in a King's whole Speeches and Actions; that as far as a King is in Honour erected above any of his Subjects, so far should he strive in Sincerity to be above them all, and that his Tongue should be ever the true Messenger of his Heart. And this sort of Eloquence you may ever assuredly look for at My Hands.

Thus the Beams of Majesty had an Influence upon every Branch and Leaf of the Kingdom, By reflecting upon the Root, their Representative Body; every particular Person expecting what Fruit this Sun-shine would produce; striving as much to Insinuate into him, as he did into the general; so that there was a reciprocal Harmony between the King and the People, because they Courted one another. But when the King's Bounty contracted it self into private Favourites, (as it did afterwards) bestowing the Affection he promised the whole People, upon one Man; when the Golden Showers they gaped for dropt into some few Chanels, their Passions flew higher than their Hopes. The King's Aims were, to Unite the two Kingdoms, so that the one might corroborate the other, to make good that part of his Speech (by this intermixtion) wherein he divides England and Scotland into halves: But the English stumbled at that Partition, thinking it an unequal Division, and fearing that the Scots (creeping into English Lordships, and English Ladies Beds, in both which already they began to be active) might quickly make their least Half the predominant Part.

The King proclaimed King of Great Britain.

But he was Proclaim'd King of Great Britain: England must be no more a Name; the Scottish Coins are made current; and our Ships must have St. George's and St. Andrew's Crosses quartered together in their Flags; all outward Ensigns of Amity. But those English that had suck'd in none of the Sweets of this pleasant Stream of Bounty, repined to see the Scots advanced from Blue Bonnets to costly Beavers, wearing instead of Wadmeal, Velvet and Satin, as divers Pasquils written in that Age Satyrically taunted at. Which is not set down here, to vilifie the Scots, (being most of them Gentlemen that had deserved well of their Master) but to shew, how cross to the publick Appetite the Hony-comb is, that another Man eats. But the King (like a wise Pilot) guided the Helm with so even an hand, that these small Gusts were not felt. It behoved him to play his Master-Prize in the beginning, which he did to the Life; for he had divers Opinions, Humours and Affections to grapple with, as well as Nations; and 'tis a very calm Sea when no Billow rises. The Romanists boggled, that he said in his Speech, They were unsufferable in the Kingdom, as long as they maintain'd the Pope to be their Spiritual Head, and he to have Power to Dethrone Princes. The Separatists (as the King called them) were offended at that Expression, wherein he professed willingly, If the Papists would lay down King-killing, and some other gross Errors, he would be content to meet them half way. So that every one grounded his Hopes, or his Fears, upon the Shallows of his own Fancy, not knowing yet what course the King would Steer. But these Sores being tenderly dealt with, did not suddenly Fester, but were Skinn'd over. The King desirous of the Title, Pacificus, did not only close with his own Subjects, but heal'd up also that old Wound that had bled long in the Sides of England and Spain, both being weary of the Pain, both willing to be Cured. The King of Spain sent the Constable of Castile with a mighty Train of smooth-handed Spaniards to close up the Wound on this side, where (the old Enmity being well mortified) they were received with singular Respect and Civility. The King of England sent his High-Admiral, the Earl of Nottingham, with as splendid a Retinue of English, to close it on that: Who being Personages of Quality, accoutred with all Ornaments suitable, were the more admired by the Spaniards for Beauty and Excellency, by how much the † Jesuits had made Impressions in the Vulgar Opinion, That since the English left the Roman Religion, they were transform'd into strange horrid Shapes, with Heads and Tails like Beasts and Monsters. So easie it is for those Juglers, when they have once bound up the Conscience, to tie up the Understanding also.

The King and Parliament in good accord.

But the Parliament highly admiring the King's Abilities, made a Recognition thereof with many Elogies, as the prime Act of their humble Submission to his Government, wherein they yield their most humble Thanks to the Divine Majesty for his Access to the Crown; and they desire from their Hearts, that as a Memorial to all Posterity, (among the Records of the High Court of Parliament for ever to endure) it may be published and declared, that they acknowledge his Right of Succession to the Crown of England, and the Empire thereof; and thereunto they faithfully submit, and oblige themselves, their Heirs, and Posterities for ever, until the last drop of their Bloods be spent. So high mounted was the Affection of the People to the King! And happily might have continued so, if some After-Jealousies had not intervened, that like Clouds hindred the Influence of their more intimate Correspondence.

Commissioners for an Union.

And to satisfy the King's Desires about an Union betwixt England and Scotland, the Parliament made an Act to Authorize certain Commissioners; viz. Thomas Lord Elesmere, Lord Chancellor of England; Thomas Earl of Dorset, Lord Treasurer of England; Charles Earl of Nottingham, Lord High Admiral of England; Henry Earl of Southampton, William Earl of Pembroke, Henry Earl of Northampton, Richard Bishop of London, Toby Bishop of Durefme, Anthony Bishop of St. David's; Robert Lord Cecil, Principal Secretary; Edward Lord Zouch, Lord President of Wales; William Lord Monteagle, Ralph Lord Eure; Edmund Lord Sheffield, Lord President of the Council in the North, Lords of the Higher House of Parliament.

† This Story of their Priests was so firmly impress'd upon the Spaniards, that at the landing of the English Ambassador, there was such a vast concourse of People of all sorts to see them, that the adjacent Maritime Provinces were almost depopulated, scarce any one that was able to Travel staying at home.

An. Reg. 1. An. Christi 1604. And Thomas Lord Clinton, Robert Lord Buckhurst, Sir Francis Hastings Kt. Sir John Stanhope Kt. Vice-Chamberlain to his Majesty; Sir John Herbert Kt. Second Secretary to his Majesty; Sir George Carew Kt. Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen; Sir Thomas Strickland Kt. Sir Edward Stafford Kt. Sir Henry Nevil of Berkshire Kt. Sir Richard Buckley Kt. Sir Henry Billingsley Kt. Sir Daniel Dun Kt. Dean of the Arches; Sir Edward Hobby Kt. Sir John Savile Kt. Sir Robert Wroth Kt. Sir Thomas Chaloner Kt. Sir Robert Maunsel Kt. Sir Thomas Ridgeway Kt. Sir Thomas Holcroft Kt. Sir Thomas Hesketh Kt. Attorney of the Court of Wards; Sir Francis Bacon Kt. Sir Lawrence Tanfield Kt. Serjeant at Law; Sir Henry Hubberd Kt. Serjeant at Law; John Bennet Doctor of the Laws, Sir Henry Withrington, Sir Ralph Grey, and Sir Thomas Lake Knights; Robert Askwith, Thomas James and Henry Chapman, Merchants, Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses of the House of Commons; or any Eight of the said Lords, and Twenty of the said Commons. Which Commissioners shall have Power to Assemble, Meet, Treat, and Consult with certain Select Commissioners to be Nominated and Authorized by Authority of the Parliament of Scotland, concerning such Matters, Causes, and Things, as they in their Wisdoms shall think and deem Convenient and Necessary, for the Honour of the King, and common Good of both Kingdoms. Yet the good Intentions of this Union took no Effect, as will follow in the Sequel of this History. But there were a great many good Laws made, which are too voluminous for this Place, having a proper Sphere of their own to move in.

Thus the King sate triumphing, as it were, upon a Throne of his Peoples Affections; and his Beginnings had some Settlement; for being loth to be troubled, he sought Peace every where. But our inbred Distempers lay upon the Lee, intermixt with other gross Dregs, that the Prince's Lenity, and the Peoples Luxury produc'd: For the King minding his Sports, many Riotous Demeanours crept into the Kingdom, the Sun-shine of Peace being apt for such a Production, upon the Slime of the late War. The Sword and Buckler-Trade being now out of date, one Corruption producing another, (the City of London being always a fit Receptacle for such, whose Prodigalities and Wastes made them Instruments of Debaucheries) divers Sects of Vitious Persons, going under the Title of Roaring Boys, Bravadoes, Roysters, &c. commit many Insolencies; the Streets swarm Night and Day with bloody Quarrels; private Duels fomented, especially betwixt the English and Scots; many Discontents nourished in the Countries betwixt the Gentry and Commonalty, about Inclosure (the Meanest gaping after new Hopes) growing in some Places to a petty Rebellion. Daily Discords (incident to Peace and Plenty) betwixt Families, Papist against Protestant, one Friend against another; the Papists being a strong and dangerous Faction, milling their Hopes, strove to make the Scots more odious than they could make themselves, though some of them went so high as to Counterfeit the King's Privy Seal, and make Addresses thereby to Foreign Princes, for which one Thomas Douglas, taken in the Fact, was executed at Smithfield. Others were so Insolent, as to quip and jear the English Nobility, and other Misdemeanours, which caused secret Heart-burnings and Jealousies betwixt the Nations. But then comes a Proclamation, like a strong Pill, and carries away the grossest of these Humours.

Roaring Boys.

Something yet stuck, especially in the Consciences of the Popish Party, that could not be purged away without a Toleration, which they Petition for; but not being granted, they contriv'd one of the most Horrid and Stupendious Mischiefs that ever enter'd into the Hearts of Men: For their Heat of Malice would not be quenched with the Blood Royal, but the Nobility and Gentry, the Representative Body of the whole Kingdom, united at Westminster, must be shatter'd in pieces, and dismember'd, by the Blast of Six and Thirty Barrels of Gun-powder, which those dark Contrivers had hid in a Cellar under the Parliament House, being discover'd by a Light from Heaven, and a Letter from one of the Conspirators, when the Fire was already in their Hands, as well as Rage in their Hearts, to put to the Train.

The Principal of these Contrivers, was Robert Catesby, a Gentleman of a good plentiful Estate, who first Hatch'd and Brooded the Plot, and promised to himself the Glory of an Eternal Name by the Propagation of it; making choice of Thomas Percy, Robert Winter, Thomas Winter, John Grant, Ambrose Rookwood, John Wright, Francis Tresham, Sir Everard Digby, and others, Gentlemen of good Estates (for the most part) and Spirits as Implacable and Furious as his own; who, like Combustible Matter, took Fire at the first Motion, their Zeal to the Roman Cause burning within them, which nothing but the Blood of Innocents can quench. The Design thus set afoot, they bind themselves to Secresy, by those Sacraments which are the greatest Ties upon the Soul; and Saint Garnet the Jesuit was their Confessor. The Foundation being laid, every Man betakes himself to his Work, some to provide Money, some Materials. Percy was to hire the Cellars under the Parliament House, to lay Wood and Coal in for his Winter Provision; Guido Faux, a desperate Ruffian (who was to give fire to the Train) was appointed to be his Man to bring in the Wood and Coal. The Gunpowder provided in Flanders, is brought from Lambeth in the Night, and covertly laid under the Wood. Thus they prepare all things ready for a Burnt-Offering against the Day the Parliament should meet, which was to be upon the Seventh of February. 160 4/5
But the King, for some Reasons of State, (which at that time the Dictates of Providence did much approve of) Prorogu'd the Parliament to the Fifth of November following, which scatter'd the Contrivers at present, and they were at their Wits end; and some of them went beyond Seas, because they would not beat too much about the Covert, their Materials being fitted; others that staid here persisted with Patience (made a Vice by them) and met often to consult how they should manage their great Business, if it took effect. They look'd upon the King and Prince as already Sacrificed to their Cruelty: And Percy undertook to dispatch the Duke of York. But because they must have one of the Blood Royal, that must serve as a Center to adhere to, to keep all from Confusion, they meant to preserve the Lady Elizabeth, and make her Queen, that under her Minority and Innocency, they might the better establish their bloody Principles of Piety and Policy. They had design'd the Fatal Day to be upon the Fifth of November, when the King and both Houses were to meet, and that Day they appointed a great Hunting-match at Dunsmore Heath in Warwickshire, to be near the Lord Harington's House, where the Lady Elizabeth was. And they had, by their horrid Art and Experience, so fitted their Mat-

Principal Actors.

ches

An. Reg. 3. An. Christi 1605.

ches, that were to convey the Fire to the Powder, that they could know a hundred Miles off, to a Minute, when that Monstrous Fiery Exhalation would break out.

Solacing themselves in this bloody Expectation, and thinking their Conveyances under Ground were not seen above by the Divine Discoverer, they stood like Vultures gaping for their Prey; when, Behold! one Tender-hearted Murderer among the Pack, willing to save the Lord Monteagle, writ this Letter to him.

A Letter to my Ld. Monteagle.

MY Lord, out of the love I bear to some of your Friends, I have a care of your Preservation; therefore I would wish you (as you tender your Life) to forbear your Attendance at this Parliament; for God and Man have concurr'd to punish the Wickedness of this Time. And think not slightly of this Advertisement; for though there be no appearance of any stir, yet, I say, they shall receive a terrible Blow this Parliament; and yet they shall not see who hurt them. This Counsel is not to be contemned, because it may do you Good, and can do you no Harm: for the Danger is past as soon as you have burnt this Letter. I hope God will give you Grace to make use of it, to whose Holy Protection I commend you. ||

Here is the Protection of the Holy God desir'd, a strange Expression in so unholy an Action, which is like their Zeal that made their Children pass through Fire to Moloch; what horrid Madness kindles such Sacrifices? The Lord Monteagle astonished at the Letter (though he understood it not) thinking there might be something in it of dangerous Concernment, communicated the Contents of it to the Earl of Salisbury, and some others of the King's Council. Salisbury could not find out the Riddle; he concluded him either a Fool or a Madman that wrote it, by this Expression, The Danger is past as soon as the Letter is burnt: If the Danger be past when the Letter is burnt, what needeth any warning? But he did not reach the Meaning; for the Writer's desire was to have the Letter burned, and then the Danger would be past, both to the Writer and Receiver, if he had Grace to make use of the Warning. The King was hunting the fearful Hare at Royston, while they laid this Snare for him at Westminster. As soon as he came to Whitehall, the Earl of Salisbury being of his intimate Councils, and Principal Secretary, shew'd him the Letter. The King considering it Circumspectly (as Cicero said of the Sibyl's Works, and majus est attenti animi quam furentis) said, This is no Madman's Writing. There is a great Blow to be given; they shall not see it that feel it; which is some secret Mischief. Many times Fear is a profitable and an Active Servant, if it do not Domineer and grow Masterly. He was so sensible of a Stroke, that he felt it (as it were) coming: Therefore the Day before the Parliament should begin, he commanded the Earl of Suffolk, Lord Chamberlain to make a strict Search about the Parliament House; who, accompany'd with the Lord Monteagle, entred the Cellar under the House, which he found stuffed with Billet, Faggot, and Coal; and asking Whinyard of the Wardrobe (who was House-keeper) what Provisions they were? he said, He had let the Cellar to Mr. Thomas Percy, (who was one of the Gentlemen Pensioners to the King) and close by in a Corner of the Cellar stood Faux, in a Gastly Condition (being a Raw-bon'd tall Man) who being question'd, said, He was Percy's Servant. The Lord Chamberlain that would make no Noise and Bustle at that time, left both the Engine and Engineer as he found them, taking no further notice, but apprehended Just Cause to have the Cellars further search'd; the Lord Monteagle assuring himself, it was Percy that writ the Letter to him as soon as he heard him Nam'd, for there were little Intimacies betwixt them. The King with his Council advising what to do, resolved of a further Search that Night, committing the Trust to Sir Thomas Knevet, one of the Gentlemen of his Privy-Chamber, a Man of approv'd Fidelity; who, with a Retinue suitable to such an Enterprize, coming to the Cellar about Midnight, he met the watchful Minister of Impiety, Faux, at the Door, on whom he presently seiz'd, and making further Search, pulled out the Core of all that horrid Contrivance. Faux, his Under-ground Works being digged out, and seeing all unkennel'd, confess'd the Intention, and was only sorry it came not to Perfection, saying, God would have concealed it, and the Devil only discover'd it. In his Pockets they found a Watch (which were not common then) and a Tinder-box, the Engines to minute out his Time to strike the Stroke; so punctual was he in his Wickedness! This tough Piece, upon Examination by the Lords of the Council, could have little drawn from him, only he said again, He was sorry it was not done. But the Conspirators reveal'd themselves; for finding all Discover'd, they pack to Dunsmore to the Hunting-meeting, breaking open some Stables in London, and taking out divers Horses of Noblemen, that were put into Riders Hands to manage, thinking to make a great Party: But the High Sheriffs of Warwickshire and Worcestershire hunted these Firebrand Foxes so, that they were forced (most of them) to Earth themselves at Littleton's House at Halbach, and there Percy and Catesby desperately sallying out, were both slain, so were John Wright and Christopher Wright: Thomas Winter, Francis Tresham, and the rest, were taken; Tresham died of the Strangury in the Tower; Thomas Winter, Guido Faux, Robert Keys, Thomas Bates, Robert Winter, late of Hoodington in Worcestershire, Esq; John Grant of Northbrook in the County of Warwick, Esq; Ambrose Rookwood, late of Traytors executed.

|| Who it was that wrote this Letter to the Lord Monteagle was never known, or how it came that King James suspected its Meaning to be what it really was, is in a great part a Mystery to this Day. Yet I cannot give my self leave to doubt, but King James had some light given him from Henry IV of the Designs of the Papists against him; for in the Duke of Sully's Memoires, there is more than once mention made of some sudden Blow they intended in England about that time: And in one Letter, King James is desired to take warning from the Fate of Henry III. I am the more confirm'd in this Opinion, that in the Harangue pronounc'd at Rome in praise of Ravillac the Assassin of Henry IV, which has since been so often quoted by several Authors, both Papist and Protestant, as an Argument that the Jesuits approved the Murder: It is there said, That Henry IV. was not only an inveterate Enemy to the Catholick Religion in his Heart, but had obstructed the glorious Enterprizes of those that would have restor'd it in England, and occasion'd them to be Crown'd with Martyrdom. Now it's well known, Garnet and the rest that were Executed for the Gun-Powder-Plot, were reputed Martyrs for the Catholick Cause by the College of Jesuits at Rome, where that Harangue was pronounc'd.

An. Reg. 3. An. Christi 1605.

Staningfield in the County of Suffolk, Eſq; and Sir Everard Digby of Gothurſt in Buckinghamſhire, Knight, were executed according to their Demerit.

This prodigious Contrivance did not only ſtupifie the whole Kingdom with Amazement, but Foreign Princes made their Wonderment alſo. And though, for the Propagation of the Catholick Cauſe, they might have Conſcience enough to wiſh it had taken Effect, yet they had Policy enough to Congratulate the Diſcovery; and ſome of them, to take off the Aſperity of the Suſpect, ſweetned their Expreſſions with many rich Gifts and Preſents to the King and Queen. But this bloody Deſign, found in the Hand of the Malefactors, graſping the Miſchief, and confirm'd by their own Confeſſions, (being ſuch Spirits as were fit Boutefeus for ſo deſperate an Enterprize) was, notwithſtanding, father'd upon the Puritans (as Nero did the Burning of Rome upon the Chriſtians) by ſome Impudent and Cunning Jeſuits, whoſe Practice is to deceive, if not quite to clear their Party, yet, by ſtirring this muddy Water, to make that which is in it to appear the leſs Perſpicuous; and it is like the reſt of their Figments, fit Baits for Ignorance to nibble on: Which ſome Years after I had Opportunity at Bruges in Flanders to make Weſton, an old Jeſuit, active in the Powder-plot, ingenuouſly to confeſs.

The Parliament meet the 9th of November.

This preceded the ſecond Seſſions of the firſt Parliament, Prorogu'd till the Fifth of November, and upon the Ninth they met; where, with Hearts full of Fears and Jealouſies, they ſifted up the Ground of the Machination, for diſcovery of the Complotters, and laid ſuch a Foundation of good Laws againſt Papiſts, as might ſerve for a Bulwark in the time to come. The King was not unmindful of the Lord Monteagle, the Firſt Diſcoverer of this Treaſon, for he gave to him and his Heirs for ever, Two hundred Pounds a Year in Fee-farm Rents; and Five hundred Pounds a Year beſides, during his Life, as a Reward for this good Service.

Rumour of the King's Death.

In the midſt of the Parliament's Activity, a Rumour was ſpread (by what ſtrange Means unknown) that the King was ſtabb'd at Okingham (Twenty Miles from London, where he was hunting) with a Poyſon'd Knife. The Court at Whitehall, the Parliament and City, took the Alarm; muſtering up their old Fears, every Man ſtanding at Gaze, as if ſome new Prodigy had ſeiz'd them; ſuch a Terror had this late Monſtrous intended Miſchief imprinted in the Spirits of the People, that they took Fire from every little Train of Rumour, and were ready to grapple with their own Deſtruction before it came. In the midſt of this Agony, there came Aſſurance of the King's ſafety, which he was enforced to divulge by Proclamation, to re-eſtabliſh the People. The Spaniſh Ambaſſador gave Sir Lewis Lewkner, Maſter of the Ceremonies, a Chain of Gold of good Value, for bringing him the News of the King's Safety, which preſently reſounded in the Court; and it was thought, he was ſo Bountiful, either out of Terror, being afraid of the People in this Confuſion, becauſe it was Rumour'd, that the King of Spain was a Fomenter of the Plot; or out of a Deſire to Vindicate his Maſter's Honour, and take the Odium from him; for he had been ſollicited by divers Jeſuits, together with theſe Conſpirators, to invade England. The Principal of which Jeſuits, called Henry Garnet (Provincial of the Order in England) was Arraign'd at Guildhall the Twentieth of March 1605, and Executed at the Weſt-end of St. Paul's ſoon after.

An. Reg. … An. Christi 1606.

Henry Lord Mordant, and Edward Lord Sturton, not coming to the Parliament according to their Writ of Summons, were ſuſpected to have knowledge of the Conſpiracy; and ſo was the Earl of Northumberland from ſome Preſumptions, and all three were committed to the Tower. The two Barons (after ſome Impriſonment) were redeem'd by Fine in the Star-Chamber, but the Earl continued a Priſoner there for many Years after.

The King of Denmark's firſt coming.

In July this Year, the King of Denmark (Brother to the Queen) came in Perſon as a Viſitor, where he found their Shakings ſomewhat ſettled, their Terrors abated, and met with not only all thoſe Varieties, that Riches, Power and Plenty are capable to produce for Satisfaction, where Will and Affection are the Diſpenſers; but he beheld with Admiration the Stately Theatre, whereon the Danes for many Hundreds of Years had acted their Bloody Parts: But how he reſented their Exit, or the laſt Act of that black Trajedy, wherein his Country loſt their Intereſt, ſome Divine Power, that ſearches the Capacious Hearts of Princes can only diſcover. This ſhort Month of his ſtay, carried with it as pleaſing a Countenance on every ſide, and of their Recreations and Paſtimes, flew as high a Flight, as Love mounted upon the Wings of Art and Fancy, the ſuitable Nature of the Seaſon, or Time's ſwift Foot could poſſibly arrive at. The Court, City, and ſome Parts of the Country, with Banquetings, Masks, Dancings, Tilting, Barriers, and other Gallantry (beſides the Manly Sports of Wreſtling, and the Brutiſh Sports of baiting wild Beaſts) ſwelled to ſuch a Greatneſs, as if there were an Intention in every particular Man, this Way to have blown up himſelf.

The Fifth of November made Holy day

The Seven and twentieth of May laſt, the Parliament was Prorogu'd to the Eighteenth of November following; but before they parted (having Hearts full of Affection for God's great Deliverance of the whole Kingdom from Ruine and Deſtruction) they made an Act to have the Fifth of November for ever Solemnized with publick Thankſgiving: Imputing the Diſcovery of the Treaſon to God, inſpiring the King with a Divine Spirit to Interpret ſome dark Phraſes of the Letter, above and beyond all ordinary Conſtruction. They attainted the Blood of thoſe Traytors that were Executed; as alſo, thoſe that were ſlain in the Field, or died in the Priſon. They made many good Laws for the Diſcovering and Suppreſſing of Popiſh Recuſants: And gave the King Three entire Subſidies, and Six Fifteens. Beſides, Four Subſidies of Four Shillings in the Pound granted by the Clergy. But they put off the Treaty of Union, by an Act that referr'd it to be done as well any other Seſſion of Parliament, ſo willing they were to keep cloſe to the King's Affections, and not to ſtart from him. But the next Seſſion (the King being loath to be longer delay'd) the Buſineſs of the Union was much preſſed again, by ſome that knew the King's Mind; among whom, Sir Francis Bacon (now the King's Sollicitor) was a principal Inſtrument, who came prepar'd for it, and firſt mov'd the Houſe of Commons, that the Scots might be Naturaliz'd by Act of Parliament; which was oppoſed by divers ſtrong and modeſt Arguments. Among which, they brought Arguments about Union.

in the Compariſon of Abraham and Lot, whoſe Families joining, they grew to Difference, and to thoſe Words, Vade tu ad dextram, & ego ad ſiniſtram.

An. Reg. 4. An. Christi 1606.

"It was answer'd, That Speech brought the Captivity of the One, they having disjoin'd their Strength. The Party opposing said, If we admit them into our Liberties, we shall be over-run with them, as Cattle (naturally) pent up by a slight Hedge, will over it into a better Soil; and a Tree taken from a barren Place, will thrive to excessive and exuberant Branches in a Better; witness the Multiplicity of the Scots in Polonia.

To which it was answer'd, That if they had not Means, Place, Custom and Employment, (not like Beasts but Men) they would starve in a plentiful Soil, though they came into it; and what Spring-tide and Confluence of that Nation have Housed and Familied themselves among us these Four Years of the King's Reign? And they will never live so meanly here as they do in Polonia; for they had rather discover their Poverty Abroad than at Home. Besides, there is a Question, whether England be fully Peopled? Witness the Drown'd Grounds and Common Wasts; the Ruines and Decays of ancient Towns in this Realm; Witness how many serve in the Parliament for desolate Boroughs; Witness our Wasts by Sea, as well as by Land; suffering the Flemings to carry all our Fishing; the Sinews of our Industry being slackned, we want active Spirits to Corroborate them by their Example: Besides the Planting Ireland, fully abounding with Rivers, Havens, Woods, Quarries, Good Soil, and Temperate Climate. No surcharge of People have been prejudicial to Countries; the worst will be an Honourable War, to Recover our ancient Rights, or Revenge our Injuries, or to attain to the Honour of our Ancestors. We should not forget the Consideration of Amplitude and Greatness, and fall at variance about Profit and Reckonings, fitter for private Persons than Kingdoms.

The other side objected, That the Fundamental Laws of both Kingdoms are divers; and it is declar'd, they shall so continue; and therefore it would not be reasonable to proceed to this Naturalization, whereby to endow them with our Rights, except they should receive and submit to our Laws.

It was answered, That in the Administration of the World under God, the great Monarch, his Laws are divers; one Law in Spirits, another in Bodies; one Law in Regions Celestial, another in Elementary; and yet the Creatures are all one Mass or Lump. That in the State of the Church, among People of several Languages and Lineages; there is a Communion of Saints, and we are all Fellow-Citizens, and Naturalizants of the Heavenly Jerusalem, and yet divers Ecclesiastical Laws, Policies, and Hierarchies; for the Laws are rather Figura Reipublicæ, than Forma; rather Bonds of Perfection, than Entireness. That in Ireland, Jersey, Guernsey and the Isle of Man, our Common Laws are not in force, and yet they have the Benefit of Naturalization.

To which it was reply'd, That these are only Flourishes of Rhetorick; for God (who is the only Disposer of all his Creatures) keeps them in Order and Obedience to Him, by a Law which they cannot deviate from, unless he withdraws his preserving Hand from them: But betwixt Man and Man, or Realm and Realm, there can be no such Tie or Obligation to hold an Unity, where they have various Laws and various Privileges. And for the Immunities given to the Irish (for some Ages past) they were English Colonies sent there to Plant, being a great Part of them Natives with us, of the same Blood and Stock, with whom we are ingrafted by Time, and made (as it were) one Body, the better to secure their Obedience, and hinder any League or Amity with a Foreign Nation. But Scotland hath an entire Union with the French, continu'd for some Hundreds of Years, that is indissolvable, and therefore incompetent yet to the Freedoms of England. When we have had as much Experience of the Friendship of Scotland, as of them, we shall incline to a more intimate Union. Besides, there is an Inequality in the Fortunes of the Two Nations; and by this Commixture, there may ensue Advantage to them, and Loss to us.

To the latter part was answer'd, Beatius est dare quam accipere: And Edward the First, among other Commendations of War and Policy, none was more celebrated than his Purpose and Enterprize for the Conquest of Scotland; as not bending his Designs to glorious Acquests Abroad, but solid Strength at Home; which, if it had succeeded, could not but have brought in those Inconveniencies of the Commixture of a more opulent Kingdom with a less; for it is not the Yoke, either of Laws or Arms, that can alter the Nature of the Climate, or the Nature of the Soil; neither is it the Manner of the Commixture, that can alter the Nature of the Commixture; and therefore if it were good for us then, it is good for us now; and not to be priz'd the less, because we paid not so dear for it.

They strive further to prove, That the Benefit of Naturalization is, by Law, to as many as have been, or shall be born, since the King's coming to the Crown; for there is no more than to bring the Ante-Nati unto the Degree of Post-Nati, that Men grown may be in no worse Case than Children, and Elder Brothers in no worse Condition than Younger Brothers. That if any object the Law is not so, but that the Post-Nati are Aliens as the rest, it is contrary to the Reason of Law. The Wisdom of the Common Laws of England is admirable, in distribution of the Benefit and Protection of the Law, according to the several Conditions of Persons. The Degrees are Four, Two of Aliens, and Two of Subjects: The First Degree is an Alien born under a King or State that is an Enemy; if such an one come into the Kingdom without safe Conduct, it is at his Peril; the Law giveth him no Protection, neither of Body, Lands, nor Goods; so as if he be slain, there is no remedy by any Appeal at the Party's Suit, though she were an English Woman; though at the King's Suit the Case may be otherwise, in regard of the Offence to the Peace and Crown. The Second Degree is of an Alien that is born under Faith and Allegiance of a King or State that is a Friend; unto such a Person the Law doth impart a greater Benefit and Protection concerning things Personal, Transitory and Moveable, as Goods and Chattels, Contracts, and the like, but not concerning Free-hold, and Inheritance; and the Reason is, because he may be an Enemy, though he be not; for the State where he was born, may enter into Hostility; and therefore as the Law hath but a Transitory Assurance of him, so it Rewards him with Transitory Benefits. The Third Degree is of a Subject, who having been an Alien, is made Free by Charter and Denization. To such one the Law doth impart yet a more ample Benefit; for it gives him a Power to purchase Freehold and Inheritance to his own Use, and likewise enables his Children (born after his Denization) to Inherit: But

But yet he cannot make Title, or convey any Pedigree from any Ancestor Paramount; for the Law thinks not good to make him in the same Degree with a Subject born, because he was once an Alien, and so might have been an Enemy; and Affections cannot be so settled by any Benefit, as when from their Nativity they are inbred, and inherent. The Fourth Degree, and the perfect Degree, is of such a Person, as neither is Enemy, nor can be Enemy in time to come, nor would have been Enemy at any time past; and therefore the Law gives unto him the full Benefit of Naturalization. Now if these be the true Steps and Paces of the Law, no Man can deny, but whosoever is born under the King's Obedience, never could, in aliquo puncto temporis, be an Enemy; and therefore in Reason of Law is Naturalized. So tho' the Scots seem to be in Reason Naturales ipso jure, yet it is not superfluous to have it done by Parliament; for it will shew the World our Love to them, and good Agreement with them.

Then they shewed by Authority of History and Experience, the Inconveniencies that may grow, if this Union of Naturalization doth not close, and bind up the Veins, so as to make it one perfect Body; for else it may be apt to open, and break out again upon all Occasions, and relapse to the Detriment of both; ripping up ancient Stories of the Romans and Latins, and the Wars they had, meerly for want of this Union, and never were at Quiet till they enjoy'd it. Then between the Peloponnesians and the Spartans the like. And from ancient Stories to the Kingdom of Arragon and Castile, united in the Persons of Ferdinando and Isabella, severed and divided from the rest of Spain in Privileges, and directly in this Point of Naturalization, or Capacity of Inheritance. But what came of this? A Rebellion grew among them, which a Royal Army with Difficulty suppressed, and (they being made one incorporated Body with the rest of Spain) perpetuated Peace to Posterity.

The like Example was betwixt Florence and Pisa. And whatsoever Kingdoms and States have been United, and that Union corroborated by the Bonds of Naturalization, you shall never observe them afterward, upon any Occasion, to break or sever again: Whereof divers Provinces in France, by time annex'd to that Crown, are further Witnesses. So that except they proceed to this Naturalization, these Realms will be in continual Danger to divide and break again.

Next, they shew the Benefits to be Security and Greatness. Surety, by stopping up the Postern-Gates of our Enemies; so that we shall not be so much a Temptation to the Ambition of Foreigners, when their Approaches and Avenues are taken away: For having so little Success when they had these Advantages, they will have less Comfort when they want them. And Greatness by this Union must needs follow: For having so many Iron handed Men in these Three Kingdoms, we shall not only pluck Gold from the (once poor) Spaniards Indian Mines, but by our Arms keep in Awe the whole Christian World.

These Arguments, press'd with gilded Oratory by the Solicitor and his Partakers, could not prevail, tho' urged with all the Power Wit could invent, or Hope aim at: For being new budded in Court, he was one of those that smooth'd his way to a full Ripeness, by liquorish and pleasing Passages, which he at last attain'd to, being made Lord Chancellor of England. But such Sweets, tho' delightful at present, breed Rottenness in the end; for he wither'd, and came to nothing, as in due time shall be express'd.

But the King (like a great Sea) being troubled when such cross Winds are boisterous, sent for both Houses of Parliament to Whitehall the last of March, 1607. to calm them; where betwixt a Sun-shine of fair Words, and a Cloud of Anger, he colours over some of the Arguments that had been used, and urges others for his best Advantage, with a plain natural Bluntness fit for Kings. He tells them, the Union he desires, is of Laws and Persons, such a Naturalizing as may make one Body of both Kingdoms; that as there is but Unus Rex, so there may be but Unus Grex, & Una Lex. His Intention is not, as some idly alledge, to give England the Labour, and Sweat, and Scotland the Fruit and Sweet, vainly talking of transplanting Trees out of barren Ground into better, and lean Cattle out of a bad Pasture into more fertile Soil. Can any Man displant them unless they will? Or is Scotland so strong, to pull them out of their Houses? Whereas the waste Grounds in Scotland would rather be planted by Swarms of People that cumber the Streets here.

The King's Speech to the Parliament about the Union.

First, He desires that all Hostile Laws should cease, being the King of England cannot make War with the King of Scotland.

Secondly, That there should be Community of Commerce, he being no Stranger, but descended of their ancient Kings: And how can he be Natural Liege Lord to both, and they Strangers to one another? And shall they that be under the same Allegiance be no freer, nor have no better Respect, than Frenchmen and Spaniards?

Thirdly, They all agree they are no Aliens, and yet will not allow them to be Natural. That he was informed by their own Judges and Lawyers, at his first Access to the Crown, that there was a difference between the Ante and Post-nati of each Kingdom; which caused him to publish a Proclamation, That the Post-nati were Naturaliz'd by his Accession; but he confesses, Judges may err; so may the Lawyers on their side: Therefore he admonishes them to beware to Disgrace either his Proclamations or the Judges, for so they may disgrace both their King and Laws; who have Power, when the Parliament is ended, to try them both for Lands and Lives.

And for some of them, who with their flattering Speeches would have the Ante-nati preferr'd, alledging their Merits in My Service, such Discourses have mel in ore, & fel in corde; carrying an outward Appearance of Love to the Union, but a contrary Resolution in their Hearts. For the King would have them know, it lies within the Compass of his Prerogative to prefer whom he pleases to any Dignity, Civil or Ecclesiastical. But he is so far from prejudicing the English, that he is willing to bind himself to reasonable Restrictions. Besides, it is a special Point of the King's Prerogative, to make Aliens, Citizens; and in any Case wherein the Law is thought not to be clear, Rex est Judex; for he is Lex loquens, supplying the Law where it wants. But this he speaks as knowing what belongs to a King, not intending to press it further than may agree with their Loves, and stand with the Conveniency of both Nations.

The Inconveniencies suppose to arise from Scotland, are pretended to be,

1. An evil Affection in the Scots to the Union.
2. That the Union is incompatible.
3. That the Gain is small, or none.

An. Reg. 5. An. Christi 1607.

If this be so, why is there Talk of an Union? For the First, they alledge the Averseness of the Scots from the Preface and Body of their Act; where they declare, they will remain an absolute and free Monarchy, and not alter the Fundamental Laws of the Kingdom. And yet in the beginning of this Session of Parliament, the Opinion was current, that Scotlad was greedy of this Union, and pursu'd it with so much Violence, that they car'd not for the Strictness of the Conditions, so they might attain the Substance, and End. And yet they now say, they are backwards, which is a Contradiction; for how can they both beg and deny the same thing at one and the same time? And by preserving their Fundamental Laws, they mean, those Laws by which Confusion is avoided, and their King's Succession and Monarchy maintain'd. To which he declares, That he is in Descent Three hundred Years before Christ, not meaning (as they do) their Common Law; for the Scots have no Law but that which is Jus Regis. And for their Desire of continuing a free Monarchy, he hopes they mean not he should set Garisons over them, as the Spaniards do over Sicily and Naples.

And then he tells them, That he governs Scotland with his Pen: He writes, and doth more by a Clerk of the Council, than others could do by the Sword. And tho' he knows there are many Seditious Persons in that Kingdom, that may talk lewdly enough, yet none of them ever spake dishonourably of England, as they have done of Scotland: For if any Man speaks any thing uncomely there, the Chancellor by his Authority interrupts him; but here they have Freedom to speak what they list, and, as long as they list, without Contradiction. Then the King shews what the Laws of Scotland are.

First, Those which concern Tenures, Wards, Liveries, Signiories, and Lands, are drawn out of the Chancery of England, brought by James the First, (who was bred up here) and differ only in Terms.

The Second are Statute Laws, to which he hopes they will be no Strangers.

The Third is the Civil Law, brought out of France by James the Fifth, and serve only to supply in such Cases where the Municipal Laws are defective: So that he hopes it is no hard Matter to unite the People together, who are, in effect, already subject to the same Law. And whereas it is objected, That the King of Scotland hath not a Negative Voice in Parliament, but must pass the Laws agreed on by the Lords and Commons; he assures them, That the Form of Parliament there is nothing enclin'd to Popularity: For about Twenty Days before the Parliament begins, Proclamation is made throughout the Kingdom, That all Bills to be exhibited that Session, be delivered to the Master of the Rolls by a certain Day: Then they are brought to the King, perused and consider'd by him; and only such as he allows are put into the Chancellor's Hand to be propounded that Parliament, and no other. And if any Man speak of any other Matter than is in this Form first allowed by him, the Chancellor tells him, That there is no such Bill allowed by the King: And when they are pass'd for Laws, he ratifies and confirms them, first racing out what he doth not approve of. And if this be to be call'd a Negative Voice in Parliament, then he hath one.

2. For the Union betwixt the French and the Scots, which makes this Union so incompatible, he assures them, it was a League only made between the Kings, not the People: For Scotland being sollicited by England and France at one time, for a League Offensive and Defensive, against each others Enemies, there was a great Disputation maintain'd in favour of England, that they being our Neighbours, joyned in one Continent a strong and powerful Nation, it would be more security to the State of Scotland to joyn in Amity with England, than with France divided by the Sea, where they must abide the hazard of Wind and Weather, and other Accidents that might hinder Relief.

But on the contrary, it was alledged in the Favour of France, That England ever sought to Conquer Scotland, and therefore there would never be kept any sound Amity: Whereas France, lying more remote, claim'd no Interest, and therefore would be found a more constant and faithful Friend; so it was concluded on their Part. But by the Tenour it was order'd to be renew'd, and confirm'd from King to King successively, by the Mediation of their Ambassadors, and therefore meerly Personal. And so it was renew'd in the Queen his Mother's time, but not by Assent in Parliament; which it could not have wanted, if it had been a League of the People: And in the King's time, when it came to be ratified, because it appear'd to be in Odium Tertii, it was by him left unrenew'd, in Consideration of his Title to the Crown.

For the Profit and Commodity that shall arise to England by this Union; who is so ignorant that doth not know the Gain will be great? Do they not gain by the Union of Wales? And is not Scotland greater than Wales? Shall not Lands, Seas, and Person, be added to their Greatness? Two Snow-balls put together, grow greater; two Houses join'd make one the larger; and two Castle-Walls made into one, makes one as thick and strong as both. And he professes, he seeks this Union only to advance the Greatness of their Empire here in England; yet with such Caution, as may stand with the Weal of both States. What is now desir'd, hath oft been sought, and not obtain'd; to refuse it then now, were double Iniquity: And for their Security in such reasonable points of Restriction which he shall agree to, they need not doubt his Inclination: For he will never say any thing he will not promise, nor promise any thing which he will not swear, nor swear any thing which he will not perform. 3.

This urg'd with Asseveration, might have wrought much with the Parliament; but that they apprehended a great Inconvenience in such an Union, where the Laws and Government are of different Natures. All were not Romans that were born Subjects to the Roman Empire; tho' St. Paul was born one, the Centurion was a Purchaser. For notwithstanding all the former Arguments by the King, and his Ministers, the Parliament knew that it is true, That if Scotland had been Conquer'd, the only way to tie them to Obedience, were to let them taste the Sweets of English Liberties. But to let them sit Triumphing upon their own Privileges, and roam about among the English Freedoms, were to make them straggle too much. The Scots would not lessen, nor in the least derogate from the Dignity of their long continued Monarchy; and the English thought they had no Reason to come to them to derogate from themselves. The Parliament only fear'd, the King's Power would have such an Influence upon the Judges of the Kingdom, that the Scots would be Naturaliz'd too soon, they were resolv'd not to be accessary to it; which indeed some two Years

The Parliament declined the Union.

An. Reg. 6. An. Christi 1608.

Years after was confirm'd in Calvin's Case of Post-nati, reported by the Lord Chief Justice Cook, who was fit Metal for any Stamp Royal; and adjudged by him, the Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, and most of the Judges of the Kingdom, in the Exchequer Chamber, though many strong and valid Arguments were brought against it, such Power is in the Breath of Kings, and such soft Stuff are Judges made of, that they can vary their Precedents, and model them into as many Shapes as they please. And thus this Case stood like a Statue cloath'd by the Lord chief Justice, in the vulgar Language, (when the rest of his Reports spoke an unknown Tongue,) that the Kingdom might take more particular Notice, that the Scots were as free in England as themselves, yet it fell not out to their Wishes. But all that could be gotten from the Parliament, was, That the Laws of Hostility that were anciently made betwixt England and Scotland were repeal'd, that the old Grudges which caused the Dis-union (the War in the Members) might be taken away. And in the said Act they provided, That if a natural born Subject of England did commit any Misdemeanour in Scotland, and flie into England, he should be tried where he was taken, and not carried into Scotland to receive his Judgment there; till such Time (which are the very Words of the Act) as both Kingdoms shall be made one in Laws and Government, which is the Thing so much desired, as that wherein the full Perfection of the blessed Union (already begun in the King's Royal Person) consisteth. And further they went not: For they found and fear'd the old Enmity would yet a while continue; for since the King's coming into England, the loose and uncomposed Borderers, that liv'd upon Rapine and Spoil, (seeking new Benefits from new Changes) had broke out and committed many Insolencies; who, though they were suppressed by the Forces of Berwick and Carlisle, and many of them suffer'd in it, yet Custom and Habit had bred in them a Natural Ferity; which could only be restrain'd by giving Freedom to the Laws, that within a short time gave bound to that barbarous Animosity. The Laws made in Scotland to the Prejudice of the English, were likewise repeal'd there; so that all Passages were made smooth on both sides. This Session also produc'd divers good Laws for the Benefit of the Common-wealth.

But this Session brought in no Money, that is as the Blood of the Subject, which he (as a wise Physician) would not strain from them the ordinary way, lest the Sense of it should bring the more Fears and Faintings with it; but by laying on little Burthens at first, he not only inured them to bear greater, but made them sweat out some of that Humour insensibly, though they felt it afterward, when they found the Weight laid upon their Shoulders, only (as they conceiv'd) to daub other Mens with Bravery. For the King's Bounty was seen by the vulgar Eye to overflow in many little Rivulets, who knew the golden Streams that out-faced the Sun, came not from the North's cold Climate, but were drain'd out of the Fountains of their Labour. They could not endure to see their Fellow-Subjects grow fat, by what should be their Nourishment. Collecting that the King had receiv'd Three hundred and fifteen thousand Pounds Subsidies due to the late Queen, besides what the Parliament had given him. And fearing that Proclamations (who were indeed very active Ministers) would now become Laws, ushering in the King's Will with large Stripes upon the Peoples Liberties, who lay down while they slept over them. The more ingenuous Sort, sensible of this incroaching Monarchy, brake out into private Murmur, which by degrees (being of a light Nature) carried a Cloud with it; by which the wise Pilots of the State, fore-seeing a Storm gathering, strive to dissipate the next Session of Parliament, which was held the 19th of February, in the Seventh Year of our King's Reign,

Not long after this, the Earl of Dorset, Lord High Treasurer, died suddenly, as he sate at the Council Table; which gave Occasion to some Persons disaffected to him, (as what eminent Officer that hath the Management of Monies can please all?) to speak many Things to his Dishonour. But they considered not, that, besides the black Worm and the white, (day and Night, as the Riddle is) that are gnawing constantly at the Root of this Tree of Life, there are many insensible Diseases, as Apoplexies, whose Vapours suddenly extinguish the Animal Spirits; and Apostems, both in the upper and middle Region of Man, that often drown and suffocate both Animal and Vital; who are like imbodied Twins, the one cannot live without the other: If the Animal Spirits fail, the Vital cannot subsist; if the Vitals perish, the Animal give over their Operations. And he that judges ill of such an Act of Providence, may have the same Hand, at the same time, writing within the Palace Walls of his own Body, the same Period to his Life's Earthly Empire. The Death of the Earl of Dorset suddenly.

The Earl of Salisbury succeeded him; a Man nourished with the Milk of Policy, under his Father the Lord Burley, famous for Wisdom in his Generation) a Courtier from his Infancy, battel'd by Art and Industry under the late Queen, Mother of her Country. Though Nature was not propitious to his Outside, (being crook'd Back'd) she supplied that Want with admirable Endowments within. This Man the King found Secretary, and Master of the Wards; and to these he added the Treasurer's Staff, knowing him to be the Staff of his Treasury: For he had Knowledge enough to pry into other Mens Offices as well as his own, and knew the Ways of disbursing the King's Moneys. The Earl of Northampton he made Lord Privy Seal; and these were the two prime Wheels of his Triumphant Chariot. The Earl of Suffolk was made Lord Chamberlain before; but he came far behind in the Management of the King's Affairs, being a Spirit of a more grosser Temper, fitter to part a Fray, and compose the Differences of a disordered Court, than a Kingdom. Upon the Shoulders of the two first, the King laid the Burthen of his Business: for though he had many Lords his Creatures, some by Creation, and some by Insinuation, (for Kings will never want supple-hand Courtiers) and the Bishops, being his Dependents, the most of them tending by direct Lines towards him, as the Center of their Advancement; so that he (like the Supreme Power) mov'd this upper Region, for the most part, and that had an Influence upon the lower, the inferiour Orbs: Yet these two Noblemen were the two great Lights that were to discover the King's Mind to the Parliament, and by whose Heat and Vigour the blessed Fruits of Peace and Plenty should be produc'd. The Earl of Salisbury made Treasurer

The Lord Treasure (by a Command from the King) instructs both Houses in their Business, and what they shall do well to insist upon Salisbury and Northampton Sticklers for the King.

An. Reg. 7. An. Christi 1609.

upon this Seſſion. Firſt, to ſupply his Majeſty's Wants. Secondly, to eaſe the People of their Grievances. They go commonly yoak'd together: For the Peoples Grievances are the King's Wants, and the King's Wants are the Peoples Grievances; How can they be ſeparated? If the King will always want, the People will always ſuffer: For Kings, when they do want, lay commonly lawleſs Impoſitions on the People, which they muſt take off again with a Sum of Money, and then they want again to a continued Viciſſitude.

Theſe two Propoſitions are ſweeten'd by him with a third; which is, to make the Parliament Witneſſes of thoſe great Favours and Honours that his Majeſty intended his Royal Son, Prince Henry, in creating him Prince of Wales: Which though the King might do without a Parliament, and that divers Kings his Predeceſſors had done ſo, (as by many Precedents was manifeſted) yet being deſirous to have a happy Union betwixt him and his People, he would have nothing reſound ill in their Ears from ſo eminent an Inſtrument to the Kingdom's Good as his Son. Then they excuſe the King's Neceſſities, proceeding from his great Disburſements: For the Three hundred and fifty thouſand Pounds Subſidies, due in the late Queen's time, he receiv'd with one Hand, and paid her Debts with another, redeeming the Crown Lands which ſhe had mortgag'd to the City. He kept an Army of Nineteen thouſand Men in Ireland for ſometime afoot; wherein a great many of the Nobility were Commanders, and other deſerving Soldiers that would have been expoſed to Want and Penury, if not ſupplied: And it was not ſafe for the King to truſt the inveterate Malice of a new reconciled Enemy, without the Sword in his Hand. ‖ The late Queen's Funeral Charges were reckon'd up, which they hoped the Parliament would not repine at: Nor was it fit the King ſhould come in as a private Perſon, bringing in one Crown on his Head, and finding another here; or his Royal Conſort, with our future Hopes (like ſo many precious Jewels) expoſed to Robbers, without a Guard and Retinue? How fit was the Magnificence at the King of Denmark's being here? And how juſt that Ambaſſadors from Foreign Princes (more than ever this Crown received) ſhould find thoſe Entertainments and Gratuities, the want whereof would put a dim Luſtre abroad on the moſt ſparkling Jewels of the Crown; Beſides, the neceſſary Charge of ſending Ambaſſadors to others, being concurrent and mutual Civilities among Princes.

That theſe are the Cauſes of the King's Wants, and not his irregular Bounty, though a Magnificent Mind is inſeparable from the Majeſty of a King. If he did not give, his Subjects and Servants would live in a Miſerable Climate; and for his Bounty to thoſe that were not born among us, it muſt be remembred he was born among them; and not to have them taſte of the Bleſſing he had attain'd, were to have him change his Virtue with his Fortune. Therefore they deſire the King's Wants may be ſupplied; a Thing eaſie to be granted, and not to be valued by Wiſe Men, nor ſpoken of without Contempt. Philoſophy ſaith, that all Riches are but Food and Raiment, the reſt is Nugarium quiddam: And that it is but Puris pars terræ, and therefore but Craſſior pars aquæ, a thing unworthy the Denial to ſuch a King who is not only the Wiſeſt of Kings, but the very Image of an Angel, that hath brought good Tidings, and ſettled us in the Fruition of all good Things. He whoſe depth of Knowledge, as well as Conſcience, deſerves the Title of Fidei Defenſor; whoſe Numerous Iſſue makes Foreign Princes ſtudy to keep their own, not look abroad. He that hath ſhut the Back-door of the Kingdom, and placed Two Lions, a Red and a Yellow to ſecure it; who would have us live under our Own Olive, that we may Lætari & benefacere. That none will wonder at the Want, or ſtartle at the Supply, but ſuch as ſtudy to ſerve their own Turns, and believe nothing but what they find written in the Stories of their own Ignorance. Among which thoſe are to be reckon'd, who (hearing of an Order to bind up the Printed Proclamation in a Book, that the better Notice may be taken of the things contain'd in them) have raiſed a Bruit, that it was intended this Parliament to make Proclamations equal to the Laws, which never entred into the King's Heart; who is ſo far from governing by Will and Power, that he will yield to any Motion from them, wherein they ſhall hold a juſt Diameter and Proportion among themſelves, and obſerve thoſe Duties due to a Great and Gracious King.

Thus theſe Lords did pleaſe themſelves and the King, by ſtriving to keep the People in the milky way of Obedience, which they had long ſuck'd in, and found the Sweet of it tending to Nouriſhment, not yet meeting any Gallous or Brawny Conſtitution, (which muſt harden them by Degrees) nor yet finding their own Tempers grown Robuſt enough, by ſo harſh a Diet as afterwards they met with. They therefore are willing to go on in the Way pointed out to them, as Pupills follow their Maſters, minding rather the Smoothneſs of the Tract they ſaw, than the Roughneſs of the End. Yet ſome of them, whoſe Hopes were not ſo high Mounted, and their Spirits more, ſpoke plainly, That the whole Wealth of England would not ſerve the King's vaſt Bounty; therefore it was a vain thing to give him that would give it away again: That Gold and Silver in Edinburgh now in our Solomon's time are like the Stones in the Streets, never ſo much glittering there, like a perpetual Spring time. Beſides they look upon the King's Encroachments upon the Publick Liberty, by undermining the Laws, taking notice of ſome Expreſſions that fell from him publickly at his Dinner, in derogation of the Common-Law, extolling highly the Civil Law before it; and approving a Book lately written by Dr. Cowel, a Civilian, againſt it: Which nettled our great Lawyers, that had not ſome of them been raiſed ſo high, that they could not with that Court-gag look downwards, it had bred a Conteſt.

The High Commiſſion alſo began now to ſwell into a Grievance, which the Parliament complain'd of. Seldom is Authority and Power exerciſed with Moderation: Every Man muſt conform to the Epiſcopal way, and quit his hold in Opinion or Safety. That Court was

The High Commiſſion a Grievance.

‖ Queen Elizabeth's Funeral was nothing extraordinary, and could hardly ſwell up any great Article of his Debts. King James was ſo very glad to have it over, that as he went not into Cloſe Mourning before her Interment, ſo he gave poſitive Orders the Court-mourning ſhould be left off in leſs than Two Months after it.

An. Reg. 7. An. Christi 1609. the Touch-stone, to try whether Men were Metal for their Stamp; and if they were not soft enough to take such Impressions as were put upon them, they were made Malleable there, or else they could not pass current. This was the beginning of that Mischief, which, when it came to a full Ripeness, made such a bloody Tincture in both Kingdoms, as never will be got out of the Bishops Lawn-sleeves. And though these Apples of Strife thrown in the Way did a little retard the Course in Hand, yet they carried not the Prize: For the King, according to his old wont, (like a cunning Hunter) when they began to run counter, call'd them off, and at Whitehall by one of his Lectures he strives to bring them into the Way again; by laying himself open as in a Glass, wherein, if they could not See his Heart, they might Scent out his Meaning, and so follow the Chace which was to be pursued.

The K's Speech to both Houses. He tells them, Though the King's Heart be in the Hands of the Lord, yet he will set it before the Eyes of the People; assuring them, That he never meant to govern by any Law, but the Law of the Land; though it be disputed among them, as if he had an Intention to alter the Law, and govern by the absolute Power of a King. He knew, he said, the Power of Kings, resembling it to the Power Divine: For as God can create and destroy, make and unmake at his Pleasure, so Kings can give Life and Death, judge All, and be judged of None. They can exalt low Things, and abase high Things, making the Subjects like Men at Chess, a Pawn to take a Bishop or a Knight. (But he left out the Power of a Pawn to take a Queen, or check a King.) And when he had raised the King's Power to the Height, with Vos dii estis, he brings them down again, with, They shall die like Men: And that all Kings, who are not Tyrants or Perjur'd, will bound themselves within the Limits of their Laws, and they that perswade them the contrary, are Vipers and Pests both against them and the Commonwealth. Yet as it is Blasphemy to dispute what God may do, so it is Sedition in Subjects to dispute what a King may do in the height of his Power. And as he will not have his Subjects discourse of what he may, so he will do nothing but what shall be consonant to Law and Reason. Then he strives to mitigate the sharpness of the Words drop'd from him at the Table to the Disparagement of the Common Law; and assures them, Though he likes the Civil Law very well, as being Lex Gentium, which maintains intercourse with Foreign Nations, and is fitted to the Ecclesiastical Courts, Court of Admiralty, and Courts of Request; yet he is so far from disavowing the Common Law, that he protests, If he were to chuse a new Law for this Kingdom, he would prefer it before any other National Law; yea, the Law of Moses, nay, without Blasphemy, the very Law of God. Then he recalls himself, and tells them, That though for this Nation he had preferr'd the Common Law to the Law of God, yet it is Inferiour to the Judicial Law. For no Book or Law is free from Corruption, but the Book and Law of God.

And therefore he could wish that Three things specially were purged out of the Common Law.

First, That it were written in the Vulgar Tongue, and made plain to the Peoples Understanding, that they might know what to obey; that the Lawyers in the Law, like the Romish Priests in the Gospel, might not keep the People in Ignorance.

Secondly, That the Common Law might have a settled Text in all Cases, for being grounded upon old Customs, Reports, and Cases of former Judges, called Responsa prudentum, which are not binding (for divers times Judges disclaim them, and recede from the Judgment of their Predecessors) it were good upon mature Deliberation, that the Exposition of the Law were set down by Act of Parliament, that the People might know what to depend upon.

Thirdly, There is in the Common Laws divers contrary Reports and Precedents, and divers Statutes and Acts of Parliament, that do cross one another, being so penn'd, that they may be taken in divers Senses; therefore he could wish, they might be review'd, and reconcil'd. And whereas he is thought an Enemy to Prohibitions, he saith, He is not ignorant of the Necessity of them, if every Stream might run in its own Channel; but the Overflowing and Super-abundance of them in every Court, striving to bring more grist to their Mill, was a Distemper fit to be Cured; therefore he did not disallow the Use, but the Abuse.

Then he closes with the House of Commons, and not only thanks them for the Bonfire they made of certain Papers, which were presented Grievances from some discontented Murmuring Spirits; but he instructs them how to receive Grievances hereafter: In which, he would have them careful to avoid Three Things.

The First, That they meddle not with the main Points of Government, that is his Craft, Tractent fabrilia fabri. To meddle with that were to lessen him, who hath been Thirty Years at the Trade in Scotland, and served an Apprenticeship of Seven Years here; therefore here needs no Phormios to teach Hannibal.

Secondly, He would not have such ancient Rights as he hath received from his Predecessors accounted Grievances; that were to judge him unworthy to enjoy what they left him.

And Lastly, That they should be careful not to present that for a Grievance, which is establish'd by a Law; for it is very undutiful in Subjects to press their King wherein they are sure to be deny'd. Complaints may be made unto them of the High Commissioners, let the Abuse appear then, and spare not, there may be Errors among them; but to take away the Commission, is to derogate from him; and it is now in his Thoughts to rectify it in a good Proportion.

Then he shews the emergent Cause of his great Expences, since his coming to the Crown, which makes him desire a Supply from them, confirming what the Lords formerly deliver'd; wherein he said, When they open'd his Necessities unto them, his Purse only Labour'd, now his Desires are taken notice of both at Home and Abroad, his Reputation Labours as well as his Purse; for the World will think it want of Love in them, or Merit in him, that both lessen'd their Hearts, and tied up their Hands towards him.

Thus the King express'd himself to the Parliament, desiring their Assistance, assuring them, He had no Intention to alter the Government, though he wish'd the Laws might be rectify'd. But his King-craft (as he calls it) fail'd in striking at the Common Law; and he was convinced in it, how dangerous it was to give too much Knowledge to the People: The Two great Hammers of the State, the Church-man and Lawyer, that work the People to Obedience upon the Two Anvils of Conscience and Policy,

An. Reg. 7. An. Christi 1609.

Policy, bear him to the Understanding of it; so that ever after he join'd with them, and that Three-fold Cord was not easily dissolv'd. But the times not being ripe yet to produce any thing but the Fruits of Obedience, they after this Lesson settled themselves to make divers good Laws, which they purchased at the rate of a Subsidy and a Fifteen.

A Proclamation against new Buildings.

About this time, the Suburbs betwixt London and Westminster had many ruinous Piles of Building, which Age had worn out, and Industry and Riches (the two great Supporters of this Momentary Eternity) did strive to renew. Among the rest, the Lord Treasurer erected out of the Rubbish of the old Stables of Durham-house, a goodly Fabrick, to be Rival to the Old-Exchange, which the King by his Presence dignified with the Name of Britain's Burse. But he took notice of, the swelling Buildings upon the new Foundations, which he look'd upon as a Rickety Constitution in the Head of the Kingdom, being Inviters of a Flux of Humours and Diseases to be near the Court; besides, he fear'd the Plague would come too near Whitehall, if that Distemper encreased. † And therefore he carefully, with mature deliberation of his Council, forbids all New Buildings to be set up for the future, within Two Miles of the City; and by Proclamation strictly commands, if any be, they shall be pulled down, tho' not taken notice of till Seven Years after. Whereby many Men (that did not so well heed the Proclamation) laid out their whole Estates upon little Hovels, and building fair Houses upon New Foundations (though it were but two Yards from the Old) they became Trespassers, and must either purchase their Houses again at a dear rate, or pull them down, both ways tending to their Ruine. Thus falling under the Stroke of the Time's rough Hand, without a Providential Care of the Danger that would follow: For what was so strictly forbidden then, was permitted after; and those Reasons that caused the restraint then (the increase of the Plague) were found upon better Experience to be a Remedy; for there was more Room and better Air to prevent it, among thin and single Families, than full-crouded Houses. And this Severity had a Second Consideration, which was, to prevent the greatness of the Body of the Kingdom from swelling to be all Head, when the Head it felt wanted so much increase of Building, as to plump, and make those thin Parts appear more round and beautiful, which was then a Disgrace, but is now an Ornament to both Cities. So that what the Wisdom of one time doth decry, the Experience of another may advance: Such is the World's career! And they are only Miserable, whose imprudence, or ill luck, puts them in the way to be over-run by it.

The Siege of Juliers.

, This Year 1609. begot a Truce betwixt the King of Spain, and the Low-Countries; yet by the Death of the Duke of Cleve, the War was like to revive again: For while two petty Princes, Brandenburgh and Newburgh, strove for the Inheritance, Spain, like the Vulture in the Fable, attempted to catch it from both, seizing upon Juliers, one of the chief Strengths of the Country; which the States of the Netherlands, by the help of our King, and Henry IV. of France, besieg'd, and recover'd again. Sir Edward Cecil, Brother to the Earl of Salisbury, commanded Four thousand English at that Siege, whose Conduct gave Life to his Soldiers Valour, and that advanced the Glory of his Conduct. But where such fiery Spirits are congregated into a Body, there will be often violent and thundring Eruptions. Sir Hatton Cheek was next Commander to Sir Edward Cecil, a Man of a gallant and daring Courage in the difficultest Enterprises; who speaking to Sir Thomas Dutton (one of the Captains under his

† The Author, though he reasons well enough upon the Conveniencies and Inconveniencies of these new raised Buildings, omits the Illegality of the Proclamation that prohibited them; and has so much good Nature as to conceal the true Reason of this Proclamation, which, in the Opinion of most other Writers, was to bring in Money to some Favourites.

, Why the Author has pass'd over so slightly this Treaty between Spain and the States of Holland, is the more strange, That it was the first Scene in which King James appear'd abroad, either as a Party or Mediator, since his Accession to the Crown of England; and was of such consequence, that all Europe was kept in suspence for several Years about the Event of it.

Indeed King James's Part in that Treaty was as mean as that of Henry IV. of France; the other Mediator was Glorious. And his Conduct towards the States for whom he pretended to Mediate, and towards France with whom he join'd the Mediation, was quite different from the Methods and Maxims observ'd by his Predecessor Queen Elizabeth.

There were employ'd in that Treaty two Ambassadors, Mediators from each of these two Crowns, one Extraordinary, and another Ordinary. All along, during the Course of it, the English Ambassadors gave not only the hand to the French, but in both the Treaty it self, and in the Guarantee of it, the Ordinary Ambassador of France is nam'd before the Extraordinary Ambassador of England.

But this was not all; for notwithstanding this low Condescention of King James, and though he was mediating a Treaty, wherein the States of Holland were to be acknowledg'd Free and Independent; yet at the same time his Ambassador in Turkey gave it out industriously, and would have had it believ'd there, that the States were Feudatory and Depending of England.

This Story of the English Ambassadors at the Port was thought of such consequence in France, that President Jeannin, their Ambassador Extraordinay at that Treaty, was commanded to demand of the States an Authentick Declaration to the contrary, in order to be Transmitted to Constantinople.

It's true, Jeannin wrote back to the French Ministers, That he thought such a Declaration was needless; and that it would be sufficient to send to Constantinople a Copy of the Treaty between Spain and the States, wherein the King of England enter'd as Guarantee, and in which the States are own'd and acknowledg'd by all Parties Independent Sovereigns. But withall, (adds Jeannin) If these Reasons should not be thought sufficient, he would demand the Declaration they desir'd, which he question'd not easily to obtain.

What opinion the French Ministers had of King James in that Treaty, appears frequently in the same Jeannin's Printed Negotiations, and in several of his Letters to King Henry: In which he tells him again and again, That King James was never hearty in the Treaty, but had all along condemn'd the Hollanders for throwing off the Sovereignty of Spain upon the Account of its bad Example. In Answer to one of which Letters, King Henry owns his knowledge of King James his ill Intentions towards the States; and withal tells Jeannin, His Carriage did not break his sleep; ending his Letter with this word of Contempt, rarely us'd mong Princes of that Rank, Je scay sa porte & les Inclinations de son Peuple: I know his Capacity and the Inclinations of his Subjects.

That the States themselves had no better Opinion of him, appears in a Printed Letter of the two French Ambassadors to King Henry: Therein they acquaint him with a private Conference between Barnevelt, the first Minister of the States, and Jeannin; at which the former told him as a Secret, That his Country-men were sensible, King James bore no good Will to them; Hated them and their Cause in his Heart, and inclin'd more to the Spaniard; But that they were oblig'd to dissemble with him, and accept of his Mediation, for fear he should join with the Spaniard against them.

An. Reg. 8. An. Christi 1610.

Command) somewhat hastily, Dutton disdaining to be snapt up, (being a Man of a crabbed Temper) returned as hot an Answer, which broke into a Flame: But Dutton quenched it, by telling Sir Hatton Cheek, He knew he was his Officer, which tied him in the Army to a strict Obedience; but he would break that Bond, and vindicate himself in another Place: And instantly quitting his Command, he went for England.

A Duel betwixt Sir Hatton Cheek, and Sir Thomas Dutton.

Some small time after the taking of Juliers, Cheek fell sick; and his Distemper was the greater, because he had heard Dutton strove to defame him, both in Court and City; for being full with Passion, he vented it with Freedom enough in every place. Cheek being recover'd, and Heart-whole, would not give time to his decay'd Limbs to suck in their old Vigour, but sends to Dutton that threatn'd him, to give an Account of the large Expence of his Tongue aginst him. Dutton, that waited for such a Reckoning, willingly accepted the Summons: Cheek took Pigot, one of his Captains, to be his Second; Dutton took Captain Gosnald, both Men of well-spread Fame; and they Four met on Calais Sands: On which dreadful Stage, at first meeting, Dutton began to expostulate his Injuries, as if a Tongue Combat might decide the Controversy; but Cheek would dispute it otherwise. Then their Seconds searching, and stripping them to their Shirts in a cold Morning, they run with that Fury on each other's Sword, as if they did not mean to kill each other, but strive who should first die. Their Weapons were Rapier and Dagger, a fit Banquet for Death. At the first Course, Cheek run Dutton into the Neck with his Rapier, and stab'd him in the Neck backward with his Dagger, miraculously missing his Windpipe: And at the same instant, like one Motion, Dutton ran Cheek through the Body, and stab'd him into the Back with his left Hand, locking themselves together thus with four bloody Keys, which the Seconds fairly open'd, and would fain have closed up the bleeding Difference; but Cheek's Wounds were deadly, which he finding, grew the violenter against his Enemy; and Dutton seeing him begin to stagger, went back from his Fury, only defending himself, till the other's Rage, weaken'd with Loss of Blood, without any more Hurt, fell at his Feet. Dutton, with much Difficulty, recover'd his dangerous Wounds but Cheek by his Servants had a sad Funeral; which is the bitter Fruit of Fiery Passions.

Henry the Fourth of France stabb'd by Ravillac.

The next Year was fatal to Henry the Great of France, who (in the heighth of his Glory, when he had imp'd his Wings with a mighty Army, and a Mass of Treasure, and none knew which way his towring Spirit would fly) was stopt by a horrid Hand, that with a poyson'd Knife cut out his Passage to another World: Such poor and penetrable Things are Kings, as well as other Men! And when in this World's Sea they have toil'd their Spirits, in a continued Tempest of fond Hopes, and built upon the Sand their vast Desires, either old Age doth wash them quite away, or else some sudden Storm makes them cast Anchor upon the Shores of Death, and there's an end. But one Act of Providence is very remarkable towards him, as a Fore-runner of this ensuing Mischief. When he came first to the Crown, (which he as it were) snatch'd out of the Fire, the whole Kingdom being in a Flame) he was a professed Protestant, so born, and so bred up; but finding himself in a tottering Condition among his Popish Subjects, for his better Security, he did something comply with them in Ecclesiastical Affairs, which gave great Scandal to the Reformed; yet did not much advance him in the good Opinion of their Opposites: For the Jesuits, unconfident of him, inclining more to the hot Zeal of Spain) one of their Instruments stab'd him into the Mouth with a Knife, without much Hurt: Which done, an Intimate of his, that came to visit him, told him plainly, That the Hand of God was much seen in this Action; for he had now denied the Truths of God, and the Religion he suck'd in with his Milk, but from the Teeth outward; and therefore this Punishment came to him as a Warning: But let him take Heed of denying it with his Heart; for if he did, (it is to be fear'd) God would strike him there also: Both which were too much manifested. So suitable often are God's Judgments to our Sins!

The Venom of this Blow reach'd presently into England, and came somewhat near to our King's Heart; therefore he took the best way to prevent his Fears, by striving to prevent his Dangers, having no other End but his own: For when he consider'd the Horridness of the Powder-Plot, and by it the irreconcileable Malice of that Party, he thought it the safest Policy, not to stir those Ashes where so much Fire was cover'd; which gave way to a Flux of that Jesuitical Humour to infest the Body of the Kingdom.

A Proclamation against Jesuits.

But now being startled with this poyson'd Knife, he ventures upon a Proclamation, strictly commanding all Jesuits and Priests out of the Kingdom, and all Recusants to their own Houses, not to come within Ten Miles of the Court; and secures all the rest of his Subjects to him, by an universal taking of the Oath of Allegiance; which the Parliament, both Lords and Commons, (then sitting) began, and the rest of the People follow'd, to the King's great Contentment.

For the last Session the Parliament was prorogu'd till the Sixteenth of October this Year; and meeting now, they were willing to secure their Allegiance to the King out of Piety; yet they were so stout, (even in those Youthful Days, which he term'd Obstinacy) that they would not obey him in his Encroachments upon the Publick Liberty, which he began then to practise: For being now season'd with Seven Years Knowledge in his Profession here, he thought he might set up for himself, and not be still Journeyman to the lavish Tongue of Men, that pry'd too narrowly into the Secrets of his Prerogative, which are Mysteries too high for them, being Arcana Imperii, fitter to be admir'd than question'd: But the Parliament were apprehensive enough, that those hidden Mysteries made many dark Steps into the People's Liberties; and they were willing, by the Light of Law and Reason, to discover what was the King's, what theirs: Which the King unwilling to have search'd into, (after Five Sessions in Six Years time) dissolved the Parliament by Proclamation.

Prince Henry created Prince of Wales.

Prince Henry, the prime Branch of this Royal Cedar, now growing Manly, (being in the Sixteenth Year of his Age) put forth himself in a more Heroick manner than was usual with Princes of his Time, by Tiltings, Barriers, and other Exercises on Horseback, the Martial Discipline of gentle Peace, which caught the Peoples Eyes, and made their Tongues the Messengers of their Hearts, in daily extolling his hopeful and gallant Towardliness to Admiration. And now the King thought him full of Ripeness for the Honour of Knighthood, (which admitted of a willing Contribution from the People; and such old Customs as bring in Money are never out of Date) and (to add the more Splendour to his sparkling Youth) created him Prince of Wales, as he formerly intimated to the Parliament) with all the Pomp and Solemnity that a great King could express to a hopeful Son, his First-born; or the Merit of a Prince (that floated in the Peoples Affections) could possibly attain to: For as yet the King could discover nothing in him but that harmless and wanton Innocency that commonly accompanies Youth, being of a light Nature, and soon blown away. But how far the King's Fears (like thick Clouds) might afterwards blind the Eye of his Reason, when he saw him (as he thought) too high mounted in the Peoples Love, and of an alluring Spirit, to decline his Paternal Affection to him, and bring him to the low Condition he fell in, may be the Subject of my Fears, not of my Pen. With this Ingrandizing Title the King added a great Revenue, establishing also a full and splendent Retinue and Family to attend his Person at St. James's, now appointed to be the Prince's Court, where this new Star, plac'd in the Third House, might be fear'd to culminate, and become Lord of the Ascendant His Palace being as gloriously attended with young and sprightly Blossoms, as the King's was with older, and more sage Plants. And now the King deliberates for a Wife for him, and sends to Sir Charles Cornwallis, his Lieger Ambassador in Spain, to treat with that King for his eldest Daughter. But after some Traverses, it was found there was more Time lost than Ground gotten: For Princes in Treaties lie at the Snap, and the most backward often gets the better of it. But the King being not so hot then for this, as he was after for the other Son, with another Sister (the eldest being matched into France) made a quicker and a more honourable Retreat.

ad-

Bancroft Archbishop of Canterbury dies.

About this time Richard Bancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury, died; a Person severe enough, whose Roughness gain'd little upon those that deserted the Ceremonies. ‖ One Work of his shew'd his Spirit better than the ruggedest Pen can depaint it: For it was he that first brought the King to begin a new College by Chealsea, wherein the choice and ablest Scholars of the Kingdom, and the most pregnant Wits in Matters of Controversies, were to be associated under a Provost, with a fair and ample Allowance, not exceeding Three thousand Pounds a Year, whose Design was to answer all Popish Books, or others, that vented their malignant Spirits against the Protestant Religion, either the Heresies of the Papists, or the Errors of those that strook at Hierarchy; so that they should be two-edg'd Fellows, that would make old cutting and slashing; and this he forwarded with all Industry during his time; and there is yet a formal Act of Parliament in being for the establishment of it: But after his Death the King wisely considered, that nothing begets more Contention than Opposition, and such Fuellers would be apt to inflame, rather than quench the Heat that would arise from those Embers: For Controversies are often (or for the most part) the Exuberancies of Passion; and the Philosopher saith, Men are drunk with Disputes, and in that Inordinateness take the next thing that comes to hand to throw at one anothers Faces; so that the Design fell to the Ground with him; and there is only so much Building standing by the Thames-side, as to shew, that what he intended to Plant, he meant should be well Watered; and yet it wither'd in the Bud. I can lay nothing to the Charge of this great Man, but from common Fame; yet this I may truly say, That for his Predecessor Whitgift, and his Successor Abbot, I never heard nor read any thing tending to their Disparagement: But on him, some unhappy Wit vented this Pasquin;

7 Regis.

Here lies his Grace in cold Earth clad,
Who died with Want of what he had.

The Queen was Mistress of Somerset-House, (as well as the Prince was Master of St. James's) and she would fain have given it the Name of Denmark-house, which Name continued her time among her People; but it was afterwards left out of the common Calendar, like the dead Emperor's new-nam'd Month. She was not without some Grandees to attend her for outward Glory; the Court being a continued Maskarado, where she and her Ladies, like so many Sea-Nymphs, or Nereides, appear'd often in various Dresses, to the Ravishment of the Beholders: The King himself not being a little delighted with such fluent Elegancies, as made the Nights more Glorious than the Day. But the Latitude that these high-flying Fancies, and more speaking Actions, gave to the lower World to judge and censure, even the greatest with Reproaches, shall not provoke Me so much as to stain the innocent Paper. I shall only say in general, That Princes, by how much they are greater than others, are look'd upon with a more severe Eye; if their Virtues be not suitable to their Greatness, they lose much of their Value: For it is too great an Allay to such Refinedness to fall under the common Conizance.

Masks in great esteem.

Pembroke a Favourite

Montgomery a Favourite.

As she had her Favourites in one place, the King had his in another. She lov'd the elder Brother, the Earl of Pembroke; he the younger, whom he made Earl of Montgomery, and Knight of the Garter: But either not finding him suitable to his Humour or Affections, or seeing another Object more delightful, his Fancy ran with a violent Stream upon a young Gentleman, who had neither Parts nor Birth to entertain such a Current. His Name was Robert Car, born about Edinburgh in Scotland, descended from Gentry of that Name, a young Man about Twenty Years of Age, a comely Personage, mix'd with a handsome and courtly Garb, which he had been practising in France, and lately came over. Sir James Hayes, some say the Lord Dingwell, at a Tilting (among the rest of the Car a Favourite.

‖ I am apt to think the Author is mistaken about the Original of this intended College at Chelsea. It was one Sutcliffe, Doctor in Divinity, that procur'd a Patent from King James for erecting this College, to consist of a Provost and Twenty Fellows, to be chosen by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, and the Vice Chancellors of the two Universities for the time being; which College he intended to build and endow, and in part did, with his own Money, and the free Contributions of others. He was the First Provost himself, and dy'd either after Archbishop Bancroft, or about the same time; for there were three Provosts after him successively, whereof the Learned Dr. Featly was one.

Now, how far Archbishop Bancroft might encourage Sutcliffe's Design, I know not: But if it had been Originally Bancroft's own, it's not probable King James would have discourag'd it afterwards, as he did; or that his next Successor but one, Archbishop Laud, would have utterly neglected a Foundation laid by a Prelate, whose Memory he held in the highest Veneration, and whose Maxims and Character he made it his Business to imitate.

Pages

An. Reg. 9. An. Chriſti 1611.

Pages and Gentlemen that in their richeſt Ornaments attended him for that Day's Triumph) made Choice of Mr. Car (according to the Cuſtom) to preſent his Shield and Device to the King; and as he was deſcending, the Horſe, full of Fire and Heat, prevented him, threw him down before the King, and broke his Leg. This Accident gave the King Occaſion to take Notice of him; and hearing that his Name was Car, remembred he had a Page of that Name when he came firſt into England, which this prov'd to be: For the Pages the King brought firſt with him, according to the French way, to wait upon his Coach, were diſcharg'd, and Footmen, according to the Engliſh way, ſupplied thoſe Places. The King muſtering up his Thoughts, fix'd them upon this Object of Pity, giving ſpecial Order to have him lodg'd in the Court, and to have his own Phyſicians and Chirurgions uſe their beſt Endeavours for his Recovery. The King viſited him often during his neceſſitated Reſtraint, ſometimes an Hour or more diſcourſing with him, to ſound him, and know what he was; and tho' he found no great Depth of Literature or Experience, yet ſuch a ſmooth and calm Outſide made him think there might be good Anchorage, and a fit Harbour for his moſt retir'd Thoughts. As ſoon as he recover'd (which the King with ſome Impatience attended) he made him Knight, and Gentleman of his Bed-Chamber, took the Pains himſelf to teach him the Latin Tongue, and laid a Foundation, by his daily Diſcourſes with him, to improve him unto a Capability of his moſt endear'd Affections.

Now all Addreſſes are made to Sir Robert Car; he is the Favourite in Ordinary; no Suit, nor no Reward but comes by him; his Hand diſtributes, and his Hand reſtrains; our Supreme Power works by ſecond Cauſes; the Lords themſelves can ſcarce have a Smile without him. And to give the greater Luſtre to his Power, about this time the Earl of Dunbar, the King's old truſty Servant, (the Cabinet of his ſecret Counſels) died; ſo that he ſolely now took the moſt intimate of them into his Charge, and the Office of Lord High Treaſurer of Scotland, which Staff the other left behind him; and though it could be no great Supporter, yet the Credit of it carried ſome Reputation in his own Country, where it was his Happineſs to be magnified, as well as in England; for he had Treaſure enough here, where the Fountain was.

1612. Made Viſcount.

And to ingrandize all, the King created him Baron of Brandſpeth, and Viſcount Rocheſter, and ſoon after Knight of the Garter. Thus was he drawn up by the Beams of Majeſty to ſhine in the higheſt Glory, grappling often with the Prince himſelf in his own Sphere in divers Conteſtations: For the Prince being a high-born Spirit, and meeting a young Competitor in his Father's Affections, that was a Muſhroom of yeſterday, thought the Venom would grow too near him, and therefore he gave no Countenance, but Oppoſition to it; which was aggravated by ſome little Scintils of Love, as well as Hatred, (Rivals in Paſſion) being both Amorous, and in youthful Blood, fixing by Accident upon one Object, who was a third Man's; in which the Viſcount got the Maſtry, but to his Ruine. The Prince ſhewing his Affection, by his neglecting of her, to be grounded rather upon Envy to the Man, than Love to the Woman.

The Earl of Eſſex marries the Lady Frances Howard.

But before this time, the Treaſurer Saliſbury, that great Engine of the State, by whom all Wheels moved, held an intimate Correſpondence with the Houſe of Suffolk, which he had ſtrengthened with an Alliance; marrying his eldeſt Son, the Lord Cranborn, to Katharine, the eldeſt Daughter of that Family.

An. Reg. 10. An. Chriſti 1612.

And being mindful of the Aſperity and Sharpneſs that was betwixt him and the late Earl of Eſſex, he thought it a good Act of Policy and Piety not to ſuffer Malice to become Hereditary; and therefore he was a great Means in marrying the young Earl of Eſſex to the Lady Francis Howard, another of thoſe Siſters, that the Father's Enmity might be cloſed up by the Son's Nuptial Fraternity. The Earl of Eſſex was Fourteen Years of Age, and ſhe Thirteen when they married; too young to conſider, but old enough to conſent: Yet by the Advice of Friends ſeparated after Marriage, ſhe under her Mother's Wing, and he viſiting France and Germany till Time ſhould mature and ripen a happy Co-union. The Court was her Neſt, her Father being Lord Chamberlain; and ſhe was hatch'd up by her Mother, whom the ſoure Breath of that Age (how juſtly I know not) had already tainted; from whom the young Lady might take ſuch a Tincture, that Eaſe, Greatneſs, and Court Glories, would more diſtain and impreſs on her, than any way wear out and deminiſh. And growing to be a Beauty of the greateſt Magnitude in that Horrizon, was an Object fit for Admirers, and every Tongue grew an Orator at that Shrine.

The Prince of Wales, now in his Puberty, ſent many loving Glances, as Ambaſſadors of his good Reſpects; and amorous Expreſſions are fit Subjects for jealous Reproaches to work on. Her Husband having been now Three or Four Years beyond the Seas, (ſick with Abſence from her whom his Deſires longed after) came over again, and found that Beauty, which he had left innocent, ſo farded and ſophiſticated with ſome Court Drug which had wrought upon her, that he became the greateſt Stranger at home. His Patience made way for him a while, and he bore up with a gentle Gale againſt the Stream of this Woman's Affections, which ran altogether (unknown to him) into another Chanel. Nor was her Reputation yet become ſo robuſt (being of a tender Growth) to ſtrike his Ears with Reproaches; and therefore he imputed her ſly Entertainments to a Maiden Baſhfulneſs; till ſurfeited with that dull Portion (upon better Advice) he went to the Earl of Suffolk (her Father) and demanded his Wife, thinking himſelf capable to enjoy both her and her Love. The Father, that thought there had been an Intimacy betwixt them ſuitable to their Conjugal Knot, made uſe of his Paternal Power to reduce his Daughter to the Obedience of a Wife. But while theſe things were ſtruggling for, a moſt Violent Diſeaſe of a Poyſonous Nature, imputed to, but far tranſcending, the ſmall-Pox, ſeized on the Earl of Eſſex; and had not the Strength of Youth, and that Almighty Power that orders all things, wrought out the Venom of it, the Earth (as probably wiſh'd by her) had been his Marriage-Bed.

The Counteſs of Eſſex in Love with Rocheſter.

For this Lady being taken with the growing Fortunes of the Viſcount Rocheſter, and grounding more hope upon him than the uncertain and hopeleſs Love of the Prince ſhe caſt her Anchor there; which the Prince ſoon diſcover'd, and ſlighted her accordingly. For dancing one time among the Ladies, and her Glove falling down, it was taken up, and preſented to him, by one that thought he did him acceptable Service; but the Prince refus'd to receive it, ſaying publickly, He would not have it, it is ſtretcht

An.Reg.10. An.Christi 1612.

stretcht by another, meaning the Viscount: This was an Aggravation of Hatred betwixt the King's Son and the King's Friend.

‡†‡ The Countess of Essex having her Heart alienated from her Husband, and set upon the Viscount, had a double Task to undergo, for accomplishing her ends: One was, to hinder her Husband from enjoying her; the other was to make the Viscount sure unto her: For dishonest Love is most full of Jealousy. Her Husband she look'd upon as a private Person, and to be carried by him into the Country, out of her Element, (being ambitious of Glory, and a Beauty covetous of Applause) were to close (as she thought) with an insufferable Torment; though he was a Man that did not only every way merit her Love, but he lov'd her with an extraordinary Affection, having a gentle, mild, and courteous Disposition, especially to Women, such as might win upon the roughest Natures. But this fiery Heat of his Wife's mounted upon the Wings of Lust, or Love, (call it what you will) carried her after so much Mischief, that those that saw her Face, might challenge Nature of too much Hypocrisy, for harbouring so wicked a Heart under so sweet and bewitching a Countenance.

She consults with Mistress Turner.

To strengthen her Designs, she finds out one of her own Stamp, Mrs. Turner, a Doctor of Physick's Widow, a Woman whom Prodigality and loosness had brought low; yet her Pride would make her fly any Pitch, rather than fall into the Jaws of Want. These two consult together how they might stop the Current of the Earl's Affections towards his Wife, and make a clear Passage for the Viscount in the place. To effect which, one Doctor Forman, a reputed Conjurer, (living at Lambeth) is found out: The Women declare to him their Grievances; he promises sudden Help; and to amuse them, frames many little Pictures of Brass and Wax, some like the Viscount and Countess, whom he must unite and strengthen; others like the Earl of Essex, whom he must debilitate and weaken; and then with Philtrous Powders and such Drugs he works upon their Persons. And to practise what Effects his Art would produce, Mrs. Turner, that lov'd Sir Arthur Manwaring, (a Gentleman then attending the Prince) and willing to keep him to her, gave him some of the Powder, which wrought so violently with him, that, through a Storm of Rain and Thunder, he rode Fifteen Miles one dark Night to her House, scarce knowing where he was till he was there. Such is the devilish and mad Rage of Lust, heighten'd with Art and Fancy.

And Forman about it.

These Things matur'd and ripen'd by the Cunning of this Jugler Forman, gave them Assurance of happy Hopes. Her Courtly Invitements, that drew the Viscount to observe her, she imputed to the Operation of those Drugs he had tasted; and that Harshness, and stubborn Comportment she expressed to her Husband, making him (weary of such Entertainments) to absent himself, she thought proceeded from the Effects of those unknown Potions and Powders that were administred to him: So apt is the Imagination to take Impression of those Things we are willing to believe.

The Earl of Essex gets his Wife to Chartley.

The good Earl finding his Wife nousled in the Court, and seeing no possibility to reduce her to Reason till she were estranged from the Relish and Taste of the Delights she suck'd in there, made his Condition again known to her Father. The old Man being troubled with his Daughter's Disobedience, imbitter'd her, being near him, with wearisome and continual Chidings, to wean her from the Sweets she doted on, and with much ado forc'd her into the Country. But how harsh was the parting, being rent away from the Place where she grew and flourish'd? Yet she left all her Engines and Imps behind her; the old Doctor, and his Confederate Mrs. Turner, must be her two Supporters: She blazons all her Miseries to them at her depart, and moystens the way with her Tears. Chartley was an Hundred Miles from her Happiness, and a little time thus lost is her Eternity. When she came thither, (tho' in the pleasantest time of Summer) she shut her self up in her Chamber, not suffering a Beam of Light to peep upon her dark Thoughts: If she stirr'd out of her Chamber, it was in the dead of Night, when Sleep had taken possession of all others but those about her. In this implacable, sad discontented Humour, she continu'd some Months, always murmuring against, but never giving the least civil Respect to her Husband; which the good Man suffer'd patiently, being loath to be the Divulger of his own Misery: Yet having a Manly Courage, he would sometimes break into a little Passion, to see himself slighted and neglected by himself, but having never found better from her, it was the easier to bear with her.

She writes to Forman.

While she was at Chartley, she writ to her Confederates, That Her Husband found little Operation in their Drugs, complaining of his Lustiness, and her Misery: For (she said) the Viscount would never love her, if her Husband did meddle with her, which with difficulty she yet impeded, but how long she should resist his Violence she knew not; therefore she implor'd their Assistance, if they would not see her the most despicable Creature in the World: And for Satisfaction, they should make their own Price. With this kind of stuff she fill'd her Letters, which were after found in Forman's Closet. These Instigations made him active; and the Man being skilful in Natural Magick, did use all the Artifice his Subtilty could devise really to imbecilitate the Earl; for no Linen came near his Body that was not rinsed with their Camphire Compositions, and other faint and wasting Ingredients; and all inward Applications were foisted on him by corrupted Servants, to lessen and debilitate the Seminal Operations: Which Veneficium is one great part of Witchcraft, destructive to Nature, and horridly abominable to be practised. And this in time wrought such Effects upon his Person, that he found himself unable with her, tho' she permitted him; yet when he had been from her some reasonable time, to renovate his Spirits, by shaking off those Artificial Applications, then his Abilities made her unwilling and refractory. Tho' some are of Opinion, that he was not much debilitated, but that she got (by her virtuous Agents) an Artifice too immodest to be express'd, to hinder Penetration. And thus she tormented him, till he was contented to let her steer her own Course, which after run her on Ground.

She comes again to Court.

For coming to London next Winter with this full Sail, loaden with Lust, she found the Viscount

‡†‡ As the Author has given us a more full and particular Account of these Passages between the Earl of Essex, his Lady, and the Favourite Car; so he was best qualified to do it, being an intimate bosom Acquaintance of the Earl, from his Youth to his Death. But if any unusual Warmth be observed in his manner of relating them, it must be attributed to his Zeal for the Honour of his Patron.

An.Reg.10. An.Christi 1612.

count much prepar'd for her; who being at first fasten'd on the Object, Absence, and all those little Artifices that mischievous Women and cunning Impostures could devise, had advanced him as much in his Desires, as they had hindred the other. We could dispute the Nature of these Operations, how far they are contingent, and how the Fancy works with them, tho' ignorant of them, making their Impulsions more active, being the Sparks that kindle this combustible Matter; for we will never allow there was any other Diabolical Means used, Nature being strong enough for such a Production; but being not pertinent to the Story, will leave it, and follow them that found the Effects of it, and had Affections suitable to it, which they made use of with an unbridled Appetite, yet meeting closely in Corners, (Sin being at first shamefac'd) but afterwards they grew more bold; and every Hour that the Viscount could steal from his Royal Master, he dedicated it to his Disloyal Mistress: Being caught in this Net of Adulation, he becomes a willing Prisoner, Lust only getting Liberty to all Looseness and Licentiousness: Places of frequent Meeting are daily renew'd; Persons fitted for such Practices are employ'd; and when Nature was exhausted, Art, her subtil Imitator, brought in her Store, to contribute new Spirits, purchased at any rate. All outward Adornment, to present Beauty in her full Glory, were not wanting on both sides, being Lust's Fuel, which tended to the Consumption of all Reason: And among the rest, yellow Starch, the Invention and soil of Jaundice Complexions, with great Cut-work Bands, and Piccadillies, (a thing that hath since lost the Name) crouded in and flourished among us, Mrs. Turner being nominated to be the first Contriver, happily in England, but the Original came out from France; which Fashion and Colour did set off their lean and sallow Countenances. Thus did the Viscount get the Conquest of two, the King, and this Lady, but could not subdue his own Lustful Appetite.

The Lord Sanquir murther-ed a Fencer.

The Wheel of Fortune running towards the Scots, turn'd by the Viscount Rochester, was unhappily diverted upon the Lord Sanquir, a Baron of that Nation, and married to a good Family in England; who some Years before meeting with a sturdy Fencer, one John Turner, who was a Master of the Weapon-trade in his own School, the young Lord strove to put some Affront upon him, (making it no little Conquest to disgrace a Master in the Art, as they term'd it) and the Man apprehensive of the Attempt, with a bold Rudeness press'd so hard upon him, that he thrust out one of the Baron's Eyes. This Mischief was much regretted by Turner, and the Baron being conscious to himself that he meant his Adversary some Ill, took the Accident with as much Patience, as Men that lose one Eye by their own Default, use to do for the Preservation of the other. Some time after, being in the Court of the late Great Henry of France, and the King (courteous to Strangers) entertaining Discourse with him, ask'd him, how he lost his Eye: He (cloathing his Answer in a better Shrow'd than a plain Fencer's) told him, it was done with a Sword: The King replies, Doth the Man live? And that Question gave an end to the Discourse, but was the beginner of a strange Confusion in his working Fancy, which neither Time nor Distance could compose, carrying it in his Breast some Years after, till he came into England, where he hir'd two of his Countrymen Gray and Carlile, (Men of low and mercenary Spirits) to murther him; which they did with a Case of Pistols in his own House in White-fryars, many Years after the Loss of his Bodily Eye: Thus the Baron lost the Eye of his Reason. This bold nefarious Act was very deeply resented at Court, and the King's Commands were so active for Apprehension of the Murderers, that they were all three taken; one upon the Borders of Scotland, so far had his Fears carried him, another in a Ship bound for Hamburgh, who escaping in a Storm, the Seas deliver'd up; and the Lord himself being obscur'd, (in this Tempest of his Soul) hearing a Thousand Pound was offered to bring his Head, (so liberal was the King for Justice) threw himself into the Arms of his Mercy, by the Mediation of the Archbishop of Canterbury, to whom he presented himself an Object of Pity; but no Intercession could prevail, their Lives satisfied the Law, the Baron not having the Honour of a Noble Death. Is hang'd.

An.Reg.10. An.Christi 1612.

Causes of the King's Severity.

The Cause of the King's Severity, (if Justice may be call'd Severity) was contrary to that of the Baron's Presumption; for he thought the Scots might do any thing, and he suffer'd because they had done so much: For Ramsey, one of the King's Servants, not long before had switch'd the Earl of Montgomery, who was the King's first Favourite, happily because he took it so. Maxwell, another of them, had bitten Hawley, a Gentleman of the Temple, by the Ear; which inraged the Templers (in those Times Riotous, and subject to Tumults) and brought it almost to a National Quarrel, till the King stept in, and took it up himself. The Lord Bruse had summon'd Sir Edward Sackvill (who was after Earl of Dorset) into France, with a fatal Compliment to take Death from his Hand: Such killing Civilities these Times produced! And the much lamented Sir James Stuart, one of the King's Blood, and Sir George Wharton, the prime Branch of that Noble Family, for little worthless Punctilio's of Honour, (being intimate Friends) took the Field, and fell by each other's Hand. These, and many more private Differences, (tho' some of them of an ancient Date) were bleeding fresh in Memory; so that the King like a wise Physician, open'd this Vein of Blood, hoping by it to stop all other Issues.

Salisbury not pleased with the Viscount's Greatness

The King's Affections were not so monopolized, but that his crafty Servant the Earl of Salisbury had a good Hole as well in his Councils as Treasure: And being not well pleased to see himself bearded by a Youth new 'started into the Affairs of the World, and mounted by the Wing of Love, not of Merit, he cast out many Mists before him, to hinder and damp his Passage so, that the Viscount could not rise to that Pitch (during his Life) that he afterwards arrived at. And one thing among the rest he obstructed, was Five thousand Pounds the King had given him to maintain his Riot: Which Sum the Treasurer thought too great a Bulk to be carried lightly away, and therefore he desir'd the King might see what he did. And having laid the Money in Silver upon Tables in his Gallery at Salisbury-house, he invited the King to Dinner, making this the Passage to his Entertainment. The King, strucken suddenly with such Heaps, ask'd the Treasurer what this Money was for; who told him, He had receiv'd his Majesty's Commands to give so much to the Viscount Rochester. The King, that either carelesly thought Five thousand Pound to be no more than the Noise so much makes in Scotland, (which doth not amount to above Five hundred Pounds) or cunningly, (if he knew the Value, knew also the Treasurer's Meaning) said,

An. Reg. 10. An. Christi 1612.

ſaid, It was too much for one Man, and made him be contented with leſs than the half.

The Queen of Scots tranſlated to Weſtminſter.

And now the King caſts his Thoughts towards Peterborough, where his Mother lay, whom he cauſed to be tranſlated to a Magnificent Tomb at Weſtminſter: And (ſomewhat ſuitable to her Mind when ſhe was living) ſhe had a Tranſlucent Paſſage in the Night through the City of London by Multitudes of Torches; the Tapers placed by the Tomb and the Altar in the Cathedral ſmoaking with them like an Offertory, with all the Ceremonies and Voices their Choires and Copes could expreſs, attended by many Prelates and Nobles, who paid this laſt Tribute to her Memory. This was accounted a Piaculous Action of the King's by many; tho' ſome have not ſtuck to ſay, That as Queen Elizabeth was willing to be rid of the Queen of Scots, yet would not have it her Action; and being it could not be done without her Command, when it was done ſhe renounc'd her own Act. So tho' the King was angry when he heard his Mother was taken away by a violent Death, recalling his Ambaſſador, threatning War, and making a great Noiſe (which was after calm'd and cloſ'd up with a large Penſion from the Queen) yet he might well enough be pleas'd that ſuch a Spirit was laid, as might have conjured up three Kingdoms againſt him: For Patrick Grey, that the King ſent to diſſwade Queen Elizabeth from taking away his Mother's Life, was the greateſt Inſtrument to perſwade her to it; diſtilling always into her this Sentence, Mortua non mordet, When ſhe is dead ſhe cannot bite: But the Love that tends to Self-Preſervation is an Abjunct of Nature, more powerful than Filial Duty; and therefore there will be no great Strife where there are not adequate Operations.

The Palatine's Arrival the 16th of October.

This Time was alſo preſented unto us in a various Dreſs, and the Event ſhew'd (tho' ſome Years after) there was more Cauſe of Mourning than Rejoycing, tho' the latter got the Predominance: For the Prince Elector Palatine came over into England to marry the King's only Daughter, and Death depriv'd us of the King's eldeſt Son. , A Prince as Eminent in Nobleneſs as in Blood, and having a Spirit too full of Life and Splendour to be long ſhrouded in a Cloud of Fleſh. If that which gave Life to his Life had been leſs, he might happily have lived longer: Not that there was too much Oil, or that concurrent natural Balſamum in this fair and well compoſed Lamp to extinguiſh it ſelf, but the Light that came from it might caſt ſo radiant a Luſtre, as (by darkning others) it came to loſe the Benefit of its own Glory. Jealouſy is like Fire that burns all before it, and the Fire is hot enough to diſſolve all Bonds that tends to the Diminution of a Crown. The Prince of Spain, (his Contemporary) Son to Philip the Second, (not long before this) like a young Phaeton, wiſhed himſelf but one Day in his Father's Throne, and he fell (not long after) into the hard Hand of an immature Fate before he could ſtep into the Chariot. So dan-

Prince Henry's Death the 6th of November.

His gallant Spirit.

, How well or ill grounded our Author's Conjectures were about the Death of Prince Henry, I ſhall not take upon me to determine; ſince few Princes of ſo great Hopes die an untimely Death, but the World is apt to attribute it to foul Play.

This is certain, the Court was full of Suſpicions about it; and it was whiſper'd about, that the Prince having entertain'd a mortal Prejudice to the Favourite Car, he was taken off to prevent the Effects of it. Theſe Surmiſes came likewiſe to be inſinuated in the Pulpit; and we have yet extant in Print, a Sermon Preach'd at St. James's upon the Diſſolution of his Family, wherein the Preacher that had been his Domeſtick Chaplain, made ſuch broad Hints about the manner of his Death, that melted the Auditory into a Flood of Tears, and occaſion'd his being diſmiſs'd the Court.

Some Years after, when the Murther of Sir Thomas Overbury came upon the Stage, at one of the Trials before the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke, there eſcap'd him ſome Words in Heat, that plainly imported his Suſpicion that Overbury had been Poyſon'd, to prevent the Diſcovery of another Crime of the ſame nature committed upon one of the Higheſt Rank, whom he term'd a Sweet Prince, which was taken to be meant Prince Henry; for which Raſhneſs the Lord Chief Juſtice loſt the King's Favour, and ſome time afterwards his Place.

However it was that this excellent young Prince dy'd, our Author is miſtaken in the length of his Sickneſs. He began to decline in his Health in September, and complain'd ever after of a Pain and Giddineſs in his Head. After ſeveral Removes for change of Air, he took his Bed at St. James's the 25th of October, of a violent Fever, (as the Phyſicians term'd it) which carry'd him off the 6th of November, about 8 a Clock at Night. So inſtead of Five Days, as our Author computes, his laſt Illneſs continu'd near Twelve. As to the opening of his Body, it ſignified but little either way, there being Poyſons of that ſubtile Nature, that they leave no convincing Marks behind them.

There had been more Matches than one under Conſideration for this young Prince. And tho' he himſelf inclin'd moſt to a Proteſtant Family, his Father, on the contrary, would hear of none but of Royal Blood, tho' of the Romiſh Religion.

A Princeſs of Savoy firſt, then an Infanta of Spain, and afterwards a Daughter of France, was deſign'd for him; and Sir Thomas Edmonds was ſent into France to treat about the latter. This Treaty was in agitation when he dy'd; and tho' he expreſs'd on all Occaſions his own Opinion againſt it, he ſubmitted to his Father's Commands, and was intirely paſſive in the whole Matter.

We have a Letter of his to King James in Print, in Anſwer to one the King had ſent him of Sir Thomas Edmonds, concerning this Treaty of Marriage. Seeing probably it was the laſt he ever writ, it well deſerves a Place here, for it's dated the 14th of October, 1612. and he dy'd the 6th of November following.

He therein, with great Prudence, gives his Opinion about every Article contain'd in Edmonds's Letter. As for the time (ſays he) they'll bring the Princeſs of France into England, I believe the ſooner it is, the better, and that Your Majeſty ought not to ſtand thereupon. As long as the Princeſs is in France, the Queen her Mother will be preſſing either to forward the Marriage, or to break it off, and to oblige her Daughter to give her Conſent, or hinder her from it. The younger ſhe is, the more Time we ſhall have, and eaſineſs to inſtruct her in our Religion, and convert her. When they aſk of Your Majeſty to explain Your ſelf as to the Liberty the Princeſs ſhall have in the Exerciſe of her Religion; I deſire you, Sir, to anſwer your Ambaſſador poſitively, That you will not agree to a greater Condition with France, than what the Duke of Savoy had demanded when he offer'd you his Daughter; that is to ſay, That the Princeſs ſhould have the Liberty to follow her Religion in private, and in the moſt retir'd Chamber of her Apartment. I confeſs theſe are too narrow and ſtrait Conditions: But if France ſpeak ſincerely, I do not queſtion but ſhe will be contented with them.

Prince Henry knew well his Father's covetous Temper, and for that Reaſon he has a nice Touch upon the Article of her Fortune. If your Majeſty (continues he) regards the Greatneſs of a Dowry, I think you will prefer the Princeſs of Savoy who brings with her Two Hundred Thouſand Crowns more than the Lady of France; for at leaſt I can ſcarce perſwade my ſelf, that the Regent will give more to the Second Daughter than to the Eldeſt. But if your Majeſty lays aſide Intereſt, as to what ſhall be more to the Mind of the general Body of Proteſtants abroad, it ſeems to me you will rather incline to France than Savoy. Laſtly, (concluded the Prince) I fear leſt your Majeſty ſhould not be contented with the Indifference I ſhew for all the Propoſitions of Marriage which are made me. I muſt humbly beg your Pardon for it. It's you, Sir, who is to take the moſt advantageous Reſolution that may be for the Good of the State: I have but little Experience in Political Affairs, and cannot ſpeak like a Man ſmitten with Love upon this Occaſion.

Happy had it been for King Charles, and for England, if the Treaty of Marriage between him and the youngeſt Siſter of this Princeſs had been ſet upon the ſame Foot that Prince Henry deſign'd his ſhould have been.

A. Reg. 10. An. Christi 1612.

gerous are the Paths of Greatneſs, that the Tongue (many times) rouling aſide, makes Men tread awry. Strange Rumours are raiſed upon this ſudden expiration of our Prince, the Diſeaſe being ſo violent, that the Combat with Nature in the Strength of Youth (being almoſt Nineteen Years of Age) laſted not above Five Days. Some ſay he was poiſoned with a Bunch of Grapes, others attribute it to the venomous Scent of a pair of Gloves preſented to him, (the Diſtemper lying for the moſt part in the Head.) They that knew neither of theſe, are ſtrucken with Fear and Amazement, as if they had taſted, or felt, the Effects of thoſe Violences: Private Whiſperings, and Suſpicions of ſome new Deſigns a foot, broaching Prophetical Terrours, That a black Chriſtmas would produce a bloody Lent. For the Spaniard, who oppoſed the Marriage of the Prince Palatine, and ſaw their Ruin grow up in Prince Henry's towardly Spirit, were reputed (vulgarly) the Mint-maſters of ſome horrid Practices; and that a Ship of Pocket-piſtols was come out of Spain, fit Inſtruments for a Maſſacre. And theſe Trepidations were not only in the lower Region, but wrought upwards ſo high, that Proclamations were ſent abroad, to forbid the making or carrying of Piſtols under a Foot long in the Barrel. And all Papiſts are not only diſarm'd (being ever eſteemed Vaſſals to the Catholick King) but their Actions, with caution, pried into. In ſuch dark Clouds as theſe, the whole Kingdom was at a loſs; all ordinary Tranſitions of Nature, are imputed to prodigious Omens; the greater the Fears are, the more blazing is the Meteor that ariſes from them.

Some that knew the Bickerings betwixt the Prince and the Viſcount, muttered out dark Sentences, that durſt not look into the light; eſpecially Sir James Elphingston, who (obſerving the Prince one day to be diſcontented with the Viſcount) offered to kill him: But the Prince reprov'd him with a gallant Spirit, ſaying, If there were Cauſe, he would do it himſelf. Now whether theſe Rumours begot a further Scrutiny, or whether it be the Court-trick to daub and ſlubber over things that may be perſpicuous, I know not: But the Phyſicians about the Prince gave it under their Hands (which was ſpread abroad in ſeveral Copies) that he died of a ſtrong malignant Feaver, (ſo are all violent Diſſolutions, where Nature hath power of Reſiſtance) that his Liver was Pale, and Livid, lead-like; the Gall had no Gall, but was full of Wind; the Spleen was unnaturally black, and the Lungs in many Places ſpotted, with much Corruption, the Midriff, or Diaphragma, blackiſh; and the Head in ſome Places full of Blood, and in ſome Places full of clear Water. Thus was he Anatomized to amuſe the World, and clear the ſuſpicion of Poiſon, as if no Venoms could produce theſe Effects. He died the 6th of November, and was carried on a Hearſe (triumphing even in Death) to Weſtminſter, the Seventh of December following; the Pomp of the Funeral being fully compleated, with the Peoples Tears and Lamentations.

His Funeral.

Mourning laid aſide.

But the King (though he could not but be troubled to loſe ſo near a part of himſelf) look'd over all theſe Miſts, and (like the Sun) diſpelled all theſe Clouds and Vapours; commanding, no Man ſhould appear in the Court in Mourning; he would have nothing in his Eye to bring ſo ſad a Meſſage to his Heart. The Jollity, Feaſting, and Magnificence of Chriſtmas, muſt not be laid down. There were Kings, Princes, and Nobles, that came out of Germany, with the Prince Elector, that muſt ſee the Glory of the Engliſh Court; which was preſented with ſo much Eminency in gorgeous Apparel, that the precedent Mourning was but as a ſable Foil, the better to illuſtrate it.

A. Reg. 10. An. Chriſ. 1612.

Knights of the Garter made.

The Prince Elector Palatine, and Maurice Prince of Orange, were made Knights of the Garter, Lodowick Count of Orange being Maurice's Deputy; and Prince Maurice took it as a great Honour to be admitted into the Fraternity of that Order, and wore it conſtantly; till afterwards, ſome Villains at the Hague, that met the Reward of their Demerit, (one of them a French Man, being Groom of the Prince's Chamber) robb'd a Jeweller of Amſterdam, that brought Jewels to the Prince, this Groom tempting him into his Chamber to ſee ſome Jewels, and there with his Confederates they ſtrangled the Man with one of the Prince's Blue Ribons; which being after diſcovered, the Prince would never ſuffer ſo fatal an Inſtrument to come about his Neck.

The Prince Palatine married to the Lady Elizabeth.

In February following, the Prince Palatine, and that lovely Princeſs, the Lady Elizabeth, were Married on Biſhop Valentine's Day, in all the Pomp and Glory that ſo much Grandeur could expreſs. Her Veſtments were White, the Emblem of Innocency; her Hair diſhevel'd, hanging down her Back at length, an Ornament of Virginity; a Crown of pure Gold upon her Head, the Cognizance of Majeſty, being all over beſet with precious Gems, ſhining like a Conſtellation; her Train ſupported by twelve young Ladies in white Garments, ſo adorned with Jewels, that her Paſſage looked like a Milky-way. She was led to Church by her Brother Prince Charles, and the Earl of Northampton; the young Batchelor on the Right Hand, and the Old on the Left. And while the Archbiſhop of Canterbury was Solemnizing the Marriage, ſome Coruſcations and Lightnings of Joy appear'd in her Countenance, that expreſs'd more than an ordinary Smile, being almoſt elated to a Laughter; which could not clear the Air of her Fate, but was rather a fore-runner of more ſad and dire Events: Which ſhews how ſlippery Nature is, to troul us along to thoſe Things that bring Danger, yea ſometimes Deſtruction with them.

She return'd from the Chapel between the Duke of Lenox, and the Earl of Nottingham Lord High Admiral, two Married Men. The Feaſtings, Maskings, and other Royal Formalities, were as troubleſome ('tis preſum'd) to the Lovers, as the Relation of them here may be to the Readers: For ſuch Splendour and Gayety are fitter to appear in Princes Courts, than in Hiſtories.

The City of London (that with high Magnificence had feaſted the Prince Palatine, and his Noble Retinue) preſented to the fair Bride a Chain of Oriental Pearl, by the Hand of the Lord Mayor, and Aldermen, (in their Scarlet and Gold Chain Accoutrements) of ſuch a Value, as was fit for them to give, and her to receive. And the People of the Kingdom in general, being Summon'd to a Contribution for the Marriage of the King's Daughter, did ſhew their Affections by their Bounty. And tho' it be the Cuſtom of our Kings to pay their Daughters Portions with their Subjects Purſes; yet a hundred Years being almoſt paſt ſince ſuch a Precedent, it might have made them unwilling (if their Obedience had not been full ripe) to recall ſuch obſolete Things, as are

A. Reg. 11. An. Christi 1613.

are only in Practice now by the meanest of the People.

The Prince Palatine returns home with the Princess.

But, tir'd with Feasting and Jollity, about the middle of April, when the Beauties of the Spring were enticing enough to Beguile the tedioufness of the Way, the Prince Elector willing to review, and the Princess to see what she was to enjoy; after all the Caresses, and sweet Embraces, that could be between the King, Queen, and Princes, that were to be separated so long, and at such a distance; and after all the 'Shews, Pastimes, Fireworks, and other Artifices that could be devised, and manifested, they parted at Rochester; the Lord Admiral being ready with a Royal Navy in the Downs for their Passage and Conduct. The Season smiled on them, and they arrived the Nine and twentieth of the Month in Flushing. The Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Arundel, the Viscount Lisle, and the Lord Harington, with divers Ladies and Persons of Quality, attended them to Heydelburg. Their Entertainment was great and magnificent in the Low Countries, not only suitable to the Persons, but the Place from whence they came, (the English having been ever a Bulwark to the Netherlands) and now they were in full Peace with Spain, which gave the better relish to their Banquetings. And in every eminent Town in Germany as they passed, they found that Welcome which prolong'd their Time, but made their Travel the less, so that with much ado they reach'd Heydelburg. And after some time spent there, to see the Beauties and Delights of that Court and Country, (which were extended and put forth to the uttermost) the Nobility and Ladies of England return'd home, only they left the Lord Harington behind them, who died by the way: A Gentleman much lamented in his own Person, but much more in his Sons, (who not long after surviv'd him) with whom were Buried, not only those excellent Endowments that make Noblemen great indeed, but the Memory of a noble Posterity, which makes them little, or indeed nothing at all.

Rochester rules all.

The Viscount Rochester all this while (tho' plunged in Lust) was held up by the Chin in the Glories of the Court; and the Prince (that interposed betwixt him and the Beams of Majesty) being remov'd, the Earl of Salisbury (another Obstacle) dying Six Months after the Prince, in the way from the Bath; he now took full Possession of the King's Favours alone. He executes the Place of Principal Secretary, receiving all Pacquets, and dispatching Answers without the Knowledge of the King or Council; or if the King did know, his Love had hoarded up such a Confidence in him, as he laid all out upon that Stock. Rochester's greatest Assistant was a private Gentleman, one Sir Thomas Overbury, by whose Compass he steer'd his Course, who (being a Man of Parts and Abilities) had wrought upon the Viscount so, as not only to keep him in, and close with the King, but to make him capable of managing the highest Affairs, if he had kept himself within the Circle drawn to his Hand. This Intimacy betwixt them, spake Overbury an Actor in all his Privacies. And when he understood by the Viscount his Intention of Marriage with the Countess of Essex, he opposed it with all the powerful Arguments he could use: For tho' he might be so active, in his Initiation of Favour with the Viscount, to be assistant to his Pleasures, and for carrying forward some of his dark Contrivances, (those Secretaries being always the greatest Favourites) yet having now gotten good footing in his Affection, and building his Fortune thereon, his Reason might tell him, there could be nothing more destructive to both their growing Hopes, than to lay a Foundation upon so much publick Injustice, as to Marry another Man's Wife, her Husband living; therefore he passionately persuaded him to cast his Thoughts upon a more honourable Object, and not on one whose Disloyalty (in her present Condition) was so much branded with Infamy, that the Marks of it would be visible on his Face. But the Viscount, bewitched with the Inticements of his Soul-ravishing Mistress, (uncapable of good Counsel) doth not only call home his Affections from Overbury, that had been long Lieger with him, (denouncing Enmity) but incites his Beloved against him also; who mustering up all her Passions, with the greatest Acrimony that a Feminine Malice could devise, she never left, till she had discharg'd all the Vollies of her Rage upon him. And the better to do it, she consults with her Uncle the Earl of Northampton, aggravating Overbury's Offence, as tending to the Dishonour of their whole Family: That he (a petty Fellow) should dare to raise such Scandals against her Innocency. The Earl of Northampton, that knew of the Endearments betwixt the Viscount and his Niece, (so base and mercenary was his Spirit) thought it good Policy to stop all Passages, that it might not come into the publick Mouth: For being in a Sphere elated above others, it was a Sin of a high Presumption for any of an inferiour Orb to move but in its own Place, or meddle with what is above them. He therefore closes with the Viscount, (whom in his flattering Acclamations by Letters he makes a little Deity) and after some Dispute of the manner how to be revenged of Overbury, they conclude to dispatch him by Poison, which could not be done so well in a publick way; and therefore they subtilly contrive to exasperate the King against him, that being a Prisoner, and shackled by them to a Place, he might be a more settled Mark for their envenom'd Arrows.

Rochester and Northampton Plot Overbury's Death.

Rochester betrays Overbury.

About the same time, the King thinking fit to send an Ambassador into Flanders, to the Arch-Duke, some say, into France) the Viscount recommended Sir Thomas Overbury to the King for that Service, (extolling his Abilities, and fitness for the same, publickly, that more notice might be taken of the Affront) and the King made choice of him for that Imployment. Which done, the Viscount (under the shadow of Friendship) imparts to Overbury what Intentions the King had towards him; but he thought it would not be so convenient for him to accept of it, because he should not only lose his Converse and Company by such an Alienation, (which he highly valued) but many a fair Opportunity of improving his Respects to him, in some better way of Advancement. Overbury had not been so little a Courtier, or a Man of so mean Reason, but that he was sensible what Displeasure he should pull upon himself, by refusing the King's Commands: And therefore he told the Viscount, that betwixt the King's Favours, and his Friendship, he had a great Conflict in his Spirit, being willing to retain both; but how he should refuse the King's Commands with safety, he knew not. But the Viscount, with fair Promises, prevail'd with him to set up his rest at home, upon higher Expectations, (such a sweet Bait is Ambition!) protesting to take off Assisted by Overbury.

A. Reg. 11. An. Christi 1613.

off the Asperity of the King's Anger from him, and smooth his way so, as should be for his better Advantage. When he had wrought Overbury in this Forge, he goes to the King, and blows the Fire, incensing him with all the Aggravations he could; so that the poor Gentleman, for his Contempt, was forthwith committed to the Tower. And to prepare all things for his Reception there, Sir William Wade, the late Lieutenant, was removed, and Sir Jervis Elwis, a Person more Ambitious than indigent (having made his way by Money, the common Merit) was admitted to the Place.

The Countesses Designs.

Now the Countess, like another Alecto drove furiously, her Chariot having two Wheels, which ran over all Impediments: One was, to sue a Divorce betwixt her and her Husband, that she might Marry the Viscount: The other was, to take away Overbury, the blemish in her Eye, and that laid such a Stain upon her, that nothing but his Blood could expiate. For these she hath several Engines; the one must be acted Overtly; the other Covertly, in dark Corners; and she and her Agents find fit Ministers for both.

Northampton joins with her.

The Earl of Northampton resenting his Neices Grievances, makes the King acquainted with her Maiden Bashfulness, how loth she is to divulge her Husband's Infirmities, and how long it is since her Marriage, and yet she hath not enjoyed the happiness of a Wife; that her Husband's Inability must needs be an unnatural Conjunction, such as neither Law nor Reason can admit of; and that there was a great Affection betwixt the Viscount and her, so as there seem'd to be a more excellent Sympathy, and sweet Composition of Soul in them, more suitable to Reason and Nature, than in the State she was in. Which was seconded by the Viscount's humble Submissions to the King's great Wisdom, who (he acknowledg'd) had not only raised him to what he is, but may yet make him more happy, by uniting him to a Lady of so much Honour and Vertue.

The King, that took delight to compleat the Happiness of them he lov'd, commanded the Bishops to sue out a Divorce between the Earl of Essex and his Lady, that the Viscount might Marry her: For he had been practised formerly in Scotland, in his Minority, with the like Experiment. Elizabeth, Daughter to the Earl of Athol, being married to the Earl of March, under pretence of Impotency, but meerly for Lust, (as the Author reports) was Divorced from her Husband, and Married to the Earl of Arran, (the King's Favourite) who had been before a Partner in her Adulterous Sheets, (so current is the Parallel, and so equally are Lust and Ambition yoked together, that they both (with full Violence) draw one and the same way.)

Rob. Johnston's History of Scotland.

The Bishops, and others, having a Commission under the Great Seal of England, to Convene the Earl of Essex, and his Countess, before them, sent out their Summons, and they made their Appearance accordingly. But before they proceeded, they caused a Jury of Twelve discreet Matrons to be Impannelled, to search the Countess, whether she were (as she pretended to be, and was reputed) a Maid still; for if she were a Maid, they could fallen upon a Nullity, and so separate them for the more honour of her Virginity. The Countess being ashamed, and bashful, to come to such a Tryal, would not expose her Face to the Light; but being to appear before the Matrons under a Veil, another young Gentlewoman, that had less offended, was fobbed into the Place; and she passed, in the Opinion both of Jury and Judges, to be a Virgin. Then the Articles were drawn up, where she accused her Husband of Impotency, (and that he was hindred with a perpetual and incurable Impediment, whereby he is unable to have Carnal Copulation with her, with frigiditas quoad hanc, often reiterated, &c.) The good Earl, willing to be rid of so horrid a Mischief, did acknowledge he had attempted to enjoy her many times, but he never did, nor could Carnally know her, and believ'd he never should. Upon these Grounds the Judges proceed to a Divorce.

The Countess divorced from her Husband.

Declaring, That Robert Earl of Essex, and the Lady Frances Howard, contracted by shew of Marriage, did cohabit in one House, and lie together in one Bed, Nudus cum Nuda, & Solus cum Sola; and that the said Lady Frances did shew her self Prompt, ready to be known of him; and that the said Earl neither did, nor could have knowledge of her, although he did think himself able to have knowledge of other Women. And that the said Lady Frances, by inspection of her Body by Midwives, expert in matter of Marriage, was proved to be apt for Carnal Copulation with Man, and yet a Virgin. Therefore we the said Judges deputed in the Cause, first invocating the Name of Christ, and setting God before our Eye, do pronounce, decree, and declare, That the Earl of Essex, for some secret, incurable, binding Impediment, did never Carnally know, or was, or is able Carnally to know, the Lady Frances Howard: And therefore we do pronounce, have decreed, and do declare, the pretended Marriage, so contracted, and solemnized, de facto, between them, to have been, and to be utterly void, and to no effect; and that they did want, and ought to want the strength of the Law: And that the Lady Frances was, and is, and so ought to be Free, and at Liberty, from any Bond of such pretended Marriage, de facto, contracted and solemniz'd. And we do pronounce, that she ought to be Divorced, and so we do Free and Divorce her; leaving them, as touching other Marriages, to their Conscience in the Lord. Which our Definitive Sentence, and Decree, we ratifie and publish.

Thomas, Wint. Lancel. Elie. Rich. Coven. & Litchfield. John, Roffe.	Bishops.
Julius Cæsar. Thomas Parry. Daniel Dun.	Knights.

These Bishops, and the rest of the Judges, could not be ignorant what Scandalous Reports of this Lady's Actions flew up and down, from Lip to Lip; which, however sweeten'd by the Partakers, carried an ill Savour with them in every honest Understanding, who were not blinded with Wilfulness, or deafned with Prejudice, which made the Bishops of * Canterbury and London decline the Business, though nominated

* Archbishop Abbot did not only refuse to Sit in the Court of Delegates upon this Divorce, but publish'd his Reasons for the Nullity of the Sentence, mix'd with some severe Reflections upon the Lady King James took so far the part of his Favourite, that he vouchsafed to Answer Abbot's Reason himself, which silenc'd any further Debate.

An. Reg. 11. An. Christi 1613.

nated in the Patent. But Kings will never want fit Ministers in corrupted Times, both in Church and Common-wealth, as long as there are Degrees, and Places of Ascent to clime to. And though these things floated awhile upon the Stream of Greatness, yet there is One above that moves the Waters; who did not only see what passed in the Bishops Palace, but in the closest Prison, which he discover'd to the Shame and Ruine of the Actors.

Mrs. Turner employ'd to poison Overbury.

For while this Wheel was turning at Lambeth, the other Wheel had its motion in the Tower. Mrs. Turner, the Mistress of the Work, had lost both her Supporters. Forman, her first Prop, dropp'd away suddenly by Death; and Gresham, another rotten Engine (that succeeded him) did not hold long: She must now bear up all her self. But she wrought in a Mine of inexhaustible Treasure, therefore she may buy Instruments at any Rate. One Weston is thought on for this Under-work, who was sometime Doctor Turner's (her Husband's) Man, and hath a little Experience in the Nature of Poysonous Drugs. This venemous Plant is sent for out of the Country to be transplanted here, and Two hundred Pounds promised to disperse his Venom, so as it may be killing. Sir Thomas Monson is made by the Countess to recommend him to Sir Jervis Elloways, and he to Sir Thomas Overbury to wait upon him; where he goes under the Character of a right Honest Man, making it good with a sober and fair Outside, the true Vizard of Hypocrisy, a fit Pipe for such corrupted Waters to run through; which must be provided by one Franklin, a swarthy, sallow, crooked-backt Fellow, who was to be the Fountain whence these bitter Waters came.

The Lieutenant of the Tower engaged in it.

But Overbury's Meat must be dress'd in the Lieutenant's Kitchin, and therefore it is necessary to make him acquainted with it; which the Earl of Northampton undertook, smoothing him with such Language, and promising him such Rewards, as he thought fittest to gain upon him; assuring him, that it would be an acceptable Service to the King to have him remov'd; being an insolent and pernicious Fellow (as he called him) of a Factious and Dangerous Spirit; and therefore advised him to be Cautious in admitting any to see him, lest his Passions should vent themselves and become Publick. The Lieutenant being a Man intelligent enough, could not but apprehend the dangerous Path he trod in pursuing this Business: For if he should make the King acquainted with it, to know more of his Mind, before it were done, and he disclaim it, Northampton was powerful enough to crush him on the one side; and if it should be discover'd after it were done, he might be sure the King would not own it; and it would bring him a certain Ruine on the other side: Betwixt these two Extreams he knew no Mean; and therefore he took that which tended (as he thought) to most safety, hoping that the Earl of Northampton had some higher Authority for the same. And now they begin to put their Design in Practice; Franklin furnishes Weston with Materials, compounded to consume Nature insensibly; but this was not quick enough; Malice must be as Active, as Cunning! Stronger Ingredients are infused, which Weston having received from the Countess by his Son, he meets the Lieutenant as he carried up Overbury's Meat, saying to him, Sir, shall I give it him now? The Lieutenant ask'd him, What? Weston answer'd, Sir, you know what is to be done. The Lieutenant, that would not have it known that he knew any thing, gave him a Check, and would not understand his Meaning, or at least would have him take notice that he understood it; for he thought that his Connivance would not bring him within the Compass of the Fact (and for the Guilt he could dispense with it well enough) and therefore his Part of Working was only not to seem to know what was done. Subtilly sometimes Men strive to cozen themselves.

Their Poisons set a work.

But these Ling'ring Operations do not suit with the Countess's implacable Humour; Weston is chid by Mrs. Turner for being so slow. But he that knew that he might be too Active, kept on his old Pace, as the only way to have it pass unsuspected, aiming at his own Preservation, as well as Overbury's Destruction. He gets therefore (by the help of Franklin) several sorts of Poysons, tempering them with his Broaths, and every bit of Meat he eat, that he might diminish by Degrees; for his very Salt was mixt with white Mercury: And besides these, Sir Thomas Monson sent Tarts and Jellies of the Countess's and Mrs. Turner's Composition (by some of his Servants) to Weston, for the better Expedition. Thus was the poor Gentleman tortur'd and rack'd in a horrid Distemper; who being Young and of a strong Constitution, was able to grapple a long time with these Corroding Tormentors: But his Body being not always able to bear it, at length he fell extream Sick; and having no Friend that could or durst Visit him; none to complain to but the Causers of his Misery (such strict Guards were kept about him) he languish'd both in Body and Mind. But some Friend by accident taking the Advantage for a Visit, and finding him very Sick, procur'd him a wholesome Glister, which Weston was willing enough to have administred, because he would not be too quick; and that retarded the Work, by carrying away some of the Poysonous Matter. Which Northampton hearing, the Lieutenant was check'd for being so careless, and commanded that none should come near him, being fearful lest the Desperateness of his Condition should make him reveal some thing of high Concernment that had been Machinated among them: And Mrs. Turner rebuked her Minister Weston, for looking no better to his Charge; so they dealt with him now upon a new Account.

The Countess got loose from her Husband, grows wanton in her Prosperity. Nature is unbounded where neither Law nor Grace doth Limit. The good Earl of Essex must repay the Portion; to do which, he is forc'd to sell Benington in Hartfordshire, a very gallant Seat, and glad he is rid of a Torment at any Rate. She now mounted on her Car, drives over all Oppositions; Her Beauties shine in the Court (as she would have it) she is the King's Favourite, as well as her Husband; the Glories of her Marriage must appear there, and she is a fit Gift for the King to bestow; he that took her away from one Husband, can give her to another, who must be of equal Rank to her, that she may not descend, therefore he is created Earl of Somerset; and all the splendid Equipage, and magnificent Preparation that can either fill a Court with Delight, or People with Admiration, are not wanting for the Marriage. She thinking all the World ignorant of her sly Practices, hath the Impudence to appear in the Habit of a Virgin, with her Hair pendant almost to her Feet; which Ornament of her Body (though a Fair one) could not cover the Deformities of her Soul: But these, and her high Elations, are Clouds to her Conscience, Rochester made Earl of Somerset, Nov. 4. married Dec. 5. following.

A.Reg. 11.
An. Christi 1613.

ence, that (though her Bauds might for her) her indeed lovely Cheeks did not betray themselves to Blushes. These glorious Days are seconded with as glorious Nights, where Masks and Dancings had a continued Motion; the King naturally affecting such High-flying Pastimes and Banquettings, as might wrap up his Spirit, and keep it from descending towards Earthly things.

Feasted in London.

The City of London, and the Court at Whitehall, like two great Stars in Conjunction, had one and the same Influence and Operation; they must do something for the Man whom the King loves: Therefore a great Feast is prepar'd by them in Merchant-Taylors-Hall (and all the Grandees and Ladies are invited) with so much Magnificence, as if it had been Competitor, and vied with Whitehall for Glory. They all rode a Horseback into the City in the Evening, following their two Leaders; the Men attending the Bridegroom, and the Women the Bride; so mounted, furnished, and adorn'd with Trappings, and so bespangled with Jewels, that the Torches and Flambeaux (which were numerous) were but little light to the Beholders.

Overbury hears of the Marriage.

The Noise of these Triumphs resounding in the closest Corners, brought the News to Sir Thomas Overbury, which was an unfit and comfortless Companion to a Man in Misery; conscious to himself, that all his Sufferings proceeded from his Opposition to that which was now in Agitation; so that in his obscure Prison and darker Thoughts, he could not see the least Glimps of Hope that look'd toward Liberty, when he consider'd the implacable Nature of the Woman. But yet he was not so guilty to his own Reason, and that Friendship (as he thought) that was betwixt him and the Earl of Somerset, as utterly to despair, he having so faithfully promised to procure his Release.

Writes to Somerset.

Therefore Overbury writes to him in the midst of his Glory, to let him know the sad Condition wherein he was, and how much his Health was impair'd, which he imputed to his Reclusedness and want of Air; humbly imploring his Assistance, that he might no longer languish under the Burthens of his Infirmities. Somerset not willing to have him exclaim, made answer, That the King was now full of great Business, but he would take the first Opportunity to move him for his Release (though he was highly incensed against him) and make his Indisposition a Ground for the King's Mercy to work upon: including in the Letter a white Powder, which he desir'd him to take; assuring him, That though it made him a little Sick at first, it would do him much good in the End. The poor abused Gentleman took his Powder, which having a poysonous Quality, added to his Afflictions: But there must be something more violent to work the Feat.

Somerset sends Poisons in his Answers.

The Lieutenant betrays Overbury.

The Lieutenant of the Tower (that was his frequent Visitor) open'd his Breast to his Complaints; and with an outward Pity receiv'd them, against those that were Authors of his Calamities, and discharg'd them again into their Bosoms, against whom they were spoken; so that he could say nothing that came not to their knowledge, his very Words being rack'd, as well as his Body tormented. For the Lieutenant confess'd after, with repenting Tears, as one of his great Sins, that he was unfaithful and treacherous to him; doing things to his Disadvantage that he trusted him to do, promising him Secrecy, and betraying him to satisfy Greatness. Thus he continu'd in this Dismal Den above four Months; whip'd daily (as it were) with Scorpions, whose venomous stings enter'd even into his Soul: So that his Enemies being more impatient for his enduring so long, than he was to endure so much, forced Nature so, with an impoyson'd Glister, compounded by Franklin) that within a short time after he died.

A. Reg. 11.
An. Christi 1613.

Overbury dies.

And to kill him again after Death, they brand him with the Scandal of a Lascivious Life; giving out, that he died of the Pox: Which Northampton expressed to Somerset in a Letter; telling him of strange Sores and Ulcers found upon his Body, ugly to behold stinking intolerably; the People forced to throw him in a loose sheet in a Coffin, and bury him privately on Tower-Hill: Concluding, That God is gracious in cutting off evil Instruments before their time. which Sentence (while he was writing it) reflected the Judgment on himself; for Northampton having a great Influence in the Kingdom, being a prime Counsellor to the King, and intimate with Somerset, they Two grasping all Power; and Northampton having the better Head to manage it, the Miscarriages were, not without cause, imputed to him. For being a Papist, he did not only work upon Somerset to pervert him (by letting him see there was a greater Latitude for the Conscience in that Religion) but got him to procure many Immunities for the Papists, as the King's best affected Subjects. And being Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, he gave free Access to Priests and Jesuits, that abundantly flock'd again into the Kingdom, the Operation of the last Parliament having now lost the Vertue. And a Letter being discover'd which he had written to Cardinal Bellarmine, wherein he expresses the Condition of the Times; and the King's Impportunity compelled him to be a Protestant in shew, yet nevertheless his Heart stood firm with the Papists, and if there were Cause he would express it; with much more to this Purpose. These Things first mutter'd, then urg'd against him, touch'd him to the Heart; so that he retir'd, dispos'd of his Estate, and died. He had a great Mind tending towards eminent Things, which he was the better able to effect, by living a Batchelor to an old Age, being always attended (and he loved it) with Gentlemen of Quality, to whom he was very Bountiful. His Affections were also much raised to Charity, as by the Alms-House he errected appears; and his Works shew him to be a great Getter. But leaving no Issue to Propagate his Name, he built a fair House by Charing-Cross to continue it; which it lost soon after his Death, being called Suffolk-house for a time, and now Northumberland-house. Such Changes there are in the World's Measures! His Body was carried to be buried at Dover, because he was Warden of the Cinque-Ports, as was reported by some of his Followers; but it was Vulgarly rumour'd to be transported to Rome. But these Actions of his about Overbury lying Dormant, made no great noise at this time against him; but when they broke out, they laid upon his Name as great a Stench as Infamy or Odium could produce.

Northampton reviles him.

Northampton dies.

People go to New-England 1614.

The Bishops that were only to move in their own Spheres, had an Influence over more than their own Sees: For some of them that were never unactive for establishing their Temporal Greatness, were not contented to suppress many Pious and Religious Men; but, I know not for what Policy, restrain'd their going beyond Sea: For there were divers Families about this time Shipp'd for New-England, and were not suffer'd to go; though afterwards they were upon

A. Reg. 12. An. Christi 1614.

upon better Thoughts permitted. For in Reason (being there was an Impossibility to reduce them to their Wills) it had been the best Course to have set open the Door, that the Enemy might have had a smooth Passage. But this Malicious Proceeding was no hindrance to the Establishment of that Colony, nor is the Blame to be laid upon the Function, (for some of the † Bishops in these Times were Holy Men, and great Lights to the Truths of God) but on such, whose Ambition made them endeavour more after Earthly things than Heavenly, and less to please God than the King, (as Cardinal Woolsey long since confessed of himself) and the Malice of Evil Men may protract, but it shall never destroy what God intends to build up. A Wonderful Light breaking forth in the West-part of the World; this Latter Age discovering the Nakedness of the Nations both in Body and Soul; which carried a Resemblance of the Creation of a new World, or at least the Imperfection of the Old. A vast Territory, and few People.

The Spaniards, the first Discoverers, being more covetous to grasp, than well able to plant, took Possession of the most precious Places; so that the English, French and Dutch, caught but what they left. Sir Walter Raleigh, and others (after Sir Francis Drake) found out that Country now called Virginia, which was long since planted with a Colony. And in that Tract of Land more Northerly, within the Degrees of 40 and 48 of Latitude, lies New-England, a Climate Temperate and Healthful, but not so much as the Old. It is rather a low than a high Land, full of Rocky Capes or Promontories. The Inmost Parts of the Country are Mountainous, intermix'd with fruitful Valleys and large Lakes, which want not store of good Fish. The Hills are no where Barren (though in some places Stony) but fruitful in Trees and Grass. There are many Rivers, fresh Brooks and Springs, that run into the Sea. The Rivers are good Harbours, and abound with plenty of excellent Fish; yet are they full of Falls, which makes them not Navigable far into the Land. The Seas bordering the Shores are studded with Islands, about which great Shoals of Fishes (Cod, Haddock, and such like) do wantonly sport themselves. The main Land doth nourish abundance of Deer, Bears, Wolves, and a Beast called Moose, peculiar to those Regions; and the Rivers and Ponds are stor'd with some Beavers, Otters, and Musquashes. There are also divers kinds of small Beasts, but the most offensive are Foxes. Fowls there are store in their several Seasons, as Turkies, Geese and Ducks; and the Soil naturally produces wild Vines with very large Bunches of Grapes; but the extremity of Heat and Cold, hinder their just Temper. There are many other Fruits which are very good, with Plants, whose Rinds or Barks transcends our Hemp or Flax; both Air and Earth concurring to bring forth most things that Industry and Art can provide for the Use of Man.

New-England described.

The First that sent a Colony into this Country, was the Lord Chief Justice Popham, in the Year 1606. A Man highly Renown'd in his time, for persecuting such as transgressed the Laws among Christians, living like Beasts of Prey to the prejudice of Travellers. And in this he had a special Aim and Hope also, to establish Christian Laws among Infidels; and by Domestical, to chace away those Ferous and Indomitable Creatures, that infested the Land: Brave and Gallant Spirits having ever such Publick Ends. But Planters are like Alchymists, they have something in Projection, that many times fails in Production. It is conceiv'd the Romans were not well advis'd to settle one of their first Colonies at Maldon in Essex, whose Soil about is neither yet found, nor Air salubrious. And the first opening of Ground in a Climate not Natural, hath an extraordinary Operation upon the Bodies of Men, whose Senses must comply to give Entertainment to a Stranger, that often spoils the Place where it finds Hospitality. For the first Planters in New-England having seated themselves low, few of them were left to direct those that succeeded in a better way. Yet People, by dear Experience, over-came it by degrees, being Yearly supplied by Men, whose Industry and Affections taught them, there was more Hope to find Safety in New-England than in the Old.

Planted first 1606.

Though these found some stop, yet our great Favourite, the Earl of Somerset, and his Business, runs smoothly, without Rub, since Overbury's Death. But he must alter his Bias, and go less, or find some new Ways to bring in Moneys; the Revenues of the Crown are not competent to maintain such vast Expences, accumulated by his Riot, though he had all the Earl of Westmorland's Lands at his Marriage and Creation, added to his Earldom. ‖ There must be therefore a new Order of Baronets made, in number Two hundred, that must be next Degree to Barons; and these must pay a Thousand Pound a-piece for their Honour; having it by Patent under the Great Seal, and continued to Posterity with the Title of Knights. Some of these new Honourable Men (whose Wives Pride, and their own Prodigalities, had pumpt up to it) were so drain'd, that they had not Moisture to maintain the Radical Humour, but wither'd to nothing. This Money thus rais'd, is pretended for Planting the North of Ireland; but it found many other Chanels, before it came to that Sea. And though at our King's first access to the Crown, there was a glut of Knights made, yet after some time he held his hand, lest the Kingdom should be cloy'd with them: And the World thriv'd so well with some, that the Price was afterwards brought up to Three hundred Pounds a piece. But now again, the poor Courtiers were so Indigent, that Sixty Pounds would purchase a Knighthood, the King wanting other Means to gratifie his Servants.

Somerset's Devices to get Money.

Yet he was of so free a Nature, and careless of Money, when he had it (though solicitous to get it) that he Battled in his own Bounty. For being one Day in the Gallery at Whitehall, and none with him but Sir Henry Rich (who was second Son to the Earl of Warwick) afterwards Earl of Holland, a Gentleman of Excellent Natural Parts, but youthfully Expensive;

The King's Bounty.

† From this Character which the Author gives several Bishops of that time, it appears he was no Sectarian or Dissenter, as some would pretend, but a Moderate Churchman.

‖ It's true, the Earl of Salisbury had given the King a Project for Erecting this new Order of Knighthood some time before, in order to supply in some Measure his empty Coffers: But it was Somerset that got it put in Practice, and he had most of the Money arising from it.

A. Reg. 12. An. Christi 1614.

and James Maxwel, one of his Bed-Chamber; ſome Porters paſs'd by them, with Three thouſand Pounds, going to the Privy-Purſe: Sir Henry Rich whiſper'd Maxwel; the King turn'd upon them, and asked Maxwel, What ſays he? What ſays he? Maxwel told him, he wiſh'd he had ſo much Money; Marry ſhalt thou Harry, (ſaid the King) and preſently commanded the Porters to carry it to his Lodging, with this Expreſſion; You think now you have a great Purchaſe; but I am more delighted to think how much I have pleaſured you in giving this Money, than you can be in receiving it. This Story intervenes, to ſhew the Temper of his Mind.

Gold raiſed

About this time alſo Gold was rais'd to Two Shillings in the Pound, occaſion'd from the high Value ſet upon it abroad, which made the Merchants tranſport it. But the firſt Inhancers can make their Markets, by ingroſſing great Sums; eſpecially the Payments of thoſe Times, and all this King's Reign, being for the moſt part in Gold, ſo that it might be call'd the Golden Age; that it is a Wonder now what Gulph hath ſwallow'd thoſe great Sums, if their Golden Wings be not flown to the Sun-riſing. But theſe little Projects will bring in but ſmall Store of Money to maintain the Work: Many ſuch Materials muſt go to make up a Royal Building; and little Streams will not eaſily fill a Ciſtern that hath many Iſſues. A Parliament can furniſh all; but who dare venture on ſuch Refractory Spirits.

A Parliament undertaken.

Yet there was a Generation about the Court, that, to pleaſe and Humour Greatneſs, undertook a Parliament, as Men preſuming to have Friends in every County and Borough, who (by their Power among the People) would make Election of ſuch Members for Knights and Burgeſſes, as ſhould comply ſolely to the King's Deſires; and Somerſet is the Head and Chief of theſe Undertakers: But this was but and Embrion, and became an Abortive. The Engliſh Freedom cannot be loſt by a few baſe and tame Spirits, that would unmake themſelves and their Poſterity to aggrandize one Man. For the Parliament meeting according to their Summons, ſuch Faces appear'd there as made the Court droop; who, inſtead of contributing to the King's Wants, lay open his Waſts, eſpecially upon the Scots, with whom they deſire Mediatatem Linguæ, a Share of Favour; the Bread (by our Saviour's Rule) properly belonging to the Children of the Kingdom. And they beſeech his Majeſty to ſtop the Current of future Acceſs of that Nation, to make Reſidence here, having enough to eat up their own Crums. They enquire into the Cauſes of the unexpected Encreaſe of Popiſh Recuſants ſince the Gunpowder-Plot, the Deteſtation whereof (they thought) ſhould have utterly extinguiſhed them; and they find it owing to the Admiſſion of Popiſh Nobility into his Councils; the ſilencing of many watchful and diligent Miniſters; † the divers Treaties his Majeſty hath entertain'd, not only for the Marriage of the deceaſed Prince Henry, but for Prince Charles, that now liveth, with the Daughters of Popiſh Princes; which diſheartencth the Proteſtant, and encourageth the Recuſant; laying open, with theſe, many other Miſcarriages in Government; which the King willing to have conceal'd, ſtop'd them in their Courſe, diſſolving the Parliament, and committing to the Tower and other Priſons (the Beginning of Encroachment upon the Publick Liberties) ſuch as were moſt active for the Common Good.

These fair Bloſſoms not producing the hop'd-for Fruit, they find out new Projects to manure the People, different much in Name and Nature, a Benevolence extorted, a Free-Gift againſt their Wills was urg'd upon them; and they that did not give in their Money, muſt give in their Names, which carried a kind of Fright with it. But the moſt knowing Men (like ſo many Pillars to the Kingdom's Liberties) ſupported their Neighbour's tottering Reſolutions, with aſſuring them, That theſe kind of Benevolences were againſt Law, Reaſon, and Religion.

A Benevolence required.

Firſt, againſt Laws, being prohibited by divers Acts of Parliament, and a Curſe pronounced againſt the Infringers of them.

Secondly, againſt Reaſon, that a particular Man ſhould oppoſe his Judgment and Diſcretion, to the Wiſdom and Judgment of the Kingdom aſſembled in Parliament, who have there deniedany ſuch Aid.

Thirdly, againſt Religion, that a King, violating his Oath, (taken at his Coronation, for maintaining the Laws, Liberties and Cuſtoms of the Realm) ſhould be aſſiſted by the People in an Act of ſo much Injuſtice and Impiety. Theſe, and many other Arguments, inſtilled into the People by ſome good Patriots, were great Impediments to the Benevolence; ſo that they got but little Money, and loſt a great deal of Love: For no Levies do ſo much decline and abaſe the Love and Spirits of the People, as unjuſt Levies. Subſidies get more of their Money, but Exactions enſlave the Mind; for they either raiſe them above, or depreſs them beneath, their Sufferings, which are equally miſchievous, and to be avoided.

The King of Denmark's ſecond Coming.

This Summer the King of Denmark re-viſited his Siſter the Queen of England, with ſome Forty Lords, Gentlemen and others, in his Train: Landing at Yarmouth, and paſſing directly to London, took up his Lodging in our common Inns, and was not known, but for ſome Outlandiſh Noblemen, till he came to the Queen's Palace in the Strand, where ſhe was ſurpriſed with the unexpected Joy of a Brother's Company, diſtanc'd from her by the Intereſt of his People, the great Bar that hinders Princes the common Civilities and Happineſs of their Inferiors. But the Joy continu'd not long; for after ſome Fourteen Days Interview, they parted again. But thoſe Days had ſuch a Plenitude of all thoſe Delights that contend to Satisfaction, as if a great deal of more Time had been involved and contracted in them.

The Queen oppoſes Somerſet.

The Earl of Somerſet, new made Lord Chamberlain, ſucceeding his Father-in-law the Earl † It's remarkable, That in a Speech of his to the preceding Parliament, King James denied that ever he had any Deſign to match his Children in Roman Catholick Families, notwithſtanding the Great Monſieur de Thou, and moſt of the Foreign Hiſtorians of that Time, mention the Steps he made towards a Match for Prince Henry with the eldeſt Infanta of Spain, afterwards Queen of France; to which that young Prince ſhew'd an utter Averſion: And there is yet extant in Print, a Memorial ſent by Sir Dudley Carleton, then Ambaſſador at Venice, to the Earl of Saliſbury, ſetting forth Reaſons againſt that intended Match, and ſhewing how much it was the Intereſt of King James to match his Son to a Proteſtant Princeſs. But however ſecret the Deſign of thus matching Prince Henry was kept, his Treaty afterwards for a Match between his ſurviving Son and that Infanta's Siſter, was one of the moſt publick Tranſactions of his Reign.

An. Reg. 12. An. Christi 1614.

of Suffolk, and the Lord Treasurer Successor to Salisbury, were not very acceptable to the Queen, having the same Spirit and Animosity against Somerset that her Son had: But whether from an Apprehension that the King's Love and Company was alienated from her by his Masculine Conversation and Intimacy, or whether the Man's Insolence (thus high mounted) had carried him too near the Beams of Majesty, (his Creature Overbury being a little before his Commitment condemned for presumptuous walking with his Hat on in her Palace Garden she being in the Window) or whether from that natural Inclination that makes every one oppose Pride in others, though it be more active in themselves and see it not, or from that Rumour of Prince Henry's Death, covertly imputed to Somerset, I know not: * But she became the Head of a great Faction against him.

---

* I remember to have read a Latin Account of the Life of Christian King of Denmark, Queen Ann's Brother, (the Author's Name I have forgot) in which Mention is made of her Hatred to Somerset, and her Suspicions of some foul Play done her Son Prince Henry.

It's certain, she was a great Instrument in his Fall, and would never see him after, though the King sometimes did; which must have proceeded from some rooted Prejudice, the rather that it was almost the only Turn of Court she meddled in all the Time she liv'd after her coming to England.

It's true, the whole Court was weary of Somerset before; but they durst not appear against him till the Queen had openly declar'd her self his Enemy: Nor durst Winwood tell the Discovery he had made of Overbury's Murder to any of the Howards, till he had sounded the Queen before-hand, to know if she would stand by him, and protect him against the Favourite.

But neither she, nor all the World besides, could have brought about his Overthrow, if the King's growing Favour to Villiers had not given them Encouragement; which they promoted with all the Industry imaginable, as the only way to jostle out the other.

It's true, the Queen would much rather have had no Favourite about the King, if it had been possible: For when Archbishop Abbot was put upon it, by the rest of the Court, to perswade her to recommend Villiers, he tells us, in his printed Narrative, she made him this Answer: My Lord, Neither you nor your Friends know what you desire. I know your Master better than you all. If Villiers get once into his Favour, those who shall have most contributed to his Preferment will be the first Sufferers by him. I shall be no more spared than the rest. The King will teach him himself to despise us, and to treat us with Pride and Scorn. The young proud Favourite will fancy that he is obliged to no Body for his Preferment, but his own Merit.

The Queen's Conjectures were not ill grounded; for she was soon obliged to apply her self to the new Favourite for every thing she had to ask of the King.

We have an early Instance of this in a Letter of hers to Buckingham, when but Sir George Villiers dated at Denmark-House, Febr. 2. 1617. contain'd in the Collection of Original Letters after-mention'd.

There she desires his Intercession with the King, for the Reversion of the Wardship of Sir George Savil's Heir, within the Lordship of Pomfret, telling him, That though the Lordship was properly her own, yet she would be obliged to Villiers for that Reversion, to prevent any Mistakes that might arise when the Thing happen'd.

Now since I have already, and may hereafter more than once, make mention of this Collection of Original Letters, it's but reasonable the Reader should once for all have some short Account of them.

There are in all Six Bundles of these Letters, most of them mark'd with King Charles I. his Hand, some few with Archbishop Laud's, if I mistake not the Character, and the rest with a Hand I remember not to have seen before.

In the first Bundle there are Twelve of King James's Letters, and Two of the Queen of Bohemia's to the Duke of Buckingham. In the second Bundle there are Sixteen Letters of King James to the Prince and Buckingham jointly. In the third there is One Letter of King James to the Prince, and Two of the Prince's to him. In the fourth there are Ten Letters of King Charles I. to Buckingham, Eight of them when he was Prince, and Two when he was King; together with Two of Queen Ann's to the same Duke. The fifth Bundle contains Seven Letters of the Duke of Buckingham to King James. And the Six Nine Letters of the Prince and Buckingham jointly to him.

All these are Original Letters, and the whole of their own Hand-writing. How they came into Archbishop Laud's Hands, I know not; but they were among the rest of his Papers seized by Prinne, by Vertue of an Order of the then House of Commons, and continued in his Hands till the Restauration, when all Archbishop Laud's Books and Papers were ordered by the King in Council to be delivered to Dr. Sheldon, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury; and after Archbishop Sheldon's Death, they fell into the Hands of his Executors.

It looks strange, that Prinne in all his virulent Writings should never take Notice of these Letters, considering that as he wanted not Inclination to bespatter the Memory of King James, so he had sufficient Matter in them to feed his Humour, there being Expressions in some of these Letters of King James to Buckingham might make a Bawd blush to repeat. But I have been credibly told they were found among a Heap of waste Paper, when Archbishop Sheldon had them from Prinne, and so probably it was they escaped Prinne's Notice all the time they were in his Possession.

The Letters that passed between the King and Buckingham are wrote in a peculiar Stile of Familiarity, the King for the most part calling him His Dear Child and Gossip, and His Dear Child and Gossip, Steiny; and subscribing himself, His Dear Dad, and sometimes His Dear Dad and Steward; and once, when he sends him Partridges, His Dear Dad and Purveyor. Buckingham calls the King, for the most part, Dear Dad and Gossip, and sometimes Dear Dad, Gossip, and Steward; and subscribes always, Your Majesty's most Humble Slave and Dog, Steiny.

The Prince's Letters, both to the King, and Buckingham, are of another Stile, and much more manly Sense. These of his and Buckingham jointly to the King from Madrid, are all of Buckingham's Hand; and upon the top, the King is call'd Dear Dad and Gossip; the Prince signing beneath on the right Hand, Your Majesty's most Obedient Son and most Humble Servant; and Buckingham on the left, Your Majesty's most Humble Slave and Dog, Steiny. The Prince, in his Letters to Buckingham, calls him always Steiny, and signs, Your Constant Faithful Friend.

Not to blot this Paper with the Bawdy that is in some of these Letters of King James, I shall only observe, that such was the Familiarity and Friendship between him and Buckingham, that in one of them he tells Buckingham, He wears Steiny's Picture under his Wastcoat, next his Heart; and in another, He bids him, his only Sweet and Dear Child, haste to him to Birely that Night, that his white Teeth may shine upon him.

But the Reader may better judge of the rest of King James's familiar Letters to the Duke of Buckingham by the following short one, which runs thus verbatim, and is without Date.

My only Sweet and Dear Child,

B*Lessing, Blessing, Blessing, on thy Heart's Roots, and all thine, this* Thursday Morning. Here is great Store of Game, as they say, Partridges and Stone-curlews: I know who shall get their Part of them: And here is the finest Company of young Hounds that ever was seen. God bless the sweet Master of my Harriers, that made them to be so well kept all Summer; I mean, Tom Badger. I assure my self thou will punctually observe the Dyet and Journey I set thee down in my first Letter from Theobalds. God bless thee, and sweet Kate, and Mall, to the Comfort of

Thy Dear Dad,

JAMES R.

P. S. Let my last Compliment settle in thy Heart, till we may have a sweet and comfortable Meeting, which God send; and give thee Grace to bid the Drogues adieu this Day.

Now the Reason why King James gave Buckingham the Name of Steiny, was for his Handsomness, it being the Diminutive of St. Stephen, who is always printed with a Glory about his Face.

A. Reg. 12.

An. Christi 1614.

Sir Ralph Winwood, who had been Lieger-Ambaſſador with the States in the Netherlands, for his Abilities and good Service had merited ſo much from the King, that he made him Secretary of State: The Queen cloſes with him the better to diſcover Somerſet's Miſcarriages; and he was ready enough to oblige her; for Somerſet made him but an Underling, graſping all Publick Employments into his own Hand, not caring whom he diſobliged, or what Malice he pull'd upon himſelf; for, like a Coloſs, he ſtood the Brunt of all the Tempeſts of Envy, making thoſe that carried the greateſt Sail to ſtrike and come under him. Nor would he ſuffer any Place in Court, or Dignity in State, to be beſtow'd, which was not ſweetned with his Smile that gave it, or their Bounty that enjoy'd it; ſo that (it was thought) he engroſſed a Maſs of Coin, as if his Soul intended to take her Eaſe. This Pride and Covetouſneſs added to his other Miſcarriages ſuch a Number of Underminers, that he ſtood upon a tottering Foundation, having no Support but the King's Favour, which, whether by Providence from above, or Purpoſes below, (both ever concurring from the Will to the Means) was ſoon removed.

George Villers a Favourite.

For about this Time the King caſt his Eye upon a young Gentleman, ſo rarely moulded, that he meant to make him a Maſter-piece: His Name was George Villers; he was ſecond Son to Sir George Villers, a Knight of Leiceſterſhire, by a ſecond Venter: For the old Man coming to Colehorton, in that County, to viſit his Kinſwoman the Lady Beaumont, found a young Gentlewoman of that Name ally'd, and yet a Servant to the Lady, who being of a handſome Preſence and Countenance, took his Affections, and he married her. This was the Soil where the glorious Cedar grew; who, having only the Breeding and Portion of a younger Brother, with the Mother's Help and Travel, got the Addition of a French Garb, which brought him to the Court in no greater a Condition than Fifty Pounds a Year is able to maintain.

The King, ſtricken with this new Object, would not expoſe him to ſo much Hazard as the Malice of a Jealous Competitor, nor himſelf to ſo much Cenſure as to be thought changeable, and taken again with a ſudden Affection; therefore he inſtructs ſome of his Confidents to bring him in by Degrees, who intimated the King's Pleaſure to him, that he ſhould wait Cup-bearer at large, being ſo, at too great a Diſtance of Place to have any Mark of Favour for Suſpition to level at. And if the King had not receiv'd a new Impreſſion thus, the Old Character of Somerſet, that was imprinted in his Soul, could not ſo ſoon (as many Men thought) have been blotted out. But Courts that are the wiſeſt, though not the moſt virtuous Schools, do teach their Scholars to obſerve the Seaſons, and, by the Aſtronomy of the Prince's Eye, to calculate what Fortune ſuch Aſpects and ſuch Conjunctions may happily produce: And they found ſo much as gave them Encouragement to hear, and Boldneſs to diſcover, that which pull'd down the one, and ſet up the other.

Somerſet's Decline, 1615.

But Somerſet, that had the Pulſe of Conſcience always beating at Overbury's Door, was as active to preſerve himſelf, as his Enemies were to ruine him: And finding himſelf ſhaking, (though there was nothing yet laid to his Charge but the imbezzelling ſome of the Crown Jewels) he throws himſelf at the King's Feet, acknowledging the great Truſt his Majeſty had repoſed in him, and the Weight of Buſineſs lying on him, might make him encounter him with ſome Miſcarriages through Youth and Ignorance, (great Employments often meeting with Envy, that joſtles them in the way:) He therefore humbly beſought his Majeſty to grant him a general Pardon for what was paſt, that he might not be expoſed to the Malice of thoſe that would wreſt all his Actions to the worſt Meaning. The King, that raiſed this fair Edifice, being loth to have it quite pull'd down again, gave Order for the drawing up of a general Pardon, in ſo ample and full a Manner, that it might rather Exceed than take Riſe from any former Precedent: This the King ſign'd, and ſent to the Great Seal; but the Queen having Notice of it, and uſing her Power with the Lord Chancellor, gave ſtop to the Seal till the King's coming to Town, (who was on his Progreſs in the Weſt) and then what was mutter'd in Corners before, rung openly in the Streets: For the Apothecary's Boy that gave Sir Thomas Overbury the Gliſter, falling ſick at Fluſhing, reveal'd the whole Matter, which Sir Ralph Winwood, by his Correſpondents, had a full Relation of; and a ſmall Breach being made, his Enemies, like the Noiſe of many Waters, riſe up againſt him, following the Stream.

A. Reg. 13.

An. Christi 1615.

The King deſerts him.

The King hearing of the Buſineſs, and what ill Sound it carried with it, (as it was ſet out to him) that in the Face of the Court, and ſo near his own Boſom, ſuch poyſonous Practices ſhould be perpetrated, and on one that was his Priſoner, he ſeem'd to be much mov'd with the Relation, and ſending for the Judges, gave them ſtrict Charge to examine the Matter throughly, imprecating a Curſe upon them and their Poſterity, if they did not endeavour to diſcover it; and if he did ſpare any guilty Perſon, he wiſh'd God's Curſe might light upon him, and his Poſterity; ſo violent the King appear'd in Proſecution of it: And away to Royſton he goes, and Somerſet with him; thither theſe Rumours came buzzing about his Ears, like a riſing Storm upon a well-ſpread Oak; but he thought himſelf too firmly rooted in the King's Favour to be removed, therefore he went back to London, to ſtill the Murmurs vented againſt him. Some ſay, the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke ſent for him; upon which he went to the King with a Complaint, as taking it to be a great Preſumption; but the King made anſwer, Then muſt go then; for if Coke ſend for me, I muſt go too. Others ſay, when he came to take his Leave of the King, he embrac'd and kiſs'd him often, wiſh'd him to make haſt back, ſhewed an extream Paſſion to be without him; and his Back was no ſooner turn'd, but he ſaid with a Smile, I ſhall never ſee thy Face more. Whether either or both of theſe were ſo cannot be aſſerted; but to London he went; his Counteſs was apprehended (and committed to Cuſtody in Black Fryars) before he came thither: He was no ſooner there, but he was ſeiz'd on, and commended to the Charge of Dr. Mountain, Dean of Weſtminſter; and then they went on roundly with the Buſineſs.

Weſton and the reſt tried.

For a little before this, Weſton was taken, and examin'd, but, like a ſtubborn Piece, (unmoulded for Impreſſion) nothing could be drawn from him: But God (by the Means and Perſwaſion of the Biſhop of London, Dr. King, a Man eminent for Piety in his Time) ſo wrought upon his Heart, that the Eye of his Soul being open'd to the foulneſs of his Sin, he diſcover'd all, ſo that the whole Confederacy were laid hold on, who falling into the Hands of

A. Reg. 13. An. Christi 1615.

of the Lord Chief Justice Coke, (a Spirit of a fiery Exhalation, as subtile as active) he left no Stone unturn'd, till he had ript up the very Foundation.

But in the mean time, between Weston's standing mute, and his Trial, one Lumsden, a Scotchman, took upon him to make a false and libellous Relation of the Business, and delivers it to Henry Gib of the Bed-Chamber, to be put into the King's Hand; in which Writing he falsifies and perverts all that was done the first Day of Weston's Arraignment, turning the Edge of his Imputations upon the Lord Chief Justice Coke; which Bolt was boldly shot by him, but it was thought not to come out of his own Quiver; and it lighted into an ill Hand for him, for the King discover'd it, and left him an open Mark to that Justice he had traduc'd.

Weston executed.

Weston was the first that suffer'd by the Hand of the Law; which Sir John Hollis, (after Earl of Clare) out of Friendship to Somerset, and Sir John Wentworth, a Person debauch'd and riotous, hoping, from the Beams of Somerset's Favour, to encrease his wanting Fortunes) strove to blast in the Spring; for they rode to Tyburn, and urged him at his Execution to deny all, hoping that way to prevent the Autumn that followed. But Weston's Soul being prepar'd for Death, resisted their Temptations, sealing penitently the Truth of his Confession with his last Gasp. And this Attempt of Hollis, Wentworth, and Lumsden, to pervert Justice, being aggravated against them in the Star-Chamber by the King's Attorney, Sir Francis Bacon, they were sentenc'd there, and found the Reward of their Presumption.

Mrs. Turner.

Mrs. Turner follow'd next: A Pattern of Pride and Lust, who having always given a loose Rein to her Life, she ran this Carrier at last into the Jaws of Death.

Sir Jerv. Ellowis.

Sir Jervis Ellowis, Lieutenant of the Tower, was the third, who suffer'd on Tower-Hill; a Man much pitied, being drawn in by the Allurements of Northampton to be a Spectator rather than an Actor in this bloody Tragedy: but this Connivance cost him his Life. And being a Man full of Sorrow for his Offence, he left two Pillars behind him at his Death, for Watch Towers to all that pass by, in this Bark of frail Mortality, to prevent Shipwrack. One was, Not to vow any thing to God, but to perform it. The other was, Not to take a Pride in any Parts, tho' never so Excellent. For the first, he said he was a great Gamester, and lov'd it; and having lost one time much Money, he seriously and advisedly, between God and his own Soul, clapping his Hand on his Breast, spake thus, as it were to God) If ever I play again, then let me be hanged! And breaking my vow, (said he) now God hath paid my Imprecation home. The second was, He took a great Delight in his Pen, And that Pen (to use his own Words) which I was so proud of, hath struck me dead, and, like Absolon's Hair, hath hanged me; for there dropt a Word or two from my Pen, in a Letter to the Earl of Northampton, which upon my Salvation I am not able to answer: At my Arraignment I pleaded hard for my Life, and protested mine Innocency; but when my own Pen came against me, I was not able to speak for my self, but stood as one amaz'd, or that had no Tongue. Such Damps doth Guiltiness cast upon the Spirit!

And Franklin.

The fourth that fell by the Stroke of Justice, was Franklin, a Fellow as sordid in his Death, as pernicious in his Life, whose Name deserves not so much as Memory.

The fifth and sixth were Somerset and his Countess. At her Arraignment, all the Letters that passed betwixt Forman and she were read in open Court, and the Waxen and Brazen Poppets were made visible, dancing up and down from Hand to Hand, which discover'd the Folly of her Actions: But the Earl and she being condemn'd, found the King's Mercy, and were, after some time of Imprisonment in the Tower, set at Liberty, holding their Lives by a Lease of the King's Will, living in a private and almost obscure Condition: † Shewing in it, That no Content or Happiness can be truly establish'd, but on the Foundation of Justice: For that Love that made them break through all Oppositions, (either by her declining to some new Object, (as was the common Rumour) or his inclining Reluctancy (or the old) grew so weak, that it pin'd away, and they liv'd long after (tho' in one House) as Strangers one to another.

The Countess's Description in her Death.

She died before him. Her Death was Infamous, his without Fame, the Obscurity of the rest of his Life darkening the Splendour of it. And tho' she died (as it were) in a Corner, (in so private a Condition) the Loathsomness of her Death made it as conspicuous as on the House-top: For that part of her Body which had been the Receptacle of most of her Sin, grown rotten, (tho' she never had but one Child) the Ligaments failing, it fell down, and was cut away in Flakes, with a most nauseous and putrid Savour; which to augment, she would roul her self in her own Ordure in her Bed, and took Delight in it. Thus, her Affections varied; for nothing could be found sweet enough to augment her Beauties at first, and nothing stinking enough to decipher her Loath-

---

† Somerset liv'd to an old Age, in a very obscure Retreat, tho' visited sometimes by King James, but never by his Son King Charles I. He was suffer'd to enjoy the greatest part of his Estate, and thought himself ill us'd that he was not restor'd to the whole. We have a Letter of his to this purpose Printed in the Cabala; wherein he complains to King James about the Delay he met with in that Business, and after a perplex'd manner vindicates his Innocency, or at least extenuates his Crime. The whole of that Letter is couch'd in obscure Terms, and some Sentences require an Interpreter. Among other expostulatory Expressions, he hath these following: I have prison'd to this end (saith he) to awaken Your Majesty's own Council upon this Subject, which can gather to it self better and more able Defences in my behalf upon this View: For the [illegible] Acts of your Mercy, which are not communicable, nor the Causes of them, as being arriv'd from those secret Motives which are only sensible and privy to your own Heart, and admits of no Secret or Discovery to any general Satisfaction; yet my Cause needs not hide its self, but attend the Dispute with any that would put upon it a monstrous and heavy Shape. Some few Lines after, he tells the King, That the Crime whereupon he was judg'd might have been none, if his Majesty's Hand had not once touch'd upon it; and that he fell rather for want of well Defending, than by the Violence or Force of any Proofs; for (says he) I so far forsook my self, and my Cause, that it may be a Question, Whether I was more condemn'd for that, or for the Matter it self?

The last Period of this Letter begins with another, yet darker Expression. I will say no further (continues he) neither in that which Your Majesty doubted my Aptness to fall into; for my Cause nor my Confidence is not in that Distress as for to use that Mean of Intercession, but to remember Your Majesty that I am the Workmanship of your Hands, &c. To this Letter he signs, Your Majesty's Loyal Servant and Creature, Somerset.

How far any Expressions in this Letter may have Relation to a Report spread about at that time, of Somerset's threatning Message sent to King James by the Lieutenant of the Tower, That if he had not his Pardon, he would discover an important Secret, which was King James's Interest to have conceal'd, is left to the Reader to judge.

An. Reg. 13. An. Christi 1615.

fomnefs at laft: Pardon the Sharpnefs of thefe Expreffions, for they are for the Glory of God, who often makes his Punifhments (in the Ballance of his Juftice) of equal Weight with our Sins.

Somerset's in his Life.

For his Perfon, he was rather well compacted than tall; his Features and Favour comely and handfome rather than Beautiful; the Hair of his Head Flaxen, that of his Face tinctur'd with Yellow of the Sycambrian Colour: In his own Nature, of a gentle Mind, and affable Difpofition, having publick Affections, till they were all fwallow'd up in this Gulf of Beauty, which did precipitate him into thefe dangerous Contrivances: For that which made his Friendfhip falfe, diverted his publick Affection to his private Intereft; and when he found himfelf guilty of what he thought might ruin him, he grew covetous to heap that together, which he thought might preferve him: So that at one Breach that our Corruptions make, many Mifchiefs follow in the Crowd. And if he had not met with fuch a Woman, he might have been a good Man: But Trials and ftrong Temptations enhanceth the Price of Vertue; the Conflict is gallant, but to be overcome, debafeth a Man the more, by how much his Fall is the greater.

I was loth to feparate thefe Delinquents in their Trials (being clofe woven) by the length of Sir Francis Bacon's Speech in the Star-Chamber, againft Hollis, Wentworth, and Lumfden. But knowing what an Ornament his Oratory will give to this Story, and how ufual it was for ancient Hiftorians to infert their Harangues of State, as well as Military Orations, I could not decline this, tho' it comes almoft in the Rear; the rather becaufe it will ferve as a Seal and Confirmation of what is formerly written. And thus it was:

Sir Francis Bacon's Speech in the Star Chamber.

'THE Offence wherewith I fhall charge 'the three Offenders at the Bar, is a Mifdemeanour of a high Nature, tending to the 'Defacing and Scandal of Juftice, in a great 'Caufe Capital. The particular Charge is 'this:

'The King, among many of his Princely 'Vertues, is known to excel in that proper Virtue of the Imperial Throne, which is Juftice: 'It is a Mafter Vertue, unto which the other 'three are Miniftrant, and do Service; Wifdom ferveth to difcover and difcern of Innocencies and Guiltinefs; Fortitude is to profecute and execute; and Temperance fo to carry Juftice, as it be not paffionate in the Purfuit, nor confus'd in Valuing Perfons, nor precipitate in Time.

'For this his Majefty's Vertue of Juftice, God 'hath of late raifed an Occafion, and erected '(as it were) a Stage, or Theatre, much for 'his Honour, to fhew and Act in it, in the purfuit of the violent untimely Death of Sir Thomas Overbury, and therein cleanfing the Land 'from Blood: For if Blood doth cry to Heaven in God's Ears, this is a Stench, I may fay, 'in the Noftrils of God and Man.

'This Work of Juftice, the greater and more 'excellent it is, you will foon conclude, the 'greater is the Offence of any that have 'fought to affront or traduce it. And therefore, before I defcend unto the particular 'Charge of thefe Offenders, I will fay fomewhat of the Crime of Impoyfonment; fomewhat of the particular Circumftances of this 'Fact upon Overbury; and thirdly, of the King's 'great and worthy Care and Carriage in this 'Bufinefs.

An. Reg. 14. An. Christi 1616.

'The Offence of Impoyfonment is moft truly figured in that Device and Defcription 'which was made of the Nature of Caius Caligula, That he was Lutum sanguine maceratum, 'Mire cemented with Blood: For as it is one 'of the higheft Offences in Guiltinefs, fo it is 'the bafeft of all others in the Minds of Offenders: Treafons Magnum aliquid spectant, They 'aim at great Things; but this is vile and bafe. 'I have found in the Book of God, Examples of 'all other Offences, but not any one of an Impoyfonment, or an Impoyfoner. I find Mention of fome Fear of cafual Impoyfonments; 'when the Waters were corrupted and bitter, 'they came complaining in a fearful manner, 'Mafter, Mors in olla: And I find Mention of 'Poyfons of Beafts and Serpents; The Poyfons of Afps is under their Lips, faith the Pfalm; but I 'find no Mention in a Humane Creature of a 'malicious and murtherous Impoyfonment. Let their Table be made a Snare, is certainly moft 'true of Impoyfonment: but that I think was 'meant of the Treachery of Friends, that were 'participant of the fame Table.

'This is an Offence that hath two Spurs of 'offending, Spes perficiendi, & spes celandi; It is 'eafily committed, and eafily conceal'd. It is 'an Offence, that is, Tanquam sagitta nocte volans, It is the Arrow that flies by Night, it 'difcerns not whom it hits, for many times the 'Poyfon is laid for one, and another takes it. 'As in Sanders's Cafe, where the Poifon'd Apple was laid for the Mother, and the Child 'eat it. And fo in that notorious Cafe, whereupon the Statute of 22 Hen. VIII. cap. 9. was 'made, where the Intent being but to poyfon 'one or two, Poyfon was put in a little Veffel 'of Barm that ftood in the Kitchen at the Bifhop of Rochefter's Houfe, of which, Barm, Pottage or Grewel was made, wherewith 17 of 'the Bifhop's Family were poyfon'd; nay, divers of the Poor that came to the Bifhop's 'Gate, and had the Pottage in Alms, were 'likewife poyfon'd. Here is great Talk of Impoyfonment, I hope I am fafe, I have no 'Enemies, nor any thing Men can long for; 'that is all one; for he may fit at the Table by 'one for whom Poyfon is prepar'd, and have a 'Drench of his Cup, or of his Pottage, and fo '(as the Poet faith) Concidit infelix alieno vulnere, 'He may die another Man's Death, and therefore it was moft gravely, judicioufly, and 'properly provided by that Statute, That Impoyfonment fhould be High-Treafon, becaufe 'whatfoever Offence tendeth to the utter Subverfion and Diffolution of Humane Society, is 'in the Nature of High-Treafon.

'But it is an Offence, that I may truly fay of 'it, Non est nostri generis nec sanguinis; It is, Thanks 'be to God, rare in the Ifle of Britain: It is 'neither of our Country, nor of our Church: 'You may find it in Rome and Italy, there is a 'Religion for it; if it fhould come among us, 'it were better living in a Wildernefs than in a 'Court.

'For the particular Fact upon Overbury, I 'knew the Gentleman, it is true, his Mind was 'great, but it mov'd not in any great good Order; yet certainly it did commonly fly at good 'Things; and the greateft Fault that ever I 'heard by him, was, That he made his Friend 'his Idol. But take him as he was, the King's 'Prifoner in the Tower, and then fee how the 'Cafe ftands. In that Place the State is (as it 'were) a Refpondent to make good the Body 'of the Prifoner; and if any thing happen to 'him there, it may (tho' not in this Cafe, yet

'in

A. Reg. 14. An. Christi 1616.

'in ſome others) make an Aſperſion and Reflection upon the State it ſelf: For the Perſon is utterly void of his own Defence; his own Care and Providence can ſerve him to nothing: He is in the Cuſtody and Preſervation of Law; and we have a Maxim in our Law, That when a State is in Preſervation of Law, nothing can deſtroy it, or hurt it; and God forbid but the like ſhould be in Perſons; and therefore this was a Circumſtance of great Aggravation.

'Laſtly, To have a Man chaſed to Death, in a manner, as it appears now by Matter of Record, (for other Privacy of Cauſe I know not) by Poyſon after Poyſon; Firſt Roſaker, then Arſnick, then Mercury Sublimate, then Sublimate again: It is a thing would aſtoniſh Man's Nature to hear it. The Poets feign, That the Furies had Whips, and that they were corded with poyſoned Snakes; and a Man would think that this Subject were the very Caſe: To have a Man tied to a Poſt, and to ſcourge him to death with Serpents; for ſo truly may Diverſity of Poyſons be termed.

'It pleaſed my Lord Chief Juſtice to let me know that which I heard with great Comfort, which was the Charge that his Majeſty gave to himſelf, and the reſt of the Commiſſioners in this Caſe, worthy to be written in Letters of Gold, That the Buſineſs ſhould be carry'd without Touch to any that was innocent, not only without Impeachment, but without Aſperſion, which was a moſt Noble and Princely Caution; for Mens Reputations are tender Things, and ought to be, like Chriſt's Coat, without Seam. And it was more to be reſpected in this Caſe, becauſe it met with two great Perſons; a Nobleman that his Majeſty had favour'd and advanc'd, and his Lady, being of a great and Honourable Houſe; tho' I think it be true that the Writers ſay, That there is no Pomegranate ſo fair or ſo ſound, but may have a periſhed Kernel. Nay, I ſee plainly in thoſe excellent Papers of his Majeſty's own Hand-writing (as ſo many Beams of Juſtice iſſuing from that Virtue which ſo much doth ſhine in him) the Buſineſs ſo evenly carry'd without Prejudice, whether it were a true Accuſation on the one part, or a Practice or falſe Accuſation on the other, as ſhew'd plainly that his Majeſty's Judgment was, Tanquam tabula raſa, as a clean pair of Tables, and his Ears, Tanquam janua aperta, as a Gate not one ſide open, but wide open to the Truth, as it ſhould be diſcover'd. And I may truly affirm, That there was never in this Kingdom, nor in any other, the Blood of a private Gentleman vindicated, Cum tanto motu Regni; or to ſay better, Cum tanto plauſu Regni: If it had concern'd the King or Prince, there could not have been greater or better Commiſſioners. The Term hath been almoſt turn'd into a Juſtitium, or Vacancy; the People being more willing to be Lookers on in this Buſineſs, than Proceeders in their own. There hath been no Care of Diſcovery omitted, no Moment of Time loſt; and therefore I will conclude, with the Saying of Salomon, this part of my Speech, Gloria Dei celare rem, and Gloria Regis ſcrutari rem, It is the Glory of God to conceal a Thing, and it is the Glory of the King to find it out: And his Majeſty's Honour is the greater, for that he ſhewed to the World this Buſineſs as it hath a Relation to my Lord of Somerſet, (whoſe Caſe in no ſort I do fore-judge being ignorant of the Secrets of the Cauſe, but take him as the Law takes him, hitherto for a ſuſpect) I ſay, the King hath, to his great Honour, ſhew'd, That were any Man in ſuch a Caſe of Blood, as the Signet of his Right Hand, as the Scripture ſaith) he would put him off.

'Now I will come to the particular Charge of theſe Gentlemen. And firſt I will, by way of Narrative, relate the Fact, with the Occaſion of it.

'This wretched Man Weſton, who was the Actor, or Mechanical Party in this Impoyſonment, the firſt Day being indicted by a very ſubſtantial Jury of ſelected Citizens, to the Number of Nineteen, who found Bills vera; yet nevertheleſs at the firſt ſtood mute: But after ſome Days Intermiſſion, it pleaſed God to caſt out the Dumb Devil, and he put himſelf upon his Trial, and was by a Jury of great Value upon his own Confeſſions, and other Teſtimonies, found guilty: So as Thirty and one ſufficient Jurors have paſs'd upon him, and he had alſo his Judgment and Execution awarded. After this, being in Preparation for another World, he ſent for Sir Thomas Overbury's Father, and falling down upon his Knees, with great Remorſe and Compunction, ask'd him Forgiveneſs; and afterwards again, of his own Motion, deſir'd to have his like Prayer of Forgiveneſs recommended to his Mother, who was abſent. And at both times, out of the Abundance of his Heart, confeſſed, that he was to die juſtly, and that he was worthy Death. And after again at his Execution, (which is a kind of ſealing time of Confeſſions) even at the Point of Death, (tho' there were Tempters about him, he did again confirm publickly, That his Examinations were true, and that he had been juſtly and honourably dealt with. So here is a Period of this Man, which was the Subject of this Calumny or Affront of Juſtice; wherein Mr. Lumſden plays his part firſt, who in the time between Weſton's ſtanding mute and his Trial, frames a moſt odious and libellous Relation, containing as many Untruths as Lines; ſets it down in Writing with his own Hand, and delivers it to one of the Bed-Chamber to be put into the King's Hands, falſifying all that was done the firſt Day of Weſton's Arraignment, turning the Pike and Point of his Imputations upon the Lord Chief Juſtice of England; whoſe Name thus occurring, I cannot paſs by, and yet I cannot skill of this ſame Flattery, or Vulgar Attribute, but this I will ſay of him, and I would ſay as much to Ages, That never Man's Perſon and his Place were better met in a Buſineſs, than my Lord Coke, and my Lord Chief Juſtice, in the Caſe of Overbury.

'Now for the Perſon of Mr. Lumſden, I know he is a Scotch Gentleman, and thereby more ignorant of our Laws; but I cannot tell whether this doth extenuate his Fault, or increaſe it, for as it may extenuate it in reſpect of Ignorance, ſo it doth aggravate it much in reſpect of Preſumption, to meddle in that he underſtood not, unleſs ſome other Man's Cunning wrought upon this Man's Boldneſs. The Infuſion of a Slander into a Kings Ear is, of all Forms of Libels and Slanders, the worſt. It is true, that King's may keep ſecret their Information, and then no Man can enquire after them, while they are ſhrined in their Breaſt: But where a King is pleaſed that a Man ſhall anſwer for his falſe Information, divers Precedents of ſlanderous Petitions have been as ſeverely puniſh'd, as ſlanderous Libels.

'For

A. Reg. 14. An. Christi 1616.

'For the Offence of Sir John Wentworth, and Sir John Hollis, which was, to scandalize the Justice already past, or to cut off the Thread of something that is to come, these two Gentlemen came mounted on Horseback, and in a ruffling and facing Manner, presum'd to Examine Weston, whether he did Poyson Overbury, or no: Directly cross to that which had been Try'd and Judg'd. For what was the Point tried? That Weston had Poyson'd Overbury! And Sir John Wentworth's question was, Whether he did Poyson him? A direct Contradictory. Whereupon Weston answer'd, That he did him wrong. And turning to the Sheriff, said, You promised me I should not be troubled at this time; and yet nevertheless Wentworth press'd him to answer, that he might pray with him. I know not that Sir John Wentworth is an Ecclesiastick, that he should cut any Man from Communion of Prayer; and for all this vexing of the Spirit of a poor Man, now in the Gate of Death; Weston stood constant, and said, I die not unworthily, my Lord Chief Justice hath my Mind under my Hand; and he is an Honourable and Just Judge. Sir John Hollis was not so much a Questionist, but wrought upon the other Questions; and, like a Counsellor, wish'd him to discharge his Conscience, and to satisfie the World: What World I marvel! It was the World at Tyburn: For the World at Guildhall, and the World at London, were satisfied before; Teste, the Bells that rang every where. But Men have got a Fashion now a Days, that Two or Three Busy-bodies will take upon them the Name of the World, and broach their own Conceit, as if it were a general Opinion. Well, what more? When they could not work upon Weston, Sir John Hollis, in an Indignation, turn'd about his Horse, as the other was turning to his Death, and said, he was sorry of such a Conclusion: That was, to have the State Honour'd or Justify'd.

'Sir John Hollis's Offence hath another Appendix before this in time, which was at the Day of Tryal. He presum'd to give his Verdict openly, That if he were of the Jury he would not doubt what to do. Marry, he saith, he cannot well tell whether he spoke this before the Jury had given up their Verdict, or after. Wherein there is little gain'd, For, whether he were a Prejuror, or a Postjuror, the one was to Prejudice the Jury, the other was to Attaint them.

'The Offence of these Gentlemen is greater and more dangerous than is conceiv'd. We have no Spanish Inquisition; no Justice in a Corner; no Gagging of Men's Mouths at their Death, but they may speak freely to the Last; but then it must come from the free Motion of the Party, not by tempting of Questions. The Questions that are asked ought to tend to further revealing of their own, or others Guiltiness: But to use a Question in the Nature of a cross Interrogatory, to falsifie that which is Res Judicata, is intolerable. That were to erect a Court, or Commission of Review at Tyburn, against the Court of Westminster: For if the Answer be according to the Judgment past, it adds credit to Justice: If it be contrary, it derogateth nothing; yet it subjecteth the Majesty of Justice to a popular vulgar Talk and Opinion. My Lords, These are great and dangerous Offences: For if we do not Maintain Justice, Justice will not Maintain us.

Then the Examinations being read, and further aggravated against these three Gentlemen, there passed Judgment upon them of Fine and Imprisonment.

Sir Thomas Monson, another of the Countess's Agents in this Poysoning Contrivance, had past one days Tryal at Guildhall. But the Lord Chief Justice Coke, in his Rhetorical Flourishes at his Arraignment, vented some Expressions (which he either deduced from Northampton's assuring the Lieutenant of the Tower, that the making away of Sir Tho. Overbury would be acceptable to the King: or from some other secret Hint receiv'd) as if he could discover more than the Death of a private Person; intimating, tho' not plainly, that Overbury's untimely Remove had something in it of a Retaliation, as if he had been guilty of the same Crime against Prince Henry; blessing himself with Admiration at the Horror of such Actions. In which he flew to so high a Pitch, that he was taken down by a Court Lure; Sir Thomas Monson's Tryal laid aside, and he soon after set at Liberty; and the Lord Chief Justice's Wings were clipt for it ever after.

Sir Thomas Monson arraign'd.

And it was rumour'd, that the King (heightned to so much Passion by this Eruption of Sir Edward Coke's) went to the Council Table, and kneeling down there, desir'd God to lay a Curse upon him and his Posterity for ever, if he were consenting to Overbury's Death. But this cannot be asserted, being above our Sphere; yet as Mathematicians do propose to themselves imaginary Circles, for the several Motions in the Heavens; and though there be none discover'd, yet they find the Effects of what they apprehend: So the sudden stopping of Monson's Tryal, put strange Imaginations into Mens Heads; and those seconded by Reports too high for private Discovery, their Operation only falling under the common Notion. But the Lord Chief Justice was blam'd for flying out of his way; that having enough to prosecute the Business, he would grasp after more till he lost all: For this Crime was thought Second to none but the Gunpowder-Plot; That would have blown up all indeed at a Blow, (a Merciful Cruelty!) This would have done the same by Degrees, a Lingring, but as sure a way, one by one might have been call'd out, till all Opposers had been remov'd. Besides the other Plot was Scandalous to Rome, making Popery odious; This was Scandalous to the Gospel ever since the first Nullity. The Devil could not have invented a more Mischievous Practice to Church and State.

The Lord Chief Justice blamed.

The Lady Arabella dying about this time in the Tower, set Mens Tongues and Fears at work, that she went the same way. Such Mischief doth one Evil Action introduce, that it makes a great Rode for Jealousie to pursue after it. The Lady was Daughter to Charles Stuart, younger Brother to our King's Father by Elizabeth Cavendish, who was married some Years past to Sir William Seymour, Son to the Lord Beauchamp, and Granchild to Edward Earl of Hertford; both at some distance ally'd to the Crown, therefore such a Conjunction would not be admitted in the Royal Almanack; so dreadful is every Apparition that comes near Princes Titles. Sir William Seymour for the Marriage was committed to the Tower, and the Lady Arabella confin'd to her House at Highgate. But after some Imprisonment, they conclude to escape beyond Sea together; appointing to meet at a certain Place upon the Thames. Sir William leaving his Man in his Bed to act his Part with his Keeper, got out of the Tower in a Disguise, and came to the Place appointed. She dress'd like a young Gallant in Man's Attire, follow'd him from her House, but staying long above the limited time, made him suspicious of her Interception; so that he went away, leaving notice if she came, that he was gone away before to Dunkirk. She, good Lady, fraught with more Fears, and lagging in her Flight, was Apprehended, brought back to the Tower, and there finish'd her Earthly Pilgrimage. She being dead, Sir William Seymour got Leave to return home, and Marry'd since to the Lady Frances, Daughter to the late Noble Earl of Essex; a Lady, in whose Breast dwells as much Honour as can be derived from Noble Progenitors, by whom he hath a very hopeful Issue; and by the Death of his Grandfather was Earl, and now is Marquis of Hertford.

The Lady Arabella dies.

ing

A Reg. 14. An. Christi 1616.

Peace every where.

And now the Temples of Janus being shut, Warlike Abiliments grew rusty, and Bellona put on Masking-Attire; for Scotland bought her Peace at a good Rate, and Ireland found the Fruits of hers growing up to her Hand. Those Irish that had great Estates (though rude enough) the King suppled and tam'd with Honours; and they that had little, were content calmly to suck in what they had, and battel'd by it; so that they wanted nothing but Moderation to make them Happy. These Halcion Days shin'd round about us. The Influence of our King's peaceable Mind had almost an Universal Operation. Spain's Ambition was contented to be bounded by the Pyrene Hills and the Atlantick Ocean, sucking in the Fruits of Italy and Sicily, and hoarding up the Treasures of the Indies; willingly singing a Requiem to the Netherlands. France wanting Exercise, surfeited with Diseases at Home, which by Fits broke out into Tumours among themselves. The Germans swell'd into a Dropsy of Voluptuousness, by Plenty, and the Sweets of Peace. Politick Bodies are like Natural; full Feeding contracts gross Humours, which will have vent. Only such Exercise as may refine, and keep the Spirits active, and digest the grosser and fuliginous Matter, strengthens the Nerves of a Kingdom, or Republick. Nothing now but Bravery and Feasting; the Parents of Debauchery and Riot flourished among us. There is no Theam for History, when Men spill more Drink than Blood; when Plots and Contrivances for Lust, acted in dark Corners, are more practised than Stratagems in War; and when the Stages with silken Pageants and Poppets, that slacken the Sinews, are more frequented than those Theatres of Honour, where Industry brawns and hardens the Arms: Peace is a great Blessing, if it bring not a Curse with it; but War is more happy in its Effects than it, especially if it takes away the Distemper that grows by long Surfeits, without destroying the Body. But since these Buskind Ornaments are wanting, we must imbellish our Discourses with such Passages as paced up and down in the Sock of Peace.

The King thinks of a Match for his Son Prince Charles.

There had been in Prince Henry's time a Treaty of Marriage betwixt him and a Daughter of Spain; which took no effect. Our King was real in his Intentions, not willing to have his Son's Beams to display themselves but in a Royal Horizon. The Spanish Policy clouded the Business with Delays; whether from the old Grudge that was betwixt Queen Katharine and Henry the Eighth, or the Difference between the Nations in Religion? But the Spanish Councel, being loth directly and point-blank to tell our King, he liked not the Conjunction, went with a slow-pac'd Gravity, such as he thought befitted the Civility of Princes, and gave a little Light to hope that it might be accomplished. But Salisbury and others, that managed those great Affairs then, did at this Clunk discover, that their Formalities were but Spanish Compliments, which like the Air that gave them being, soon vanish'd away. After this, our King's Thoughts cast about, how he might provide a fit Match for Prince Charles, who shin'd in the same Sphere of Honour (that his Brother left for a Better) but not so much enlightned with the Peoples Love, being less Active and Splendid, and (that I may not call it Sullenness) more Reserv'd. The German Dames were discoursed on (where his Sister shin'd in her Glory) as being of the same Religion, and more suitable in Christian Policy; but they were (in a manner) Subjects to the Emperor; and that would give an Allay to the Super-elementary Extraction of Kings, which should be of a higher Origine, to amuse, and that they might be the more admir'd by their People, and therefore not so fitting in State-Policy. And seeing there were small Hopes expected from Spain, a Daughter to Henry the Great, late King of France, was aim'd at, and Sir Thomas Edmonds, our King's Lieger Ambassador, had (long before this time) made his little Addresses superficially, and sounded the Chanel; but he met some Rocks and Remora's in the Way, so that he could not discover clearly their Intentions; and the King was loth to express himself plainly, lest he should receive an Affront. And now sending (as he thought it civilly necessary) an Extraordinary Ambassador to congratulate the King of France his Marriage with Anna the Infanta of Spain, he thought it good Policy to take this Occasion to make a stricter Scrutiny, whether there were any Ground to rest upon for matching his Son.

The Lord Hayes sent to France.

And who is fitter for that Employment, being only for Courtship and Bravery, than the Lord Hayes, a Gentleman whose Composition of Mind tended that way? He was Born in Scotland, where Bravery was in no Superfluity; bred up in France, where he could not have it in Extravagancy; but he found it in England, and made it his Vanity. The King had a large Hand, and he had a large Heart; and though he were no great Favourite ever, yet he was never but in Favour. He with a great Train of young Noblemen, and other Courtiers of Eminency, suited themselves with all those Ornaments that could give Lustre to so dazzelling an appearance as Love, and the Congratulation of it carried with it. All the Study was, who should be most Glorious; and he had the happiest Fancy, whose Invention could express something novel, neat, and unusual, that others might admire. So that Huntington's Prophecy was fulfill'd here, when speaking of the time of the Scot's Conquest of England, he said, Multimoda variatione vestium & indumentorum designaretur. I remember I saw one of the Lord Ambassador's Suits, and pardon me that I take notice of such petty Things) the Cloak and Hose were made of very fine white Beaver, imbroidered richly all over with Gold and Silver; the Cloak, almost to the Cape, within and without, having no Lining but Imbroidery; The Doublet was Cloth of Gold, imbroidered so thick, that it could not be discerned; and a white Beaver-Hat suitable, brim-full of Imbroidery, both above and below. This is presented as an Essay, for one of the meanest he wore; so that if this Relation should last longer than his old Cloathes, the Reader might well think it a Romance, savouring rather of Fancy than Reality.

6 Lib. H. Hunt.

The Lord Hayes rides in State to the Court.

But

A. Reg. 14.

An. Christi 1616.

But this kind of Vanity had been long active in England: For the last Parliament it was mov'd by some well-affected to Reformation of the Abuses of Excess in Apparel, that there might be a Regulation of this kind of Gallantry, to the distinguishing of Men one from another: For (it was said) some of mean Fortunes wore Garments fitter for Princes than Subjects; and many Gentry of antient Descent had wasted, and impoverish'd themselves and their Posterities with this Extravagancy, so that it was very requisite to give some stop to this redundant Humour. To which was answer'd, That if those of Mean Fortunes went so richly attir'd and came not honestly by their Ornaments, they would be quickly found out, and there were good Laws enough for such Transgressors. But as there is no perpetuity of Being on Earth; so there is a continual Vicissitude and Revolution in all Sublunary Things; some are advanced, and some decline; God pulleth down one, and setteth up another. If any Noble, or anciently descended Family, will be so Mad and Foolish to beggar themselves and their Posterities with this, or any other Excess, 'tis very probable that some Man of more Wisdom and Merit will enjoy that which the other hath so idly and prodigally mispent; for to set such Limitations, will damp the Spirits of Industry. So the Motion was declin'd.

But to return to the Lord Hayes. Thus accouter'd and accomplish'd, he went into France, and a Day for Audience being prefix'd, all the Argument and Dispute betwixt him and his gallant Train (which took up some time) was, how they should go to the Court. Coaches, like Curtains, would eclipse their Splendor; riding on Horseback in Boots, would make them look like Travellers, not Courtiers, and not having all Foot-cloaths, it would be an unsuitable Mixture; Those that brought rich Trappings for their Horses, were willing to have them seen; so it was concluded for the Foot-cloth, and those that have none (to their bitter Cost) must furnish themselves. This Preparation begot Expectation; and that fill'd all the Windows, Balconies and Streets of Paris, as they passed, with a Multitude of Spectators. Six Trumpeters, and two Marshals (in Tawny Velvet Liveries, compleatly Suited, lac'd all over with Gold, richly and closely laid) led the Way; the Ambassador followed with a great Train of Pages and Footmen in the same rich Livery, encircling his Horse, and the rest of his Retinue according to their Qualities and Degrees, in as much bravery as they could devise or procure, follow'd in Couples, to the Wonderment of the Beholders. And some said (how truly I cannot assert) the Ambassador's Horse was shod with Silver-shoes, lightly tack'd on; and when he came to a Place where Persons, or Beauties of Eminency were, his very Horse prancing and curveting, in humble Reverence flung his Shoes away, which the greedy Understanders scrambled for; and he was content to be gazed on and admir'd, till a Farrier, or rather an Argentier in one of his rich Liveries, among his Train of Footmen, out of a Tawny Velvet Bag took others, and tack'd them on; which lasted till he came to the next Troop of Grandees: And thus with much ado he reach'd the Louvre.

All Compliments and outward Ceremonies of State being perform'd, the Lord Ambassador made his Business known by more private Addresses; which in appearance was well resented, but indeed not intended, and came to no effect: For the Duke of Savoy had anticipated the young Lady's Affection for the Prince of Piemont his Son. The Savoyan Agents bringing more Gold in their Hands than on their Backs, had so smoothed the Way, that not only those about the Princess, but the Great ones themselves, were made Workers for him. After the Ambassador had been feasted magnificently, with all his gallant Train, in several Places, to shew the Grandure of France, he came over into England, and Practic'd it here; making many times upon several Occasions, such Stupendious Feasts, and heaped Banquets, as if all the Creatures had contributed to his Excess. I know not what Limits or Bounds are set to the Glories of Princes Courts, or Noble Minds. We see the Sea it self, and all his Tributary Rivers, do ebb and flow; but if they swell so high to overflow that Bank, that Reason hath prescrib'd to keep them in, what Inundations of sad Mischief follow, Experience shews.

A Breach betwixt the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice.

A little before this time, there was a Breach between the Lord Chief Justice Coke, and the Lord Cancellor Ellesmere, which made a Passage to both their declines. Sir Edward Coke had heard and determin'd a Cause at the Common Law; and some report, there was jugling in the Business. The Witness that knew, and should have related the Truth, was wrought upon to be absent, if any Man would undertake to excuse his Non-Appearance: A pragmatical Fellow of the Party undertook it; went with the Witness to a Tavern; call'd for a Gallon-pot full of Sack; bid him drink; and so leaving him, went into the Court. This Witness is call'd for as the Prop of the Cause; the Undertaker answers upon Oath, He left him in such a Condition, that if he continues in it but a Quarter of an Hour, he is a Dead Man. This Evidencing the Man's Incapability to come, decided the Matter so, that it lost the Cause. The Plaintiffs that had the Injury bring the Business about in Chancery: The Defendants (having had Judgment at Common Law) refuse to obey the Orders of that Court; whereupon the Lord Chancellor, for Contempt of the Court, commits them to Prison. They Petition against him in the Star-Chamber; the Lord Chief Justice joins with them, foments the Difference, threatning the Lord Chancellor with a Premunire. The Chancellor makes the King acquainted with the Business, who sent to Sir Francis Bacon his Attorney-General, Sir Henry Montague and Sir Randolph Crew, his Serjeants at Law, and Sir Henry Yelverton his Sollicitor; commanding them to Search what Precedents there have been of late Years, wherein such as complain'd in Chancery were reliev'd according to Equity and Conscience, after Judgment at Common Law. These being Men well vers'd in their Profession (after canvassing the Matter throughly) return'd Answer to the King, That there hath been a strong Current of Practice and Proceeding in Chancery, after Judgment at Common Law, and many times after Execution, continu'd since Henry VII's time, to the Lord Chancellor that now is, both in the Reigns (Seriatim) of the several Kings, and the Times of the several Chancellors, whereof divers were great Learned Men in the Law: It being in Cases where there is no Remedy for the Subject by the strict Course of the Common Law, unto which the Judges are sworn. This satisfied the King; justified the Lord Chancellor; and the Chief Justice receiv'd the Foil: Which was a bitter Potion to his Spirit, but not strong enough to work on him as his Enemies wish'd.

There-

A. Reg. 14. An. Christi 1616.

Therefore to humble him more, he is brought on his Knees at the Council Table, and Three other Ingredients added to the Dose, of a more Active Operation.

The Chief Justice is humbled.

First, He is charged, That when he was the King's Attorney in the beginning of his Reign, he conceal'd a Statute of Twelve thousand Pounds due to the King from the late Lord Chancellor Hatton, wherein he deceiv'd the Trust reposed in him.

Secondly, That he utter'd Words of very high Contempt as he sat in the Seat of Justice; saying, The Common Law of England would be overthrown, and the Light of it obscur'd; Reflecting upon the King.

And Thirdly, His uncivil and indiscreet Carriage before his Majesty (being assisted by his Privy Council and Judges) in the Case of Commendams.

The last he confess'd; and humbly crav'd his Majesty's Pardon. The other Two he palliated with some colourable Excuses, which were not so well set off; but they left such a Tincture behind, that he was commanded to a private Life. And to Expiate the King's Anger, he was enjoin'd in that leisurely Retirement to review his Books of Reports, which the King was inform'd had many extravagant Opinions, publish'd for Positive and good Law, which must be corrected, and brought to his Majesty to be perused. But the Title of the Books, wherein he stiles himself Lord Chief Justice of England, was to be expunged, being but Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench. And at his departure from the Council Table, (where he humbly acknowledged his Majesty's Mercy, and their Lordship's Justice) the Lord Treasurer gave him a Wipe, for suffering his Coachman to ride bare before him in the Streets; which Fault he strove to cover, by telling his Lordship, his Coachman did it for his own ease. But not long after, the Lord Treasurer came under his Lash in the Star-Chamber, and he required him for it.

His Faults.

While he was under this Cloud, all his Faults was ripped up, either by his Enemies, or his Well-wishers, who advised him to be humbled for this Visitation. That Affliction only levels the Mole-hills of Pride in us, plows up the Heart, and makes it fit for Wisdom to sow her Seed, and Grace to bring forth her Increase. That he delighted to speak much, which becomes a Pleader, and not a Judge; for so his Affections were entangled with a liking of his own Arguments, and an undervaluing of others; when having a large and fruitful Mind, he should not labour so much what to speak, as what to leave unspoken: Such lusty Soils are often to be weeded! That he was wont to praise and dispraise, upon slight Grounds, the same Man, and that sometimes suddenly; so that his Reproofs or Commendations are neglected and contemned; when as the Censure of a Judge (coming slowly, but surely) should be a Brand to the Guilty, and a Crown to the Virtuous. That he will Jest at any Man in publick, without respect of the Persons Dignity, or his own; which disgraceth his Gravity, more than it can advance the Opinion of his Wit. That he makes the Law to lean a little too much to his own Opinion, whereby he shews himself a legal Tyrant, striking with that Weapon whom he pleases, being able to turn the edge any way. That having the Living of a Thousand, he hath no Bowels of Compassion to Men in want; the Hand that hath taken so much can give little, but gets still, as if he did try how much he could gather to Account for at the great and general Audit-Day. That in the Case of Overbury, he used too many Delays, till Delinquents Hands were loose, and his bound; in which slowness he was a Fabius, but the Humour of Marcellus would have done better; for he stopt the Confessions and Accusations of some, that would have spoken enough to remove more stumbling Blocks out of his way; and yet he did not this in favour of any, but out of present unadvised Humour, supposing enough behind to discover all; which fell not out so: And therefore, though he were to be commended for what he did, yet he is to be reprehended for many Circumstances in the Doing; and these are now Briers in his Sides, and Thorns in his Eyes. Much more, to this purpose, was written to him, and vented against him.

And short Character.

Truly he was a Man of excellent Parts, but not without his Frailties: For as he was a Storehouse and Magazine of the Common Law, for the present Times; and laid such a Foundation for the future, that Posterity may for ever build on; so his Passions and Pride were so predominant, that Boiling over, he lost (by them) much of his own Fulness, which extinguished not only the Valuation, but respect to his Merit: So often is that heat, that gives life to noble Parts, by a circular Motion, the ruin of them! Yet to cool his Distemper, and to bring him to himself, he is within a short time called to the Council Table, the King being loth to lose his Abilities.

The Lord Chancellor retires.

The Lord Chancellor Ellesmer also about this time, weary of his publick Employment, and weakned with Age, desired the King's Leave to retire, that he might make use of the short time left him, to cast up his Accounts for another World; The King gave the Seal, and the Place of Lord Chancellor, to Sir Francis Bacon, his Attorney General; and the old Lord Ellesmer wore out the Remnant of his Life in quiet, dying in a good old Age, and full of virtuous Fame, leaving a noble Posterity, who enjoy a great Estate, with the Title of Earl of Bridgewater.

Sir Ralph Winwood dies.

Time and Age had also worn out Sir Ralph Winwood, the King's able, faithful, and honest Servant, and Secretary; who dying, Sir Robert Nanton, and Sir George Calvert, were made Secretaries; Men of contrary Religions and Factions, (as they were then styled) Calvert being an Hispaniolized Papist; the King matching them together, like contrary Elements, to find a Medium betwixt them.

The Lord Treasurer questioned in the Star-Chamber.

But the greatest Remove was the Lord Treasurer's Staff, which was broken by Somerset's fall, the way being now made plain, and laid open, that discovered the Treasurer's Imperfections, and his Wives Corruptions: The Lady keeping the Shop, and Sir John Bingley, her Officer, crying, What d'ye lack? was the new Lord Chancellor Bacon was pleased to express himself in the Star-Chamber, whether the Business being brought, the Sore was opened, and all the bad Humours flow to the ill-affected Party. Bribery and Extortion is the Matter that appears, which is squeez'd out, and aggravated by Sir Edward Coke, (newly perk'd up, such is the World's Bucket!) who very learnedly cited many Precedents of Treasurers in former King's Reigns, that Miscarried, and their several Punishments.

He begins with Randulphus de Britton, Treasurer to King Henry III. who had mis-employ'd the King's Treasure, deceived the King in his Office;

A. Reg. 14. An. Christi 1616.

Office, for which he was queſtioned, his Lands and Goods ſeized into the King's Hands, and ſent Priſoner to the Tower, where he ſubmitted himſelf to the King, confeſs'd his Fault, gave up his Place, & pro Gratia habenda, (ſaith the Record) obtained Reſtitution of his Goods and Lands, paying only Three thouſand pounds Fine. This was a piece of Wiſdom (ſaith he) as well as Humility, alluding to the preſent Lord Treaſurer's ſtout Heart that would not ſubmit.

The Second was Petrus de Rivallis, who was Treaſurer of Ireland, and Chamberlain of England, in Edward I's time, who had taken Bribes in his Office, Tam de Religioſis, quam de Laicis. Of which being Convicted he loſt his Place, and was put to his Fine and Ranſom.

And in the ſame King's Reign, the Abbot of Weſtminſter, and his vertuous Monks, took out of the King's Treaſure at Weſtminſter many Thouſand Pounds, Ad ineſtimabile dammum Regis & Regni. The Abbot being ſent to the Tower, and the Monks diſpoſed to ſeveral Priſons; and notwithſtanding they pleaded Privilege of Clergymen for their Tryal, yet in the Caſe of Imbezelling the King's Treaſure, they had no Privilege, but the Temporalities of the Abbey were ſeized for Satisfaction.

Cov. and Litchf.

In King Edward II's time, Walter de Langton, a Biſhop, was Treaſurer to the King: He did take of the Earl of Montealto, to be a Friend to him, (in agendis negotiis verſus Dominum Regem) a Hundred pounds, (the ſaid Earl, being a Priſoner) to let him go free to do his Buſineſs. And this was given, as the Record ſpeaks, De ſpontanea voluntate, for a Gratuity, & ex curialitate ſua, for his Courteſie, yet this was adjudged Extortion and Bribery. Again, John de Engham was Indicted of Treſpaſs by this Biſhop for the Mannor of Fiſbie, whereunto the King pretended Title, and was by the Biſhop Impriſoned for the Treſpaſs. But afterwards another Mannor was conveyed to this Biſhop, ob diverſas curialitates, for Courteſies that he had done, and ſo Engham was diſcharged of his Indictment, and tho' that the Biſhop pleaded, that Voluntas Regis potius ad impriſonamentum quam ad finem, becauſe it was the King's Pleaſure rather to puniſh by Impriſonment than Fine, yet this was adjudged Bribery. Again, the Bayliff of Oxford was committed for Arrerages of a Hundred Pounds in his Accompt, and thereupon the Mannor of Calcot was conveyed unto the Biſhop, and the Biſhop of his pure Devotion did diſcharge him of that Impriſonment. But theſe were Pleas and Flouriſhes of guilty Men, as the Record ſaith, but they were all three judged Extortion and Bribery; and for theſe, the Biſhop was put from his Place, Fined, and committed to the Tower.

William Lord Latimer, in Edward III's time, being appointed to pay the King's Debts, did Buy in ſome of them at lower Rates than was due, as Eighty Pounds for a Hundred, and Thirty Pounds for Forty; by which Courſe he made the King a Bankrupt-Compounder, and for this he was Fined, and loſt all his Offices.

In like caſe was the Lord Nevil, who was truſted to pay the Army; but he bought the Debt of them, and juſtified, that they gave him the remainder of their free Gift; but for this he was Fined and committed to the Tower.

Theſe, and many other Precedents and Examples, armed with Authority and Antiquity, were muſtered up, and the Lord Treaſurer's Miſcarriages exaſperated, eſpecially for Embezelling thoſe Monies the King lately received of the State of the Netherlands for the Redemption of the cautionary Towns, Fluſhing and Brill, which the King was forced to relinquiſh again to the States, becauſe he had no Money to Pay the Soldiers there; and that Money being deſigned for the Iriſh Army (which was alſo in great Want) it was thought the more heinous, and a double Miſcarriage, being it was ſo dearly bought, and ſo unduly ſpent. But the Earl himſelf being a Man of a noble Diſpoſition (though too indulgent to his too-active Wife) had retained the King's Favour, if he had taken Sir Edward Coke's Counſel, and ſubmitted, and not ſtrove to juſtifie his own Integrity, which he maintained with a great deal of Confidence, till it was too late, for then his Submiſſion did him little good. But his Wives Faults being imputed to him, he was fined Thirty thouſand Pounds, and Impriſonment in the Tower; Sir John Bingly, Fined Two thouſand Pounds, and Impriſonment in the Fleet, For it was thought the Lord and Lady could not have found the way into theſe obſcure, low, and dark Contrivances, without the light of his help. Which Sentence was pronounced by the Lord Chancellor Bacon, who though he were of tranſcendent Parts, yet was he tainted with the ſame Infection, and not many Years after periſhed in his own Corruption; which ſhews, That neither Example nor Precept (he having ſeen ſo many, and been made capable of ſo much) can be a Pilot ſufficient to any Port of Happineſs (tho Reaſon be never ſo able to direct) if Grace doth not give the Gale.

The King comes to the Star-Chamber.

But the King, more to exalt Juſtice, and to ſhew the People his high Abilities, came in June this Year to the Star-Chamber, where in a long, and well-weighed Diſcourſe, he turns over the Volume of his Mind, that the World might read his excellent Parts in lively Characters.

He told the Lords, he came thither in Imitation of Henry VII. his great Predeceſſor; and the reaſon he came no ſooner was, that he reſolved with Pythagoras, for Seven Years to keep ſilence, and learn the Laws of the Kingdom, before he would teach others, and the other Seven Years he was ſtudying to find an Occaſion to come, that might not be with Prejudice: For in his own Cauſe he could not come; in a great Cauſe betwixt Man and Man, it might be thought ſome particular Favour brought him thither; and in a ſmall Cauſe it was not fit for him to come; but now he had ſo much to ſay in relation to good Government, that he could no longer forbear.

Firſt, He charges himſelf.

Secondly, The Judges.

Thirdly, The Auditory in general.

In his own Charge, he lays a Foundation for raiſing a moſt excellent Structure in Government, wherein he was a Maſter-workman, and had a moſt admirable Theory, and full Abilities to put in Practice, and happily the bent of his Intentions tended that way, though it had for the moſt part a looſe String.

And to that which concerned the Judges, he not only reckons up their Duties in their publick Relation, but ſhews them the Juriſdiction and Power of their ſeveral Courts, how far every one did extend, to which he would have them limitted, that they might not claſh and conteſt one againſt another, to ſhake the Baſis on which they were built, but that there might be a Harmony and ſweet Con-

A. Reg. 14. An. Christi 1616.

Concordance among them, expressing himself with such Elegance and Prudence, that the most studious Lawyer (whose Design had been to embellish a Discourse fitting for the Ears of his Prince) could not have gone beyond what he express'd to his People, so strong and retentive was his Judgment and Memory, so natural and genuine was that which came from him, that it did, eminare, flow from him, to the Admiration of the Hearers.

To the People in general, and Under-Officers, he gave an Admonition to submit to the Law and Justice of the Land, and not to go upon new Puritan Strains (such was his Expression) to make all things Popular, but to keep themselves within the ancient Limits of Obedience: For he feared Innovation as a Monster got loose, which should be always kept in such a Labyrinth, as none should come at, but by the Clew of Reason.

Then he commands the Judges in their Circuits, to take notice of those Justices of the Peace that were most active for the good of the Country, that they might have Encouragement from him. For, (to use his own Words) I value them that serve me faithfully there, equally with those that attend my Person. Therefore let none be ashamed of this Office, or be discouraged in being a Justice of the Peace, if he serve worthily in it.

The Chancellor under me makes Justices, and puts them out; but neither I, nor he, can tell what they are: Therefore we must be informed by you, Judges, who can only tell who do well, and who do ill; without which, how can the Good be cherished, and the rest put out? The Good Justices are careful to attend the Service of the King and Country; the Bad are idle Slow-bellies, that abide always at Home; given to a Life of Ease and Delight, liker Ladies than Men; and think it is enough to contemplate Justice, when as, Virtus in actione consistet; to contemplate Justice is no Justice; and contemplative Justices are fit to be put out.

Another sort of Justices are Busy-bodies, and will have Men dance after their Pipe, and follow their Greatness, or else will not be content: A sort of Men, Qui se primos omnium esse putant, nec sunt tamen: These proud Spirits must know that the Country is ordained to follow God and the King, and not them.

Another sort are they that go seldom to the King's Service, but when it is to help some of their Kindred or Alliance; so they come to help their Friends, or hurt their Enemies, making Justice serve for a Shadow to Faction, and tumultuating the Country.

Another sort, are Gentlemen of great Worth in their own Conceit; and cannot be content with the present Form of Government, but must have a kind of Liberty in the People, and must be Gracious Lords, and Redeemers of their Liberty; and in every Cause that concerns Prerogative, give a Snatch against Monarchy, through their Puritanical itching after Popularity; some of them have shew'd themselves too bold of late in the Lower House of Parliament: And when all is done, if there were not a King, they would be less cared for than other Men. So wise the King's Fears made him, and so wary to prevent the Popular Violence! And even in these Infant-times, the Contention doth appear; which afterward got more strength, when by his Power he had gain'd in every County, such as he made subservient to his Will: For as the King strove to loosen the Piles and Banks of the Peoples Liberties, so the People strove to bound and keep off the Inundation of his Prerogative.

Then he takes notice of the Swarms of Gentry, that through the Instigation of their Wives, or to new Model and Fashion their Daughters, (who, if they were Unmarried, marr'd their Marriages; if Married, lost their Reputations, and rob their Husbands Purses) did neglect their Country Hospitality, and cumber the City; a general Nuisance to the Kingdom, being as the Spleen to the Body, which as in Measure it overgrows, the Body wastes: And seeing a Proclamation will not keep them at Home, he requires that the Power of the Star-Chamber may not only regulate them, but the Exorbitancy of the New Buildings about the City (which he still much repined at) being a Shelter for them; where they spent their Estates in Coaches, Lacquies, and fine Clothes, like French-men; living miserably in their Houses, like Italians; becoming Apes to other Nations: Whereas it was the Honour of the English Nobility and Gentry (above all Countries in the World) to be Hospitable among their Tenants; which they may the better do, by the Fertility and Abundance of all things. Thus the King pried into every Miscarriage; being willing to Reform these (then growing) Abuses.

Unstable Spirits mutable.

But among all the Heights of Reason that the Spirit of Man doth Actuate and give Life to, the Highest and most Transcendent is that of Religion; which as it partakes more or less of Faith, so it enclines more or less to Fancy: Wavering and Unstable Minds are not only blown about with the Wind of every Opinion, but Pride and Discontent (conjoined often, though of different Operations) are Engines sufficient to shake the Foundation, though never so firmly settled. Some Men turn over the Leaf of Conscience, and change a Good Religion for a Worse; some the Leaf of Policy, leaving an Evil Religion for a Better: But these kind of Spirits will not be brought under by Fasting and Prayer, unless it be by him that can discover the Heart of Hypocrisie, though in as variable a Capacity as the Countenance.

The Archbishop of Spalato comes into England.

These Times gave Examples of both these Humours; some that went from us to Rome, and some that came from Rome to us. Among the rest, one of Eminency, . Marcus Antonius de Dominis, Archbishop of Spalato, a Man old an corpulent; unfit for Travel, being almost at his Journeys End by Nature, came into England with as little Grace. Here he Preaches, Rails, and Writes against Rome (extolling the Protestant Religion) till he came to the Dean of Windsor, and Master of the Savoy, which some few Years he enjoy'd; then, whether he had higher Hopes homewards, or the Humour and Fancy altering, like a Wandring Star, he goes Retrograde, placing himself again in the Roman Calendar: But he is made to reckon at Rome by the Gregorian Account; and though he thought himself in a full Conjunction with the Stars

. Our Author had been more tender of the Character of the Archbishop of Spalato, if he had known or remember'd how much the World has been oblig'd to him for that Noble History of the Council of Trent, wrote by Father Paul the Venetian. For it was by his Means, and the Measures he had concerted with that Father before he left Italy, that Archbishop Abbot got the Manuscript transmitted in Parcels into England.

there of the greateſt Magnitude (having publickly Recanted, and as bitterly Reproached the Proteſtant Doctrine there, as he had Exalted it here) yet the Inquiſition had ſo ſtrong an Influence upon him, that it hindred the Operation of it; for he died in Priſon, and they buried him both like a new Heretick and an old Emperor, committing his Body to the Flames. Such Honour have all ſuch Saints! For they hold it as a Maxim, That that Foundation is never again to be built upon, that was once of a tottering Temper.

Dies at Rome.

France in Combuſtion.

About this Time, France raging with Paſſion, play'd her bloody Pranks. There is in that Kingdom a mad Genius domineering, which, like Climaterical Diſeaſes, take reſt, and after ſome Intermiſſion break out again. The very ſame Tragedy acted at this time, was newly Reviv'd there Three and thirty Years after, as is now in the Year 1650. Perſpicuous to every Eye of Reaſon, the Perſons in Power the ſame, running all in one Parallel. The Queen-Mother and the Marquis D'Ancre then, the Queen-Mother and the Cardinal Mazarine now; both Aliens, both Favourites. The Prince of Conde (the Head and Prime of the Nobility) impriſon'd then for oppoſing the ſwelling Greatneſs of that Favourite: The Prince of Conde, and the other Princes, Conti and Longueville, impriſon'd now (though ſince ſet at Liberty, having a powerful Army a-foot) for oppoſing this. The Nobility riſe in Arms againſt the young King and his Mother, to aſſiſt the Princes; ſo they do now. The Complaints and Grievances are the ſame; The Princes repin'd that ſuch an Upſtart ſhould manage all the great Affairs with ſo much Licentiouſneſs, and they ſit ſtill as lookers on, and having nothing to do; All Offices, both Civil and Military, bringing their Garlands, and ſtrowing their choiceſt Flowers at Marſhal D'Ancre's Feet, which ſtunk in their Noſtrils, and they infected the People, who are there but what the great Ones will make them, ſo that the Kingdom groaned under the Inſolencies of an inſulting Muſhroom, bred from the Exreſcency of Royal Humours, as it doth now. Lewis XIV. fights with his Subjects now upon the ſame Account that Lewis XIII. did then. But I can only give a Cataſtrophe to one of theſe Trajedies; the laſt Act of this now a playing wants its Exit.

And to conclude the Firſt, Lewis XIII. finding his Mother's Power ſwell ſo high, as to threaten a Deluge of Noble Blood for the Preſervation of a Mechanick Florentine, and willing to be rid of a Governeſs who eclips'd his Glory, commanded Monſieur De Vitry, Captain of his Guard, to ſeize on the Marquis at his firſt acceſs to Court. The Marquis (being then in his Government in Normandy, placing and diſplacing Officers, for his greater ſecurity) hearing there were new Whiſperers admitted to the King, came to the Court in a full Career, with a ruffling Retinue at his Heels, thinking to remove all Obſtacles in his Way; but there he met the great One, Death, waiting for him, that his Policy and High-Flying Thoughts never minded: For he had no ſooner entred the Gates of the Louvre, but De Vitry Arreſted him; and ſeeing him ſtep back upon his Arreſt, as it were, to lay hold of his Sword, he kill'd him inſtantly with a Piſtol; the Noiſe whereof put the whole Court into an Uproar. The King approved the Fact, the Queen lamented it; but ſhe muſt mourn no longer in the Court, therefore removed thence with a ſmall Train, to practice her Italian Artifices, as ſhe afterwards did, to the Diſturbance of moſt Parts of Chriſtendom. The poor Marquis reſted not in Death, for though he was privately buried that Night, yet the Rage and Malice of the People lighted them to his Grave the next Day; and tearing him thence, and tying his naked Body to an Aſs's Tail, drew him through the Streets of Paris, and hanged him by the Heels upon a Gibbet on the new Bridge; where they cut off flakes of his Body, to ſend as Preſents to their Friends. And when they had ſatiated themſelves thus, they took down the mangled Carcaſs, and made another Progreſs through the City, till wearied with their Delight, they ſtrove to burn the Body, to be rid of it; but the Fire being not ſo active as their Malice, they threw the tatter'd Bones into the River; ſo that their Rage pull'd him out of the Earth, hung him in the Air, burnt him in the Fire, and left him in the Water. And (as they thought) to leave no Memory of him, pulled down his Houſe to the Ground; which was afterwards ratified by publick Juſtice, and his Wife was condemn'd by the ſame, and burn'd for a Witch. And to make their Names the more Odious, the very Birth places were ripped up, and they were both found to proceed from the † Dunghills of Florence. Thus ended this ſad Tragedy; which ſerves as Lights and Sea-marks of Mortality, to teach us how to ſteer our Brittle Bark in this World's Tempeſt, that we bear not too much Sail, but keep a moderate and even Courſe betwixt the Rocks of Pride, and Shallows of Contempt; both which are equally dangerous.

The King goes into Scotland.

Our King dedicated this Summer to the Northern Climate; it is now Fourteen Years Revolution ſince the Beams of his Majeſty appear'd in Scotland. He begins the Journey with the Spring, warming the Country as he went with the Glories of the Court: Taking ſuch Recreations by the way, as might beſt beguile the Days, and cut them ſhorter; but lengthen the Nights (contrary to the Seaſons) for what with Hawking, Hunting and Horſe-Racing, the Days quickly ran away; and the Nights with Feaſting, Masking and Dancing, were the more extended. And the King had fit Inſtruments for theſe Sports about his Perſon; as Sir George Goring, Sir Edward Zouch, Sir John Finnit, and others, that could Fit and Obtemperate the King's Humour: For he loved ſuch Repreſentations and Diſguiſes in their Maſqueradoes, as were witty, and ſudden; the more Ridiculous, the more Pleaſant.

His new Favourite.

And his new Favourite being an excellent Dancer, brought that Paſtime into the greater Requeſt. To ſpeak of his Advancement by Degrees, were to leſſen the King's Love; for Titles were heaped upon him; they came rather like Showers than Drops. For as ſoon as Somerſet declin'd, he mounted. Such is the Court motion! Knighthood, and Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber, were the firſt Sprinklings: And then the old Earl of Worceſter (who had been long Maſter of the Horſe to the late Queen, and continu'd it to this time) was made Lord Privy Seal, in exchange of his Place, and a good Sum of Money put into the Scale: And

† The Author has miſtaken the Birth of the Marquis D'Ancre and his Lady, for ſhe was deſcended of a tolerable good Family in Tuſcany, and he of a Noble Extraction originally from Lucca.

A. Reg. 15. An. Chriſti 1617.

Made Earl of Buckingham.

Sir George Villers (Baron of Whaddon, Viſcount Villers, and Earl of Buckingham, alſo of the Privy-Council) is made Maſter of the Horſe. In this Glory he viſits Scotland with the King, and is made a Privy-Counſellor there. Favourites are not compleat Figures, if the Prince's Bounty be not Circular, as well in his Northerly motion as his Southerly. He now Reigns ſole Monarch in the King's Affection; every thing he doth is admir'd for the Doer's ſake. No Man Dances better, no Man Runs, or Jumps better; and indeed he jumpt Higher than ever Engliſhman did in ſo ſhort time, from a private Gentleman to a Dukedom. But the King is not well without him, his Company is his Solace, and the Court Grandees cannot be well but by him; ſo that all Addreſſes are made to him; either for Place or Office, in Court or Commonwealth. The Biſhops See did alſo Ebb and Flow, from the Wane or Fulneſs of his Influence upon them; and having a numerous Kindred of the Rank of Gentry, which he planted about him, as a Nurſery in the Court, to make them Kinſcere, and Spring up the better; the Dew of theſe Offices, and the freſh Springs that came from theſe Seas muſt be contributed. It cannot with Modeſty be expreſſed how greedily ſome of our Prelates would clear all the Paſſages of a bad Conſcience, to bring in ſuch Waters of Comfort, leſt it ſhould beſpatter the more Worthy, and brand them with all Simony, which dares not be done. But where God hath his Church, the Devil many times will have his Chapel: It was ever his Ambition to be like unto him.

The Book of Sports obtruded.

But among all the Dances that theſe Times were guilty of, none of the Maſqueradoes preſented ſo horrid a Vizard as the Churchman's: For ſome of the Biſhops, pretending Recreations and Liberty to Servants and Common People, (of which they carved to themſelves too much already) procur'd the King to put out a Book to permit Dancing about May-poles, Church-ales, and ſuch debauched Exerciſes upon the Sabbath-day after Evening Praying, (being a ſpecious way to make the King, and them, acceptable to the Rout) which Book came out with a Command, enjoining all Miniſters to read it to their Pariſhioners, and to approve of it; and thoſe that did not, were brought into the High Commiſſion, Impriſon'd and Suſpended. This Book being only a Trap to catch ſome Conſciencious Men, that they could not otherwiſe with all their Cunning inſnare: For they would preach the Goſpel in a Fool's-Coat (as ſome of them expreſs'd) rather than be ſilenced for a Surplice. And their Conjuring of them with the Croſs in Baptiſm, and the Circle of the Ring in Marriage, could not make a well-compoſed Reaſon and a ſound Conſcience then ſtart at it; but when ſo Frightful an Apparition as the Dancing Book appear'd, ſome of the Miniſters left all for Fear, others by Force, they were ſo terrified with it. Theſe, and ſuch like Machinations of the Biſhops, to maintain their temporal Greatneſs, Eaſe and Plenty, made the Stones in the Walls of their Palaces, and the Beam in the Timber, afterwards cry out, moulder away, and come to nothing: Whereas, if thoſe in moſt Authority had not been ſo Pragmatical, but Holy, Prudent, and Godly Men †‡† (as ſome others of the Function were) their Light might have Shin'd ſtill upon the Mount; and not have gone out as it did, offenſive to the Noſtrils of the Rubbiſh of the People.

The King in his return from Scotland made his Progreſs through the Hunting-countries, (his Hounds and Hunters meeting him) Sherwood-Foreſt, Needwood, and all the Parks and Foreſts in his way, were ranſack'd for his Recreation. And every Night begat a new Day of Delight, till he brought Holyrood-day (not * Holyrood-houſe) to Whitehall.

* His Houſe in Edinburgh ſo called.

Piety of the Lord Mayor of London.

This new Encroachment upon the Sabbath gave both King and People more liberty to Prophane the Day with Authority: For if the Court were to remove on Monday, the King's Carriages muſt go out the Day before. All times were alike; and the Court being to remove to Theobalds the next Day, the Carriages went through the City of London on the Sabbath, with a great deal of Clatter and Noiſe in the time of Divine Service. The Lord Mayor hearing of it, commanded them to be ſtopt; and this carried the Officers of the Carriages with a greater Violence to the Court; and the Buſineſs being preſented to the King with as much Aſperity as Men in Authority (croſſed in their Humours) could expreſs it; It put the King into a great Rage, Swearing, He thought there had been no more Kings in England but himſelf; yet after he was a little Cool'd, he ſent a Warrant to the Lord Mayor, commanding him to let them paſs, which he obey'd, with this Anſwer, While it was in my Power, I did my Duty; but that being taken away by a Higher Power, it is my Duty to Obey. Which the King upon ſecond Thoughts took well, and thanked him for it.

Juggling of the Jeſuits.

As Prophaneneſs crept in on one ſide, ſo did Idolatry and Superſtition on the other; for there was more Enmity againſt Miniſters of the Goſpel than Popiſh Prieſts; they ſwarm'd over the Kingdom, working Miraculous Projects in every Corner. One Pack of them got into Staffordſhire, among ſome of the Giffords in that County, Gentlemen of good Eſtates, where they practiſed their Artifices to ſeduce the People. There muſt be a Ground-work, Eſtates to keep them (being like the Gout, never troubling the Poor) and then there muſt be Materials, Correſpondents to act for them. Holineſs and Piety muſt be confirmed by Miracles; and theſe Miracles muſt be viſible to the Peoples Eyes, that they may convey Belief better to the Heart. If the Prieſts be Holy, and can ſubdue Satan, the Religion they profeſs muſt be Heavenly, that triumphs over Principalities and Powers, and Spiritual Wickedneſs, bringing all to Obedience. Theſe are Fineſſes and Subtilties of Maſtring Wits (calling them Piæ Fraudes, Godly Deceits, Worms to bring Fiſh to the Net) and this kind of Frippery they are ever fraught with.

The Boy of Bilſon.

For about this time there was a Boy born at Bilſon in that County, whoſe Father, Mother, Neighbours, and many other People, with Admiration, did abſolutely think poſſeſs'd with a Devil; for he had ſtrange, ſudden, violent, diſtorting Fits, that appeared to all the Beholders contrary to Nature; and being not full

†‡† There were ſeveral of the Biſhops that declar'd their Opinion againſt the Book of Sports: And Archbiſhop Abbot being at Croydon the Day it was order'd to be read in Churches, flatly forbad it to be read there; which King James was pleaſed to wink at, notwithſtanding the Daily Endeavours that were us'd to irritate the King againſt him.

A. Reg. 15. An. Chriſti 1617.

Fifteen years old, it could not be imagn'd that any thing of Impoſtory could reſult from him, and therefore the Fame of it was the more remarkable.

The Jeſuits (that are the beſt Phyſicians in ſuch Diſtempers) hearing of it, viſited the Boy, Prayed by him, and uſed ſuch other Charms and Exorciſms, as are fit to make them be admir'd; giving his Parents good hope of Diſpoſſeſſing him of that Foul Spirit; by which might palpably be diſcerned, how much God's Power was expreſs'd in their Weakneſs, and difference in the Truth and Holineſs betwixt the Catholick Religion, and the Hereſy profeſſed among Proteſtants. So that they that heard them, (as many reſorted to the Place) muſt needs take them for very Holy Men, by whom ſuch Wonders were to be accompliſhed. The Jeſuits viſited him often, ſometimes in Private, ſometimes in Company; but this kind of Spirit would not be commanded by them, ſo that they grew almoſt deſperate of the Cure.

Accuſes a Woman to be a Witch.

The Boy in his Fits would rave againſt an old Woman dwelling near to his Father, intimating by Signs and Ghaſtly Behaviour, that ſhe had ſent a Spirit to torment him; and in plain Terms (when he was out of his Fits) accuſed her to be a Witch, and the Author of all his Miſery. This old Woman is ſent to the Biſhop's Chanchellor at Litchfield to be examined: The Boy is brought thither to confront her; and having his Back towards her, at her coming into the Room, where the Chancellor was, before ſhe yet enter'd or appear'd, he falls into a moſt bitter Agony, crying out, Now ſhe comes, now my Tormentor comes! Wreathing and Tearing himſelf in ſo horrid a manner, that it did not only breed amazement, but Pity in the Spectators, there being many with expectation attending the Iſſue; which, with ſome other Probabilities, were an Inducement to the Chancellor to ſend the Woman to Stafford Goal.

At the next Aſſizes for that County, the Boy and his Parents appear as Witneſſes againſt the Witch; the Boy was placed in a conſpicuous part of the Court, with his Face to the Bench, Eying the Judge continually in a very peaceable and quiet Poſture; and as the Woman was coming in (when the Court thought it impoſſible the Boy ſhould be ſenſible of her appearance) he fell into a more raging Fit than ever he was poſſeſs'd with before: So ſtupendiouſly unnatural, that it was deem'd by all that ſaw it, that nothing but a Diabolical Spirit could work ſuch horrid Effects. This, thus openly acted, and the Relation of what was done at Litchfield, and other Probabilities evidencing, the old Woman (that had no good Reputation among her Neighbours, being of a tetrical and froward Temper, incident to old Age) found few Friends to plead her Cauſe; ſo that being indicted for Witchcraft, ſhe was found Guilty by the Jury, and Condemn'd to die.

She is condemned.

Biſhop Morton gets her Reprieve.

Dr. Morton, Biſhop of that Dioceſe, a great Father of the Anglicane Church, (and happily then on the Bench about Secular Affairs) hearing that ſome Romiſh Prieſts had been tampering with their Exorciſms, to the undevilling of the Boy, and finding little Reaſon produced, why, or for what Cauſe the Witch ſhould uſe the Child ſo ill, was perſwaded, that this might be ſome juggling Trick in them, for effecting their miraculous Ends. He therefore beſought the Judge to reprieve the Woman till the next Aſſizes, and he would take the Boy home with him, have him carefully and ſtrictly looked to, and doubted not before that time to find out the bottom of ſome ſecret and hidden Contrivance. The Judge aſſented to the Biſhop's Requeſt, and ſo the Boy was carried to Eccleſhal Caſtle, the Biſhop's Houſe, whither his Fits followed him with a great deal of Violence: For being put out of his Road (having formerly all ſorts of People come to admire him, and now being more carefully looked to) he grew ſullen, and would not eat ſometimes in two or three Days; ſo that his Belly was almoſt clung, and grown to his Back, and he had a new Swelling about his Throat, which never appeared before; lay in his Bed, ſometimes as it were ſenſeleſs, ſometimes ſtaring with his Eyes, and foaming at the Mouth, ſometimes ſtriking thoſe that ſtood near him, (his own careful Mother being one, whom he made all black about the Arms and Breaſts) never ſpoke but in his Fits, and then a ſtrange Gibbriſh; at other times he only muttered, and made Signs. The Biſhop viſited him often, ſtriving ſometimes to ſoften him with Gentleneſs; at other times he handled him roughly, with Objurgations and Threatenings; but his ill Spirit is capable of neither. He ſpoke to him one time ſome of the Greek Teſtament, to ſee how that would work, and it brought him into his Fit. At another time, he uttered ſome Verſes out of the Greek Poets, which his Devil was not ſo learned as to diſtinguiſh, for that put him into a Fit again; ſo that the Biſhop was confirmed, that he was an Impoſtor of a moſt pernicious and pertinacious Spirit, but how to conjure it out of him, was the Difficulty. And finding Words and Menaces made no Impreſſion in him, he fell to Blows; for taking him out of his Bed, and having one to hold him, the Biſhop gave him ſix very ſmart Laſhes with a Rod, which moved the Boy no more than if he had been an inſenſible Stock. They alſo thruſt Needles into his Toes and Fingers, betwixt the Nails, clapt burning Candles to his Eye-lids, till they ſinged the Hair off, to divert him when he was in his Fits; but with all their Perſecutions he neither winch'd nor ſtirr'd; ſo that the Actors were more troubled to execute, than he to ſuffer.

And in this Condition growing almoſt deſperate, he would make Signs for Knives, or any other Inſtrument, to do himſelf a Miſchief: Therefore ſtrict Care was taken, and many watchful Eyes ſet over him, to prevent any ſuch Danger. Thus he continued almoſt a quarter of a Year, at laſt his Urine grew ſo black, that the Phyſicians thought Nature had left her uſual Operations, having never found in any Humane Body ſo much Aduſt Matter, to give ſo deep and deadly a Tincture.

The Biſhop troubled for the Boy.

This ſtruck the good Biſhop very near; for he was certain the Prieſts had been hammering about him, and now, if he ſhould miſcarry under his Hand, thoſe Mint-Maſters of Miſchief would in their dark Shops coin ſuch Scandals againſt him, as might paſs current in the World's Opinion: Therefore he uſed all the Means he could poſſible, as well to preſerve him as to diſcover him; but finding the Boy endure ſo many Tryals with Patience, ſo much tough Hardſhip and Robuſtneſs in tender Years, he reſolved, if his Water continued black, to ſift the Matter no further. To find out which he ſet a truſty Servant to watch him through a Hole that looked into the Chamber upon the Bed, which the Boy knew not of. The Biſhop going that Morning with his Family to a Lecture, all things were very ſtill in the Houſe; and the Boy finding all quiet, no Noiſe about him, he lifts himſelf up, ſtares, and liſtens, and at length gets gets out of his Bed, and in the Straw or Mat under it takes out an Ink-horn, and makes Water in the Chamberpot through a piece of the Cotton in his Hand; another little piece of the Cotton he puts into his Prepuce, covering it with the Skin, and that was for a Reserve, if he should be forced to make Water when Company is by. Thus having cunningly put himself in order, he hides the Ink-horn again, and returns to his Bed.

The Impostor discovered.

The Man that was appointed to watch him seeing all this, discovered it to the Bishop at his coming home, who came to him presently, and ask'd him how he did? He, according to his usual manner, pointed to his Water, looked ghastly on it, and mutter'd out his old howling Tone. The Bishop, that meant now to deal roundly with him, said Sirrah, you have Ink in your Bed-straw, which you make use of to black your Water, and your Knavery is found out; and calling in his Man, he took out the Ink-horn where the Boy had hid it, and the Man justified, that he saw him make Water through the Cotton; which (with the Bishop's threatening to send him to the House of Correction) struck the Boy with such a sudden Terror, that he arose from his Bed, fell upon his Knees, and humbly besought the Bishop to pardon him, and he would discover to him the whole Truth. And as he put on his Clothes, the Bishop laid open the Grievousness of his Sin, which wrought so upon his Spirit, that he melted into Tears, crying to God for Mercy. A very strange Alteration! That, what he did but counterfeit, the Devil had so hardened in him, that all the Torments and Pains inflicted by Man could not produce a Tear, till God, that melted the Rock, had first touched the Heart.

His Confession.

Then he confess'd, a Pedlar with a Pack on his Back met him when he was going to School, and with many inticing Words perswaded him to go to Mr. Gifford's House, assuring him of good Entertainment; and by his Allurements he went thither with him. There he found four Romish Priests, who gave him Money, and many fair Words, promising him great Matters, if he would be conformable to their Instructions. They were three Days teaching him how to demean himself, and after he was well tutor'd, and had practis'd his Tricks there privately, then they sent him home to his Father (who thought he had been lost, and was much troubled for him) to exercise them in a more publick way. He came home in a very distracted manner, to the Amazement of his Parents, and in short time drew much Company to visit him; and his Parents being poor, got Money from many charitable People, which did encourage him to persist in that way. But when the Fame of his being possess'd with an evil Spirit was sufficiently bruited abroad, the Priests came to dispossess him; but he found so much Sweetness in the Ease, and Profit of that Life, that he would not be dis-inchanted by them, tho' they charmed never so cruelly; for they beat him, and pinch'd him, and us'd him bitterly ill, to make him desist. Thus were the Deceivers deceiv'd! The Bishop ask'd him, Why he accus'd the poor old Woman of Witchcraft? He answer'd, The Priests told him he must lay the Cause of his being possess'd upon some old Woman, and she being known to him, and of a scolding Humour, he fix'd it on her. Then the Bishop ask'd him, How he came to fall into his Fits a little before the Woman appear'd in the Room, both at her Examination and Arraignment, his Back being towards her? For the first, at Litchfield, he said, He heard some about him mutter, She is here; which made him cry out, She comes, she comes: And for the second, at Stafford, He heard the People remove, and her Chains gingle as she came, which gave him the Sign. Lastly he was ask'd, How he made his Throat swell? And he shew'd, it was by thrusting his Tongue (being very long) down his Throat, which Trick he found out himself, the rest were taught him by the Priests. Thus did the Bishop preserve an innocent old Woman condemned by the Law to die, discover the abominable Forgeries of the Priests, and convert a wicked Boy, whom afterwards he bound Apprentice, and proved a good Man. This Story I heard from the Bishop's own Mouth, almost thirty Years before it was inserted here. And the Result of all is, That Falshood with her painted Countenance appears often as beautiful as Truth it self, deceiving many, specially in this Point of Witchcraft, which is a Structure established in the Vulgar Fancy, that hath many odd Passages and Ways opening to it, and is many Airy Stories high; but being well examined, it will prove (for the most part, I will not say always) Paper-proof, as there may be occasion to express in another place.

The King discovers many Impostors.

The King took Delight by the Line of his Reason to found the Depth of such Brutish Impostors, and he discover'd many: For in the Beginning of his Reign, Richard Haydock, of New-College in Oxford, practised Physick in the Day, and preached in the Night in his Bed. His Practice came by his Profession, and his Preaching (as he pretended) by Revelation; for he would take a Text in his Sleep, and deliver a good Sermon upon it; and tho' his Auditory were willing to silence him, by pulling, hauling, and pinching, yet would he pertinaciously persist to the end, and sleep still. The Fame of this Sleeping-Preacher flies abroad with a light Wing; which coming to the King's Knowledge, he commanded him to the Court, where he sate up one Night to hear him: And when the time came that the Preacher thought it was fit for him to be asleep, he began with a Prayer, then took a Text of Scripture, which he significantly enough insisted on a while; but after made an Excursion against the Pope, the Cross in Baptism, and the last Canons of the Church of England, and so concluded sleeping. The King would not trouble him that Night, letting him rest after his Labours; but sent for him the next Morning, and in private handled him so like a cunning Chirurgeon, that he found out the Sore; making him confess not only his Sin and Error in the Act, but the Cause that urged him to it, which was, That he apprehended himself as a buried Man in the University, being of a low Condition, and if something Eminent and Remarkable did not spring from him, to give Life to his Reputation, he should never appear like any body, which made him attempt this Novelty to be taken notice of. The King finding him ingenuous in his Confession, pardoned him, and (after his Recantation publickly) gave him Preferment in the Church. Some others, both Men and Women, inspired with such Enthusiasms, and Fanatick Fancies, he reduced to their right Senses, applying his Remedies suitable to the Distemper, wherein he made himself often very merry (being happily practiced, to be taken notice of by him); but some of their Stories being a little coarse, are not fit to be here related. And truly the Looseness and Carelesness of Publick Justice sets open a Door to such flagitious and nefarious Actions, as severer Times would never have prepetrated.

About

A. Reg. 15.

An. Chriſti 1617.

Sir Walter Raleigh's Weſt-Indian Voyage

About this time, that gallant Spirit, Sir Walter Raleigh, (who in his Receſſes in the Tower had preſented in lively Characters the true Image of the Old World) made Acceſſes to the King, whereby he got Leave to viſit the New World in America: Captain Kemiſh (one of his old Seamen and Servants) ſhewing him a Piece of Ore in the Tower, of a Golden Complexion, (a glittering Temptation to begin the Work) aſſuring him, he could bring him to a Mine in Guiana of the ſame Metal; which (together with Freedom, the Crown of Life and being) gave Riſe to this Enterpriſe.

The King looking on Raleigh as a Man whoſe Abilities might better the Nation, if improv'd the right way, gave him Liberty, and a Commiſſion under the Great Seal, to equip and ſet forth Ships and Men for that Service. His Reputation and Merit brought many Gentlemen of Quality to venture their Eſtates and Perſons upon the Deſign; and being gallantly furniſhed with all things neceſſary, either for Peace or War, they ſet out; and met no Difficulties till they came to Cape Vert in Africa; and then they found the Winds averſe to them, (contrary to the uſual Nature of it) with many violent Storms, which much impeded their Voyage: For they that uſually navigate betwixt Cape Vert and America, run it in leſs than twenty Days; but it took them double the time. And being driven from the Iſle of Bravo by a Tempeſt, there left they Cables, Anchors, and Water-Cask behind them; ſo that by the Length of the Time, Heat of the Climate, and their Want of water, great Sickneſs fell among them, and ſwept away many of their ableſt Men, both for Sea and Land.

But with much Patience and Hardſhip, getting ſight of the Coaſt of Guiana, they came to an Anchor in five Degrees, at the River Caliana, where they landed their ſick Men, ſet up Barges and Shallops, which were brought out of England in Quarters, waſhed their Ships, and took in freſh Water, being fed and aſſiſted by the Indians that Sir Walter Raleigh had formerly known; who (in this general Contagion, having grappled long with Sickneſs, and not yet able to move, otherwiſe than he was carried in a Chair) gave Order to five ſmall Ships to ſail into the River Orinoque (having Captain Kemiſh for their Conductor) towards the Mine, the Star that directed them thither. And in theſe five Ships were five Foot-Companies, under the Command of Captain Parker, and Captain North, Brothers to the Lord Monteagle, and the Lord North; Captain Walter Raleigh, the General's eldeſt Son; Captain Thornhurſt, and Captain Chidley, Gentlemen of great Valour, and infinite Patience, in ſuffering Hunger, Heat and Labour. Major Piget died in the miſerable Paſſage, and Sir Warham Santleger (who was Lieutenant-Colonel) lay ſick, without hope of Life; ſo that the Command of the five Companies being conferred upon George Raleigh, the General's Nephew, (made Major in Piget's room) he was not ſo well obey'd as the Enterpriſe required. As they paſs'd up the River, the Spaniards began the War, and ſhot at the Ships, both with their Ordnance and Musket; but they landed their Forces, without any great Loſs, near unto a Town upon the River, called St. Thome, and gallantly charged the Enemy to the very Ports; where finding ſome little Oppoſition, they at laſt forced a Paſſage, and made themſelves Maſters of the Town. In the Aſſault, Captain Walter Raleigh, the General's Son, (a Man of Fire and Courage, fitter to execute, than to order his Valour) was ſlain, to the great Grief of the Conquerors.

An. Reg. 15.

An. Chriſti 1617.

The other five Ships ſtaid with the General at Trinidado, having no other Port capable of them near Guiana. The firſt was commanded by the General himſelf; the ſecond by Captain John Pennington, Vice-Admiral; the third by Sir Warham Santleger; the fourth by Sir John Fern; the fifth by Captain Chidley of Devonſhire. The General had twelve Ships in all ſet out with him; but Captain Whitney and Captain Welleſton mutiny'd againſt him, and ran home again from the Granadoes. With theſe five Ships they daily attended the Armada of Spain, and had they ſet upon them, their Force divided, (one half being in Orinoque, a Hundred and fifty Miles from them) they in Trinidado had not only been endangered, but all thoſe in the River had alſo periſhed. And tho' theſe five Ships with the General were but of little Defence againſt ſo ſtrong a Power as the King of Spain's Gallions, yet they would have given them their Hands full; for they were all reſolved to have burned, and died by their ſides. But the Armada ſtaid for them at Margarita, by which Iſland they expected them to paſs towards the Indies.

The Deſign diſcovered to Gondemar.

For the King unwilling to diſpleaſe his Brother of Spain, commanded Sir Walter Raleigh upon his Allegiance, before he went out, to ſet down under his Hand, the Country and the River which he was to enter, the compleat Number of his Men, Burthen of his Ships, and what Ordnance every Ship carried: Which being made known to the Count Gondemar, the Spaniſh Ambaſſador here, and by him in Poſt to the King of Spain, a Diſpatch was made by that King to the Indies, and his Letters ſent from Madrid, before Sir Walter Raleigh with his Fleet departed out of the River Thames. For the firſt Letter, ſent by a Bark of Advice, was dated the 19th of March, 1617. at Madrid. The ſecond Letter was ſent by a Carvell to Diego de Palomeque, at Trinidado. The third Letter by the Biſhop of Puerto Rico: And the fourth was ſent by the Farmer and Secretary of the Cuſtoms, at the ſame time. By that of the King's Hand, there was alſo a Commiſſion for the ſpeedy levying of Three thouſand Men, and ten Pieces of Ordnance, to be ſent from Puerto Rico for the Defence of Guiana. Theſe Proviſions were made to entertain the Engliſh, and had they met them, they would have found a harſh Banquet.

But the Spaniards at St. Thome (their Supplies being not come) were not ſo numerous as to defend both the Town and the Paſſages to the Mines; therefore they quitted the Town, and fortified the way to the Mines near the Town. But the Paſſages leading to the Mine that Kemiſh had in his Eye, were Aſpera & Fragoſa, as Sir Walter Raleigh expreſs'd them; and Kemiſh found the River ſo low, that he could not approach the Banks, in moſt places near the Mine, by a Mile; and where he found an Aſcent, a Volley of Muſquets came from the Woods, and at one time ſlew two of the Rowers, hurt ſix others, and ſhot a valliant Gentleman, Captain Thornhurſt in the Head, of which he with great Difficulty recovered. Kemiſh ſeeing ſo much Hazard in attempting to find the Mine, the Paſſage to it being full of thick and impaſſable Woods; and thinking the Engliſh that were left in the Town of St. Thome would not be able to defend it, eſpecially if the Enemy ſhould be recruited, the Country being all in Alarm, he gave over the Enterpriſe, and returned: For if

he

A. Reg. 15. An Christi 1617. he should have discovered the Mine, he had no Men (as he pretended) to work in it; and being a great way up into the Land, Men would have been got thither with much Danger and Difficulty. And that was true. The Spaniards themselves complain for want of Negroes to work in their Mines; for the Indians cannot be constrained, by a Law of Charles the Fifth; and the Spaniards will not, neither can they endure the Labour. But this was ill advised, to take so much Pains, and run so much Hazard, to get and possess that, which, when they had it, they could not make use of; so that which Kemish pleaded (when he returned) for an Excuse, reflected upon him as a great Miscarriage. As soon as he came to St. Thome, the English pillaged the Town, carried away the best and most portable Things; and the Enemy not daring to appear for the Redemption of it, they set it afire, leaving behind them an infinite Mass of Treasure, which, either for want of Knowledge or Power, they could not attain to: For there were two Gold Mines near the Town, the one possessed by Roderigo de Parama, the other by Herman Frontino, and a Silver Mine by Francisco Fashardo: To preserve and fortify which, they employed all their Strength and Industry; so that they needed not have gone so far up the River to find a new Mine, when they had so many nearer them, that either Ignorance or want of Strength made them neglect.

Raleigh troubled. The General with the News of the Death of his Son, and Kemish's Return without effecting his Work, was perplexed to the very Soul, telling Kemish he had undone him, and wounded his Credit with the King, past recovery; but he must think (he told him) to bear the Weight of the King's Anger as well as himself; for he must avow that Kemish knew the Mine, and that with little Loss he might have possessed it. Kemish, much troubled in his Mind, retires to his Cabin, which he had in the General's Ship, and presently after his being there, he shot himself with a Pistol: The General hearing the Noise, ask'd what Pistol it was? Answer was made, That Captain Kemish shot it off in his Cabin to cleanse it; but Kemish's Man going into the Cabin, found his Master lying in his own Blood. The Pistol having a little Bullet, did only crack the Rib; which being too slow for his Fury, he desperately thrust a Knife in after it up to the Haft; and with him the Glory of the Voyage expired: For the Design being thus broken, the Ships leaky, Victuals failing, and missing of those Golden Showers they gaped after, (that Radical Moisture which fills the Veins of the Affections, and gives Life and Vigour to all Actions) some of the Men began to mutiny against the General, others were for him; some would have him go home, others would have him stay; the major part forced him to swear not to go home but by their Allowance; and yet his Ships dwindled away one after another, (his Strength was best discovered by his Weakness) ten Ships being reduced to four, and those would do what they list. Some would go for Italy, some for France, few for England, fearing the Spanish Power there more than they did in the Indies. Thus they were shatter'd in Judgment, with a greater Tempest than the Seas or Winds could produce. Miserable is that Government where the Multitude is Master! At last he is brought to Kinsale in Ireland.

Kemish kills himself.

Gondemar incenses the King against Raleigh, 1618. The News of taking and burning St. Thome coming to Gondemar, he besieges, and, as it were assaults the King with Importunity for Reparation: For he was a Man not only of an insinuating and glosing Spirit, but of a violent and fiery Temper, when any cross Accident blew up the Humour. The Matter is aggravated with the highest Circumstances by those of the Spanish Faction, as if this Irruption of Raleigh's not only tended to the Breach of the Treaty of Marriage betwixt Prince Charles and the Infanta of Spain, (that was then in motion) but to the Infringement of the Peace and Amity established betwixt the two Crowns. The King's Fears being heighten'd to Anger, he disavows the Action; and lest others of his Subjects should by this Example take the Boldness to attempt the like Hostility against the King of Spain, he puts out a Proclamation, wherein he shews his Detestation of such Proceedings, and threatens severe Punishment to the Enterprisers, thereby to deter them: Which gave Gondemar some Satisfaction; whose Design being only to get Sir Walter Raleigh home, after this Brush) vented little Passion; but so cunningly skinned over his Malice, that when Raleigh was in Ireland, he found nor heard of no such great Difficulties, (Dangers often flying upon the Wings of Rumour) but that he might appear in England; and the Men not willing to be banished their own Country, (tho' some of them had France in their Eye) put in at Plimouth. Raleigh was no sooner ashore, but he had private Intimation, which gave him cause to suspect, the Smoothness of the Beginning would have a Rough End: Therefore he attempted an Escape from thence in a Bark of Rochel: But being apprehended by Sir Lewis Stukley (his Kinsman) who had private Warrant and Instructions to that purpose, (so unnatural and servile is the Spirit, when it hath an Allay of Baseness, there being many others fitter for that Employment) he is brought to London, and recommitted to the Tower.

A. Reg. 16. An Christi 1618.

He is committed to the Tower. He was no sooner in the Tower, but all his Transactions in this Business are put to the Rack, and tender'd by his Adversaries. They say he knew of no Mine, nor did Kemish know that the Mine he aimed at was Gold; but Kemish bringing him a Piece of Ore into the Tower, he fobb'd a Piece of Gold into it in dissolving, making the poor Man believe the Ore was right, that by these Golden Degrees he might ascend to Liberty; promising the King to fetch it where never Spaniard had been. But when Kemish found by better Experience he was cozen'd by Raleigh, he came back from the Mine: And Raleigh knowing that none but Kemish could accuse him, made him away. This Vizard was put upon the Face of the Action, and all the Weight of the Miscarriage was laid upon Raleigh's Shoulders.

Gondemar, that looked upon him as a Man that had not only high Abilities, but Animosity enough to do his Master Mischief, (being one of those Scourges which that old Virago (the late Queen) as he call'd her, used to afflict the Spaniards with) having gotten him into this Trap, laid now his Baits about the King. There is a strange Virtue in this Spirit of Sol! The Intenseness makes Men firm; the Ductilness brings them to be active. French Crowns are not so pure, nor so piercing, as Spanish Pistoles. Auri sacra fames! Quid non mortalia pectora cogis? The King, that loved his Peace, is incensed by them that loved their Profit, and the poor Gentleman must lay down the Price of his Life upon the old Reckoning.

In October this Year he is brought to the King's-Bench Bar at Westminster, where the Records of his Arraignment at Winchester were open'd; and Demand was made, Why Execution should not be be done upon him, according to the Judgment therein pronounced against him; To which, in way of Answer, he began to justify himself in the Proceedings of the late Voyage; but the Lord Chief Justice wished him to spare that Trouble; for there was no other Matter in question but the former Judgment, which the King would have executed upon him, for some Occasions best known to himself, unless he could shew good Cause to the contrary.

A.Reg.16. An. Christi 1618.

Raleigh answered, That he was told by his Council, that Judgment was void, by the Commission his Majesty was pleased to give him since under the Great Seal for his last Employment, which did give him a new Vigour and Life to that Service. The Lord Chief Justice replied, That he was deceived, and that the Opinion of the Court was to the contrary. Then he desir'd, that some reasonable time might be allowed him to prepare for Death; but it was answered, That the time appointed was the next Morning, and it was not to be doubted, but he had prepared himself for Death long since. Raleigh having a Courageous Spirit, (finding the Bent of the King's Mind, and knowing Disputes to be in vain, where Controversies are determined) acquiesc'd, was conveyed to the Gate-house, and the Day following was brought to the Old Palace-yard at Westminster, and, upon a Scaffold there erected, . lost his Head.

And Beheaded.

His Character and Description.

He had in the outward Man a good Presence, in a handsome and well-compacted Person, a strong natural Wit, and a better Judgment, with a bold and plausible Tongue, whereby he could set off his Parts to the best Advantage. And to these he had the Adjuncts of general Learning, which (by Diligence and Experience (those two great Tutors) being now Threescore Years of Age) was augmented to a great Perfection, being an indefatigable Reader, and having a very retentive Memory. At his Arraignment at Winchester, his Carriage to his Judges was with great Discretion; humble, yet not prostrate; dutiful, yet not dejected: Towards the Jury affable, but not fawning, not in despair, nor believing, but hoping in them; carefully perswading them with Reasons, not distemperately importuning them with Conjurations; rather shewing Love of Life, than Fear of Death. Towards the King's Council patient, but not insensibly neglecting, nor yielding to Imputations laid against him in Words, (which Sir Edward Coke, then the King's Attorney, belched out freely) and it was wondred a Man of his high Spirit could be so humble in suffering, not being much overtaken in Passion. And now at his last, when Death was presented before him, he looked upon it without Affrightment, striving to vindicate his Actions, by taking off the Veil that false Reports had cast upon them, (especially the Imputation of his glorying, and rejoycing in the Fall, and at the Death of the late Earl of Essex, which had stuck so many Years in his Breast; and this new Miscarriage of Kemish's, of a later Date, imputed to him) for having provided himself privately for Heaven, clearing his Accounts with God before he came to the Scaffold, he publickly at last reckon'd with Man, (being to quit all Scores) and so made an end.

A.Reg.16. An.Christi 1618.

Disunion in the United Provinces.

Times of Peace are accounted the happiest Times; and tho' they are great Blessings, proceeding from the Influence of Supreme Mercy, and the Showers of Grace, yet the Branches of the Tree of Knowledge, (growing by this Sunshine) for want of due pruning, do often become so exuberant, that their very Fruits are not only their Burthen, but sometimes their Ruine. Prosperity is of an Airy Constitution, carried about with the Breath of strange Fancies, which mount sometimes as high as Omnipotency; but there finding Resistance, they come down amain, and beat the lower Region with a Tempest of Strife and Malice. When the Romans wanted Enemies, they digged them out of their own Bowels. Active Spirits will be set on work.

Our Neighbours of the Netherlands (that had so long bounded the Spanish Power, and humbled their Pride so far, as to acknowledge them a Free-State, before they would so much as listen to an Overture of Peace) had a Fire kindled in their own Bosoms. It is now some time since the Twelve Years Truce betwixt Spain and them began, being in the Wane and Last Quarter. While they had their Hands full of Business, they had not their Heads full of old Cu-

. As Sir Walter Raleigh's Conspiracy before had been a Riddle of State, so his Death now was a Sacrifice of State. King James was at this time openly in the Spanish Interest, and some Steps had been already made towards a Match between the Prince of Wales and the Infanta of Spain, which a little after was made publick. Condomar was then a Favourite, as well as an Ambassador, and had acquir'd so great an Ascendant over King James, that he was led into his most secret Counsels, and, in conjunction with Buckingham, entirely govern'd him.

Raleigh was the last of Queen Elizabeth's Captains, and had done her Signal Services against Spain. After King James's Accession to the Crown, tho' then a Prisoner, and under the Sentence of Death, he had writ several Memorials to him against a Peace with Spain, laying open the Advantages accruing to England, and the Disadvantages to Spain, in continuing the War. This was what the Court of Spain could never forgive him; and so upon Pretence of his Sacking of St. Thomas, a Colony of theirs in the Indies, they got rid of his working Head.

I am apt to believe there was something of a Personal Prejudice in King James against him, that concurr'd with Condomar's Sollicitations to bring about the Fate of this Great Man. He had during his Imprisonment made Applications to Prince Henry, who contracted a particular Esteem for him, kept a constant Correspondence with him by Letters and Messages, and had again and again sollicited the King for his Liberty.

When the Prince fell into his last Illness, the Queen sent for Sir Walter Raleigh for some of his Cordial, which she her self had taken in a Fever some time before, with Remarkable Success. Raleigh sent it, together with a Letter, to the Queen, wherein he expressed a tender Concern for the Prince; and boasting of his Medicine, stumbled unluckily upon an Expression to this purpose, That it would certainly cure him, or any other of a Fever, except in case of Poyson.

The Prince dying, tho' he took it, the Queen, in the Agony of her Grief, shew'd Raleigh's Letter, and laid so much Weight on the Expression about Poyson, that to her dying Day she could never be disswaded from the Opinion, That her belov'd Son had had foul Play done him.

It's certain Sir Walter Raleigh lov'd the Prince with an Esteem next to Idolatry; his Death putting an end to the First, and indeed the only remaining Part left us of his Noble History, which he sums up in these Words. Lastly, Whereas this Book, by the Title it hath, calls it self, The First Part of the General History of the World, implying a Second and Third Volume, which I also intended, and have hewn out: Besides many other Discouragements perswading my Silence, it hath pleased God to take that Glorious Prince out of the World, to whom they were directed; whose unspeakable and never-enough lamented Loss hat taught me to say with Job, Versa est in luctum Cithara mea, & Organum meum in Vocem flentium. But tho' Sir Walter Raleigh was Great in most other Things, it was both Vanity and Indiscretion in him to lay such a Stress on this Medicine of his, as to suppose nothing but Poyson could resist the Power of it; and at the same time to start such a Suspicion in a fond Mother, that perhaps he had no true Ground for, and might in the Consequence prove fatal to himself.

riosities

A. Reg. 16. An. Christi 1618. riosities. Now, like Plethorique Bodies that want letting Blood, they break out into Distempers; a Schism in the Church, and Faction in the State.

The first Author of the Schism, was Arminius; of the Faction, Barnevelt; Persons of great Parts and Power (tho' of different Natures.) The one had been Divinity-Professor at Leyden, the other the Manager of all the great Affairs of the State. Distempers in Kingdoms and States are like Madness in Bodies, which do not break out till some Accident doth stir the Humour. Arminius died just upon the beginning of the Treaty, which was in the Year 1609. leaving behind him the Seeds of this Pelagian Heresy, which tho' it were cherished much by some, in whose Bosoms he had sown it, yet happily it might never have taken Root, had not Peace and Ease manured it, and made it fruitful. The Mysteries of Predestination, and the ineffable Essence of God, (Quæ tremenda & admiranda sunt, sed non scrutanda (to use our King's own Words) which are to be trembled at, and admired, not pried into) are the great Theme. Such Intuitions are too high for Flesh and Blood: Yet what will not Pragmatical Spirits do, when they proudly look into Divine Things with the Eye of Reason, not humbly with the Eye of Faith?

This Rupture in the Bowels of the Church grew so great, that it endangered the Body of the State. The Chief Rulers and Magistrates in the several Provinces being tainted with this Error, strove to establish it by Power; among whom Barnevelt was a Principal Agent, who, by the Assistance of Hoogenberts of Leyden, Grotius of Rotterdam, and Leidenburgh Secretary of Utrecht, with others their Adherents, drew on the Design, which was to suppress the Protestant Reformed Religion, and establish the Tenents of Arminius, being fomented by the Kings of France and Spain, as the immediate way to introduce Popery. This went on so smoothly, that the Orthodox Ministers were expelled out of their principal Towns, and none but Arminians admitted to Preach to the People, which in some Places bred many Combustions, that tended to nothing but Popular Confusion.

Our King forewarns them of it Anno 1611. But long before this time, our King saw the Storm coming upon them: For in the Year 1611. he forewarns the States; telling them, That by the unhappy Succession of Two such Prodigies in one Sphere, as Arminius and Vorstius, some dreadful Mischief would succeed. For Arminius was no sooner Dead, but those that drew on the Design had an Eye on Vorstius, his Disciple, to make him Divinity-Professor in his Place; which the King hearing of, and having read some of Vorstius's Blasphemous Writings, sends to his then Ambassador Sir Ralph Winwood, Resident there, to let the State know, that Vorstius rather deserved Punishment than Promotion; that the Head of such a Viper should be trod upon and crush'd, that was likely to eat his way through the Bowels of the State. And if they (nevertheless) would persist to prefer him, he would make known to the World publickly in Print, how much he detested such abominable Heresies, and all Allowers and Tolerators of them.

The Ambassador urging the King's Desires, they returned a long Answer in Justification of Vorstius.

The States Answer. First, 'That the Curators of the University 'of Leyden (according to their Duty, and the 'ancient Custom ever since the Foundation of 'that University) having diligently made Enquiry for some Doctor to be chosen in the 'Place of Divinity-Professor there, at that 'time void; after Mature Deliberation, they 'made Election of Conradus Vorstius to that Place, 'Which Election and Calling, was countermin'd presently after by certain Persons, to 'whose Office or Disposal the Business did nothing at all belong; who charged the said 'Vorstius with Unsoundness of Doctrine; whereupon the Curators thought fit (with the good 'liking of Vorstius himself) that both at Leyden, 'and at the Hague, he should appear in his own 'Justification, to Answer all Accusers; which 'he did; and there came none to Charge him. 'But not long after, six Ministers undertook to 'prove, That Vorstius had publish'd False Doctrine, who being heard in a full Assembly of 'the States of Holland and Westfrizaland, they 'could by their Arguments find no Reason, 'why the Execution of what was done by the 'Curators lawfully, ought to be hindred or impeached. And they do assuredly believe, That 'if his Majesty of Great Britain were well informed of the true Circumstances of this Business, he would, according to his High Wisdom and Prudence, conceive favourably of 'them, they proceeding in this Business with all 'Reverence, Care and Respect, to his Majesty's serious Admonition. Dated at the Hague, '1 October, 1611.

Vorstius's Books burned by the King. The King seeing which way the States went, by the Print of the Footing that Vorstius had set among them, caused his Books publickly to be burned in St. Paul's Church-yard, and both the Universities. And not giving it over, he writes to them again, to be mindful of the Glory of God, and not suffer such Scandalous Members to remain in the Body of the true Reformed Church, that maintain such execrable Blasphemies, as to deny the Eternity and Omnipotency of God: Furthermore, he desires them so much to consult their own Honour and Safety, as to Extirpate such Atheisms and Heresies. But if they suffer such Pestilent Hereticks to nestle among them (who dare take upon them the licentious Liberty to fetch again from Hell ancient Heresies long since condemned, and invent new ones of their own, to the Depravation of the true Catholick Church) he should be constrained publickly to protest against them, Dated at Theobalds, 6 October, 1611.

Sir Ralph Winwood represented this Letter to the States; and finding them cold and backward in proceeding any further against Vorstius, according to the King's Directions to him, he made this Remonstrance to them.

My Lords,

Sir Ralph Winwood's Remonstrance to the States. 'If ever the King of Great Britain, my Master, 'hath merited any thing of this State, (and 'how much he hath merited, in respect of his 'great Favours and Royal Assistances, your 'Lordships acknowledging them with all Gratitude, can best Judge and Witness) he hath surely merited at this present, having by his Letters full of Zeal and Piety, which he hath 'written unto you, endeavour'd to procure the 'Establishment of that Religion only within 'your Provinces, which the Reformed Churches 'of Great Britain, France and Germany, by a mutual Consent have generally Imbraced. For 'what is it to his Majesty, whether Dr. Vorstius 'be admitted Professor in the University of 'Leyden, or not? Or whether the Doctrine of 'Arminius be preached in your Churches? Saving that as a Christian Prince, he desires the Ad-

A. Reg. 16. An. Christi 1618.

'Advancement of the Gospel; and as your best 'Friend and Ally, the Strengthening of your 'Commonwealth, whose first Foundations were 'cemented with the Blood of his Subjects; and which 'in his Judgment can no way subsist, if wit-'tingly and willingly you suffer the Reformed 'Religion to be (either by the Practices of your 'Doctors sophisticated, or by their Malice) de-'praved. If therefore Religion be as it were 'the Palladium of your Common-wealth; and 'that to preserve the One in her Glory and 'Perfection, be to maintain the Other in her 'Purity, let your selves than be Judges, in how 'great a Danger the State must needs be at 'this present, so long as you permit the Schisms 'of Arminius to have such Vogue (as now they 'have) in the Principal Towns of Holland; 'and if you suffer Vorstius to be received Di-'vinity-Professor in the University of Leyden '(the Seminary of your Church) who, in scorn 'of the Holy Word of God, hath, after his own 'Fancy, devised a new Sect, patch'd together 'of several Pieces of all sorts of Ancient and 'Modern Heresies. The Fool said in his Heart, 'there is no God: But he that with an open Mouth, 'of set Purpose, and prepensed Malice, hath 'let his Pen run at random, to disgorge so 'many Blasphemies against the sacred Majesty 'of God, this Fellow shall wear the Garland 'of all that ever yet were heard of, since the 'Means of the Gospel, the Light of Christian 'Religion hath shined unto the World. If any 'Man doubt of it, see here what his Majesty, 'with his own Hand, hath collected out of his 'Writings. And then presenting them a Paper, he proceeded.

'These are, in part, the Opinions of that 'great Divine, who is chosen to domineer in 'the Chair at Leyden: In opposition whereun-'to, I mean not to say any thing, but that 'which the Roman Orator did once pronounce 'in the like Case, Mala est, & impia consuetudo, 'contra Deum disputandi, sive serio id fit, sive si-'mulate; It is an evil and wicked Custom to 'dispute against God, whether it be in earnest, 'or in jest.

'Now my Lords, I address my self unto you, 'and according to the Charge which I have re-'ceived from the King my Master, I conjure 'you by the Amity that is betwixt his King-'doms, and your Provinces, to awaken your 'Spirits, and to have a Careful Eye at this As-'sembly of Holland (which is already begun) 'ne quid Respublica detrimenti capiat, that the Com-'monwealth take no harm; which undoubted-'ly at one time or other will be turned upside 'down, if you suffer such a dangerous Conta-'gion to harbour so near you, and not remove 'it as soon as possibly you may. The Disci-'ples of Socinus (with whose Doctrine Vorstius 'hath been suckled in his Childhood) do seek 'him for their Master, and are ready to em-'brace him. Let him go, he is a Bird of their 'own Feather, Et dignum sane patella operculum, 'a fit Cover for such a Dish.

'On the other side, the Students in Divinity 'at Leyden, to the Number of Six and Fifty, 'by a dutiful Remonstrance, presented unto 'the States of Holland the Sixteenth of October, 'the last Year, being 1610, did most humbly 'beseech the said States, not to use their Au-'thority in compelling them to receive a Pro-'fessor, who both by the Attestations of the Di-'vinity-Colleges at Basil and Heidleberg, as also 'by manifest Evidence out of his own Writings, 'is convinc'd of a Number of manifest Here-'sies.

A. Reg. 16. An. Christi 1618.

'These Reasons therefore, namely, the enor-'mous and horrible Heresies maintained by 'him; the Instance of his Majesty, ground-'ed upon the Welfare and Honour of this 'Country; the Requests either of all, or of the 'most part of your Provinces; the Petitions 'of all the Ministers (excepting those only 'which are of Arminius's Sect) should methinks 'prevail so far with my Lords the States of 'Holland, as they will at the last apply them-'selves to the Performance of that, which both 'the Sincerity of Religion, and the Service of 'their Country requireth at their Hands.

'Furthermore, I have Commandment from 'his Majesty, to move you in his Name, to set 'down some certain Reglement in Matters of 'Religion throughout your Provinces, that this 'licentious Freedom of Disputation may be re-'strain'd, which breeds Factions and Par-'takings; and that you would absolutely take 'away the Liberty of Prophesying, which 'Vorstius doth so much recommend unto you in 'the Dedicatory Epistle of his Anti-Bellarmine, 'the Book whereof his Patrons do boast so 'much.

'And his Majesty doth exhort you, seeing 'you have heretofore taken Arms for the Li-'berty of your Consciences, and have endur'd 'a violent and bloody War, the space of Forty 'Years, for the Profession of the Gospel; that 'now, having gotten the upper Hand of your 'Miseries, you would not suffer the Followers 'of Arminius to make your Actions an Example 'for them to proclaim throughout the World 'that wicked Doctrine of the Apostacy of the 'Saints. The Account which his Majesty doth 'make of your Amity, appears sufficiently by 'the Treaties which he made with your Lord-'ships, by the Succours which your Provinces 'have received from his Crowns by the De-'luge of Blood, which his Subjects have spent 'in your Wars. Religion is the only Soldier of this 'Amity. For his Majesty being, by the Grace 'of GOD, Defender of the Faith, doth hold 'himself obliged to defend all those who pro-'fess the same Faith and Religion with him: 'But if once your Zeal begins to grow cold 'therein, his Majesty will then straightways 'imagine, that your Friendship towards him, 'and his Subjects, will likewise freeze by little 'and little.

This was the Effect of Sir Ralph Winwood's Remonstrance; to which, after six Weeks Delay, he received this cold and ambiguous Answer:

'THat the States General had deliberated up-'on his Majesty's Proposition and Letter, 'dated the 6th of October, 1611. and do give 'him humble Thanks for the continuance of his 'Royal Affection towards the Welfare of their 'Country, and Preservation of Religion. And 'that they had entred into Consultation con-'cerning the Articles charged against Vorstius; 'and the Curators of Leyden, did thereupon 'make an Order Provisional, That Vorstius 'should not be admitted to the Exercise of his 'Place, but remain in Leyden only as an Inha-'bitant and Citizen. And in case Vorstius should 'not be able to clear himself from those Accu-'sations which were laid to his Charge, at or 'before the next Assembly (which was to be 'holden in February following) that then they 'would decide the Matter with good Con-'tentment to his Majesty. The States Answer.

But this Answer still savouring of Delays, could not in effect be esteemed less than an absolute Refusal to yield to the King's Desires; besides besides, the specious Separation of Vorstius as a Citizen, was only to satisfy the King at present; for he (after) notwithstanding exercised his Place of Professor. Whereupon Sir Ralph Winwood knowing the King's Mind, made this Protestation in their Publick Assembly.

A. Reg. 16. An. Christi 1618.

Sir Ralph Winwood's Protestation.

My Lords,

'THere is not any one of you, I suppose, in this Assembly, that will not acknowledge the Brotherly Love wherewith the King, my Master, hath always affected the Good of your Provinces, and the Fatherly Care which he hath ever had to procure the Establishment of your State. In which respect, his Majesty having understood, that Vorstius was elected Divinity-Professor of Leyden, a Person attainted by many Witnesses, Juris & Facti, of a Number of Heresies, is therewith exceedingly Offended. And for the timely prevention of an Infinite of Evils, did give me in charge to exhort you (which I did the 21st of September last) to wash your Hands from that Man, and not suffer him to come within your Country. To this Exhortation your Answer was, That all due Observance and Regard should be had unto his Majesty: But his Majesty hath receiv'd so little Respect therein, that instead of debarring Vorstius from coming into the Country, which even by the Laws of Friendship his Majesty might have requir'd) the Proceedings have been clean contrary; for he is permitted to come to Leyden; hath been received there with all Honour; taken up his Habitation; Treated, and Lodg'd, in the Quality of a Publick Professor. His Majesty perceiving his first Motion had so little prevailed, writ a Letter to you to the same Purpose, full of Zeal and Affection; perswading you, by many Reasons, not to stain your own Honour, and the Honour of the Reformed Churches, by calling unto you that wretched and wicked Atheist. These Letters were presented to this Assembly the Fifth of November last, at which time, by his Majesty's Command, I used some Speech my self to the same effect. Some Six Weeks after, I received an Answer, but so Confused, Ambiguous, and Impertinent, that I have Reason to conceive there is no meaning at all to send Vorstius away, who is at present in Leyden, received, acknowledged, respected and treated as Publick Professor: Whether it be to grace that University instead of the Deceased Joseph Scaliger, or whether to give him means to do more Mischief in Secret, which perhaps for Shame he durst not in Publick, I cannot tell. For these Reasons, according to that Charge which I have received from the King, my Master, I do in his Name, and on his Behalf, Protest in this Assembly, against the Wrong, Injury, and Scandal, done unto the Reformed Religion, by receiving and retaining Conradus Vorstius in the University of Leyden, and against the Violence offered unto that Alliance which is betwixt his Majesty and your Provinces; which being founded upon the Preservation and Maintenance of the Reformed Religion, you have not omitted to Violate, in the Proceeding of this Cause. Of which Enormous Indignities committed against the Church of God, and against his Majesty's Person, in preferring the Presence of Vorstius before his Amity and Alliance, the King, my Master, holds himself bound to be sensible; and if Reparation be not made, and that speedily (which cannot be by any other Means, than by sending Vorstius away) his Majesty will make it appear unto the World, by some Declaration which he will cause to be Printed and Published) how much he detests the Atheisms and Heresies of Vorstius, and all those that Maintain, Favour and Cherish them.

To this, the States promised a better Answer at their next Assembly; but that producing no good Effect, the King writes a Declaration against Vorstius, which is extant in his own Works, collected by Doctor James Mountague, Son to Sir Edward Mountague, of Bowghton in the County of Northampton, Knight, then Bishop of Winchester, and Dean of his Majesty's Chappel; in which Volume is depainted the King's excellent Spirit, and many Royal Graces tending to Religion and Piety.

Thus the States let in a Deluge of Impiety, by being so pertinaciously affected to Vorstius; and though he lived not long among them, yet what he had planted grew up abundantly, and were the bitter Roots of these present Divisions.

Our King writes to the States in 1613.

And after, in the Year 1613, there were many Discords among them, which our King hearing of, he incited the States by Letters again (so willing he was to have Unity among them) that this War of the Tongue might be pacified, rather by Publick Authority than School Disputations; and, by his Mediation, for a good time the Humour was abated, or rested, as in the Interpolate Fits of Agues; but the Rancour broke out again more than ever.

And now in 1618.

For this Year 1618. (as formerly expressed) the Distemper came to the State, or Height, and had ever after a Decline. Our King hearing of the Disorders and Tumults among them, look'd upon them (now) as so many ill Omens, portending not only the Ruine of the Netherlands, but the Tempest growing greater, might beat too soon upon the British Shores. To stay therefore the swelling Progress of this Gangrene Humour, he prohibits the Subjects by Proclamation to send their Children to Leyden, and sollicites the States by Letters again, not only to forbid the Preaching of these Controversies, (the Pulpits being made but the Bellows of Dissention) but commands his Ambassador, Sir Dudley Carleton, to shew them their Disease, and then prescribes them the Cure. Their Disease was this; Schism in the Church, which usher'd in a Faction in the State, Jealousy and Disaffection among the Magistrates; Hatred and Heart-burning among the Common People; Contempt of the Orders and Decrees of the chiefest Courts of Justice; Distraction among the Soldiers, being tied to several Forms of Oaths; Insurrections and Commotions among the Companies new levied, not well Disciplin'd, (as likewise among the Common People) which have extended to Blood, to the Affrightment, Fear and Trouble of all the Provinces; at which the Enemy smiles (who happily have a Hand in the Design) and their Friends lament to see it so. To cure which Malady, there is no other way than to call a National Council, where these Waters of Strife being kept in due bound, the asperous Edge of Opinion might be taken off, by grave and weighty Reason, to abate the Passion both in Church and State.

Barnevelt opposes the Prince of Orange.

The Remonstrants (which the Arminians called themselves) carrying on their Resolutions with a full sail, would by no means alter their Course, or consent to the calling of a Council; either fearing their Party in Council would prove the Weakest,

A. Reg. 16. An. Christi 1618. Weakest, or knowing their Partakers in Action would be the Strongest; for most of the States and Governors of Provinces had tasted of this infected Cup. And Barnevelt (the Head of them) being an active Person, and having a nimble Tongue, distilling into them a Jealousie, that Maurice Prince of Orange (who had the Command of all their Garrisons, as General of their Army) affected to make himself (by his Power) sole Lord and Monarch over them; that the freedom which they had purchased with their Bloods, was now ready to be trampled on; he that was their Servant, aspiring to become their Master; having all Power both by Sea and Land, in his own hand; all Governments, and Offices at his own dispose, so that he wanted nothing but the Title to make him Absolute. These Sparks took Fire with many, and yet they could not well see by that Light, because Barnevelt drew these Pretences as a Curtain, to get as much Power in the Militia, as he had in their Councils, the better to bring his Ends about. Whereupon, to Ballance the Prince of Orange's Power, new Companies are levied in some of the Provinces secretly, especially in Utrecht, meaning to make that the Stage to act their bloody Parts on: Which Town being much corrupted with the Leaven of bad Doctrine, they soon closed with the Corruption of as bad Manners.

The Prince of Orange goes to Utrecht.

The Prince of Orange, and some others affected to him, did cut out their Time to the length of the others Endeavours, proportioning their Prevention suitable to the others Action; so the advance of the one Party ran upon the same Parallel with the other, being ready to tread on their Heels for haste. And now the time being ripe, the Prince goes to Utrecht, accompanied with some of the States his Intimates, Count Ernest of Nassau, and some other Commanders of the Army, to Seise upon, or Disband those new raised Forces; in which he was opposed by Leydenburgh and other States of the Town, who incited the Governour, Sir John Ogle, our Country-man, to deny the Prince entrance; but he was too much a Friend to the Honour of his Name, and Nation to falsify his Trust. So that the Prince encountred only with those, whose Unwillingness had Power enough if they had had Hearts to oppose him. But he finding it would be an ill Precedent to the rest of the Towns to meet a Repulse here, had order'd Five hundred Foot from Arnham, and the next Garrisons, to meet him there, who entred the Town that Evening peaceably, and the next Morning about Four a Clock Disbanded the new levied Companies, before the Towns-Men were well awake.

25 July.

The Prince had no great Reason to trust the Garrison of the City, considering the Reformed Religion was totally kept under Hatches, and the Arminian got upon the Deck. The Governor himself suspected, and complying to outward Appearance, and the Common Soldiers running with the Stream. But he knew (it seems) their Temper ascended to no higher Notions, than Thirty Stivers a Week was able to purchase. Therefore he summon'd them all over Night into the Market-place, without Beat of Drum, who, with the other Five hundred, struck such a Terror into the new levied Companies, that, at the first Word of Command, they laid down their Arms and submitted. They were in that City in all Nine hundred Men, that knew they were raised to oppose the Prince's Power, pick'd up of several Nations, that hoped to carve their Fortunes out of Bloody Tumults, and back'd by a numerous Multitude of Citizens; yet they all shrunk in their Heads before the Face of Authority.

This giving some Stop to the Career of the Remonstrants in Utrecht, the rest of the Towns took up, though they had rung long uncurbed. And now the Prince and State thought of nothing more than of composing the Disorders of the Church, by a National Council; which Barnevelt and his Faction opposing, they resolved to take away those Impediments that hindred the Peace and Tranquility of the Provinces. So that on the 19th of August, the prime King-leaders of the Sedition, Barnevelt, Hoogenberts and Grotius, were seized on at the Hague, as they were entring the Senate, and committed to several Prisons. This cast a general Damp upon the Spirits of the Remonstrants, as if they had been crushed in the Head. And some few Days after, Leydenburgh was sent from Utrecht with a strong Guard. These being the Four chief Pillars whereupon this confused Building stood, they being taken away, it fell to the Ground; Leydenburgh, to prevent their Mercy, stabbed himself in Prison with a Knife, that opened a Passage to let out his Life. Hoogenberts and Grotius found something of Mercy by waiting for it, but they were condemned to perpetual Imprisonment in the Castle of Lovestein. And the latter of them (Grotius) after some time of Imprisonment, made his Escape in a Trunk, which his Wife pretended, to the Soldiers of the Castle, to be full of Arminian Books, which she would send away, because they should not trouble her Husband's Head. But the Capital Offender, Barnevelt, was beheaded at the Hague the 14th of May following, being 1619.

Barnevelt's Sentence and Death.

His Sentence of Death was this, That for so much as he had endeavou'd to disturb the Peace of the Land, and had opposed himself against the wholsom Advice of divers Princes, Lords, and excellent Persons, as well without as within the Land, and that he had injured some of their mightiest Allies by his secret Practices, namely, by calumniating the King of Great-Britain, as though he had been the Author of these Troubles in the Low-Countries: For that he had kindled the Fire of Dissention in the Provinces; had raised Soldiers in the Diocese of Utrecht; had disreputed his Excellency as much as lay in his Power; had revealed the Secrets of the Council; and had received Presents and Gifts from Foreign Princes: Finally, For that by his Machinations and Plots, new States have been erected in the State, new Governments against the Government, and new Unions and Alliances against the ancient Union, to the general Perturbation, as well of Policy, as of Religion; to the exhausting of the Treasures of the Land; to the Jealousy and Dislike, not only of the Confederates, but of the Natives of the Country, who by this Means were brought into Danger, that they were like to fall into final Ruine.

His Imployments.

He was born in Amersford, descended from the Ancient Family of Olden Barnevelt: In his Fortune, a private Gentleman; but by his Industry, Travels, and Studies at Home and Abroad, he made himself capable of managing the highest Affairs, which he did almost for Forty Years together. He was Five times Extraordinary Ambassador into England and France; had been in the Field with the Princes of Orange, and the Army, as one of the States, Thirty two several Leaguers; nothing was acted without his Advice: Indeed he was the Tongue and Genius of the State. But whether Ambition (now in his Old Age) mounted him to grapple with the the Prince for Power; or whether that wild and frantick Fancy, that Men often brand their Spirits with, and call it Conscience, (but is nothing but Pertinacy in Opinion); into the Wings of his Affections we cannot discover, being only the secret Companions of his own Breast, and let them dye with him. But thus he ended in the Seventy first Year of his Age.

A Synod at Dort. He lived to see (that which he had so much oppofed) a National Synod held at Dort, * whither our King sent Doctor George Carlton, Bishop of Landaff; Doctor Joseph Hall, Dean of Worcester; Doctor John Davenant, Professor Regius in Cambridge, and Master of Queen's College; and Doctor Samuel Ward, Regent of Sidney College in Cambridge: Divines of great Reputation, found Learning, and well grounded Faith. Where they met with divers Divines from Switzerland and Germany, besides the Natives of the Netherlands; who altogether, in a full Synod, quashed, as much as in them lay, the Arminian Opinions: And though they could not utterly extirpate the Roots of the Heresie, yet they laid them so low, that they never broke out there since into exuberant Branches; though some of the Fibræ, the small Veins left behind, much tainted our Nation; as shall be expressed hereafter.

A Blazing Star. And now the Heavens declare the Glory of God: A mighty Blazing Comet appears in Libra, whose bearded Beams covered the Virgin Sign. It began on Wednesday Morning, the 18th of November this Year, and vanished away on Wednesday the 15th of December following; making, in 28 Days Motion, its Circumgiration over most Parts of the known World, extending its radiant Locks (by the Observation of Astronomers) sometimes 45 Degrees in length. And as our Doctor Bambridge observed toward the Declination of it, about the 11th of December, it pass'd over London in the Morning, and so hasted more Northwards, even as far as the Orcades.

Nunquam futilibus excanduit ignibus Æther,

They make not their Course in vain. ⁂ These Apparitions do always portend some horrid Events here Below, and are Messengers of Mischief to poor Mortals: The Divine Wisdom pointing to us what we should do, to prevent these threatned Dangers, that we may have our Lives for a Prey. It appears first in Libra, the Emblem of Justice, and streams over the Virgin Astrea, which (as the Poet saith) was last of all the Virtues left the Earth, Ultima Cælestum terras Astrea reliquit.

We must by this Admonition from Heaven, learn to do justly; and it is for Injustice that these sad Omens threaten us. What miserable Effects of War, Ruine, and Devastation, in most Parts of the known World, followed at the Heels of this stupendious Harbinger, is obvious to all; and so far as relates to us, may be declared (God willing) in the Progress of this History: But I hope the Operation and Power of it is almost at an End; for it began in Germany, took France and Spain in the way, and pass'd over England to the Orcades, and so vanished; as Banbridge relates in the Description of it, Fol. 7.

Fulgura non semper, nec semper prælia durant.
——Let's count it almost past,
For War, like Lightning, doth not always last.

The Death of Queen Anne. The first remarkable Accident that happened in England after this Prodigious Fore-runner, was the Death of Queen Anne, who died of a Dropsie at Hampton-Court; and thence brought to her Palace in the Strand, for the more triumphant Glory of her Obsequies. The common People, who naturally admire their Princes, placing them in a Region above ordinary Mortals, thought this great Light in Heaven was sent as a Flambeau to her Funeral; their dark Minds not discovering, while this Blaze was burning, the Fire of War that broke out in Bohemia, wherein many Thousands perished.

A short Character of the Queen. She was in her great Condition a good Woman, not tempted from that height she stood on, to embroil her Spirit much with things below her (as some Busie-bodies do) only giving her self content in her own House, with such Recreations as might not make Time tedious to her: And though great Persons Actions are often pried into, and made Envy's Mark, yet nothing could be fixed upon her that left any great Impression, but that she may have engraven upon her Monument a Character of Virtue.

Northumberland set at Liberty. About this time Henry Earl of Northumberland, who had been a Prisoner in the Tower ever since the Powder Plot (a long Recluse) was set at Liberty. The Cause of his Confinement was upon a Sentence in the Star-Chamber, for nourishing in his House Thomas Piercy his Kinsman, who was one of the Complotters of the Treason. And though nothing could be prov'd against the Earl to endanger his Life; yet upon the Presumption of his Knowledge of it, he was Fined in Thirty thousand Pounds, and Imprisoned in the Tower. He was married to Dorothy, Eldest Daughter to Walter Earl of Essex, by whom he had a Noble (yet surviving) Issue, two Sons, and two Daughters; Algernon, now Earl of Northumberland, and

* For all this mighty Pother King James made against Arminius and his Doctrine, its remarkable that towards the end of his Reign, and much more in his Sons, the best way to obtain Preferments in the Church was to be of that Principle; and those that were not, were branded with the odious Name of Puritans.

⁂ The Notice our Author takes of this Comet, as presaging, forsooth, mighty Events, is an instance, how far a popular Error, or the prejudice of Education, may Byass even Men of good Sense and Learning, for such certainly the Author was. This puts me in mind of an Accident that happened about this time in Scotland, which the Historians of that Country interpreted each of them to their own Sence and Purpose.

King James had prevail'd with the General Assembly of that Church which sat at Perth, to come to an Agreement with the Church of England, in Five material Articles, which were ever since call'd, The Five Articles of Perth. The Presbyterians exclaim'd against them, and opposed them with all their might; as the Episcopal Party stood firm for them, as the greatest Point they had gain'd since the Reformation. When these Articles came afterwards to be Ratified in Parliament, just as the King's Commissioner Touching the Act with the Scepter, (which is the manner of giving the Royal Assent in that Kingdom) there happen'd a mighty Clap of Thunder, attended with such an unusual Storm of Wind and Rain, that the like had not been known in many Ages before nor since Their Ecclesiastical Writers of both sides, when they come to mention this Accident, are pleas'd to give it a turn suitable to their own Genius or Interest. The Presbyterians say; And that God from Heaven, by the Voice of Thunder, express'd his Abhorrence of what was then done upon Earth. Those of the other side are not behind with them; for, say they, That God, by the Voice of Thunder, Ratified in Heaven what was done on Earth. Its after this manner we poor Mortals put what Construction we please upon the Phœnomena's of Nature, and adapt them to our narrow Capacities and Concerns.

Henry,

A. Reg. 17. An. Christi 1619. Henry, both in these Times young. Dorothy, the Eldest Daughter, married Robert Viscount Lisle, after the Death of his Father Earl of Leicester, by whom he had a numerous Issue, like Olive-Branches about his Table. The Younger Daughter, Lucy, a Lady of incomparable Beauty, (solemnized in the Poems of the most exquisite Wits of her time) married the Lord Hayes, (now made Viscount Doncaster) against her Father's Will, (who aimed at higher Extraction) during his Imprisonment; which the old Earl's stubborn Spirit not brooking, would never give her any thing; and Doncaster, whose Affection was above Money (setting only a Valuation upon his much-admired Bride) strove to make himself Meritorious, and prevailed so with the King for his Father-in-Law, that he got his Release. But the old Earl would hardly be drawn to take a Release from his hand, so that when he had liberty, he restrained himself; and with importunity was wrought upon, by (such as knew the Distempers of his Body, might best qualifie those of his Mind) perswading him, for some Indisposition, to make a Journey to the Bath, which was one special Motive to accept of his Son-in-Law's Respects.

The variousness of Times. The stout old Earl, when he was got loose, hearing that the great Favourite, Buckingham, was drawn about with a Coach and Six Horses, (which was wondred at then as a Novelty, and imputed to him as a Mastring-Pride) thought if Buckingham had Six, he might very well have Eight in his Coach, with which he rode through the City of London to the Bath, to the vulgar Talk and Admiration; and recovering his Health there, he lived long after at Petworth in Sussex, bating this over-topping Humour, which shewed it rather an affected Fit, than a Distemper. Nor did this addition of Two Horses by Buckingham grow higher than a little Murmur. For in the late Queen's time there were no Coaches, and the first had but Two Horses; the rest crept in by Degrees, as Men at first venture to Sea. And every new thing the People disaffect, they stumble at, sometimes at the Action for the Person, which rises like a little Cloud, but soon vanishes. So after, when Buckingham came to be carried in a Chair upon Men's Shoulders, the clamour and noise of it was so extravagant, that the People would rail on him in the Streets, loathing that Men should be brought to as servile a Condition as Horses. So irksom is every little new Impression, that breaks an old Custom, and rubs and grates against the publick Humour! But when Time had made those Chairs common, every loose Pimp, or Minion, used them; so that, that which gave at first so much Scandal, was the Means to convey those privately to such Places, where they might give much more. Just like long Hair, at one time decried as abominable, at another time approved of as beautiful. So various are the Fancies of the Times! And that strong Reason is only able to manage this Beast, that can best curb its own Appetite.

Stirs in Germany. But now War breaks in upon us, following that blazing Fore-runner; the House of Austria (like Pyrrhus and Lysander, extending their Dominions no further than the Sword could reach) having long feathered their Nests with the Eagles Plumes, grew formidable to the Princes and States of Germany. And because they found the Popes had shrewdly plumed some of their Predecessors, till they had wrested most Parts of Italy from the Empire, they were content to maintain their Grandeur by the Pope's Power; and, to ingratiate themselves the more, became great Persecutors of the Reformed Religion.

A little before this time, Ferdinand (Uncles Son to Matthias the Emperor) was Crowned King of Bohemia, with this Reservation, That he should not Exercise the Power of a King, as long as the old Emperor lived. This kind of crowning of Kings (one in the Life of another) was the great Chain, that (Link by Link) held the Empire, and the two Kingdoms of Hungaria and Bohemia together in the Austrian Family; so that the State of either Kingdom could not, or durst not, put forth their Strength to shake them asunder. The Emperor kept his Court at Vienna, King Ferdinand at Gretz in Stiria; so that the Government of Bohemia rested in such Counsellors as the Emperor Matthias left there for the Management of Publick Affairs. These Counsellors and Ministers, with the Archbishop of Prague, broke out about this time, not only to demolish the Protestant Churches, but by the help of the Jesuits, (their bitter Enemies) strove to undermine the Religion it self. An. 1617.

The Protestant States, and Nobles of the Country, summoning an Assembly, to redress their Grievances, were opposed by some of the Emperor's Ministers of State, the very day of their Meeting; which exasperated them to such a height of Passion, (being back'd by some Forces they brought with them for their Security) that they threw Slabata the Emperor's Chief Justice, Smetsansius one of the Council of State, and Fabricius a pragmatical Secretary, from a high Window in the Castle, down into the Court, though some of them took little hurt, and lived (as Reports go) to this time. This rash Action the Bohemians strive to palliate by Apologies to the Emperor; but withal strengthned themselves, making Levies both of Horse and Foot, the better to secure their own Peace, and banishing those Firebrands the Jesuits out of Prague, whose malicious and distemper'd Zeal first kindled the Flame. The Emperor hearing of these Mischiefs, raises an Army under the Command of Count Bucquoy; and the Protestant States finding the Emperor exasperated, raise two Armies, one commanded by Count Thurne, the other by Count Mansfeldt: Some Bickrings pass'd betwixt the Imperial Army and the Bohemians, some Towns taken on both sides; and in the heat of this stir the old Emperor dies.

Ferdinand King of Hungary and Bohemia, and adopted Heir of old Matthias, meeting (after Summons) at Frankford, with the Three Electors of Mentz, Collen, and Trevers, and only with the Representatives of the other Three Electors: The Church carried it for him, and he was chosen King of the Romans. The States of Bohemia disclaimed the Election as invalid, because he could not be an Elector himself as King of Bohemia; for that he had never been actually in Possession of the Crown. And tho' their Dissent could not lessen Ferdinand's Election to the Empire, yet they protested by Oath never to acknowledge him for their King. These Eruptions made a Noise all over Christendom, and most knowing Men looked on this heavenly Torch, the late Comet, as fit Fuel to give Fire to such a Train. Aug. 18.

Our King, fearing the Clap would fall heavy upon the Protestant Party, sent the Viscount Doncaster, Extraordinary Ambassador, to mediate a Reconciliation betwixt the Emperor and Doncaster Ambassador.

A. Reg. 17. An. Christi 1619.

the Bohemians. But the Afperity and Bitternefs was too great to find an Allay by his fweet and candid Compliments, being fitter for the Bofoms of Lovers, than the armed Breafts of Uproars and Tumults.

Ferdinand infinuated with the Princes of Germany, efpecially the Duke of Bavaria, to corroborate his Party; the Bohemians made Election of our King's Son-in-Law, the Prince Elector Palatine, to be their King, hoping his great Alliance would ftrengthen theirs. Some little Paufes were in the Acceptation, (though a Liquorifh Bait) the Elector Palatine being fearful to ingage himfelf to fnatch a Crown out of the Fire: But the Bohemian States wrought the Prince of Anhalt, the Earl of Holoch, and the Baron Done, the Palatine's Intimates, in their Forge (of great Promifes and Preferments) to fuch a Temper, that by their Affiftance (flighting the Danger) he reach'd at the Crown, before either he or his Friends were well advifed of it. His Election was upon the 26th of Auguft, his Entrance into Prague the laft of October, and his Coronation the Fourth of November following. But as foon as he had accepted, and fwallowed the Royal Bait, he fent the Baron Done to our King, to excufe the fuddennefs of the Acceptation, before his Counfels were well concocted; but the emergency of the Caufe (as he pretends) would admit of no Deliberation. As fome hafty Phyficians, or cholerick Patients, to prevent a Feaver, bring the Body to a Hectick.

1619.

Our King, that looked upon his own Condition through the Optick of the People's mutable and unftable Affection, would by no means countenance fuch a Precedent as fhould give them Power to difpofe of an eftablifhed Royal Dignity at their Pleafure, and upon every change of Humour; for fo he might fhake his own Foundation, which made the Baron's Addreffes crude and naufeous to his Appetite, till Time had a little digefted them. And then he difpatched two Ambaffadors into Bohemia. One was Sir Richard Wefton, who was afterwards Lord High Treafurer of England, and left to his Pofterity the Earldom of Portland; a Man of a haughty Spirit, yet knew how, by fuppling it, to make his way to the height he arrived at: For his Religion gave place to his Policy, and mounted him till he became one of the great Grievances of the Kingdom. The other was Sir Edward Conwey, a Man of a groffer Temper; bred a Soldier, being Governor of Brill, when England gave over her Intereft in the Cautionary Towns, who was after made a Vifcount, and Secretary of State, a rough impolifhed Piece for fuch an Employment. But the King, that wanted not his Abilities, would often make himfelf Merry with his imperfect Scrouls in writing, and hacking Expreffions in reading; fo that he would break into Laughter, and fay in a facetious way, Had ever Man fuch a Secretary, that can neither Write nor Read? Thefe two were fuited for the Employment, happily upon defign: Wefton being a kind of Papift, and Conwey a Proteftant, the better to clofe up the Breach between the Emperor, and the King of Bohemia.

Wefton and Conwey fent Ambaffadors into Bohemia.

1620.

But Ferdinand being ftartled with the flaring Glory of this new King, to caft a damp upon it, and to terrifie him and his Adherents, he caufed this Profcription to be publifhed againft them

A. Reg. 18. An. Christi 1620.

The Palatine profcribed.

'WE Ferdinand, &c. To all Electors, Princes, &c. but efpecially to the Subjects of Frederick Count Palatine of the Rhine, Elector, &c. fend Greeting. Becaufe it is not known unto you, how that Frederick Count Palatine of the Rhine, &c. hath made himfelf Head of that perfidious and rebellious Crew of our Kingdom of Bohemia: Wherefore we proclaim the faid Frederick Count Palatine, &c. Guilty of High-Treafon, and iterate Profcription, and of all the Penalties which by Law and Cuftom are depending thereon. We conclude him out of Our and the Imperial Peace, and are firmly refolved to execute the faid Penalties againft the faid Frederick, which calleth himfelf Count Palatine of the Rhine, as againft one publickly profcribed, an Enemy and Adverfary to us, and to the Empire, and as one which hath fuffered himfelf to be made a Head of our Difobedient and Perfidious Rebels, who is a Contemner and Oppugner of our Imperial Authority, and Majefty, who is an Infringer of Publick Peace, and Tranquillity, and of other Ordinances and Laws of the Empire. Commanding you, under pain of Life, that in no way you give any Aid, Succour, Affiftance, neither in Money, Provifion, Munition, nor any way elfe, neither openly, nor covertly, under what colour or pretext foever, to the faid Frederick, who calleth himfelf Count Palatine of the Rhine. And if one or more of you fhould ferve, or be in pay of the faid Frederick, his Complices or Helpers, We command him, or them, to forfake the Service of the faid profcribed Frederick, and of his Helpers. And We Command you the Eftates, Dependents, Alliances, Subjects and Vaffals of the faid profcibed Frederick, that henceforth you yield unto him no Obedience, Help, nor Aid, in Affifting him any further; nor partake of his Rebellion, Difobedience, and Crime, but utterly to forfake him in it, and to affift us with true and faithful Aid and Succour, to reduce the Difobedient, Difloyal, Rebellious, profcribed Frederick, and his Helpers, to due Obedience, any Treaty, Confederacy, Amity and Alliance notwithftanding. And We abfolve you that are Vaffals of the faid profcribed Frederick, or which are in his Protection, or which are his Natural Subjects, or Strangers, from all your Oaths and Duties; promifing to all thofe which fhall be Obedient unto this our Mandate, all Imperial Favour, Grace, and Security. We will likewife, that none fhall Protect, Defend or Secure the faid banifhed Frederick, and his Helpers and Affiftants in nothing that may be profitable to them. For we exclude the faid banifhed Frederick, together with his Adherents, from all Favour, Liberties, Promifes, Security, publick Peace, Confederacies, Alliances, Laws, Privileges, Immunities and Cuftoms, heretofore given unto him and them, by our Anceftors the Roman Emperors. But he that fhall be Difobedient unto this our Will and Command, and fhall affift, take part, or aid in any fort, either privately or publickly, under what colour foever, the faid Frederick, who calleth himfelf Count Palatine of the Rhine, and Duke of Bavaria, We declare by thefe Prefents guilty of High Treafon, and iterate Profcription, no lefs than himfelf. And this let every one take notice of, to keep themfelves from danger. Given in our City of Vienna, &c.

Ddddd

The

A. Reg. 18. An. Christi 1620.

Saxony executes the Imperial Ban.

The Duke of Saxony took the Field with an Army of Twenty thousand Men, to execute this Imperial Ban, and reduced most part of Lusatia. But before this, the Earls of Thurn and Mansfeldt, with a great Army, stood the Shock of the Imperial Power in divers Assaults: But when the King was established in Bohemia, and his Counsels managed by the Prince of Anhalt and the Earl of Holoch, then Thurn and Mansfeldt were eclipsed by the Brightness of their Power; for Anhalt must be General, and Holoch Lieutenant-General. This taking Impression in the Region of gallant Minds, drew up some ill Vapours of Discontent, which tended to a fiery Exhalation, that, like ill Omens, did presage an unhappy Event.

Preparations for War.

While they were thus grappling in Bohemia, the Marquis Spinola was forming an Army in Flanders, and the Protestant Princes of Germany, Confederates to the Palatine, (calling themselves the Princes of the Union) raised Forces for the Defence of the Palatinate, and their own Interest, under the command of the Marquis of Anspach. But our King made no Preparations; yet he sent to his Ambassador at Brussells, commanding him to enquire for what purpose Spinola's Army was called together, the Truce continuing betwixt Spain and the Low Countries; but the Ambassador could receive little Satisfaction, the Spanish Subtilty having sealed up Spinola's Commission, which he was not to open till the Army were ready to march. But Men of ordinary Understanding might apprehend, that an Army of 26000 Foot, and 4000 Horse, with all Military Provisions, were not to lie still; and though our King had divers Arguments presented to him, that did assure him that Army was intended for the Palatinate, yet would not his Spirit be set on work to preserve his Childrens Patrimony: So odious was the Name of War to him! But at length, with much ado, one Regiment of Foot (to join with the Princes of the Union, and make a little Noise and Bustle) was extorted from him by Importunities. This Regiment was the gallantest for the Persons, and outward Presence of Men, that in many Ages (I think) hath appeared either at home or abroad: It consisted of 2200 compleat; the Chief Commander Sir Horatio Vere, (who was after Baron of Tilbury) a Person bred up in the School of War, and a known Master in the Art of Victory. He was accompanied with the Earls of Oxford and Essex, young and daring Spirits, whose Honour not only descended from a long Series of Noble Progenitors, but they made it their own. And out of Respect to them as well as Love to the Service, this Regiment was almost furnished with Gentlemen, who went to make themselves capable of better Employment; the English for many Years having been Truants in that Art. The two Earls had 250 Men apiece in each Company; and so many flocked to Essex out of Love, (and he loath to put them off) that he carried 300 Men into the Palatinate, paying 50 of them with his own Money. The King being drawn to consent, that two Regiments more should follow for these two Noblemen, which gave the more Encouragement to this petty Enterprize.

The March of the English into the Palatinate.

‡†‡ The English followed Spinola, but at a distance; for he being nearer to the Palatinate, got much the start of them, tho' they went out of England before he presented the Arch-Duke with the Civilities of his Departure, which was upon the 8th of August. And upon the last of the same Month, by the Assistance of Maurice prince of Orange, and the Benefit of a Bridge of Boats a little below Wesel, they passed the Rhine under the Conduct of Prince Henry of Nassau, who, with 2000 Horse, and 400 Musqueteers, taken out of Gulick and the adjacent Garisons, cleared the Country before them, marching through Gulickland, and the barren Mountains of Collenland, till they came near to Coblentz, which Town stands upon the Center of two Rivers, the Rhine and Mosell: Giving out in the March as if the Army intended to pass the Mosell; but the Prince (to divert the Enemies Intelligence) upon the 16th of September drew two Miles back from Coblentz, and passed the Rhine in Punts, a kind of Lighter, advancing forward on the other side of the River three English Miles that Night, to a Village called Hembach, where the Foot stay'd till the Horse passed the River. And this sudden Change of Resolution was one of Prince Henry's Master-pieces; for he knew from Collen, Spinola would have Intelligence by Couriers which way the Bent of their March tended; and they had the Mosell in their Eye all the way, but the Rhine in Intention. In the Halt before Coblentz, one Bullet, among others from the Town, passed between General Vere and the Earl of Essex standing together, and hit a Gentleman called Flood on the Elbow: The Cause of shooting from thence (as was conceived) proceeded from a Skirmish the Night before, that happened betwixt some English and the Country People of an adjoining Village on the Mosel; for Captain Fairfax being sent with a Squadron to them in a peaceable manner, to desire the Accommodation of Bread and Wine for Money, the Boors shot at him, and hurt some of his Men; but he stoutly advancing to them, they took their Boats, and hasted down to Coblentz. Some of the Boors were reported to be slain, for which Fairfax, upon the Princes Complaint, was committed, to give the Country Satisfaction; but the next day released.

Before the Army passed the Rhine, General Vere sent Captain Row and Captain Dexter (with 94 sick Men, some Tents, Trunks, and other Luggage, that were cumbersome) by Water to Bacrach, which Town within few days after was summon'd by Spinola, and yielded to him, after the Example of Openheim, and the other Towns he had taken in the Palatinate: So Spiritless were the People in every Place, that he met no Resistance in any thing that he attempted. The English taken in Bacrach were used with Civility, and, with the Payment of small Ransoms, had Liberty to return home. After the Army, both Horse and Foot, had passed the Rhine, they had hard Marches through the pleasant Country of Nassau, (whose Amenity and Fruitfulness may rival the Beauties of France) shaping their Course towards Francfort.

Spinola attempts to intercept the English.

Spinola finding himself deluded on one side of the Rhine, passed the River Main with all his Horse, and 4000 Foot, intending to snap them on the other; but the Stream being too high, his Waggons with Ammunition took wet, and some Field-pieces miscarried, which could not be recover'd with the Loss of some of his Men; which Disasters happening, they admonished

‡†‡ The Author's Account of the War in the Palatinate agrees with the other Historians of that time, and may be rely'd upon on his own Score; he being along with the Earl of Essex in that Expedition, and staying with him all the time the Earl was beyond Seas.

him

A.Reg. 18. An. Christi 1620.

him to a Retreat; otherwise, in all probability, he had cut off those Forces before they could have joined with the Princes of the Union. The 24th of September, Prince Henry with his Horse, and General Vere with the Foot, passed the River Main, at a Ford not far from Frankfort, the Foot for the most part marching up to the middle through the Stream; and that Night they stood in Arms, having two Alarms of Spinola's Approach, not hearing yet he was retired. The next day they had a long March to recover Darmstadt, one half of which Town belongs to the King of Bohemia, the other part to the Landgrave of Hessen. There Prince Henry and the Dutch Companies left the English, and returned into the Netherlands again; and 1500 German Horse, commanded by Collonel Meran, met them, by Order from the Princes of the Union. The 27th of September they came to Beinsheim, being the first entire Town in the Palatinate they arrived at; and upon the first of October passed over the Rhine by Worms, upon a Bridge of Boats; and that day were met by the Marquis of Anspach, and some others of the Princes of the Union, who stay'd to see them march by, wondering at the Gallantry of such Foot, who were with them the meanest of the People.

The English join with the Princes.

After two Days rest, the Princes with part of their Army, being 4000 Horse, and 6000 Foot, joined with the English, and together marched towards Altzi, (a Town in the Palatinate that the Enemy had taken in) which they intended to surprize. But hearing by their Scouts that the Enemy had quitted the Town, as not tenable, and that Spinola with his whole Army was marching towards them, they faced about to make his way the shorter, and within three Hours their Scouts and the Enemies were in Skirmish; but the German Princes, not having their whole Army, were not forward to engage, Spinola seeing them march towards him, (being as weary as they) took the Advantage of a Hill, and forced their Horse with his Cannon to retreat; but the Princes drew their Cannon up another Hill on the right Hand of the Enemy, there being a large Bottom, and a Hill of Vineyards betwixt the two Armies, which were not visible but from thence, for the one Hill drowned the other to them in the bottom. As soon as they saw how the Enemy strove to secure themselves, and that they were loth to come on, they judged their Strength not to be great, and therefore took a Resolution to set upon them. The Dutch, in Courtesy, yielded the Van-guard to the English, which before they stood upon, as a Punctilio of Honour. The English General drew out of every Division 80 Musqueteers to give the Onset, who were encouraged by that Reverend Divine Dr. Burges, (of whom mention is formerly made) who accompanied the General from England, and was an Instrument of much good to that Regiment; tho' they needed no Encouragement at that time, being Spirits willingly prepared for such Enterprizes.

And prepare for a Charge.

Standing thus ready, expecting the Command of the Marquis of Anspach to begin the Charge, and the Evening hasting with a sable Foil to excuse his Slowness, General Vere, tired with his Delays, rode up the Hill, accompanied with the Earls of Oxford and Essex, and there they saw the Enemy began to march away, their Waggons marching in two Ranks, and the Foot on the further side of them, the Waggons serving as a Bulwark for them; their Horse brought up the Rear; and the March was without Drum or Trumpet, till the last Division moved; and then they made the Air shake with the Noise of their Shouts, which was apprehended to be for Joy of their Escape: For the Princes afterwards had Intimation, that they were not above 6000 Foot, and 2000 Horse, and that they had marched all Night, hoping to have found them in some Security at Altzi, that they might have beaten up their Quarters before they had been settled. But the Spaniard, like a cunning Miner, finding them in a Posture to entertain him, was loth to engage, fearing their Strength, and seeking Advantages. And if their German Heads had countermined with him, and interposed betwixt him and Oppenheim, (his Head Quarter, whither he was marching) being nearer to it than he, they might have either forced him to fight, or forced the Town from him. The Earl of Essex being informed of this by some that knew the Country, pressed the Marquis of Anspach to it, desiring him not to let slip an Opportunity so happily put into his Hand. He, not well pleased to be urged to a thing so contrary to his Humour, replied angerly, There is a Fort betwixt us and the Town, and we must pass thither under the Mercy of their Cannon. Sir Horatio Vere hearing the Marquis's Reason, said, When shall we then fight, if we shun the Cannon? But no Perswasion can be prevalent, where Power and Disaffection join their Force. The Dutch Horse skirmished with the Rear of the Spanish, and took 5 or 6 Horse, and some straggling Foot; that was all the Hurt done them.

Spinola and the Princes hunt one another.

The next Day they marched to Quarters again, where the Souldiers found the Country Roots, Fruits and Wine in the Must, no good Preservatives: But after they had stay'd by it 7 or 8 Days, Spinola led them a Dance for Digestion, pretending for Kaisers Lutter, a Town in the borders of the Palatinate, which made the Princes advance their whole Body to attend him, but as they drew near, he retreated; so that they sported with one another, as Children at Seek and Find, that neither of their Armies could be much pleased with the sharp frosty Nights those desolate and naked Hills exposed them to: Upon the top of one of them, the English Commanders one Night burnt a great many of their Waggons to warm them; the Frost was so violent, and the Soldiers lay in Heaps upon the Ground close together like Sheep, cover'd as it were with a Sheet of Snow. Yet they spent the time thus, till their Stoves summon'd them to warmer Lodging. And the English Regiment was disposed into three principal Garrisons: General Vere commanded in Manheim, Sir Gerrard Herbert in Heidelburgh, and Serjeant-Major Burrows in Frankendale, imprisoning themselves in Walls, while the Enemy roamed round about them, and they had only Power to preserve themselves; for the Princes of the Unions Forces were Garrison'd in their several Countries. I have the more particularly describ'd this Expedition, because I was an Eye-witness of what passed; and if we had not had an Allay of Dutch dulness, the Spaniard could not have carved to himself so great a Share in that Country, and their Opposers had not mouldred away their Forces as they did afterwards; which makes this Relation harsh and unpleasing.

A sad Fate upon Germany.

But there was a Divine Fate attended not only this Country, but all Germany; for the Almighty Wisdom, that is the Author of all Revolutions in the World, hath his set Times for Changes, which often tends to the imbettering of it: For all the Northern Conquests of the Goths, Huns, Vandals, Scyths, and other Barbarous

An. Reg. 18. An. Christi 1620.

rous Nations, were to corroborate the Southern Bodies, wasted with Ease and Luxury. And now in Germany a Flood of Books, that almost tended to an Inundation, overspread the World, and was her great Disease: Besides the Drunken Dropsy, witness their monstrous swelling Tuns and Vessels. In lieu of Books, War brings in Barbarism, which is the First-born before Plague or Famine. These do not always kill, but rectify. Full Bodies are apt to fall sick, and then they must be drawn very low oftentimes, before they come to perfect Health. These Judgments have fallen heavy upon England; we drink the Dregs of the Cup; one Sin is not to be pointed at, but all; and tho' it hath been bitter to the tast, yet he that knows the Nature of the Ingredients, may make it wholsome unto those that love him.

A sad Story of Mr. Duncomb.

One thing, both pittiful and remarkable, that happen'd in the Palatinate, was almost omitted. There was a Gentleman whose Name was Duncomb, that was a Soldier in the Earl of Oxford's Company. This young Man left a Gentlewoman behind him in England, to whom he had vowed his Heart, and Promise of Marriage; but her Fortune not being fit for his Father's Humour, he threaten'd to disinherit him if he married her: And the better to alienate him from her, he sent him so long a Journey, hoping Time and Absence might wear out those Impressions, that the present Fancy had fix'd upon him; charging him at his Departure never to think of her more, lest with the Thoughts of her he lost him for ever. The young Man being now long absent from her, and having his Heart full with the Remembrance of her, could not contain himself, but let her know, That no Threats or Anger of Parents should ever blot her Memory out of his Thoughts, which was illustrated with many Expressions of Love and Affection. But the careless Man writing at the same time to his Father, superscrib'd his Father's Letter to his Mistress, wherein he renounces her; and his Mistress's Letter to his Father, wherein he admires her. The Father, swoln with Rage and Anger against the Son, sent him a bitter Letter back again, full of Menaces; and whether that, or Shame for the Mistake, that she should see he renounc'd her whom he profess'd to love, did overcome his Reason, is not known; but he killed himself, to the great Grief of all the English there. And by this Example, Parents, that are too rigid to their Children, may see what Murderers they are: For it was not the young Man's Hand, but the old Man's hard Heart, that killed him.

Good Success in Bohemia.

The Prince of Anhalt, General to the King of Bohemia, in the beginning of the War, (like a red Morning, that is the fore-runner of a foul Evening) met Victory smiling in his Face: For hearing that Bucquoy the Imperial General with his Army was drawing near Prague, he interposed to stop his Progress, having not above 12000 Men, a far less Number than the Imperialists. Bucquoy had a Wooden Stratagem, and it thriv'd accordingly: He mounted Trees upon Carriages, like Ordnance, to fright his Enemy; but they, as wise as Birds, would not leave their Prey for a whisp of Straw dress'd like a Man, but charg'd upon the Mouths of such Cannon. Anhalt us'd a more real Stratagem, that took Effect: He brought his Ordnance up behind his Men, invisibly, loaden with Musquet-bullet; and when they should have charged the Enemy, made them wheel off, that those bloody Engines might break their Ranks, which they performed to purpose, and forced them to retire into a Wood, where pursuing their Advantage, they scatter their main Body.

This was a fair Spring-time, (the Battel being fought upon the 10th of March) and might have inhanced the Hopes of a good Autumn: But in November following (when the Princes of the Union and Spinola were hunting one another among the frosty Hills in the Palatinate) the Duke of Bavaria coming with a great Army towards Prague, and joining Bucquoy and Tillie, with all their Forces together, like Cruel Hunters, meant either to catch a Prey, or be a Prey. Anhalt then had not so closed with Count Mansfeldt, as to bring him up to him, (being puffed up with his last Victory) and some of his Soldiers being discontented for want of Pay, it abated the Edge of their Courage; yet he got with his Army betwixt the Imperialists and Prague, and stood upon the Advantage of Ground; but all would not do; a Hand went out that gave a Period to that Royalty: For the Enemy breaking through them, forced his way, and put the Bohemians into such Confusion, that happy was he that could escape with his Life. The Prince of Anhalt, and his Lieutenant-General Hollac, were the first that fled, and brought the News of the Defeat of the King at Prague, who (with his Queen astonished with the Danger) being in a City not very defensible, among a wavering People, and a Conquering Enemy in the Field, took Time by the Fore-top, and in this Hurly-burly the next Morning, being the 9th of November, left Prague, taking with him their most portable Things, having load enough within them: But the Queen, the more Gallant and Royal Spirit, carried it with most Undauntedness; the King suffer'd doubly as he went, being blamed for keeping his Soldiers without Pay, having such a Mass of Money by him, which he was forced to leave behind to his Enemies; and the Imputation stuck upon him: But flying upon the Wings of common Fame, I shall not lure it into this Relation as a known Truth.

The King censured.

But by a sad Accident that some Years after happen'd to this unfortunate King, it was obvious that he left not all behind him; for going to visit the Bankers of Amsterdam, where his Treasure lay brooding, and passing in the Night over Haerlem-Mere, the Winds and Darkness, in a Conspiracy, made a cross Hoigh to run against the King's, and bulged it in the Sea: But before it sunk, the King and others got to the Mastering Vessel, and saved themselves; but the Prince his Son (being of a pregnant, hopeful Puberty) with too severe a Fate, was left to the broken Boat, which they durst not approach again, tho' they heard his Cries, so that he was abandoned to be tormented to Death, which was more grievous than Death it self; for the Waters being shallow, and the Hoigh sinking not far, the next Day they found him frozen to the Mast, embracing it as his last Refuge, his Body half above, half under the Water. This Story, melting with Pity, is here inserted, because the Glory of this King expires.

The loss of his Son.

And since there will be occasion to mention him no more, because his Actions afterwards never mounted up one Story high, take this brief Character of him: He was a comely Personage for Body, of a good Stature, his Complexion of a duskish Melancholy, the Constitution of his Mind rather fitted for those little Besoigns of Accounts and Reckonings, than any Vigorous or Masculine Heat, to solder up the crack'd Title of a Crown: He was a handsome, well built, but slight Edifice, set on an ill Foundation,

The King's Character

A. Reg. 18. An. Chriſt. 1620.

dation, that could not ſtand long. The King of Great Britain (that the Bohemians built upon) was not of ſo firm a Temper, as to ſupport a Fortreſs (weakly made) that muſt endure the rigorous Shock of War; which made it at the firſt or ſecond Aſſault thus totter and fall.

Weſton and Conway return home.

The two Engliſh Ambaſſadors, Weſton and Conway, which our King ſent to mediate for the Bohemians, could make little uſe of their Oratory, being ſcatter'd with the reſt in the Cloud of this Confuſion: But they brought the King and Queen to Limburgh, the firſt Days Journey; and after they were gone towards the Netherlands, the Ambaſſadors procure a ſafe Conduct from the Duke of Bavaria to return to Prague; but there they could find no Words ſo prevalent and penetrable, as the Steel of a Conquering Enemy; and ſo they returned home, re infecta, no wiſer than they went out.

The Princes of the Union ſubmit to Ferdinand.

This Defeat coming to the Ears of the Princes of the Union, quailed their Courage, made them look back into their own Condition; and having not ſo much Faith as to depend upon our King for Aſſiſtance, before the Spring they ſubmitted themſelves to the Emperor, leaving the almoſt-ruin'd Palatinate as a Prey to an inſulting Enemy; the Engliſh only giving Spirits to the Vital Parts of it, conveyed by the Conduct of thoſe Inſtruments, Vere, Herbert and Burrowes; Men fitter to command Armies, than to be confined within the Walls of Towns.

So doth Anhalt.

As ſoon as Anhalt had done the King his Maſter this Diſſervice, he retires; applies himſelf by Mediation to the Emperor, is received with Favour, and admitted to be one of his Generals. No wonder that the War thriv'd no better, when it was only made for Worldly Intereſts! It was not the Badneſs of the Cauſe altogether, but the Men, that ſtruck the deadly Blow. The Proteſtant Rage at Prague was not juſtifiable in the Star-Chamber of Heaven, tho' the Popiſh Inſolence might too much exaſperate. The Counſels muſt be well weighed in all the Courts of Juſtice, when War is put into the Scale? for he that holds it, ſits above, can turn it which way he pleaſes, and picks out Men to manage it, ſuitable to his own Ends. If the Proteſtant Party had been Conquerors, it ſhould not have been by the Means of a General that could fight for it, and preſently after take Arms againſt it. Such Luke-warm Tempers are not of a Heavenly Conſtitution! Therefore in all great Actions, reſpect the Men as well as the Cauſe; for God ſeldom doth any great thing for his People by wicked Inſtruments.

Mansfeldt vexeth the Emperor ſtill.

Mansfeldt only, that was rejected and ſlighted by Anhalt, makes good his Fidelity, by bearing up againſt the Power of the Emperor: Not that he was able to grapple with his whole Force; but being an active ſpritely Man, and having a nimble moving Army of 14 or 15000 Men, he did harraſs the Countries, force Contribution from the Cities; and when any greater Power came againſt him, he got from them into another Country, and harrowed that, to their perpetual Vexation: So that he was as Goads in their Sides, and Thorns in their Eyes. And thus he continued in deſpight of the Emperor and the Duke of Bavaria for almoſt two Years after, till they were conſtrained to purchaſe their Peace of him at a dear Rate; to which Mansfeldt was alſo enforced, not finding Aſſiſtance nor Supplies to ſupport him.

Eſſex ſolicites our King for more Forces.

As ſoon as the Princes in the Palatinate were retir'd to their Quarters, before the great Loſs at Prague came to their Knowledge, the Earl of Eſſex, with a Convoy of Horſe to Swiebruken, paſſed into Lorrain, and through France poſted for England, to ſollicite the King to ſend thoſe Regiments promiſed, and other Supplies, (if poſſible) that the Engliſh there, and the whole Country might not be expoſed to Ruine. But when he came into England, he found the Court Air of another Temper, and not as he left it; for it was much more inclined to the Spaniſh Meridian. And tho' Gondemar, the King of Spain's Ambaſſador, at the departure of one of his Agents into Spain, facetiouſly bad him commend him to the Sun, for he had ſeen none here a long while; yet we had the Spaniſh Influence hot among us, the King himſelf warmed with it; then what will not the Court be?

Obſtructed by Gondemar.

The King and his Miniſters of State had ſeveral Ends, and drive different Deſigns. His was, for the matching of his Son with ſome great Princeſs, aiming at no other Glory, tho' he debaſed himſelf to purchaſe it. For preſently after he received a Denial in France, he ſent to Sir John Digby, his Lieger Ambaſſador in Spain, to treat of a Marriage betwixt the Prince of Wales, and the Infanta Maria, Siſter to that King, which was in 1617. No Blood but Blood Royal can be a propitiatory Offering for his Son; yet the beſt Sacrifice is an humble Spirit. No matter what Religion, what Piety; that is not the Queſtion. When Kings have Earthly Aims, without conſideration of God, God looks to his own Glory, without reſpect of Man. The little Foundation of Hope they built upon at that time, was now raiſed to a formal Building, by the cunning Practices of Gondemar, who aſſured the King, It was his Maſter's real Intention the Prince ſhould marry the Infanta. And he wiſhed the King his Maſter had all the Palatinate in his Power, to preſent it as a Donative to the Prince with his fair Miſtreſs.

The King (that now heard all was loſt in Bohemia, and ſaw little poſſibility of injoying the Palatinate quietly, but by the Treaty of a Marriage) was lulled aſleep with Gondemar's windy Promiſes, which Sir John Digby ſeconded, being lately made Vice-Chamberlain to the King, Baron of Sherborn, and a great Manager of the Affairs at Court. Sir Walter Aſton being ſent Lieger Ambaſſador into Spain, for the general Correſpondence. And the King, anchoring his Hopes upon theſe ſhallow Promiſes, made himſelf unable to prevent a Tempeſt of War that fell on the Palatinate, tying up his own Hands, and ſuffering none to quench the Fire that devoured his Children's Patrimony.

Spaniſh Penſioners.

On the other ſide, the great Courtiers that were our King's Intimates, and had his Ears, either through Eaſineſs willing to pleaſe his Humour, and not daring to oppoſe it; or elſe, being Papiſts and Penſioners to Spain, ſtriving to promote the Catholick Cauſe, out of Love to it, or being ſuppled by that inſinuating Miniſter Gondemar (who had his Maſter's Purſe at command, and purchaſed ſuch as he thought to be moſt uſeful to his Ends) were content to let the King go which way the Stream of his Affection carried him, and ſome of them put Hand to the Oar. Thoſe that were looked on under the name of Spaniſh, were Arundel, Worceſter, Digby, Calvert, Weſton, and ſome others Popiſhly affected; then Buckingham, and all the Train he ſwept along with him (except that Party which his Mother managed) advanced the Spaniſh Match out of Love to their Maſter. The Duke of Lenox, the Marqueſs Hamilton, both Scotchmen, and old Servants, of great Credit with him

A. Reg. 18. An. Christi 1620.

him, and intereft in his Counfels, were not fo active; no more was William Earl of Pembroke, who after Somerfet's fall (by the late Queen's Mediation) was made Lord Chamberlain to the King; a Man that merited the higheft Employment: For thefe finding the King's Genius tending to the Spanifh Match, and he a known Mafter of his own Reafon, did not oppofe him with a contefting Spirit, but gave him fome little hints, that he might know they were not of his Mind. And he being able to fteer his own Courfe, looked after no other Pilot but Gondemar, and thofe that knew the Chanel: Making Buckingham his Inftrument and only Bofom Counfellor in thofe Affairs, which afterwards brought the Hatred of the People with the more Violence upon him: For they look not upon the King in any Mifcarriage with an Eye of Anger (fuch was the Englifh Modefty, if Kings had been fenfible of it) but upon fuch intimate Minifters, as he makes active in thofe things which are contrary to their Affection. And though there were general Murmurs in the Breafts of the People, which found vent enough in Corners, yet the Council-Table and Star-Chamber are fuch Terrifiers, that (as one faid) None durft run Riot, but keep at the Stirrop, at excellent Command, and come in at the leaft Rebuke or Check.

Papifts flourifh.

It was thought the Papifts did much contribute to Gondemar's Liberality; for they began to flourifh in the Kingdom, he having procured many Immunities for them; and they ufed all their Induftry to further the Match; hoping, that if the Prince did not adhere to Rome, yet his Off-fpring might; and at prefent looked for little lefs than a Toleration.

Gondemar's Power.

No ftubborn piece of either Sex ftood in Gondemar's way, but he had an Engine to remove them, or fcrew them up to him. None that complied with him, but found the Effects of his Friendfhip; many Jefuits fared the better for his Interceffion, he releafing Numbers, among the reft one Bauldwin, an Archprieft, accufed to have had a Hand in the Gun-powder Treafon, and had been feven Years in the Tower; a Man of a dangerous and mifchievous Spirit, who was (after his Releafe) made Rector of the Jefuits College at St. Omer's. By his Artifices and Negotiations (having been time enough Ambaffador in England to gain credit with the King) he got Sir Robert Manfel (the Vice-Admiral) to go into the Mediterranean Sea, with a Fleet of Ships to fight againft the Turks at Algier, who were grown too ftrong and formidable for the Spaniard, (moft of the King of Spain's Galleons attending the Indian Trade, as Convoys for his Treafures, which he wanted to fupply his Armies) and he tranfported Ordnance, and other Warlike Provifions, to furnifh the Spanifh Arfenals, even while the Armies of Spain were battering the Englifh in the Palatinate; fo open were the King's Ears to him, fo deaf to others: For Sir Robert Nanton, one of his Secretaries (a Gentleman of known Honefty and Integrity) fhewed but a little diflike to thofe Proceedings; and he was commanded from Court, and Conway was put in his Place. And Gondemar had as free accefs to the King, as any Courtier of them all (Buckingham excepted) and the King took delight to talk with him; for he was full of Conceits, and would fpeak falfe Latine on purpofe in his merry Fits to pleafe the King; telling the King plainly, He fpoke Latine like a Pedant, but I fpeak it like a Gentleman: And he wrought himfelf fo by fubtilty into the King's good Affections, that he did not only work his own Will, but the King's, into a Belief that the Treaties in agitation, were (though flow) Real and Effectual. So eafily may wife Men be drawn to thofe things their Defires with Violence tend to.

Prevails with both Sexes.

And he caft out his Baits not only for Men; but if he found an Atalanta, whofe Tongue went nimbler than her Feet, he would throw out his golden Balls to catch them alfo. And in thefe Times there were fome Ladies, pretending to be Wits (as they called them) or had fair Nieces or Daughters, which drew great Refort to their Houfes; and where Company meet, the Difcourfe is commonly of the Times (for every Man will vent his Paffion) thefe Ladies he fweetned with Prefents, that they might allay fuch as were too foure in their Expreffion, to ftop them in the Courfe, if they ran on too faft, and bring them to a gentler Pace. He lived at Ely-Houfe in Holborn, his paffage to the Court was ordinarily through Drury-Lane (the Covent-Garden being then an inclofed Field) and that Lane and the Strand were the Places where moft of the Gentry lived; and the Ladies as he went, knowing his times, would not be wanting to appear in their Balconies or Windows, to prefent him their Civilities, and he would watch for it; and as he was carried in his Litter, or Bottomlefs Chair (the eafieft Seat for his Fiftula) he would ftrain himfelf as much as an old Man could to the humbleft Pofture of Refpect: One Day paffing by the Lady Jacob's Houfe in Drury-Lane, fhe expofing her felf for a Salutation, he was not wanting to her; but fhe moved nothing but her Mouth, gaping wide open upon him. He wondred at the Ladies Incivility, but thought it might be happily a yawning Fit took her at that time; for Tryal whereof, the next Day he finds her in the fame Place, and her Courtefies were again accofted with no better Expreffions than an Extended Mouth. Whereupon he fent a Gentleman to her, to let her know, That the Ladies of England were more gracious to him, than to encounter his Refpects with fuch Affronts. She anfwer'd, It was true, that he had purchafed fome of their Favours at a dear Rate, And fhe had a Mouth to be ftopt as well as others. Gondemar finding the Caufe of the Emotion of her Mouth, fent her a Prefent as an Antidote, which cured her of that Diftemper.

Vanity of this Age.

Thefe kind of Spirits were let loofe to be fuitable to the Times they lived in, and they wrought ftrange Effects, for this being a Widow, and of no good Fame, with her Subtilties intrapt in her Nets, and married a famous Lawyer, a Man of great Reputation, and a pregnant Wit; and many other young Gentlewomen (whom their Parents Debaucheries drive to Neceffities) made their Beauties their Fortunes, coming to London to put them to Sale; and fome of them had fo good Markets, that they obtained great Penfions during their Lives, and afterwards were married to Men of eminent Parts and Fortunes, accounted Wife, Gallant, and Heroical Spirits. Such filly Fate often intermingles with thofe Parts, though never fo Excellent, when the Senfitive Faculties get predominance over the Reafon! And fuch Men as were affected to Wantonnefs, would vulgarly brag of it; nay, many times to the traducing of a Lady's Fame, and their own (I cannot fay) Innocence: For fome would fay, and vent it, as an Apothegm, I would rather be thought to enjoy fuch a Lady, though I never did it, than really to enjoy her, and no body know it. Such

Pride

A. Reg. 18. An. Christi 1620.

Pride was taken in Sin, and so Brazen-fac'd and Impudent such Crimes were then! And though Men thought them small and trivial, yet they were of such Weight, that they pressed those down that practised them (though great in the World's Eye) to be now in little better esteem than the meanest of the People. But as Tacitus modestly covered the Faults of some that followed Nero in his Folly, and Madness; Ne nominatim tradam majorum eorum tribuendum puto, for the Honour (he saith) of their Ancestors; so though I name the Vices, I shall spare the Persons, out of respect to their Posterity.

Buckingham rules all.

The Earl of Buckingham, as great in Title as in Favour, was now grown a Marquis; and lying all this while in the King's Bosom, every Man paid Tribute to his Smiles. As the King bought off Worcester, to make him Master of the Horse; so he bought off Nottingham, to make him Admiral. What may not he have, that is not only Master of his Horse, and Ships, but his Heart also? His Mother is created a Countess by Pattent, and her second Husband, Sir Thomas Compton, had no other Title but an Unworthy one, which the People (either out of their Anger, or her Misdemeanour) imposed upon him. Her eldest Son, first made Sir John Villers, after, Viscount Purbeck, married to the Daughter and Heir of the Lady Elizabeth Hatton, by Sir Edward Coke; a Lady of transcending Beauty, but accused for Wantonness. Purbeck not well able to look down from these great Heights, got a Giddiness in his Head, which confined him to a dark Room. Her other Son, first made Sir Christopher Villers, was after created Earl of Anglesey, whose Honour, mixt with a Weak Brain, could not buoy him up from sinking into that Distemper that drowns the best Wits. Her Daughter presently after, also shin'd in the same Sphere with her; her Husband being from a private Gentleman made Earl of Denbeigh. Happy is he that can get a Kinswoman, it is the next way to a thriving Office, or some new swelling Title. The King, that never much cared for Women, had his Court swarming with the Marquesses kindred so, that little ones would dance up and down the privy Lodgings like Pharies; and it was no small Sap would maintain all those Suckers.

A Duel betwixt Compton and Bird.

And now we have named Sir Thomas Compton, there will follow a Story of his youthful Actions, which, though done long since, will not be uncomely to croud in here. He had the remark of a slow-spirited Man when he was young, and truly his Wife made him retain it to the last, But such as found him so in those Vigorous Days of Duelling, would trample on his Easiness; and there could not a worse Character be imprinted on any Man, than to be termed a Coward. Among the rest, one Bird, a roaring Captain, was the more bold and insolent against him, because he found him slow, and backward (which is a Baseness of an Over-daring Nature) and his Provocations were so great, that some of Compton's Friends taking notice of it, told him, It were better to die nobly once, than to live infamously ever; and wrought so upon his cold Temper, that the next Affront that this bold Bird put upon him, he was heartned into the Courage to send him a Challenge. Bird, a massy great Fellow, confident of his own Strength (disdaining Compton, being less both in Stature and Courage) told the Second that brought the Challenge, in a Vapouring manner, That he would not stir a Foot to encounter Compton, unless he would meet him in a Saw-pit, where he might be sure Compton could not run away from him: The Second, that look'd upon this as a Rodomontado-Fancy, told him, That if he would appoint the Place, Compton should not fail to meet him. Bird making choice both of the Place and Weapon (which in the vain formality of Fighters was in the Election of the Challenged) he chose a Saw-pit, and a single Sword; where, according to the time appointed, they met. Being both together in the Pit, with Swords drawn, and stript ready for the Encounter: Now, Compton, (said Bird) thou shalt not escape from me; and hovering his Sword over his Head, in a disdainful manner, said, Come, Compton, let's see what you can do now: Compton attending his Business with a watchful Eye, seeing Bird's Sword hovering over him, ran under it, in upon him, and in a moment run him through the Body; so that his Pride fell to the Ground, and there did sprawl out its last Vanity. Which should teach us, that strong Presumption is the greatest Weakness; and it's far from Wisdom in the most arrogant Strength, to slight and disdain the meanest Adversary. There is yet in Bleeding Memory (even in these Times of Just Severity against this Impious Duelling) one of the same Family of the Compton's, in some part guilty of Bird's Crime; for the Provoker to such horrid Encounters seldom escapes, the Divine Justice permitting such violent Madness to tend to its own Destruction. But to return to our Story.

Two Lord Treasurers in one Year.

Sir Henry Mountague, Lord Chief Justice (as the Reports of those Times lively voted) laid down Twenty Thousand Pounds for the Office of Lord Treasurer; and before the Year expir'd, it was conferred upon Sir Lionel Cranfield, who had been a Citizen of London, bred up in the Custom-house, and knowing the secret Contrivances of those Officers, was thought fittest to manage the King's Revenue: For in expensive and wanting Courts, those great Officers are most acceptable, that by their Finenesses and Projects can bring in that, which with Riot and Prodigality goes out. But the great step to his Office, was Cranfield's marrying one of the Marquis's Kindred, which mounted him presently after to be Earl of Middlesex. The Lord Chief Justice for his Money was made a Precedent, as some jested; the King finding him a Man intelligent in all the great Affairs of State, made him Lord President of the Council, Viscount Mandevill, and Earl of Manchester, and, after the Death of Worcester, was Lord Privy Seal.

The Countess of Buckingham rules her Son.

But though the Marquis of Buckingham in appearance acted all these Removes, and Advancements, yet his Mother, the Countess, wrought them in effect, for her Hand was in all Transactions, both in Church and State; and she must needs know the Disposition of all Things, when she had a feeling of every Man's Pulse; ‖ for most Addresses were made to her first; and by her conveyed to her Son (for he looked after his Pleasure more than his Profit) which made Gondemar (who was well skill'd in Court Holy-Water) among other his witty

‖ In one of King James's Original Letters in the above-mention'd Collection to the Duke of Buckingham there is a Passage that plainly confirms this. The King tells him, That the Treasurer had made too low a Bargain with the East-India Company for a Present to his Mother: But that he (the King) had had better luck in taking the Management of it out of the Treasurer's Hands, and had got of them Two thousand Pounds for her.

Pranks

A. Reg. 18. An. Christi 1620.

Buckingham a lover of Ladies.

Franks, write merrily in his Dispatches into Spain, That there was never more hope of England's Conversion to Rome than now; for there are more Prayers and Oblations offered here to the Mother, than to the Son.

For the Marquis himself, as he was a Man of excellent Symmetry, and proportion of Parts, so he affected Beauty, where he found it; but yet he looks upon the whole Race of Women as inferior Things, and uses them as if the Sex were one, best pleased with all: And if his Eye cull'd out a wanton Beauty, he had his Setters that could spread their Nets, and point a Meeting at some Ladies House, where he should come (as by Accident) and find Accesses, while all his Train attended at the Door, as if it were an Honourable Visit. The Earl of Rutland, of a Noble Family, had but one Daughter to be the Mistress of his great Fortune; and he tempts her; carries her to his Lodgings in Whitehall; keeps her there for some time, and then returns her back again to her Father. The stout old Earl sent him this threatning Message, That he had too much of a Gentleman to suffer such an Indignity; and if he did not marry his Daughter to repair her Honour, no Greatness should protect him from his Justice. Buckingham, that perhaps made it his Design to get the Father's good Will this way (being the greatest Match in the Kingdom) had no reason to mislike the Union, therefore he quickly salved up the Wound, before it grew to a Quarrel: And if this Marriage stopt the Current of his Sins, he had the less to answer for. This young Lady was bred a Papist by her Mother; but after her Marriage to the Marquess, she was converted by Doctor White (as was pretended) and grew a Zealous Protestant; but, like a Morning Dew, it quickly vanished: For the old Countess of Buckingham never left working by her sweet Instruments the Jesuits, till she had placed her on the first Foundation. So that the Marquess, betwixt a † Mother and a Wife, began to be indifferent, no Papist, yet no Protestant; but the Arminian Tenets taking Root, were nourished up by him; and those that did not hold the same Opinions, were counted Puritans. These new Indifferences now grew so hot in England, that the Protestant Cause grew very cold in Germany. Which made the Spirits of most Men rise against the Spanish Faction at home, and Spain's incroaching Monarchy abroad.

The King calls a Parliament.

And though the King sped ill the last Parliament of Somerset's Undertaking, and thought to lay them by for ever (as he often expressed) looking upon them as Incroachers into his Prerogative, and Diminishers of his Majesty and Glory, making Kings less, and Subjects more than they are: Yet now finding the Peoples desires high-mounted for regaining the Palatinate, he thought they would look only up towards that, and liberally open their Purses, which he might make use of; and this Unanimity and good Agreement, betwixt him and his People, would induce his Brother of Spain to be more Active in the Treaty in Hand; and so he should have Supply from the One, and Dispatch from the Other. But Parliaments that are like Physicians to the Bodies of Commonwealths, when the Humours are once stirred, they find Cause enough many times to administer sharp Medicines, where there was little appearance of Diseases. For in this Recess and Ease, Time-servers and Flatterers had cried up the Prerogative: And the King, wanting Money for his vast Expences, had furnished himself by unusual Courses. For Kings excessive in Gifts, will find Followers excessive in Demands; and they that weaken themselves in giving, lose more in gathering, than they gain in the Gift: For Prodigality in a Sovereign, ends in the Rapine and Spoil of the Subject. To help himself therefore, and those that dreined from him, he had granted several Patents to Undertakers and Monopolizers, whereby they preyed upon the People by Suits and Exactions, milk'd the Kingdom, and kept it poor; the King taking his Ease, and giving way to Informers; the Gentry grown Debauched, and Fashion-mongers; and the Commons, sopt and besotted with Quiet and Restiness, drunk in so much Disability, that it might well be said by Gondemar, England had a great many People, but few Men: And he would smile at their Musters; for through disuse they were grown careless of Military Discipline; ill provided of Arms; Effeminate; Officers neglecting their Charges and Duties, conniving for Gain at their Neighbours Miscarriages. Some of the Officers in the Militia, and Justices of the Peace, not a few, being Church-Papists, floating upon the smooth Stream of the Times, overwhelming all others that opposed them, Stigmatizing them with the Name of Puritans; and that was Mark enough to hinder the Current of any Proceeding or Preferment aimed at, or hoped for either in Church or State.

Sir Robert Cotton, Hen. 3.

Jesuits swarm.

And the Jesuits rangeing up and down (like Spirits let loose) did not now, as formerly, creep into Corners, using close and cunning Artifices; but practised them openly, having admission to our Counsellors of State; for when Secretaries, and such as manage the intimate Counsels of Kings, are Jesuitical and Clients to the Pope, there can be no tendency of Affection to a contrary Religion or Policy. Those were only most active in the Court of England, that courted the King of Spain most, and could carry the Face of a Protestant, and the Heart of a Papist; the rest were contented to go along with the Cry: For they hunted but a cold Scent, and could pick out, and make nothing of it, that drew off, or cross'd, or hunted Counter. Which raised the Spirits of the People so high against them that were the Chief Hunters in these Times, that they brought the King himself within the Compass of their Libels and Pasquils, charging him to love his Hounds better than his People. And if this bad Blood had been heated to an itch of Innovation, it would have broke out to a very sore and incurable Malady: every Man seeing the Danger, few Men daring to prevent it. The Pulpits were the most bold Opposers; but if they touch'd any thing upon the Spanish Policy, or the intended Treaties (for the Restitution of the Palatinate was included in the Marriage before it was the Spaniards to give) their Mouths must be stopt by Gondemar, without the Lady Jacob's Receipt, and (it may be) confined, or imprison'd for it: So that there was no plain downright Blows to be given, but if they cunningly, and subtily, could glance at the Misdemeanors of the Times, and smooth it over Metaphorically, it would pass current, though before the King himself.

† I do not find the Dutchess of Buckingham own'd her self a Roman Catholick while her first Husband liv'd: But marrying afterwards the Marquis of Antrim in Ireland, she ever after publickly profess'd that Religion.

A. Reg. 18. An. Christ. 1620.

For about this time, one of his own Chaplains preached before him at Greenwich, took this Text, Mat. 4. 8. And the Devil took Jesus to the top of a Mountain, and shewed him all the Kingdoms of the World, saying, All these will I give, &c. He shewed what Power the Devil had in the World at that time, when he spake these Words; and from thence he came down to the Power of the Devil now. And dividing the World into Four Parts, he could not make the least of the Four to be Christian; and of those, how few went God's way? So that he concluded the Devil to be a great Monarch, having so many Kingdoms under his Command; and no doubt he had his Vice-Roys, Council of State, Treasurers, Secretaries, and many other Officers, to Manage and Order his Affairs; for there was Order in Hell it self; which after he had mustered together, he gives a Character of every particular Officer, who were fit to be the Devil's Servants; running through the Body of the Court; discovering the Correspondencies with Jesuits; secret Pensions from Foreign Princes; betraying their Masters Counsels to deserve their Rewards, working and combining to the Prejudice of God's People. And when he came to describe the Devil's Treasurers Exactions and Gripings, to get Money, he fixed his Eye upon Cranfield, then Lord Treasurer (whose Marriage into the House of Fortune, and Title of Earl, could not keep him from being Odious to the People) and pointing at him with his Hand, said with an Emphasis, That Man (reiterating it) That Man, that makes himself rich, and his Master poor, he is a fit Treasurer for the Devil. This the Author heard, and saw, whilst Cranfield sat with his Hat pulled down over his Eyes, ashamed to look up, lest he should find all Mens Eyes fixed upon him; the King, who sat just over him, smiling at the quaint Satyr so handsomly coloured over. It seems Neile, the Bishop of Lincoln, was not by him then; for when any Man preached that had the Renown of Piety (unwilling the King should hear him) he would in the Sermon time entertain the King with a merry Tale (that I may give it no worse Title) which the King would after laugh at, and tell those near him, he could not hear the Preacher for the old B. Bishop, We must confess this Relation smells too rank, but it was too true, and hope the Modest Reader will excuse it (we having had divers Hammerings and Conflicts within us to leave it out) seeing it proceeds not from any rancour of Spirit against the Prelacy, but to Vindicate God's Justice to Posterity, (who never punishes without a Cause) and such-like Practices as these were doubtless put upon the Score, which afterwards gave a Period to that Hierarchy. This Man's Hand helped to close up the Countess of Essex's Virginity, when he was Coventry and Litchfield; His Heart had this kind of Vanity when he was Lincoln; and when he was Archbishop of York, his Head was so fill'd with Arminian Impiety, that in the next King's Reign he was looked upon by the Parliament to be one of the great Grievances of the Kingdom; as will follow in the Tract of this Story.

A Satyrical Sermon.

Jesuitrices.

But England was not only Mann'd with Jesuits (all Power failing to oppose them) but the Women also began to practise the Trade, calling themselves Jesuitrices. This Order was first set a-foot in Flanders, by Mistress Ward, and Mistress Twittie, Two English Gentlewomen, who cloath'd themselves in Ignatian Habit, and were Countenanced and Supported by Father Gerard, Rector of the English College at Liege, with Father Flack and Father More. But Father Singleton, Father Benefield, and others, opposed them, and would not bless them with an Ite, prædicate; for their Design was to preach the Gospel to their Sex in England. And in short time this Mrs. Ward (by the Pope's Indulgence) became the Mother-General of no less than Two hundred English Damsels of good Birth and Quality, whom she sent abroad to Preach; and they were to give account to her of their Apostolick Labours. This Spawn out of the Mouth of the Beast, and many other fine Jesuitical Exploits, are more particularly related by Wadsworth in his Spanish Pilgrim (who was Son to that Wadsworth, that went over Chaplain into Spain with our King's first Leidger Ambassador Sir Charles Cornwallis, and there perverted by the Jesuits) which young Man being bred up at St. Omer's, in the Nursery of Jesuitism, discover'd all their Machinations. Such a brood of Vipers being then nourished in the Bowels of this Kingdom.

The Parliament meet the 20th Jan.

The King, that either thought these Instruments were not so active, or that they would not be discovered, was resolved upon a Parliament, for the former Reasons, which began the Twentieth of January this Year, yet not being ignorant of some Miscarriages that passed by his Allowance, he strives to palliate them; and gives the Parliament some little Touches of them by the way, that when they should find them, they might (by his Anticipation) appear the less. And being loth to have the Breach between Him and his People made wider, he thus strives to stop the Gap.

The King's Speech to the Parliament.

'MY Lords, Spiritual and Temporal, and you the Commons, Cui multiloquio deest peccatum? In the last Parliament I made long Discourses; especially to them of the Lower House, I did open the true Thought of my Heart. But I may say with our Saviour, I have piped to you, and you have not danced; I have mourned, and you have not lamented. Yet as no Man's Actions can be Free, so in me, God found some Spices of Vanity, and so all my Sayings turned to me again, without any Success. And now to tell the Reasons of your Calling, and this Meeting, apply it to your selves, and spend not the Time in long Speeches. Consider, That the Parliament is a Thing composed of a Head and a Body; the Monarch, and the Two Estates. It was first a Monarchy, then after a Parliament; there are no Parliaments but in Monarchical Governments; for in Venice, the Netherlands, and other Free Governments, there are none. The Head is to call the Body together; and for the Clergy, the Bishops are Chief; for Shires, their Knights; and for Towns and Cities, their Burgesses and Citizens. These are to treat of difficult Matters, and counsel their King with their best Advice, to make Laws for the Commonweal; and the Lower-House is also to Petition the King, and acquaint him with their Grievances, and not to meddle with their King's Prerogative. They are to offer Supply for his Necessity; and he to distribute, in recompence thereof, Justice and Mercy. As in all Parliaments, it is the King's Office to make good Laws (whose Fundamental Cause is the Peoples ill Manners) so at this time. That we may meet with the new Abuses, and the incroaching Craft of the Times, Particulars shall be read hereafter.

'As touching Religion. Laws enough are made already; it stands in Two Points, Per-

A.Reg. 18. An. Christi 1620.

'swasion and Compulsion. Men may Perswade, 'but GOD must give the Blessing. Jesuits, 'Priests, Puritans and Sectaries, erring both on 'the Right-hand and Left-hand, are forward to 'perswade unto their own Ends; and so ought 'you the Bishops, in your Example and Preach-'ing; but Compulsion to obey, is to bind the 'Conscience.

'There is a talk of the Match with Spain: 'But if it should not prove a furtherance to 'Religion, I am not worthy to be your King. 'I will never proceed, but to the Glory of God, 'and Content of my Subjects.

'For a Supply to my Necessities. I have 'reigned Eighteen Years, in which time you 'have had Peace; and I have received far less 'Supply than hath been given to any King since 'the Conquest. The last Queen, of Famous Memo-'ry, had one Year with another above a Hun-'dred thousand Pounds per Annum in Subsidies: 'And in all my time I had but Four Subsidies, 'and Six Fifteens. It is Ten Years since I had 'a Subsidy, in all which time I have been spa-'ring to trouble you. I have turned my self 'as nearly to save Expences as I may. I have 'abated much in my Houshold-Expences, in 'my Navies, in the Charge of my Munition: 'I made not choice of an old beaten Soldier for 'my Admiral, but rather chose a young Man, 'whose Honesty and Integrity I knew; whose 'Care hath been to appoint under him sufficient 'Men to lessen my Charges, which he hath done.

'Touching the Miserable Dissentions in Chri-stendom. I was not the Cause thereof; for 'the appeasing whereof, I sent my Lord of 'Doncaster, whose Journey cost me Three thou-'sand Five hundred Pounds. My Son-in-Law 'sent to me for Advice, but within Three Days 'after accepted of the Crown; which I did 'never approve of for Three Reasons.

'First, For Religion sake, as not holding 'with the Jesuits disposing of Kingdoms, rather 'learning of our Saviour to uphold, not to 'overthrow them.

'Secondly, I was no Judge between them, 'neither acquainted with the Laws of Bohemia, 'Quis me judicem fecit?

'Thirdly, I have treated a Peace, and there-'fore will not be a Party. Yet I left not to 'preserve my Childrens Patrimony; for I had 'a Contribution of my Lords and Subjects, 'which amounted to a great Sum. I borrowed 'of my Brother of Denmark Seven thousand 'five hundred Pounds to help him, and sent as 'much to him as made it up Ten thousand: 'And Thirty thousand I sent to the Princes 'of the Union to hearten them. I have lost 'no time; had the Princes of the Union done 'their Part, that handful of Men I sent had 'done theirs. I intend to send by way of per-'swasion, which, in this Age, will little avail, 'unless a strong Hand assist. Wherefore I pur-'pose to provide an Army the next Summer, 'and desire you to consider of my Necessities, as 'you have done to my Predecessors. Qui cito 'dat, bis dat. I will engage my Crown, my 'Blood, and my Soul in that Recovery.

'You may be informed of me in things in 'course of Justice; but I never sent to any of 'my Judges to give Sentence contrary to the 'Law. Consider the Trade, for the making 'thereof better; and shew me the Reason why 'my Mint, for these Eight or Nine Years, hath 'not gone. I confess, I have been Liberal in 'my Grants; but if I be informed, I will a-'mend all hurtful Grievances: But who shall 'hasten after Grievances, and desire to make 'himself Popular, he hath the Spirit of Satan. 'If I may know my Errors, I will reform them. 'I was in my first Parliament a Novice; and 'in my last, there was a kind of Beasts, called 'Undertakers, a Dozen of whom undertook to 'govern the last Parliament, and they led Me. 'I shall thank you for your good Office, and 'desire that the World may say well of our 'Agreement.

Physicians have an Aphorism, Si caput infirmum, cætera membrum dolent. This Head is not a weak one, but subtil enough for the Body. The Parliament knew well whom they had to deal with, and managed their Business in the Beginning, that they were the readier to grapple with him in the End. They would not stir a Stone of that Foundation his Prerogative rested on; but those Men that had wrought themselves in, to supplant and undermine the Common Liberties, they fell sore upon them.

The Parliament comply with the King.

Doncaster's Ambassy expensive.

The King was modest, and almost asham'd to tell the Parliament, how much Money the Viscount Doncaster's Journey cost; therefore he minces it into a small proportion. But this we know, when he landed at Rotterdam, the First Night and Morning, before he went to the Hague, his Expences at those two Meals in the Inn where he lay, came to above a Thousand Gilders, which is a Hundred Pounds Sterling. And the Inn-keeper at the Peacock at Dort (hoping he would make that his way into Germany) made great Provisions for him, upon no other Order, but a bare Fancy; and the Ambassador taking his way by Utrecht, the Inn-keeper of Dort followed him; complaining, That he was much prejudiced by his baulking that Town: For hearing of a great Ambassador's coming, and what he had expended at Rotterdam, I made, (saith he) Preparations suitable, and now they will lye on my Hands: Which coming to Doncaster's Ear, he commanded his Steward to give him Thirty Pounds Sterling, and never tasted of his Cup. And we have been assured by some of his Train, that his very Carriages could not cost so little as Threescore Pounds a Day; for he had with him a great many Noblemens Sons, and other Personages of Quality, that the Germans might admire the Glory of the English, as well as the French did in his last Ambassage. And he was out so long following the Emperor, in his Progresses from City to Camp, and from Camp to City, a poor humble Sollicitor, if not Petitioner, that his Expence could not amount to less than Fifty or Threescore thousand Pounds.

He is feasted by the Prince of Orange.

When he was at the Hague, had made his Visits, and filled the Town with the Admiration of his Bravery and Feasts: Some intimates to Maurice Prince of Orange, advised him to Feast the great English Ambassador. Yes, yes, (saith the Prince) bid him come. When the Prince's Steward had notice of the Invitation (from other Hands, for the Prince gave no Order in it) he comes to the Prince and tells him, There will be great Preparations expected, for the Ambassador's ordinary Meals were Feasts; and he had a numerous and splendid Train of Nobles and Gentry that did accompany him. Well, (said the Prince) fit me a Dinner such as I used to have, and let me see the Bill of Fare. When the Steward brought the Bill, the Prince liked it well; but the Steward said, Sir, This is but your Ordinary Diet; now you should have something Extraordinary, because this is an Extraordinary Ambassador. The Prince think-ing some Reason in the Steward's Arguments,

and

A. Reg. 19. An. Christi 1621.

and finding but one Pig nominated in the bill, commanded him to put down another Pig, and that was all the Additions he would make. Which Dish, as it is not very pleasing and acceptable to the Scots Nation for the most part, so we know not whether it were by Accident, or on Purpose, to displease him. But this is well known, there could be nothing more contemptible to the Morose and Severe Temper of the Prince's Spirit, than this Comportment of Doncaster's, which most Men interpreted Pride and Prodigality. But truly (let those Vanities of Grandure aside for the Honour, though not Profit of his Master) he was a Gentleman every way compleat. His Bounty was adorned with Courtesy, his Courtesy not affected, but resulting from a natural Civility in him. His Humbleness set him below the Envy of most, and his Bounty brought him into Esteem with many. A true Courtier for complying, and one that had Language enough to be Real as well as Formal; for he could Personate both to the height of Expression. So that he was very fit for his Employment, though it were purchased at a dear rate.

His short Character

But to leave this Digression. Some small time after the Parliament began, the King, according to his Intentions and Expressions in his Speech to them, dispatched away the Lord Digby Ambassador to the Emperor, where he was to press for a punctual Answer, whether the Palatinate might be recover'd by Peace, or War.

Digby goes into Germany.

And now expecting his return, and the Emperor's Answer, the Parliament go on with their Work, receiving divers Petitions from several Persons imprison'd and ruined, by the violent Extortions of such Ministers and Informers as were active to promote the illegal Exactions, that the King's Necessities and ill-advised Councils drive him to. For he was grown very low, not having had the Assistance of his People in Ten Years, as he himself Notes) so that he was forced to lessen his Houshold, and bring his Expences down, not being willing to call a Parliament to supply him. Like Henry the Third of England, whose Life and Reign, Sir Robert Cotton (that able Understander and Lover of Antiquities) wrote about this time, wherein he presents that King so fearful of calling Parliaments, that he would rather pawn his Crown-Jewels, give over his House, & cum Abbatibus, & Prioribus prandere, Dine and Eat with the Monks, rather than be beholden to his People. And some thought this Piece of Sir Robert Cotton's a Parallel for these Times. But our King was not so much necessitated, though his Wants were the Greater, because they confined the Greatness of his Mind.

The King's Wants.

The main Things which the Parliament insisted on (though many others came by the by) were the Three great Patents; for Inns, Ale-houses, and Gold and Silver Thread. Upon every Inn, and Ale-house, there was a great Fine and Annual Revenue set throughout the Kingdom; and that they would not pay so much as the Patentees assessed them at, their Goods and Persons were seized on, till they gave them Satisfaction according to their Voraginous Humours. And they found out a new Alchimistical way to make Gold and Silver Lace with Copper, and other Sophisticate Materials, to cozen and deceive the People; and no Man must make, or vent any but such Factors as they imployed; so that they engrossed all the whole Trade of that Ages Vanity (which was enough) and gave them counterfeit Ware for their Money. And if any Man were found to make any other Lace than what was allowed by them, they were made to know (to their dear Experience) the Power of these Engrossers. And so poisonous were the Drugs that made up this deceitful Composition, that they rotted the Hands and Arms, and brought Lameness upon those that wrought it; some losing their Eyes, and many their Lives, by the Venom of the Vapours that came from it.

The Peoples Grievances.

The chief Actors in this Pestilent Business, were Sir Giles Mompesson, and Sir Francis Michell. These two moved all the Under-wheels. Mompesson had Fortune enough in the Country to make him happy, if that Sphere could have contained him; but the Vulgar and Universal Error of Satiety, with present Enjoyments, made him too big for a Rustical Condition; and when he came at Court, he was too little for that: So that some Novelty must be taken up, to set him (if he knew his own Mind) in Competition to the Place he was in; no matter what it was, let it be never so Pestilent and Misclevous to others, he cared not, so he found Benefit by it. To him Michel is made Compartner, a poor sneaking Justice, that lived among the Brothels near Clerkenwell, whose Clerk and he pick'd a Livelihood out of those Corners, giving Warrants for what they did; besides Anniversary Stipends (the frequent Revenue of some Justices of those Times) for Connivancy. I know how necessary and how splendent it is for Men of Publick Minds to flourish in the Execution of Justice, for weeding out, and extirpating Vitious Habits, radicated in every Corner; but this Thing was a poisonous Plant in its own Nature, and the fitter to be an Ingredient to such a Composition: Therefore he is brought to Court, Knighted, and corroborated by these Letters-Patents, whereby he took liberty to be more Ravenous upon poor People, to the grating of the Bones, and sucking out the very Marrow of their Substance.

Mompesson and Michel Actors in them.

These Oppressions were throughly ripped up, and laid open by the House of Commons. But, together with these Proceedings, they took Notice of the King's Wants, and thought fit something to sweeten his Temper, that they might not take from him the little Profit he had by those Patents, but they would make it up some other way; therefore they gave him two entire Subsidies, which were very acceptable to him: For those Contributions that flow from the Peoples Love, come freely like a Spring-Tide; but illegal Taxes racked from their Bowels (coming through so many Promoters and Catchpoles hands) run very low, and the King hath the least Share.

The Parliament's goodness.

The King hearing these Patents were anatomized in the House of Commons, and willing to comply with his People, whom he found so bountiful unto him; he comes to the House of Lords to close gently with them, and excuse the Granting of those Patents, shewing some Reasons why he did them, and the Instructions he gave for the Execution of them, by which he hoped to take off that sharp Reflection that might light upon him. But the Modesty of Parliaments seldom impute any of these Miscarriages to the Prince, but the Actors under him must bear the Burthen of it: And the time drawing near that the Lords assigned for judging the Malefactors, the King comes again to the House upon the Twenty Sixth of March; and thus passed his Sentence upon the Patents, before the Lords should pass theirs upon the Executioners of them.

A. Reg. 19. An. Christi, 1621.

The King's Speech to the Lords

My Lords,

'THE last time I came hither, my Errand was to inform you (as well as my Memory could serve me of things so long passed) of the Verity of my Proceedings, and the Caution used by me in passing those Letters Patents, which are now in question before you, to the effect that they might not be abused in the Execution: And this I did by way of Declaration. But now I am come (understanding the time of your Censure at hand) to express my readiness to put in Execution (which is the Life of the Law) those things which ye are to Sentence, (for even the Law it self, is a dead Letter without Execution) for which Office God hath appointed me in these Kingdoms. And tho' I assure my self, That my former Behaviour, in all the Course of my Life, hath made me well known for a just King; yet in this special Case, I thought fit to express my own Intentions, out of my own Mouth, for Punishment of Things complain'd of: The first Proof whereof I have given, by the diligent Search I caused to be made after the Person of Sir Giles Mompesson, who tho' he were fled, yet my Proclamation pursu'd him instantly: And as I was earnest in that, so will I be to see your Sentence against him put in Execution.

'Two Reasons move me to be earnest in the Execution of what ye are to Sentence at this time.

'First, that Duty I owe to God, who hath made me a King, and tied me to the Care of Government, by that Politick Marriage betwixt me and my People: For I do assure you in the Heart of an honest Man, and by the Faith of a Christian King, (which both ye and all the world know me to be) had these Things been complained of to me before the Parliament, I would have done the Office of a just King, and out of Parliament have punished them as severely, and peradventure more than ye now intend to do. But now that they are discovered to me in Parliament, I shall be as ready in this way, as I should have been in the other: For I confess, I am asham'd (these Things proving so as they are generally reported to be) that it was not by good Fortune to be the only Author of the Reformation and Punishment of them, by some ordinary Courts of Justice. Nevertheless, since these Things are now discovered by Parliament, which before I knew not of, nor could so well have discovered otherwise, in regard of that Representative Body of the Kingdom, which comes from all Parts of the Country, I will be never a whit the slower to do my Part for the Execution. For (as many of you that are here have heard me often say, and so I will still say) so precious unto me is the publick Good, that no private Person whatsoever (were he never so dear unto me) shall be respected by me by many Degrees as the Publick Good, not only of the whole Commonwealth, but even of a particular Corporation, that is a Member of it. And I hope that ye, my Lords, will do me that Right, to publish to my People this my Heart and Purpose.

'The Second Reason is, That I intend not to derogate or infringe any of the Liberties or Privileges of this House, but rather to fortify and strengthen them: For never any King hath done so much for the Nobility of England as I have done, and will ever be ready to do. And whatsoever I shall say, and deliver unto you as my Thought, yet when I have said what I think, I will afterwards freely leave the Judgment wholly to your House. I know you will do nothing but what the like hath been done before; and I pray you be not jealous that I will abridge you of any thing that hath been used: For whatsoever the Precedents (in Times of good Government) can warrant, I will allow: For I acknowledge this to be the Supreme Court of Justice, wherein I am ever present by Representation. And in this ye may be the better satisfied by my own Presence, coming divers times among you: Neither can I give you any greater Assurance, or better Pledge of this my Purpose, than that I have done you the Honour to set my only Son among you, and hope that ye with him shall have the Means to make this the happiest Parliament that ever was in England.

'This I profess, and take Comfort in, That the House of Commons, at this time, have shewed greater Love, and used me with more Respect, in all their Proceedings, than ever any House of Commons have heretofore done to me, or I think to any of my Predecessors. As for this House of yours, I have always found it Respective to me, and accordingly do I, and ever did, favour you, as you well deserved. And I hope it will be accounted a Happiness for you, that my Son doth now sit among you; who, when it shall please God to set him in my Place, will then remember that he was once a Member of your House, and so be bound to maintain all your Lawful Privileges, and like the better of you all the Days of his Life. But because the World at this time talks so much of Bribes, I have just Cause to fear the whole Body of this House hath bribed him to be a good Instrument for you upon all Occasions: He doth so good Offices in all his Reports to me, both for the House in general, and every one of you in particular. And the like I may say of one that sits there, Buckingham: He hath been so ready upon all Occasions to do good Offices, both for the House in general, and every Member in particular. One Proof thereof, I hope, my Lord of Arundel hath already witnessed unto you, in his Report made unto you of my Answer touching the Privileges of the Nobility, how earnestly he spake unto me of that Matter.

'Now, my Lords, the time draws near of your Recess; whether Formality will leave you Time for proceeding now to Sentence against all, or any of the Persons now in question, I know not. But for my part, since both Houses have dealt so lovingly and freely with me, in giving me, as a Free Gift, two Subsidies, in a more loving manner than hath been given to any King before, and so accepted by me: And since I cannot yet retribute by a General Pardon, which hath by Form usually been reserved to the end of a Parliament; the least I can do (which I can forbear no longer) is to do something in present, for the Ease and Good of my People. Three Patents at this time have been complained of, and thought great Grievances.

'1. That of the Inns and Hosteries.

'2. That of Ale-houses.

'3. That of Gold and Silver Thread.

'My Purpose is to strike them all dead; and that Time may not be lost, I will have it done presently. That concerning Ale-houses, I would have to be left to the managing of Justices of the Peace, as before. That of Gold and Silver Thread was most vilely executed, both for Wrong done to Mens Persons, as also for Abuse in the Stuff; for it was a kind of false

A. Reg. 19. An. Christi 1621.

'false Coin. I have already freed the Persons that were in Prison, I will now also damn the Patent; and this may seem instead of a Pardon. All these three I will have recalled by Proclamation, and wish you to advise of the fittest Form to that purpose.

'I hear also, there is another Bill among you against Informers, I desire you my Lords, that as you tender my Honour, and the Good of my People, ye will put that Bill to an end as soon as you can, and at your next Meeting to make it one of your first Works: For I have already shew'd my Dislike of that kind of People openly in the Star-Chamber, and it will be the greatest Ease to me, and all those that are near about me at Court, that may be: For I remember, that since the beginning of this Parliament, Buckingham hath told me, he never found such Quiet and Rest, as in this time of Parliament, from Projectors and Informers, who at other times miserably vexed him at all Hours.

'And now I confess, That when I looked before upon the Face of the Government, I thought (as every Man would have done) that the People were never so happy as in my time. For even as at divers times, I have looked upon many of my Coppices, riding about them, and they appeared on the outside very thick, and well-grown unto me; but when I turned into the midst of them, I found them all bitten within, and full of Plains and bare Spots, like an Apple or Pear, fair and smooth without, but when ye cleave it asunder, you find it rotten at the Heart: Even so this Kingdom, the external Government being as good as ever it was, and I am sure, as learned Judges as ever it had, and I hope as honest, administring Justice within it; and for Peace, both at home and abroad, I may truly say, more settled, and longer lasting, than ever any before, together with as great Plenty as ever; so as it was to be thought, that every Man might sit in Safety under his own Vine and Fig-tree: Yet I am asham'd (and it makes my Hair stand upright) to consider, how in this time my People have been vexed, and polled, by the vile Execution of Projects, Patents, Bills of Conformity, and such like, which, besides the Trouble of my People, have more exhausted their Purses, than Subsidies would have done.

'Now, my Lords, before I go hence, since God hath made me the great Judge of this Land under him, and that I must answer for the Justice of the same, I will therefore, according to my Place, remember you of some Things, tho' I would not teach you, for no Man's Knowledge can be so good, but their Memories will be the better to be refresh'd. And now, because you are coming to give Judgment, (all which moves from the King that you may the better proceed) take into your Care two Things.

'1. To do it Bonum.

'2. To do it Bene.

'I call Bonum, when all is well prov'd, whereupon ye judge, for then ye build upon a sure Foundation. And by Bene, I understand, that ye proceed with all Formality and Legality, wherein you have fit occasion to advise with the Judges, who are to assist you with their Opinions in Cases of that Nature; and woe be to them if they advise you not well. So the Ground being good, and the Form orderly, it will prove a Course fitting this High Court of Parliament.

'In Sentence, ye are to observe Two Parts: First, To recollect that which is worthy of Judging and Censuring: And secondly, To proceed against these, as against such like Crimes properly. We doubt there will be many Matters before you, some complained of out of Passion, and some out of just Cause of Grievance: Weigh both, but be not carried away with the Impertinent Discourses of them, that name as well innocent Men as guilty. Proceed judicially, and spare none, where ye find just Cause to punish: But let your Proceedings be according to Law, and remember that Laws have not their Eyes in their Necks, but in their Foreheads. For the Moral Reason for the Punishment of Vices in all Kingdoms and Commonwealths, is, because of the Breach of Laws standing in force; for none can be punished for Breach of Laws by Predestination, before they be made.

'There is yet one Particular that I am to remember you of; I hear that Sir Henry Yelverton (who is now in the Tower upon a Sentence given in the Star-Chamber against him for deceiving my Trust) is touched concerning a Warrant Dormant, which he made while he was my Attorney: I protest I never heard of this Warrant Dormant before, and I hold it as odious a Matter, as any is before you. And if for Respect to me ye have forborn to meddle with him, in Examination, because he is my Prisoner, I do here freely remit him unto you, and put him into your Hands.

'And this is all I have to say unto you at this time, wishing you to proceed justly and nobly, according to the Orders of your House: And I pray God to bless you, and you may assure your selves of my Assistance; wishing, that what I have said this Day among you, may be entred into the Records of this House.

Thus the King strove to mitigate the Asperity and Sharpness of the Humours contracted in the Body of the Kingdom, that they might not break out to disgrace the Physician: For he looked upon himself as an able Director, and yet he found he might be deceived: And therefore he brings the Lords into a Wood, comparatively to tell them, That they appeared to him well grown, and fair, but searching into them, he found them otherwise. But he that pretended to the Knowledge of all things, (as, give him his due, he was well known in most) could not be ignorant that the Patents he granted were against the Liberties of the People; but whether the Execution of them, to that Extremity came within his Cognizance, cannot be determined: His damning of them shews his Dislike at present, condemning that which he knew would be done to his hand, if he had not done it; and this must not be known only at Westminster, and left upon Record to Posterity there, but he commanded his Speech to be Printed, that all his People might know how willing and forward he was to abolish any Act of his that tended to a Grievance. And tho' he did not accuse the Marquess of Buckingham for giving way to Informers, yet he was much troubled with them till the Parliament began; and in that numerous Crowd, those that brought Profit were doubtless admitted with the first. These Considerations upon the King's Speech buzzed up and down, and many of the Parliament-Men looked upon the Marquess as the first Mover of this great Machine; but the Wisdom of the House did not rise so high as to strike at the uppermost Branches, but they pruned those roundly they could reach. Buckingham, tho' he

The King's Speech descanted on.

Buckingham Master of the Work.

A. Reg. 19. An. Christi 1621.

A. Reg. 19. An. Christi 1621.

he were well grown, had not yet Sap enough to make himself swell into Exuberancy, as he did afterwards; nor was the Peoples Malice now against him so fertile, as to make every little Weed a dangerous and poysonous Plant, being subtile enough (yet) to crop off any, that might appear venumous in relation to himself, that the mischievous Operations might work upon others: For all the World knew Mompesson was his Creature; and that notwithstanding the King's Proclamation for his Interception, he got out of the Kingdom by his Key: For Buckingham ruled as a Lord Paramount, and those that complied with him, found as much Refuge as his Power could secure unto them; those that oppos'd him, as much Mischief as Malice could pour upon them. Sir Henry Yelverton, the King's Attorney, had found the Effects of his Anger, by not closing with his Desires in such Patents as he required: So that all his Actions being anatomiz'd, some Miscarriages are made Criminal, he is committed to the Tower, and another put in his Place that should be more observant. The King now lays upon him a Warrant Dormant, which did not much startle him; for he was not long after released, and made a Judge, carrying with him this Character of Honesty, That he was willing to lay down his Preferment at the King's Feet, and be trod upon by the growing Power of Buckingham, rather than prosecute his Patron Somerset, that had advanced him, as his Predecessor Bacon had spitefully done his. But whether that Dialogue betwixt Buckingham and Yelverton in the Tower, mentioned in our King's Court, have any thing of Truth, cannot be asserted here, Buckingham being not arrived yet to the Meridian Height of his Greatness, tho' the King had afterwards Cause enough to be jealous of his Actions.

Michell censured.

But now comes the old Justice, Sir Francis Michell, to his Censure, and the Crime he had committed arguing a base Spirit, he is fitted with as suitable a Punishment. First, he is degraded, with all the Ceremonies of Debasement; but that being most proper to his Nature, he was but eas'd of a Burthen, his Mind suffer'd not: But then his keckish Carcass was made to ride Renvers, with his Face to the Horse-tail, (with a Paper on his Breast and Back, that pointed at the Foulness of the Cause) through the whole City, suffering under the Scorn and Contempt of Boys, and Rabble of the People, besides the squeezing of him by Fine and Confinement to Prison, that he might never be more capable of Mischief. The same Sentence had Sir Giles Mompesson, but he was so provident as not to be found to pay it in his Person, tho' he paid it in his Purse. Some others also, their Instruments, tho' not so sharply dealt with, had great Mulcts laid upon them, according to their Demerit; and so this Gangrene was healed up.

The Lord Chancellor Bacon questioned.

Not long after, comes the great Lord Chancellor Bacon to a Censure, for the most simple and ridiculous Follies that ever entred into the Heart of a wise Man. He was the true Emblem of Humane Frailty, being more than a Man in some Things, and less than a Woman in others. His Crime was Bribery and Extortion, (which the King hinted at in his Speech, when he facetiously said, He thought the Lords had bribed the Prince to speak well of them) and these he had often condemned others for as a Judge, which now he comes to suffer for as a Delinquent: And they were proved, and aggravated against him with so many Circumstances, that they fell very foully on him, both in relation to his Reception of them, and his Expending of them: For that which he raked in and scrued for one way, he scattered and threw abroad another; for his Servants being young, prodigal and expensive Youths, which he kept about him, his Treasure was their common Store, which they took without stint, having free Access to his most retired Privacies; and his Indulgence to them, and Familiarity with them, open'd a Gap to infamous Reports, which left an unsavoury Tincture on him; for where such Leeches are, there must be putrid Blood to fill their craving Appetites. His Gettings were, like a Prince, with a weak Hand; his Expences, like a Prodigal with a strong Hand; and 'tis a wonder a Man of his Noble and Gallant Parts, that could fly so high above Reason, should fall so far below it; unless that Spirit that acted the first, were too proud to stoop to see the Deformities of the last. And as he affected his Men, so his Wife affected hers: Seldom doth the Husband deviate one way, but the Wife goeth another. The Things came into the publick Mouth, and the Genius of the Times (where Malice is not corrival) is the great Dictator of all Actions: For Innocency it self is a Crime, when Calumny sets her Mark upon it. How prudent therefore ought Men to be, that not so much as their Garments be defiled with the soure Breath of the Times!

This poor Gentleman, mounted above Pity, fell down below it, his Tongue, that was the Glory of his Time for Eloquence, (that tuned so many sweet Harangues) was like a forsaken Harp, hung upon the Willows, whilst the Waters of Affliction overflowed the Banks. And now his high-flying Orations are humbled to Supplications; and thus he throws himself, and Cause, at the Feet of his Judges before he was condemned.

To the Right Honourable the Lords of the Parliament in the Upper House assembled.

The humble Submission and Supplication of the Lord Chancellor.

May it please your Lordships,

His Supplication.

'I Shall humbly crave at your Hands a benign 'Interpretation of that which I shall now 'write; for Words that come from wasted Spi'rits and oppressed Minds are more safe, in be'ing deposited to a Noble Construction, than 'being circled with any reserved Caution.

'This being moved (and, as I hope, obtained 'of your Lordships) (as a Protection to all that 'I shall say, I shall go on; but with a very 'strange Entrance, as may seem to your Lord'ships at first; for in the midst of a State, of as 'great Affliction as I think a mortal Man can 'endure, (Honour being above Life) I shall 'begin with the professing of Gladness in some 'Things.

'The first is, That hereafter the Greatness of 'a Judge or Magistrate shall be no Sanctuary or 'Protection to him against Guiltiness, which is 'the beginning of a Golden Work.

'The next; That, after this Example, it is like 'that Judges will fly from any thing in the like'ness of Corruption, (tho' it were at a great 'distance) as from a Serpent; which tends to 'the purging of the Courts of Justice, and re'ducing them to their true Honour and Splen'dour. And in these two Points (God is my 'Witness) tho' it be my Fortune to be the An'vil upon which these two Effects are broken 'and wrought, I take no small Comfort. But

'to

A. Reg. 19. An. Christi 1621.

'to pass from the Motions of my Heart (whereof God is my Judge) to the Merits of my Cause, whereof your Lordships are Judges, under God and his Lieutenant; I do understand, there hath been heretofore expected from me some Justification; and therefore I have chosen one only Justification, instead of all others, out of the Justification of Job: For after the clear Submission and Confession which I shall now make unto your Lordships, I hope I may say and justify with Job, in these Words, I have not hid my Sin, as did Adam, nor concealed my Faults in my Bosom. This is the only Justification which I will use.

'It resteth therefore, that without Fig-leaves, I do ingenuously confess and acknowledge, That having understood the Particulars of the Charge, not formally from the House, but enough to inform my Conscience and Memory, I find Matter sufficient and full, both to move me to desert my Defence, and to move your Lordships to condemn and censure me. Neither will I trouble your Lorpships, by singling those Particulars, which I think might fall off. Quid te exempla juvant spinis de pluribus Uva? Neither will I prompt your Lordships to observe upon the Proofs, where they come not home, or the Scruple touching the Credits of the Witnesses. Neither will I represent to your Lordships, how far a Defence might in divers things extenuate the Offence, in respect of the Time, and manner of the Guilt, or the like Circumstances; but only leave these things to spring out of your own more Noble Thoughts, and Observations of the Evidence, and Examinations themselves; and charitably to wind about the Particulars of the Charge, here and there, as God shall put into your Minds, and so submit my self wholly to your Piety and Grace.

'And now I have spoken to your Lordships as Judges, I shall say a few Words unto you as Peers and Prelates, humbly commending my Cause to your Noble Minds and Magnanimous Affections.

'Your Lordships are not simply Judges, but Parliamentary Judges; you have a further Extent of Arbitary Power than other Courts; and if you be not tied by ordinary Course of Courts, or Precedents in Points of Strictness and Severity, much less in Points of Mercy and Mitigation. And yet if any thing which I shall move might be contrary to your honourable and worthy End, (the Introducing a Reformation) I should not seek it; but herein I beseech your Lordships to give me leave to tell you a Story.

'Titus Manlius took his Son's Life, for giving Battel against the Prohibition of his General. Not many Years after, the like Severity was pursued by Papirius Cursor the Dictator, against Quintus Maximus; who being upon the Point to be sentenced, was, by the Intercession of some particular Persons of the Senate, spared. Whereupon Livy maketh this grave and gracious Observation, Neque minùs firmata est Disciplina Militaris, periculo Quinti Maximi, quàm miserabili supplicio Titi Manlii; The Discipline of War was no less established by the questioning of Quintus Maximus, than by the Punishment of Titus Manlius. And the same Reason is in the Reformation of Justice: For the questioning of Men in eminent Places, hath the same Terrour, tho' not the same Rigour with the Punishment. But my Cause stays not there; for my humble Desire is, That his Majesty would take the Seal into his Hands, which is a great Down-fall, and may serve, I hope, in it self for an Expiration of my Faults. Therefore if Mercy and Mitigation be in your Lordships Power, and no way cross your Ends, why should I not hope of your Favour and Commiseration? Your Lordships will be pleased to behold your Chief Pattern, the King our Sovereign, a King of incomparable Clemency, and whose Heart is inscrutable for Wisdom and Goodness. And your Lordships will remember, there sate not these Hundred Years before a Prince in your House, and never such a Prince, whose Presence deserveth to be made Memorable by Records and Acts, mix'd of Mercy and Justice. Your selves are either Nobles (and Compassion ever beateth in the Veins of Noble Blood) or Reverend Prelates, who are the Servants of him that would not break the bruised Reed, nor quench the smoaking Flax. You all sit upon a high Stage, and therefore cannot but be sensible of the Changes of Humane Conditions, and of the Fall of any from high Place.

'Neither will your Lordships forget, that there are Vitia Temporis, as well as Vitia Hominis; and the beginning of Reformation hath the contrary Power to the Pool of Bethesda; for that had Strength to cure him only that was first cast in, and this hath Strength to hurt him only that is first cast in: And for my part, I wish it may stay there, and go no further. (Extortion and Bribery the Vices of the Times.)

'Lastly, I assure my self, your Lordships have a noble Feeling of me, as a Member of your own Body, and one that in this very Session had some taste of your loving Affections, which I hope was not a Lightning before the Death of them, but rather a Spark of that Grace, which now in the Conclusion will more appear. And therefore my humble Sute to your Lordships is, That my penitent Submission may be my Sentence, the Loss of my Seal my Punishment, and that your Lordships would recommend me to his Majesty's Grace and Pardon for all that is past. God's Holy Spirit be among you.

April 22. 1621.

Your Lordships
Humble Servant,
and Suppliant,
Fran. St. Albans, Can.

Thus was his great Spirit brought low, and this Humiliation might have raised him up again, if his Offences had not been so weighty as to keep him down. He lost his Peerage and Seal, and the Scale was wavering whether he should carry the Title of Viscount of St. Albans to his Grave, and that was all he did; having only left a poor empty Being, which lasted not long with him, his Honour dying before him. And to heighten his Misery the more, many others were crush'd to pieces by his Fall; for he had a vast Debt lay upon him, which they were forced to pay; and tho' he had a Pension allow'd him by the King, he wanted to his last, living obscurely in his Lodgings at Grays-Inn, where his Loneness and desolate Condition wrought upon his Ingenious, and therefore then more melancholy Temper, that he pined away. And had this Unhappiness, after all his Height of Plenitude, to be denied Beer to quench his Thirst: For having a sickly Taste, he did not like the Beer of the House, but sent to Sir Fulk Grevil, Lord Brook, in the Neighbourhood (now and then) for a Bottle of his Beer, and after some (His Censure.)

A. Reg. 19. An. Christi 1621.

some grumbling, the Butler had Order to deny him. So sordid was the one, that advanc'd himself to be call'd Sir Philip Sidney's Friend, and so Friendless was the other, after he had dejected himself from what he was.

His Description and Character.

He was of a middling Stature; his Countenance had indented with Age before he was old; his Presence grave and comely; of a high-flying and lively Wit, striving in some things to be rather admir'd than understood; yet so quick and easy where he would express himself, and his Memory so strong and active, that he appear'd the Master of a large and plenteous Store-house of Knowledge, being (as it were) Nature's Midwife, stripping her Callow Brood, and cloathing them in new Attire. His Wit was quick to the last; for Gondemar meeting him the Lent before his Censure, and hearing of his Miscarriages, thought to pay him with his Spanish Sarcasms and Scoffs, saying, My Lord, I wish you a good Easter; And you my Lord, reply'd the Chancellor, a good Passover: For he could neither close with his English Buffonry, nor his Spanish Treaty, (which Gondemar knew) tho' he was so wise as publickly to oppose neither. In fine, he was a fit Jewel to have beautified and adorned a flourishing Kingdom, if his Flaws had not disgraced the Lustre that should have set him off.

Parties in Parliament.

In this very time of Parliament, when the King carried all things with a full Sail, the Pilots of the Commonwealth had an Eye to the Dangers that lay in the way; for in both Houses the King had a strong Party, especially in the House of Lords: All the Courtiers, and most of the Bishops, steer'd by his Compass, and the Prince's Presence (who was a constant Member) did cast an Awe among many of them, yet there were some gallant Spirits that aim'd at the publick Liberty, more than their own Interest. If any thing were spoken in the House that did in the least reflect upon the Government, or touch (as the Courtiers thought) that Noli me tangere, the Prerogative, those that moved in it were snapt up by them, tho' many times they met with stout Encounters at their own Weapon; among which the Principal were, Henry Earl of Oxford, Henry Earl of Southampton, Robert Earl of Essex, Robert Earl of Warwick, the Lord Say, the Lord Spencer, and divers others, that supported the old English Honour, and would not let it fall to the Ground.

Oxford was of no Reputation in his Youth, being very debauched and riotous, and having no Means, maintain'd it by sordid and unworthy Ways, for his Father, hopeless of Heirs, in Discontent with his Wife, squandred away a Princely Estate; but when she and his great Fortune were both gone, he married a young Lady of the ancient Family of the Trenthams, by whom he had this young Lord, and two Daughters; she having a Fortune of her own, and Industry with it, after her Husband's Death married her Daughters into two Noble Families; the Earl of Montgomery married the one, and the Lord Norris, after Earl of Berkshire, married the other. And finding her Son hopeless, let him run his Swing till he grew weary of it; and thinking he could not be worse in other Countries than he had been in his own, she sent him to travel, to try if change of Air would change his Humour. He was not abroad in France and Italy above three Years, and the Freedoms and Extravagancies there (that are able to betray and inshare the greatest Modesties) put such a Bridle upon his Inordinateness, tho' look how much before he was decry'd for a mean and poor Spirit, so much had his noble and gallant Comportment there gain'd, that he came over refin'd in every Esteem; and such a Valuation was set upon his Parts and Merit, that he married the Lady Diana Cecil, Daughter to the Earl of Exeter, one of the most eminent Beauties and Fortunes of the Time.

† Southampton, tho' he were one of the King's Privy-Council, yet was he no great Courtier; Salisbury kept him at a bay, and pinch'd him so, by reason of his relation to old Essex, that he never flourish'd much in his time; nor was his Spirit (after him) so smooth shod, as to go always the Court pace; but that now and then he would make a Career that was not very acceptable to them; for he carried his Business closely and slily, and was rather an Adviser than an Actor.

Essex had ever an honest Heart; and tho' Nature had not given him Eloquence, he had a strong Reason that did express him better: His Countenance to those that knew him not, appear'd somewhat stern and solemn; to Intimates, affable and gentle; to the Females, obligingly courteous; and tho' unfortunate in some, yet highly respected of most, happily to vindicate the Virtue of the Sex. The King never affected him, whether from the Bent of his Natural Inclination to Effeminate Faces, or whether from that Instinct or secret Prediction that Divine Fate often imprints in the Apprehension, whereby he did fore-see in him (as it were) a Hand raised up against his Posterity, may be a Notation, not a Determination: But the King never liked him, nor could he close with the Court.

Warwick, tho' he had all those excellent Endowments of Body and Fortune, that gives Splendour to a Glorious Court, yet he used it but as his Recreation; for his Spirit aimed at more publick Adventures, planting Colonies in the Western World, rather than himself in the King's Favour: His Brother Sir Henry Rich (about this time made Baron of Kensington) and he, had been in their Youths two emulous Corrivals in the publick Affections, the one's Brownness being accounted a lovely Sweetness, transcending most Men; the other's Features and pleasant Aspect equalled the most beautiful Women; the younger having all the Dimensions of a Courtier, laid all the Stock of his Fortune upon that Soil, which after some Years Patience came up with Increase; but the elder could not so stoop to Observances, and thereby became his own Supporter.

Say and Seal was a seriously subtile Piece, and always averse to the Court ways, something out of Pertinaciousness; his Temper and Constitution ballancing him altogether on that side, which was contrary to the Wind; so that he seldom tack'd about, or went upright, tho' he kept his Course steady in his own way a long time: Yet it appear'd afterward, when the Harshness of the Humour was a little allay'd by the sweet Refreshments of Court Favours, that † These Characters of the Earls of Southampton, Essex and Warwick, the Lord Kensington (afterwards Earl of Holland) and the Lord Say and Seal, do all of them agree in the main with those given them many Years after by the Earl of Clarendon In his History. Wilson has drawn their Pictures in Miniature, and that other Noble Historian has done them at length; which is a convincing Proof of our Author's penetrating Judgment, and of his being perfectly acquainted both with Men and Things.

those

A. Reg. 19. An. Christi 1621.

those stern Comportments, supposed Natural, might be mitigated, and that indomable Spirits by gentle Usage may be tamed and brought to Obedience.

Spencer, (like the old Roman chosen Dictator from his Farm (made the Country a Virtuous Court, where his Fields and Flocks brought him more calm and happy Contentment, than the various and mutable Dispensations of a Court can contribute: And, when he was called to the Senate, was more vigilant to keep the Peoples Liberties from being a Prey to the encroaching Power of Monarchy, than his harmless and tender Lambs from Foxes and ravenous Creatures.

There were many other Noble Patriots concentrique with these, which like Jewels should be preserved and kept in the Cabinet of every Man's Memory, being Ornaments for Posterity to put on; but their Characters would make the Line too long, and the Bracelet too big to adorn this Story.

Spencer and Arundel quarrel.

About this time Spencer was speaking something in the House that their great Ancestors did; which displeas'd Arundel, and he cuts him off short, saying, My Lord, when these things you speak of were doing, your Ancestors were keeping Sheep (twitting him with his Flocks which he took Delight in): Spencer (instantly reply'd, When my Ancestors (as you say) were keeping Sheep, your Ancestors were plotting Treason.

This hit Arundel home, and it grew to some Heat in the House; whereupon they were separated, and commanded both out of the House, and the Lords began to consider of the Offence. There was much bandying by the Court-Party, to excuse the Earl of Arundel; but the Heat and rash Part of it beginning with him, laying such a Brand upon a Peer that was nobly descended, he could not be justified, but was enjoined by the House to give the Lord Spencer such Satisfaction as they prescrib'd, which his Greatness refusing to obey, he was by the Lords sent Prisoner to the Tower, and Spencer re-admitted into the House again.

Arundel committed.

When Arundel was well cooled in the Tower, and found that no Power would give him Liberty, but that which had restrain'd him, (rather blaming his Rashness, than excusing his Stubbornness) his great Heart humbled it self to the Lords, betwixt a Letter and a Petition, in these Words.

To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in the Higher House of Parliament assembled.

May it please your Lordships,

His Submission.

WHereas I stand committed here by your Lordships Order, for having stood upon performing some part of that which was enjoined me by your Lordships; which I did rather in respect the time was short for Advice, than out of any Intent to disobey the House, for which I have suffered in this Place till now: I do therefore humbly beseech your Lordships to construe of what is past, according to this my Profession, and for the time to come to believe, that I both understand so well your Lordship's Power to command, and your Nobleness and Tenderness to consider what is fit, as I do, and will wholly put my self upon your Honours, and perform what is, or shall be enjoined me. So beseeching your Lordships to construe these Lines, as proceeding from a Heart ready to obey you in what you command, I rest

Tower, June 2. 1621.

Your Lordships most humble Servant,

Thomas Arundel.

A. Reg. 19. An. Christi 1621.

Upon this Submission, the Lords commanded him to be sent for, and presenting himself at the Bar of the House, with the accustomed Humility that Offenders do, he thus express'd himself, Because I have committed a Fault against this House, in not obeying all the Order that your Lordships commanded me, I do here acknowledge this my Fault and ask your Lordships Pardon for the same, and am ready to obey all your Lordships Commands.

Thus this great Lord (tho' he flutter'd in the Air of the Court, and mounted by that means upon the Wings of Passion) was glad to stoop when Consideration lured him to it, lest by the Heat that he himself made, melting the Waxen Plumes that he thought would have supported him) his Suffering might have been a greater Mischief to him than his Submission: So sour and severe a School-master is Passion, to be both Author and Punisher of our Errors; yea, making the best Natures (often) correct themselves most.

The Parliament adjourned.

The fourth of June this Year the Parliament had a Recess, the King being to go his Progress; wherein some Lords, and others of the Parliament, were to attend him: For it seems his Business was not yet ripe for the Parliament, and he was loth they should have too much leisure; therefore they were not to meet again till the eighth of February following, which being a long time of Vacancy, the House of Commons, before they parted, took the Miseries of the Palatinate into serious Debate; and tho' they felt the King's Pulse, and knew the Beat of his Thought, when he spake of providing an Army this Summer for the Recovery of it, and would engage his Crown, Blood and Soul for it, (finding him apt to say what he had no Will to do) yet they were so wise as not to slacken or draw back in so good a Work; that if there were a Failing, it should not be on their side, knowing how much Religion was concerned in it (for to the Appearance of Reason, the Triumphing Emperor, and Universal King, would quickly tread all under foot); therefore with one Voice (none daring to oppose) they made this Declaration.

The Commons Declaration.

THE Commons assembled in Parliament, taking into most serious Consideration the present State of the King's Children abroad, and generally afflicted Estate of the true Professors of the same Christian Religion, professed by the Church of England in Foreign Parts; and being touch'd with a true Sense and fellow-feeling of their Distresses, as Members of the same Body, do with unanimous Consent, in the Name of themselves and the whole Body of the Kingdom, (whom they represent) declare unto his most Excellent Majesty, and to the whole World, their hearty Grief and Sorrow for the same; and do not only join with them in their humble and devout Prayers unto Almighty God, to protect his true Church, and to avert the Dangers now threaten'd, but also with one Heart and Voice do solemnly protest, That if his Majesty's pious Endeavours by Treaty, to procure their Peace and Safety, shall not take that good Effect which is desir'd in Treaty, (wherefore they humbly beseech his Majesty not to suffer any longer Delay) that then, upon Signification of his Majesty's Pleasure in Parliament, they

A. Reg. 19.
An. Christi 1621.

ſhall be ready, to the utmoſt of their Powers, both with their Lives and Fortunes, to aſſiſt him ſo, as that, by the divine Help of Almighty God, (which is never wanting unto thoſe, who in his Fear ſhall undertake the Defence of his own Cauſe) he may be able to do that with his Sword, which by a peaceable Courſe ſhall not be effected.

The King pleaſed with it.

The King took this Declaration of the Commons in very good Part, and meant, when Occaſion ſerv'd, to make good uſe of it: For as he found them forward enough to begin a War, ſo he knew his own Conſtitution backward enough, (the Sword being in his Hand) and did fore-ſee an Advantage ariſing from a Medium betwixt the Parliament and him, if he could bring his Ends about, which he after put in practice; but it broke all to pieces; and now away he goes on his Progreſs.

Towards Winter the Lord Digby returns from his ſoliciting Journey in Germany: His firſt Addreſſes he made to the Emperor, his ſecond to the Duke of Bavaria, and his laſt to the Infanta at Bruſſels, and all to as little purpoſe as if he had ſtay'd at home; that three-fold Cord, twiſted by the Power of Spain, was not eaſily to be broken. Some little Twilight and Scintil of Hope was given him by the Emperor for Reſtitution of the Palatinate, yet not ſo much as would diſcover the Error of our eaſie Belief: But the Bavarian had already ſwallowed the Electorate, and his Voraginous Appetite gaped after the Poſſeſſion of the Country, tho' the Engliſh there were Bones in his way.

Digby's Return.

Digby being arriv'd at Court, and bringing with him doubtful Anſwers from the Emperor, and ſullen ones from the Duke of Bavaria, the King thought it good Policy to ſhorten the long Receſs till February, and to re-aſſemble the Parliament the 20th of November; that meeting before their Time, it might more amaze them, and intimate ſome extraordinary Cauſe, which happily might produce ſome extraordinary Effect, if well manag'd. And, as incident thereunto, he gave Order to Digby, as ſoon as the Parliament aſſembled, to make Relation to the Houſes of his Proceedings there; which he did in theſe Words:

His Relation to the Parliament.

IT pleaſed his Majeſty to command me to give you an Account of my laſt Foreign Negotiation with the Emperor; who (you know) being much exaſperated with the Invaſion of Bohemia, (to which the King never gave Encouragement in the Attempt, nor Countenance in the Proſecution) hath, upon the Advantage of his fortunate Succeſs there, invaded into the Inheritance of his Son the Palatine: Whereupon I was directed by his Majeſty's Commiſſion to Treat, if Peace might be compaſſed with fair Endeavours, to which the Emperor ſeemed very inclinable. Albeit, ſlow in giving Audience, by reaſon that the Diet in Germany was deferr'd, and he depended upon ſome Anſwer from the Princes. But in Concluſion, I receiv'd ſuch Satisfaction, as promis'd Reſtitution of the Palatinate, which only was granted by Commiſſion to the Duke of Bavaria, until it was ſetled by abſolute Peace, or further War. And being addreſs'd by the Emperor with Letters to the Duke of Bavaria, wherein he wiſh'd his tractable Condeſcent to all good Terms of Peace; Upon which Occaſion I urged, That I had Authority from the Count Palatinate, to cauſe the Count Mansfield to deſiſt from War, and likewiſe from the King to his Body of War under the Government of Sir Horatio Vere. The Duke of Bavaria reply'd, That he had becalmed Mansfield with great Sums of Money; and when he is quiet, my Peace is made. To which ſcornful and ſlight Reply ſomething I anſwer'd, and departed to the Infanta to Bruſſels, who ſeemed to underſtand by the Emperor's Letters, that he did rather prepare for War than Peace, and would give no direct Anſwer till ſhe heard from the King of Spain, who, I muſt ingenuouſly confeſs, hath ſtood clear a Neutral, according to his Promiſe: Yet is he now ſo ſtrong prepar'd for War, (having at this inſtant five great Armies in motion) that it will not miſ-become the Wiſdom of the State to fear the worſt: And to conclude, ſuch hath been the Care of the King for his own Honour, and Son's Right, that he preſumes you will chearfully apply your ſelves to the Neceſſity of the Times, and this Occaſion; and not only afford him Aid for his preſent Support, but ſuch further Supply as may help to re-inveſt his Son into his Inheritance.

A. Reg. 19.
An. Christi 1621.

Which Relation of Digby's being ſeconded by ſome of the King's great Miniſters of State, who had Inſtructions ſuitable to their Errand) they let the Parliament know how juſtly and neceſſary it was, and how forward the King would be to accompliſh that by War, which he could not recover by Peace; and they ſet it off with all the ſlippery Oratory they could to draw in Money; for that being the main Ingredient, if that were provided, the reſt of the Simples would eaſily be purchaſed, to make up the Compoſition. Seconded.

Thus the King's Suits and Intreaties were ſlighted, and diſregarded abroad; and his Intentions ſuſpected, and feared at home. Princes that do graſp Poſſeſſions with Iron Hands, will not be ſmoothed out of them by fair Words; the Sword, as it is the beſt Determiner, ſo it is the moſt honourable Treater. And tho' the King incited the Parliament by theſe his Miniſters to contribute towards a War, yet they found his Inclination bent towards Peace, both in reſpect of Gondemar's Power with him, (upon whoſe ſandy Promiſes he built a good Foundation of Hope) and in regard of ſome Letters which the King had lately written to the King of Spain, wherein great Indulgencies were promiſed to the Papiſts, whereby they ſaw he was too much tranſported with a Deſire to the Match: And the King, finding Digby's Endeavours fruitleſs in Germany, intended to ſend him into Spain, Extraordinary Ambaſſador to that King, whom he looked upon as the great Wheel that moved the others which way he pleaſed: For he was reſolved to cloſe ſome way with the Houſe of Auſtria, either by Marriage or Intreaty, to piece and make up the Breach the War had made. But the King had to do with cunning Gameſters, that ſmiled to ſee how earneſt he was at it; for they had the Sign given out of his Hand, and ſaw all the Game he play'd: So faithleſs was the Council about him.

The King prevails not abroad, nor at home.

The Engliſh in general, except Papiſts, were averſe to this Match, as boding ſome evil Event, becauſe the Papiſts did prune themſelves, flutter up and down, and ſpread their Trains ſo publickly. This almoſt univerſal Averſion of the People had a natural Influence upon the Repreſentative, the Parliament; who conſidering that the King (by Digby and others) did inform them how formidable the King of Spain was, and did require them to apply themſelves to the Neceſſity of the Times, and further him with Help to re-inveſt his Son in his Inheritance, thought there was no better Means to be uſed than to try effectually the King's Spirit, and ſtir him up to a War; for ſo they ſhould know which way their Money went, at leaſtwiſe his Mind, before they tamely parted with it. And therefore (like

The People and Parliament againſt this Match.

A. Reg. 19. An. Christi 1621.

The Parliament thought it strange that the King in a Recess should call them together before the appointed Time of Meeting; pretending Emergent Occasions, and (by his Ministers of State) perswade and incite to a War, and when (in Obedience to this Command) they shall proceed in their Advice, only to prevent the Dangers abroad, and establish Security at home, they shall be accounted Presumptuous and Insolent. But by this they discover, (and which the King plainly expresses in his Answer) that he required none of their Advice, he wanted only their Money; if they had furnish'd him with that, instead of Counsel, it would have been a golden Remonstrance. They are to be his Bank, his Merchants, he needs no other Directions; let them find Money, he knows how to dispose of it. This was the great Fault, which this Petition strives to mitigate, accompanied with the Remonstrance it self, and the Petition against Recusancy, for both which it was an Intercessor; but it could not with all its Humility procure Acceptance for its Companions, though sent by Twelve select Members of the House, and the leading Man Sir Richard Weston (who was really the King's) chosen by the Commons to make their Petitions the more acceptable. And the House finding it a great Discouragement to them to proceed in any Business, when there was so great a Distance betwixt the King and them, (the King thinking their Actions an Intrenchment upon his Prerogative, and they thinking the King's Expressions an Infringement of their Liberties) they resolved to give over all Business, till they had an Answer of their Petitions; for they thought they had as good do nothing, as have that they do undone again. Which the King hearing of, was vexed at the Heart, and entertained their Messengers very roughly; and some say he called for Twelve Chairs for them, saying, Here are Twelve Kings come to me. But after he had consider'd their Desires in their last Petition (rejecting the others) he returns them this Answer to all.

The King wanted Money, not Advice.

The King's Answer.

'WE must here begin in the same Fashion that we would have done, if your first Petition had come to our Hands before we had made a stay thereof, which is to repeat the first Words of the late Queen, of Famous Memory, used by her in Answer to an insolent Proposition, made by a Polonian Ambassador unto her; that is, Legatum expectabamus, Heraldum accipimus. For we had great Reason to expect, that the first Message from your House should have been a Message of Thanksgiving for our continued Gracious Behaviour towards our People since your last Recess: Not only by our Proclamation of Grace, wherein were contained Six or Seven and thirty Articles, all of several Points of Grace to the People; but also by the Labour we took, for the Satisfaction of both Houses, in those Three Articles recommended unto us in both their Names by the Right Reverend Father in God the Archbishop of Canterbury, and likewise for the good Government of Ireland we are now in hand with at your request. But not only have we heard no News of all this, but contrary, great Complaints of the Danger of Religion within this Kingdom, tacitly implying our ill Government in this Point. And we leave you to judge, whether it be your Duties, that are the Representative Body of our People, so to distaste them with our Government; whereas, by the contrary, it is your Duty, with all your Endeavours, to kindle more and more a Dutiful and Thankful Love in the Peoples Hearts towards us for our Just and Gracious Government.

'Now whereas in the very Beginning of this your Apology, you tax us in fair Terms of trusting uncertain Reports, and partial Informations concerning your Proceedings: We wish you to remember that we are an Old and Experienc'd King, needing no such Lessons, being in our Conscience freest of any King alive from hearing or trusting idle Reports, which so many of your House as are nearest us can bear witness unto you, if you would give as good ear to them, as you do to some Tribunitial Orators among you. And for proof in this Particular; We have made your own Messengers confer your other Petitions sent by you with the Copy thereof, which was sent us before, between which there is no difference at all, but that since our receiving the first Copy you added a Conclusion unto it, which could not come to our Hands, till it was done by you, and your Messengers sent, which was all at one time. And if we had had no Copy of it before-hand, we must have received your first Petition to our great Dishonour, before we had known what it contain'd, which would have inforced us to have returned you a far worse Answer than now we do. For then your Messengers had returned with Nothing, but that we have judged your Petition unlawful and unworthy of an Answer: For as to your Conclusion thereof, it is nothing but Protestatio contraria facto, for in the Body of your Petition you usurp upon our Prerogative Royal, and meddle with Things far above your reach, and then in the Conclusion you protest the contrary; as if a Robber would take a Man's Purse, and then protest he meant not to rob him. For first, you presume to give us your Advice concerning the Match of our dearest Son with some Protestant, we cannot say Princess, for we know none of these fit for him, and disswade us from his Match with Spain, urging us to a present War with that King, and yet in the Conclusion, forsooth, ye protest ye intend not to press upon our most Undoubted and Regal Prerogative; as if the Petitioning of us in Matters that your selves confess ye ought not to meddle with, were not a meddling with them.

'And whereas ye pretend, that ye were invited to this Course by the Speeches of Three Honourable Lords; yet by so much as your selves repeat of the Speeches, nothing can be concluded, but that we were resolved by War to regain the Palatinate, if otherwise we could not attain unto it. And you were invited to advise forthwith upon a Supply for keeping the Forces in the Palatinate from Disbanding, and to fore-see the Means for the raising and maintaining of the Body of an Army for that War against the Spring. Now what Inference can be made upon this? That therefore we must presently denounce War against the King of Spain, break our dearest Son's Match, and Match him to one of our Religion; Let the World judge! The difference is no greater, than if we would tell a Merchant that we had great need to borrow Money from him for raising an Army; that thereupon it should follow, that we were bound to follow his Advice in the Directions of the War, and all Things depending thereupon. But yet not contenting your selves with this

'Excuse,

A. Reg. 19.
An. Christi 1621.

Excuse of yours, which indeed cannot hold Water, you come after to a direct Contradiction to the Conclusion of your former Petition, saying, That the Honour and Safety of us and our Posterity, and the Patrimony of our Children invaded, and possessed by their Enemies, the Welfare of Religion, and State of our Kingdom, are Matters at any time not unfit for your deepest Considerations in Parliament. To this Generality, we Answer with the Logicians, That where all things are contained, nothing is omitted. So as this Plenipotency of yours invests you in all Power upon Earth, lacking nothing but the Pope's, to have the Keys also both of Heaven and Purgatory. And to this vast Generality of yours, we can give no other Answer; for it will trouble all the best Lawyers in the House, to make a good Commentary upon it: For so did the Puritan Ministers in Scotland bring all kind of Causes within the compass of their Jurisdiction, saying, That it was the Churches Office to judge of Slander, and there could no kind of Crime or Fault be committed, but there was a Slander in it, either against God, the King, or their Neighbour; and by this means they hooked into themselves the Cognizance of all Causes. Or like Bellarmine's distinction of the Pope's Power over King's, in ordine ad Spiritualia, whereby he gives them all Temporal Jurisdiction over them.

'But to give you a direct Answer to the Matter of War, for which you are so earnest; We confess, we rather expected you should have given us Thanks for the so long maintaining a settled Peace in all our Dominions, when as all our Neighbours about are in miserable Combustion of War. But Dulce Bellum inexpertis: And we indeed find by Experience, that a Number of our Subjects are so pamper'd with Peace, as they are desirous of Change, though they know not what.

'It is true, that we have ever profess'd (and in that Mind, with God's Grace, we will live and die) that we will labour by all Means possible, either by Treaty, or by Force, to restore our Children to their ancient Dignity and Inheritance; and whatsoever Christian Princes, or Potentates, will set themselves against it, we will not spare any Lawful Means to bring our so Just and Honourable Purpose to a good End. Neither shall the Match of our Son, or any other Worldly Respect, be preferred to this our Resolution: For by our Credit, and Intervention with the King of Spain, and the Arch-Dutchess, and her Husband now with God, we preserved the Lower Palatinate one whole Year, from any further Conquering in it; which in any Eight Days space in that time, might have easily been swallow'd up by Spinola's Army, without any Resistance: And in no better Case was it now at our Ambassador the Lord Digby's coming through Heidelbergh, if he had not extraordinarily succoured it.

'But because we conceive, that ye couple this War of the Palatinate with the Cause of Religion, we must a little unfold your Eyes herein. The Beginning of this Miserable War, which hath set all Christendom on fire, was not for Religion, but only caused by our Son-in-Law's hasty and rash Resolution, following Evil Counsel, to take to himself the Crown of Bohemia: And that this is true, himself wrote Letters unto us at that time, desiring us to give Assurance both to the French King and State of Venice, that his [illegible]ting of the Crown of Bohemia had no re[illegible]rence to the Cause of Religion, [illegible] reason of his right of Election (as he called it.) And we would be sorry that that Apprehension should come upon our Religion, as to make it a good Pretext for Dethroning of Kings and usurping their Crowns. And we would be loth that our People here should be taught that Doctrine: No, let us not so far wrong the Jesuits, as to rob them of their sweet Positions, and Practice in that Point. And upon the other Part, we assure our self so far of your Charitable Thoughts of us, that we would never have Constantly denied our Son-in-Law both the Title and Assistance in that Point, if we had been well perswaded of the Justice of his Quarrel. But to conclude, this Unjust Usurpation of the Crowns of Bohemia and Hungaria from the Emperor, hath given the Pope, and all that Party, too fair a Ground, and open'd them too wide a Gate, for curbing and oppressing of many Thousands of our Religion in divers Parts of Christendom.

'And whereas you excuse your touching upon the King of Spain, upon occasion of the Incidents by you repeated in that Place, and yet affirm, that it is without any touch to his Honour; we cannot wonder enough that ye are so forgetful, both of your Words and Writs: For in your former Petition ye plainly affirm, that he affects the Temporal Monarchy of the whole Earth, than which there can be no more Malice uttered against any great King; to make all other Princes and Potentates both Envy and Hate him. But if ye list, it may be easily tried, whether that Speech touched him in Honour or not: If we shall ask him the Question, whether he means to assume to himself that Title or no? For every King can best judge of his own Honour. We omit the Particular Ejaculations of some Foul-mouth'd Orators in your House, against the Honour of his Crown and State.

'And touching your Excuse of not determining any thing concerning the Match of our dearest Son, but only to tell your Opinions, and lay it down at our Feet: First, We desire to know how you could have presumed to determine in that Point, without committing of High-Treason. And next, You cannot deny, but your talking of his Match after that manner, was a direct breach of our Commandment and Declaration out of our own Mouth, at the first sitting down of this Parliament, where we plainly professed, that we were in Treaty of his Match with Spain, and wished you to have that Confidence in our Religion and Wisdom, that we would so manage it, as our Religion should receive no Prejudice by it. And the same we now repeat unto you, professing that we are so far engaged in that Match, as we cannot in Honour go back, except the King of Spain perform not such Things as we expect at his Hands: And therefore we are sorry that ye should shew to have so great Distrust in us, or to conceive that we should be cold in our Religion; otherwise we cannot imagine how our former publick Declaration should not have stopp'd your Mouths in this Point.

'And as to your Request, That we would now receive your former Petition, we wonder what could make you presume, that we would not receive it; whereas in our former Letter, we plainly declar'd the Contrary unto you; and therefore have justly rejected that Suit of yours. For what have you left unattempted in the highest Points of Sovereignty in that Petition of yours, except the striking of Coin? For it contains the Violation of Leagues, the particular way how to govern a War, and the Marriage of our dearest Son, both Negative with Spain, nay, with any other Popish Princess. And also Affirmatively, as to the Matching with one of our Religion; which we confess is a Strain beyond any Providence or Wisdom God hath given us, as Things now stand.

'that

A. Reg. 19. An. Christi 1621.

'These are unfit Things to be handled in Parliament, except your King should require it of you; for who can have Wisdom to judge of Things of that Nature? but such as are daily acquainted with the Particulars of Treaties, and of the variable or fixed Connexion of Affairs of State, together with the Knowledge of the secret Ways, Ends, and Intentions of Princes in their several Negociations; otherwise, a small mistaking in Matters of this Nature may produce more Effects than can be imagined. And therefore, Ne sutor ultra crepidam. And besides, the intermeddling in Parliament with Matters of Peace or War, and Marriage of our dearest Son, would be such a Diminution to us, and to our Crown, in Foreign Countries, as would make any Prince neglect to treat with us, either in Matters of Peace or Marriage, except they might be assured by the Assent of Parliament. And so it proved long ago with a King of France; who, upon a Trick, procuring his States to dissent from some Treaty, which before he had made, was after refused treating with any other Princes, to his great Reproach, unless he would first procure the Assent of his Estates to their Proposition.

False Play justly rewarded.

And will you cast your Eyes upon the late Times, you shall find that the late Queen, of Famous Memory, was humbly petitioned by a Parliament to be pleased to marry: But her Answer was, That she liked their Petition well, because it was simple, not limiting her to Place or Person, as not befitting her Liking to their Fancies; and if they had done otherwise, she would have thought it a high Presumption in them. Judge then what we may do in such a Case? having made our publick Declaration already (as we said before) directly contrary to that which you have now petitioned.

'Now to the Points in your Petition, whereof you desire an Answer, as properly belonging to the Parliament. The first and the greatest Point is that of Religion, concerning which at this time we can give you no other Answer than in the general; which is, That you may rest secure, that we will never be weary to do all we can for the Propagation of our Religion, and Repressing of Popery. But the Manner and Form you must remit to our Care and Providence, who can best consider of Times and Seasons; not by undertaking a publick War of Religion through all the World at once; which, how hard and dangerous a Task it may prove, you may judge. But this puts us in Mind how all the World complain'd the last Year of Plenty of Corn, and God hath sent us a cooling Card this Year for that Heat. And so we pray God, that this Desire among you of kindling Wars (shewing your Weariness of Peace and Plenty) may not make God permit us to fall into the Miseries of both. But, as we already said, our Care of Religion must be such, as on the one part we must not, by the hot Persecution of our Recusants at home, irritate Foreign Princes of contrary Religion, and teach them the way to plague the Protestants in their Dominions, with whom we daily intercede, and at this time principally for Ease to them of our Profession, that live under them. Yet upon the other Part, we never mean to spare from due and severe Punishment any Papist that will grow insolent, for living under our so mild Government. And you may also be assured, We will leave no Care untaken, as well for the good Education of the Youth at home, especially the Children of Papists, as also for preserving at all times hereafter the Youth that are or shall be abroad, from being bred in dangerous Places, and so poison'd in Popish Seminaries. And as in this Point, namely, concerning the good Education of Popish Youth at home, we have already given some good Proofs, both in this Kingdom and in Ireland; so will we be well pleased to pass any good Laws that shall be made, either now, or any time hereafter, to this purpose.

Wars good to prevent Wars.

A. Reg. 19. An. Christi 1621.

'And as to your Request of making this a Session, and granting a general Pardon, it shall be in your Defaults, if we make not this a Session before Christmas.

'But for the Pardon, ye crave such Particulars in it, as we must be well advised upon, lest otherwise we give you back the double or treble of that we are to receive by your entire Subsidy, without Fifteens. But the ordinary Course we hold fittest to be used still in this Case, is, That we should of our Free Grace send you down a Pardon from the Higher House, containing such Points as we shall think fittest, wherein we hope ye shall receive good Satisfaction.

'But we cannot omit to shew you how strange we think it, that ye should make so bad and unjust a Commentary upon some Words of our former Letter, as if we meant to restrain you thereby of your ancient Privileges and Liberties in Parliament. Truly, a Scholar would be ashamed so to misplace and misjudge any Sentences in another Man's Book. For whereas in the end of our former Letter we discharge you to meddle with Matters of Government and Mysteries of State; namely, Matters of War or Peace, or our dearest Son's Match with Spain; by which particular Denominations we interpret, and restrain our former Words: And then after, we forbid you to meddle with such Things as have their ordinary Course in Courts of Justice; yet couple together those two distinct Sentences, and plainly leave out these Words, Of Mysteries of State; so as ye err, à bene divisis ad male conjuncta. For of the former part, concerning Mysteries of State, we plainly restrained our Meaning to the Particulars that were after mentioned. And in the latter, we confess we meant it by Sir Edward Coke's foolish Business. And therefore it had well become him, especially being our Servant, and one of our Council, to have complained unto us; which he never did, tho' he was ordinarily at Court since, and never had Access refus'd unto him.

'And altho' we cannot allow of the Stile, calling it, Your ancient and undoubted Right and Inheritance, but could rather have wished that ye had said, That your Privileges were derived from the Grace and Permission of our Ancestors and us (for most of them grow from Precedents which shews rather a Toleration than Inheritance); yet we are pleased to give you our Royal Assurance, That as long as you shall contain your selves within the Limits of your

Ann. Reg. 19. An. Chrifti 1621.

'Duty, we will be as careful to maintain and 'preferve your lawful Liberties and Privileges, 'as ever any of our Predeceffors were, nay, 'as to preferve our own Royal Prerogative: So 'as your Houfe fhall only have need to beware 'to trench upon the Prerogative of the Crown; 'which would enforce us, or any juft King, 'to retrench them of their Privileges, that 'would pare his Prerogative and Flowers of the 'Crown. But of this, we hope there fhall be 'never Caufe given. This was the Effect of the 'King's Anfwer, which was dated at New-market 'the 11th of December, 1621.

The King and People Competitors.

Thus the King acted his part; and tho' his Anfwer might be the Refult of his Thoughts, yet it was fome tranfcendent Caufe that puts it into Words; for his Nature was apt enough to fear the Sound of its own Impreffions. But now his Spirit was mounted, either the Breach of the Treaty with Spain, or the Breach (as he thought) upon his Prerogative, gave Wing to raife his Anger higher than his Fear. Princes that never knew how to obey, ride their Paffions with a loofe Rein, and are eafieft carried by that Impulfion. The Prince and the People are here Competitors, both jealous of Encroachments, both ftriving to prevent them. Liberty is a Power that gives a Well-being and Life to the People. Power is a Liberty that Princes take to be the very Life of their Being. Kings are like the Sea, and the People like the Land, the Induftry of the one ftriving with the Piles, and Banks of good Laws and Precedents, to bound the often Spring-Tides, and over-flowing of the other. In Scotland the Land was high, Rocky, and inacceffible for his Waves, tho' never fo boifterous: Here he finds a fmooth Shore, and the People as tame in their Obedience, as they were in their Sufferings, which makes him the bolder with them.

Difcourfes upon the King's Anfwer.

But the Parliament (weighing the King's Anfwer by the Ballance of Reafon, not Paffion) found that there was little for them to do. For how is this a mix'd Government, when Kings do what they pleafe; They call their People to a Parliament, where the three Eftates are faid to be the mix'd Government; but what is their Errand? To get Money. If they touch upon Mifcarriage in Government, it difparages him to his People (for now the infide of his Copfes are well grown again). If upon Religion, he knows well enough how to order that, if the Treaty with Spain goes on. And for the Affairs of State, he feems to imply, as if there were fome hidden and fecret Art in thofe Myfteries of King-craft, that the Parliaments Apprehenfion cannot reach. For, who can have Wifdom (faith he) to judge of Things of that Nature, but thofe that are traded in them? Every Man in his Profeffion! So the Priefts by their old Oracles did ftrive to keep the World in Ignorance, as the Romifh Factors do now. Whereas the true way of Treaties is with Chriftian, not Machiavellian Policy. This we require, this Anfwer we expect, you fhall have this Retribution from us. If you go about to cozen and cheat us by Delays, and fpin out Time for Ends, fuch Syrens muft not be liften'd after. Every State muft ftand upon the Foundation of its own Reafon and Power, and not build Caftles of Paper-Hopes upon deceitful Promifes, unlefs there be fuch redundant Caufes of Dependency upon them, as it is impoffible to fubfift without them. It was obferved by Comines, that in all Treaties betwixt the Englifh and the French, the Englifh ever had the worft; but in all Wars and Conflicts, the Englifh had the better; intimating, that Subtilty may deceive, but plain down-right Honefty is beft, and will prevail. Falfenefs is fit for fuch Spirits as Pope Alexander, or his Nephew Cæfar Borgia. Scipio, tho' a Heathen, in his Pactions with Spain and Carthage, fcorn'd it, and the old Roman Senate were fo Gallant, as to rebuke Lucius Marcius, their Ambaffador and General, becaufe, in the managing of his Wars and Treaties with Perfeus King of Macedon, he went about by Subtilties to circumvent him. And now an Ambaffador (as one faith) lies abroad, Reipublicæ Causâ, for the Good of his Country, which tends rather to the Hurt of it.

1621.

The Parliament the King's Merchants.

But now they find that the King would only make Merchandize of the Commonwealth; yet Merchants look for their Money again with Advantage, and therefore their Counfel in difpofing it may be well fpared. But the Parliament, if they raife Money from the People, (which is never to be repay'd) there is good Reafon they fhould know, not only to what purpofe it is levied, but how prudently and fitly laid out; otherwife, as the King tells them in the Comparifon of the Robber, (tho' in relation to his Prerogative) if they fhould be fummon'd to levy Money of the People without Confideration of what it is for, or how it fhall be difpos'd for the Good of the Kingdom, they may very well fay and profefs, That they meant not to take it from them fo; that is, not to rob them of it. But the King's Neceffities muft come under the Common Emergencies, which he would not have known; and what will one Subfidy without Fifteens do? The Proteftants want in the Palatinate, fo doth he in England: But he had lately a great Affiftance from his People; never King of England found greater Love, (as he faith of himfelf) yet he wants ftill, and would have Supply for it under the Notion of a War. They muft confider what Money is fit, what Foot, what Horfe is neceffary; but they muft not know for what. All that they can imagine, is, that the King wants Money for his Favourite Buckingham, and his Kindred, to furnifh them againft Chriftmas, for Feafting, Gaming, and Bravery, the three main Pillars of the Times, Licentioufnefs raifed up to a ftupendious and exceffive Height, or to fend out his Ambaffadors, or help his indigent and expenfive Courtiers, and then the Wars are ended; for Want is a great War. But if the Good of the Kingdom, the Eftablifhment of Religion, the Happinefs of the King and his Pofterity, be not fit Themes for them to difcourfe of, why are they called?

The late Queen, (whofe Memory will be for ever Famous) by the King's own relation, liked the Parliaments, Petition well, when they humbly befought her to marry, becaufe they did not prefcribe her Place and Perfon, but left that to her Election; if they had done otherwife, fhe would have thought it Prefumption in them. The King thinks it Prefumption in the Parliament, humbly to befeech him (for the Good of Religion) to permit his Son to marry with a Proteftant Princefs; if they had fix'd upon Place or Perfon, he would have thought it High Treafon. So many Degrees high was the King's Spirit mounted above a Woman's to humble Subjects, and fo many Degrees lower than hers was his Spirit to daring Enemies.

Some of thefe Things were publickly difcourfed of among them in the Houfe, and otherfome mutter'd and talk'd of in private (for full Breafts will find vent); but the main Bufinefs

that

A. Reg. 19. An. Christi 1621.

[That] the Commons insisted on, was the King's [en]croachment upon their Liberties, debarring the[m] Freedom of Speech in Parliament, which was a natural, reasonable, and uncontroul'd Immunity, as long as they kept themselves within the Limits of their Duty, which the House was to be the sole judge of. And who can tax any particular Member with Miscarriages that way, that the House hath not censured hitherto? for now the Heat is but new broke in among them, and this Liberty of Speech stuck most with them; for if any Man should speak any thing to displease the King, (tho' it tended never so much to the good of the Kingdom) it might be termed insolent Behaviour, and be liable to Punishment after Parliament, (if not then) as the King threatens in his Letter; which carried such a Terror and over-awing with it, that they resolved to give over all Business, lest they should offend: Which the King hearing of, writes again to his Secretary Calvert, and the Speaker, to take of the Edge of those sharp Expressions he used in his Letters, thinking to cool the Heat among them.

The higher House offended.

But before this Heat was in the House of Commons, the Lords began to consider how cheap they were made by the multitude of Irish, and Scotch Earls and Viscounts, the King had accumulated, not the Natives of those Kingdoms, but private English Gentlemen, who had procured and assumed those Titles, to perch above the English Baronry, to their great Regret and Dishonour. And after some Debate, and canvassing in it, they resolved, That tho' they could not debar the King from making such Swarms of Nobles with Outlandish Titles, yet they would let him know what Prejudice it was to them, and if it produced no other good Effect, the King might at least see they took Offence, and were not well pleas'd with it; which made them present him with this Petition, thus Subsign'd.

The Humble Petition of the Nobility of England.

The Petition.

That whereas Your Majesty, at the Importunity of some natural Subjects of this Realm of England, hath been pleased to confer upon them Honours, Titles, and Dignities, peculiar to other Your Majesty's Dominions, by which all the Nobility of this Realm, either in themselves, their Children, or both, find they are prejudiced. Our humble Desire is, That, with your gracious Allowance, we may challenge and preserve our Birth-rights; and that we may take no more notice of these Titulars to our Prejudice, than the Law of this Land doth; but that we may be excused, if, in civil Courtesy, we give them not the Respect or Place as to Noblemen-Strangers, seeing that these being our Country-men, born and Inheritanced under our Laws, their Families and Abode among us have yet procured their Translation into Foreign Names, only to our Injury.

But in this Address to Your Sacred Majesty, it is far from us to meddle with, much less to limit, or interpret the Power of your Sovereignty, knowing that Your Majesty (being the Root whence all Honour receives Sap, under what Title soever) may collate what you please, upon whom, when, and how you please: Wherefore, in all Humbleness, we present this to your Gracious View, confident of your Majesty's equal Favour herein.

1. Oxford. 4. Lincoln. 7. Warwick.
2. Huntington. 5. Dorset. 8. Abergavenie.
3. Essex. 6. Salisbury. 9. Dacres.

10. Darcie. 18. Scroop. 26. Dudley.
11. Stafford. 19. Cromwell. 27. Hunsdon.
12. Willoughby. 20. Sturton. 28. Denny.
13. Sheffield. 21. Howard. 29. Spencer.
14. Windsor. 22. St. John. 30. Haughton.
15. Gray. 23. Paget. 31. Stanhope.
16. Wentworth. 24. Russell. 32. Say.
17. Mordant, 25. Gerrard. 33. Noell.

The King angry.

Thus we see the Errors of Princes are sometimes put into the Scale, and they bring with them so much Trouble and Vexation, that they often wear down their Glory and Happiness; for no Man can feel the Load and Burthen of it, but he that wears a Crown. The King was conscious to himself that he had done these Noblemen Injury, especially the Barons, to advance their Inferiors above them, for a little Profit either to himself or his Courtiers. And if he had not heard of this Petition before, such a Troop of Attendance together might have startled him; but being prepar'd for it, he muster'd up his Spirits, thinking it too great an Abasement for his Majesty to stoop at their Summons, being so publick an Action; or to lessen or recall what he had done. Yet was he troubled, not knowing what Quarrels the Strife for Place and Precedency might produce; or what ill Blood the Discontent of so many of the Nobility at one time might ingender: Therefore he sent for them all, or the most eminent and leading Men of them, some Days after, and expostulated the Business with them, one by one, in private, knowing he could deal best with them so, beginning with some of them roughly; yet still he closed with them at last, his Anger being (as it were) raised to make them humble, and reconcile themselves to him, that he might the better reconcile himself to them. And to the Earl of Essex he vented this Expression, I fear thee not Essex, if thou wert as well belov'd as thy Father, and hadst Forty thousand Men at thy Heels. Which Words he utter'd, as if he had chid himself that they made an escape from him. And tho' this Petition did not derogate from the Dignity of those Creations past, yet the King willingly restrain'd himself for the time to come.

The Commons Discontent.

But the House of Commons found the King's Letters to entangle the Way, rather than make a free Passage to their Liberties; for that which was their Birth-right, would now come to be derived from his Ancestors. And for all the King's Finenesses, they thought Religion very unsecure: For as long as the Bent of his Affections tended to the Spanish Match, there must needs be a wide Gap open as an Inlet to Popery; and if it may be made Treason for his Parliament to advise him from it, they saw but a very small Door left open to Liberty. But whatsoever befel them, they resolved to leave to Posterity some Prints and Foot-steps of their Parliamentary Rights and Privileges, left them by their great Ancestors, that tho' they could not preserve them entire, those that succeed them might at least find some Relicks and Ruines of what they had; which made them make this Protestation, Recorded in their Journal-Book, 19. Dec. 1621.

Their Protestation.

THE Commons now Assembled in Parliament, being justly occasioned thereunto, concerning sundry Liberties, Franchises, and Privileges of Parliament, among others here mentioned, do make this Protestation following, That the Liberties, Franchises, Privileges, and Jurisdictions of Parliament, are the ancient and undoubted Birth-right and Inheritance of the

Anno 1621.

Subjects of England, and that the arduous and urgent Affairs concerning the King, State, and Defence of the Realm, and of the Church of England, and the Maintenance and making of Laws, and Redress of Mischiefs and Grievances, which daily happen within this Realm, are proper Subjects and Matter of Counsel, and Debate in Parliament. And that in the handling and proceeding of those Businesses, every Member of Parliament hath, and of Right ought to have, Freedom of Speech, to propound, treat reason, and bring to Conclusion the same. And that the Commons in Parliament have likewise Liberty and Freedom to treat of these Matters, in such Order as in their Judgments shall seem fittest. And that every Member of the said House hath like Freedom, from all Impeachment, Imprisonment, and Molestation, (other than by Censure of the House it self) for, or concerning any speaking, reasoning, or declaring of any Matter or Matters, touching the Parliament, or Parliament Business. And that if any of the said Members be complain'd of, and question'd for any thing done or said in Parliament, the same is to be shew'd to the King, by the Advice and Assent of all the Commons assembled in Parliament, before the King give Credence to any private Information.

The King's Trouble increases.

The King was again alarm'd by this Protestation, and He that naturally lov'd Peace, both at home and abroad, found a loud War in his own Breast, which indeed was in effect rais'd by himself; for no Wisdom could resolve the Intricacies of his Resolutions but his own; for he would have a War with the Emperor in Contemplation, and a Treaty with the King of Spain in Action, both at one time, who were (as it were) one Person; and because the Parliament, like wise Mathematicians, would use the Practical Part as well as the Theory, he was enraged against them, and his Prerogative stept in as a Stickler, and broke out, like an Exhalation, in Thundering and Terror, to the Astonishment and Fear of his People, which made them shrowd themselves from those Storms, by creeping under the Shelter of their Native Liberties. And now the King flies from his hot and Intemperate Region, to some cool Considerations. If he should yield by Silence or Connivance to this Protestation, it would remain as an impregnable Bulwark for the People to Posterity. And what is this terrible Thing? their just Liberties. If he should oppose it with Rigour, it might produce such an intestine Division at home, as with all Industry he strove to prevent abroad. Break the Treaty with Spain he would not, his Heart was too much set upon it, for he could find no Protestant Princess good enough; the high and elated Extraction of Kings will raise the People up to a kind of Adoration (as the old Heathens did the Race of their Gods and Heroes.) whereas true Honesty and Piety finds out such Matches, as may as well bring Glory to God as to Man, not Worldly Blessings only, but Heavenly also. Lose the Love of the People he was loth; for he thought his peaceable Reign gained upon them, and that no King had ever deserved better of a People than he. But Peace is a kind of Soft Rayment, or Masking-Dress, not always to be worn: Standing Lakes beget Corruption. The Pool of Bethesda had no Virtue till it was stirred. War is necessary as Physick for unsound Bodies. Justum id Bellum quibus necessarium.

The Parliament is dissolved.

When the King had weighed every particular Scruple, by the Ballance of his own Reason, and Council about him, he took a Resolution to dissolve the Parliament; which he did by Proclamation, the 6th of January, being 15 Days after the Protestation was made. So much Time he measured out by the Scale of Consideration, before he would pull down such a Structure of Love, as never was built by the People for any of his Predecessors; which he implies in his Proclamation, laying there all the Blame upon the House of Commons, and not on them in general, but on some ill-temper'd Spirits, (as he call'd them) that sowed Tares among the Corn, and frustrated the Hopes of a plentiful Harvest: Striving by these Imputations to take away the Odium that such a Dissolution might produce.

A Proclamation against Talking.

The Parliament (and consequently the Union between the King and People) being thus dissolved, every Man's Tongue is let loose to run Riot. And tho' the King loved Hunting above all other Exercises, and had many good Hunters about him; yet all those, and the Strength of a Proclamation, (put out to forbid talking of State Affairs) could not restrain them from mouthing out, That Great Britain was become less than little England; that they had lost Strength by changing Sexes; and that he was no King, but a Fidler's Son; otherwise he would not suffer such Disorders at home, and so much Dishonour abroad. So dangerous it is for Princes, by a flegmatick Remissness, to slacken the Ligaments of the Peoples Tongues; for such an over-flux of bad Humour may bring their Obedience to a Paralytick! And the Story of David Ritius, written by the King's own Tutor, Buchanan, had died in every English Opinion, if it had not had a new Impression by these Miscarriages.

Sets Peoples Tongues a-work.

And they say further, Why should he assume to himself the Title of Defender of the Faith, that suffers the Protestants of Germany and France to be extirpated. That he might almost have purchased such a Country as the Palatinate, with the Money spent on Ambassages; and that his promising the French Protestants Assistance, (by their Agents that interceded for them) made them the more resolute, and confident to their Ruine: So that they might well call England the Land of Promise. And all that he got by his Lip-labour Assistance from the French King, was, That his Ambassador, Sir Edward Herbert, was snapp'd up by Luynes, the young Constable and Favourite there; with, What hath your Master to do with us and our Business? Whereas the English Fleet's the Glory of the World, if employ'd) would have taught the French Pride to know, that a Looker on sees more than the Gamester; and he that strikes with Passion, will many times thank them that take him off by Friendly Admonition. Such Discourses as these flew up and down from Lip to Lip, that it was almost Treason to hear, much more to speak.

Oxford and Southampton committed.

The Earl of Oxford was betray'd, and accus'd by one White, a Papist, (who was vulgarly call'd after in Derision by the Name of Oxford White) to have spoken some Words to the Dishonour of the King, and Disparagement of his Government, and was committed to the Tower. The Earl of Southampton was also committed to the Dean of Westminster. Oxford lay by it a great while, and being an active Man, the King sent him at last to Sea, to be one of Buckingham's Vice-Admirals for the English Coast, while Sir Robert Mansell guarded the Coasts of Spain from being infested with the Turks of Algier and Sally.

Sir Edw. Coke in Disgrace.

Sir Edward Coke, that was looked upon as one of the great Incendiaries in the House of Commons, is put from the Council-Table with Disgrace: The King saying, He was the fittest Instrument for a Tyrant that ever was in England,

An. Reg. 19. An. Christi 1621.

land. And yet in the House he call'd the King's Prerogative, a great Over-grown Monster. And how can these agree; unless because the King would not take his Counsel, he hanged himself on the other side. But whether the King had Cause to say the one, I know not; but he (it seems) found Cause enough to say the other.

Some punished, some preferred

Sir Thomas Crew, Sir Dudly Digges, Sir Nathaniel Rich, and Sir James Perrot, Men of great Repute and Knowledge, active in the House, were sent into Ireland, and joined with others in Commission, to enquire into Misdemeanours committed there, but (it was thought) as a Punishment for what they had commited here; for they were long detained from their own Occasions, under the Colour of an honourable Employment; and Sir Peter Hammon of Kent, and others, were sent into the Palatinate. This kind of Punishment beginning now to be in Fashion; and not long after this, Sir John Savile, the Knight of Yorkshire, that carried all the Country at a Beck, and a powerful Man in the House, is taken off by the King, made Comptroller of his Houshold, a Privy-Councellor, and not long after a Baron: So the King found out two ways of silencing those that were able to do him Mischief. Active Spirits, that come too near him, must either come nearer to him, or be sent further from him, which he doubts not will take off the Edge, and bate the Sharpness of the Humour another time. And these Preferments and Punishments were also practised by his Successor, with this Experiment in both, That the most popular Men, as soon as they wore the Court Livery, lost the love of the People; but those that suffered for them, were the more beloved and admired by them: The Commons of England having more than an ordinary Genius to support and strengthen the Pillars of their Liberties.

The King dishonoured abroad.

And as these Troubles bred Disturbance at home, so they begot Discredit abroad; for now (by this Breach) they undervalued the King's Power as much as they did before his Spirit; yea, even in the King of Spain's own Towns, (whilst this beloved Treaty was in heat) they in their Comedies presented Messengers bringing News in haste, That the Palatinate was like to have a very formidable Army shortly on foot: For the King of Denmark would furnish him with a Hundred thousand Pickel'd-Herrings, the Hollanders with a Hundred thousand Butter-Boxes, and England with a Hundred thousand Ambassadors. And they picture the King in one place with a Scabbard without a Sword: In another place with a Sword that no body could draw out, tho' divers stand pulling at it. At Brussels they painted him with his Pockets hanging out, and never a Penny in them nor in his Purse, turned upside down. In Antwerp they pictured the Queen of Bohemia like a poor Irish Mantler, with her Hair hanging about her Ears, and her Child at her Back, with the King her Father carrying the Cradle after her; and every one of these Pictures had several Motto's, expressing their Malice. Such Scorns and Contempts were put upon the King, and in him the whole Nation.

And now the Treaty goes on amain. The Lord Digby is sent into Spain Extraordinary Ambassador. To relate the manner of whose Entertainment, after his Arrival there, it may not be impertinent; for by it may be discovered the Course-grain of Spanish Civility, and how much our Ambassador went against the Hair then, tho' happily the Way may be smoother now.

He landed at St. Andrea in Biscay, a poor Maritime Town, where the People for the most part go all bare-foot; and there his Lordship had the Patience to stay a Fortnight, expecting the Court Civilities, which were then upon Remove from Madrid to Lerma, (being part of the way to St. Andrea) without any Intention to meet his Lordship. When his Expectations were tired with attending their Formalities, he sent his Secretary, Simon Digby, to Madrid, to be a Solicitor to the Duke of Lerma, (who then bore the Sway) that he might have his first Audience at Lerma. And after some waiting time, (tho' he had our King's Agent, Mr. Cottington, for his Assistant) he was returned with a Spanish Shrug, That the King would by no means admit of his Desire, because he knew the Ambassador came about Business, and he went to Lerma only for Pleasure. This was a Rub in his Lordship's way; and being impatient till it were removed, he sent again to Court a second Petition, which was to be presented with all the Power Cottington could make; and his Importunity got the upper Hand of the Spanish Resolution, (tho' much against their Minds) that he might come to Lerma; for which his Lordship was so elevated in his Spirits, that he pleased himself in an endeavouring way to express, That the King of Spain would not have done this Favour to any Ambassador, but the King of England's, nor to any that our King should have sent, but himself. And it may be partly true, for none (it is hoped) would have begg'd it so shamefully as he did; for there was no Business to be expected; that must be turned into Feasting and Jollity; and if he had not hunted after the King of Spain for the Favour, they would have let Don Juan (as they call'd him) dance Attendance at Madrid till all their Sports at Lerma had been finished: For all his Train (many of them Knights, and Gentlemen of good Quality) murmured to see him so slighted by the Spaniard; that being known to be a whole Month in the Country, he had not the least Message or Civility from the Court; which extraordinary Miscarriage would have put any but an Extraordinary Ambassador out of Countenance. But his Lordship made Bonne mine, and Pleased himself with the great Favours he should receive at Lerma, and so came forward to Burgos, which is within 20 English Miles of Lerma. And tho' the Court had been a Fortnight at Lerma, yet there was no more News of his Reception at Burgos, than if he had been still at St. Andrea.

And now his Lordship fearing they would wholly neglect him, thought it his best course to send Cottington (who met him at Burgos) to Lerma, to learn what their Pleasure was to do with him; who returning, brought word, that the next Day he should have advice what Order would be taken. And accordingly, one of the Duke of Lerma's Secretaries sent a poor Fellow with a Letter, that the next Day (being Sunday) there should be two Coaches sent, to bring his Lordship on Tuesday following to Villa Manza (a Village a Mile short of Lerma) where his Lodgings should be ready, and the King's Harbingers attending to prepare all Things with Diligence. This gave new Life to his Lordship's Spirits; the Coaches came according to the time, and to Villa Manza they went, every Man furnished in his best Accoutrements, hoping to see the Court that Night: But they only found a pitiful, poor, ragged Village; where, enquiring for the Lord Ambassador's House, the honest Country People told them, surely they were mistaken; they knew knew of no House, nor Harbinger, nor what they meant; being as much amazed at the strange Questions of the English, as they had cause to be at their strange Entertainment.

The English romed up and down the Town, and could discover no House fit for the Ambassador to go into; so that he was forced to sit in the Coach, and sent || Walsingham Greisley in all haste to Lerma, to know how he should be disposed of: Greisley returned, and told the Ambassador, They were all so busie in seeing a Play, that he could not come to Speak with any Man that understood any thing relating to his Lordship: Which so distracted him, that he began to doubt whether Villa Manza were the Place; and it begot a new Scrutiny; but the Scruple was quickly removed, by finding Villa Manza in the Letter in very legible Characters. And now he could no longer dissemble like an Ambassador; but supplying with Impatience what he wanted in Authority, commanded the Coach-man in a very hasty manner to drive back to Burgos, which they very punctually refused; whereupon his Lordship leap'd out of the Coach, and in a great Choler mounted on Horse-back, crying to his Company, Away. The Coach-men seeing him resolute, and fearing to lose their Reward, told his Lordship, They would venture a Chiding to do him Service; which dismounted him again, and he entred the Coach; but before the Wheels turned about, his Mind changed, and by some little whispering Advice of Cottington's, he now determined to tarry there all Night: So that after sitting still four Hours in a Coach, he made a worse Choice, entring into a poor Cottage, where bare Walls, and want of such fitting Furniture as helps Nature's Weariness, might tell his Lordship, that the Commons of England stand on a better Foundation than wooden Shoes. Yet the Owner of this House welcomed his Lordship with as much Gravity, as if it had been a well provided Castle; so that there was little Pleasure to be taken, to hear one so over-furnish'd with Words that had such empty Rooms.

But now News was brought, that a Harbinger was come, who said, there was a House, and all things provided; so that his Lordship composed his Countenance as well as he could upon such a sudden Warning, and commanded the Harbinger to be brought to him; who excusing himself for not coming time enough to attend his Lordship, said, He was glad to see his Lordship had lighted upon the right House. My Lord something dashed with the ill Accommodation, asked him, How he knew it to be the right House? He answered, That himself and one of his Fellows had been there the Day before to bespeak it. The Master of the House being questioned about it (having formerly deny'd it) made good his first Assertion, denying there was any Body at his House: Which put his Lordship into such a Fit of Anger, that he threatned to throw the Harbinger out of the Window for Lying. The Man, affrighted, quickly got down the Stairs, leaving his Lordship to his shifts, and He and his Train that Night were but slenderly provided for.

The next Morning Cottington went to Court betimes, where he spake with the Duke of Lerma, representing to him the Disorder that had been at Villa Manza, whereat the Duke seemed highly offended with the Officers; and as he was in his Heat, in comes the Harbinger, who being question'd for this Miscarriage, told the Duke (before Cottington's Face) That the Ambassador expected Two or Three Grandees should be sent to receive him, which failing in, he grew so Cholerick, that when he came to do his Service, he threatned to throw him out at the Window. The Duke, Perhaps glad of the Occasion, gave (by way of Diversion) good Ear to the Fellows words; and putting on the severest Countenance, told Cottington, He did not think that so great a Counsellor, as Don Juan, would have so miscarried with Passion, as to menace and affront the King's Officer in that manner: So that Cottington's Business was quite preverted; for whereas he came to complain of the Wrongs his Lordship had received, he was now driven to excuse the Error he had committed. So that the Duke of Lerma left him in his old House a Day or Two, to consider well of it, and then the Conde de Salazar, one of the King's Major Domo's, was sent to accompany him to the Court. These were the Glories of the Spanish Entertainments, the Honour they gave the English, and the Groundwork of that Union betwixt the Nations, whereon they built up some great Formalities, which (like Royal Shadows) vanished in the End, and came to nothing.

As the Lord Digby is sent into Spain to smooth the way over the Pyrene, so Gage is sent to Rome to make the Alpes accessible; for the Dispensation must be had from thence for the Marriage. That Man of Sin, as the Primum mobile; he turns about all inferior Orbs at his Pleasure; usurping a Terrene Deity, and holds it by the Chains of Conscience, even now when the Light of Learning and Knowledge, with a Marvellous Influence, shines over the Christian World. At home, the Prisons are set open; Priests and Jesuits walk about at noon-day to deceive; and Gondemar vaunts of Four thousand Recusants that his Intercession had released, either to make his Service the more acceptable to his Master, or to let him see how willing our King is to do any thing to advance that Match that they never intend. Who is not so nice, but that he can stay for a Dispensation from Rome; to expedite which, he writes to some of the activest Cardinals there, and receives Answers from them, by Gage his Agent, full of alluring Hopes. (Car. Bandino, Car. Lervisa.) And, that he might give some more publick Testimony of his Indulgence, he commands Dr. Williams, Bishop of Lincoln, then Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, to pass Writs under the Great Seal, to require the Judges of every Circuit to enlarge all such Papists as were imprisoned for Recusancy. Whereupon the Lord Keeper issued out these Writs; and, to let the Judges see how well he was pleased with this Command, he corroborates their Authority with this Letter, signed with his own Hand.

(Lord Keeper's Letter to the Judges.)

After my hearty Commendations to you. His Majesty having resolved (out of deep Reasons of State, and in Expectation of like Correspondence from Foreign Princes to the Professors of our Religion) to grant some Grace and Connivance to the Imprison'd Papists of this Kingdom, hath commanded me to pass some Writs under the Broad Seal to that Purpose: Requiring the Judges of every Circuit to enlarge the said Prisoners, according to the Tenor and Effect of the same. I am to give you to understand (from his

|| In the above-mentioned Collection of Original Letters that passed between King James and the Duke of Buckingham, I find one Greisley often nam'd, as the Bearer of several of these Letters from Madrid and back again.

Majesty)

A. Reg. 19.
An. Christi 1621.

Majesty) how his Majesty's Royal Pleasure is, that upon Receipt of these Writs, you shall make no niceness, or difficulty, to extend that his Princely Favour to all such Papists as you shall find Prisoners in the Goals of your Circuits, for any Church Recusancy whatsoever, or refusing the Oath of Supremacy, or dispersing Popish Books, or hearing, saying of Mass, or any other point of Recusancy, which doth touch or concern Religion only, and not Matters of State. And so I bid you farewel.

Westminster Coll. 2 Aug. 1622. Your loving Friend, JO. LINCOLN.

His Preferment, Character and part of his Story.

This Bishop succeeded the Lord Verulam, not as Chancellor, but Keeper of the Great Seal, he having, been by Buckingham's means, made Dean of Westminster, and Bishop of Lincoln, upon Neil's remove to Durham; and for a long time had very gracious Acceptance with the Countess of Buckingham, who was a great Means to smooth his Passage to all these Places; and the Marquess her Son was the rather induced to it, because he was his Creature, and could mould him (as he thought) to serve his own Turn; though when he had sifted and tried him, he found some Pharisaical Leaven in him, and afterwards in the next King's Reign threw him by. For though, he were composed of many Grains of good Learning, yet the Height of his Spirit (I will not say Pride) made him odious, even to those that raised him; happily, because they could not attain to those Ends by him, that they required of him: For great and good Officers ought to be just to their own Principles, and not deviate from them for any Worldly Respects.

But being of a comely and stately Presence, and that animated with a great Mind, made him appear very proud to the Vulgar Eye; but that very Temper raised him to aim at great Things, which he effected, for the old ruinous Body of the Abbey-Church at Westminster was new clothed by him, The fair and beautiful Library of St. John's in Cambridge, was a Pile of his Erection; and a very compleat Chapel built by him at Lincoln-College in Oxford, meerly for the Name of Lincoln, having no Interest in, nor Relation to that University. These were Arguments of a great Mind, how far from Ostentation in this frail Body of Flesh, cannot be determined, because the Benefit of publick Actions smooths every Stone that makes up the Building.

* But that which heightned him most in the Opinion of those that knew him best, was his bountiful Mind to Men in Want, being a great Patron to support, where there was Merit that wanted Supply. Among the rest, Monsieur de Molin, a very famous Minister of France, (in the Persecution there) driven into England for Refuge. The Bishop hearing of him, spoke to Doctor Hacket, his Chaplain, to make him a Visit from him. And because (saith he) I think the Man may be in want, in a strange Country, carry him some Money, not naming the Sum, because he would sound the Depth of his Chaplain's Mind. Doctor Hacket finding the Bishop nominate no Proportion, told him, He could not give him less than Twenty Pounds. I did demur upon the Sum (said the Bishop) to try you. Is Twenty Pounds a fit Gift for me to give a Man of his Parts and Deserts? Take a Hundred Pounds and present it from me, and tell him he shall not want, and I will come shortly and visit him my self. Which he after performed, and made good his Promise, in supplying him during his abode in England.

But these great Actions were not publickly visible; those were most apparent that were looked on with an Envious, rather than an Emulous Eye. For the close and intimate Correspondence that was betwixt this Bishop and the old Countess, set many scurrilous Tongues and Pens a-work, though he was (as I have been assured) Eunuchus ab Utero; which shews, that nothing can prevent Malice, but such an Innocence as it cannot lay hold on. For it hath ever been accounted a Crime, not to endeavour to prevent the Voice of Calumny.

His Breach with Laud Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Disgraces put upon him by the Court, will not fall in here; nor his closing again, and strugling when he saw the Axe laid to the Root of Episcopacy. But by this Man's Actions (as in a Mirror) may be seen, that a great Estate which (besides his Bounty) his Places procured him, is a liquorish Temptation to make a Man, Proteus-like, vary from one Shape to another, and to shape no direct Course, but to go still as the Wind blows.

Archbishop Abbot kills a Keeper.

Not long before this, that Reverend Prelate George Archbishop of Canterbury, a Man of a Holy and Unblamable Life (meddling with edged Tools that he used not to handle in his Study) by a sad Accident killed a Keeper with a forked Arrow as he was shooting at a Deer. This was a great Perplexity to the good Man, and a heavy Knell to his Aged Spirit, which he petitioned the King might ring a Requiem to his retired Thoughts at Guildford, his Place of Birth, where he had built a very Munificent Alms-house for poor People, and where he went to bring his Spirit under, to make it more blessed than the Glories of the World can contribute to it. There were very many willing to have him retire to his Rest, that gaped after his Dignity more than Desert; and though Doctor Laud was but newly initiated into his Bishoprick of St. David's (by other Hands, because those of the Archbishop were tinctured with Blood, as he saith himself) yet his Enmity was not small against him, for being a Means to let the King know, he was reputed a Papist in Oxford, and of a dangerous turbulent Spirit: But the King granted out a Commission to enquire, Whether casual Homicide did make the Archbishop irregular? And in the Disquisition of it, he found many Friends that restor'd him from his Alms-house to his Palace. But this he did, and would have done in either Condition. The Widow of the Man that fell by him, was raised by him; and she and her Children (as may be said) built a commodious Being upon his Grave.

Arminianism flourished.

The King's Mercy and Indulgence extending towards the Papists, taught many Men to come as near Popery as they could stretch, finding it the next way to Preferment; so that Arminius's Tenets flew up and down from Pulpit to

* The Character our Author gives of the Lord-Keeper Williams, agrees with what hath been publish'd many Years after, both in the History of himself, and of Archbishop Laud; and we have an Argument, how well our Author was acquainted with the most minute Passages of that time, in what he tells us of the Lord-Keeper's Discourse with his Chaplain Hacket about Monsieur du Moulin, and of his being Eunuchus ab Utero. Neither of which was ever taken notice of by any Writer but himself, till Hacket's Life of Williams, publish'd near Forty Years after our Author's Death, made mention of both.

A. Reg. An. Ch. 162

Pulpit; that, indeed, Preaching was nothing but Declamation, little tending to Edification (such Orthodox Ministers, as strove to refute these Erronious Opinions, being looked on as Puritans and Antimonarchical) which continual rubbing one against another begot so much Heat, as might have blown into a Flame not easie to be quenched. And the King had daily information how the Pulpits rung against the Spanish Match. So that to settle these Extravagancies, he directs his Letters to the Archbishop of Canterbury in this manner for Regulating of the Ministry.

The King's Letter for regulating the Ministry.

MOST Reverend Father in God, Right Trusty and entirely Beloved Councellor, We greet you well. Forasmuch as the Abuses and Extravagancies of Preachers in the Pulpit have been in all Times repressed in this Realm, by some Act of Council or State, with the Advice and Resolution of grave and learned Prelates; insomuch, that the very licensing of Preachers had beginning, by an Order of Star-Chamber, the Eighth Day of July, in the Nineteenth Year of the Reign of King Henry the Eight, our Noble Predecessor: And whereas at this present, divers young Students, by reading of late Writers and ungrounded Divines, do broach many times unprofitable, unsound, seditious, and dangerous Doctrines, to the scandal of the Church, and disquiet of the State and present Government. We, upon humble Representations unto Us of these Inconveniencies by your self, and sundry other grave and reverend Prelates of this Church; as also of Our Princely Care and Zeal for the Extirpation of Schism and Dissention growing from these Seeds, and for the settling of a Religious and Peaceable Government both in Church and Common-wealth; do, by these Our special Letters, straitly charge and command you, to use all possible Care and Diligence, that these Limitations and Cautions, herewith sent unto you concerning Preachers, be duly and strictly, from henceforth put in practice, and observed, by the several Bishops within your Jurisdiction. And to this end, Our Pleasure is, that you send them forthwith Copies of these Directions, to be by them speedily sent, and Communicated unto every Parson, Vicar, Curate, Lecturer and Minister, in every Cathedral or Parish Church, within their Diocese: And that you earnestly require them, to employ their utmost Endeavours in the Performance of this so important a Business, letting them know, that We have a special Eye unto their Proceedings, and expect a strict Account thereof, both from you, and every of them: And these Our Letters shall be your sufficient Warrant and Discharge in that behalf. Given under Our Signet at Our Castle of Windsor the Fourth of August, in the Twentieth Year of Our Reign.

Directions concerning Preachers, sent with the Letter.

'1. THAT no Preacher under the Degree and Calling of a Bishop, or Dean of a Cathedral or Collegiate Church, (and they upon the King's days, and set Festivals) do take Occasion (by the Expounding of any Text of Scripture whatsoever) to fall into any set Discourse or Common Place, otherwise than by opening the Coherence and Division of the Text, which shall not be comprehended and Warranted in Essence, Substance, Effect, or Natural Inference, within some one of the Articles of Religion, set forth in 1562, or in some of the Homilies set forth by Authority of the Church of England, not only for a help for the Non-preaching, but withal for a Pattern and Boundary (as it were) for the Preaching Ministers. And for their further Instructions for the performance hereof, that they forthwith read over and peruse diligently the said Book of Articles, and the Two Books of Homilies.

'2. That no Parson, Vicar, Curate, or Lecturer, shall Preach any Sermon or Collation hereafter, upon Sundays and Holidays in the Afternoon, in any Cathedral or Parish Church throughout the Kingdom, but upon some part of the Catechism, or some Text taken out of the Creed, Ten Commandments, or the Lord's Prayer (Funeral Sermons only excepted) and that those Preachers be most encouraged, and approved of, who spend the Afternoons Exercise in the Examination of Children in their Catechism, which is the most ancient and laudable Custom of Teaching in the Church of England.

'3. That no Preacher, of what Title soever, under the Degree of a Bishop or Dean at the least, do from henceforth presume to Preach in any Popular Auditory the deep Points of Predestination, Election, Reprobation, or of the Universality, Efficacy, Resistibility, or Irresistibility of God's Grace, but leave those Themes rather to be handled by the Learned Men, and that moderately and modestly, by way of Use and Application, rather than by way of Positive Doctrines, being fitter for the Schools than for simple Auditories.

'4. That no Preacher, of what Title or Denomination soever, from henceforth shall presume in any Auditory within this Kingdom to declare, limit, or bound out, by way of Positive Doctrine, in any Lecture or Sermon, the Power, Prerogative and Jurisdiction, Authority or Duty of Sovereign Princes, or otherwise meddle with Matters of State, and the Differences between Princes and the People, then as they are Instructed and Precedented in the Homilies of Obedience, and the rest of the Homilies and Articles of Religion, set forth (as before is mentioned) by publick Authority, but rather confine themselves wholly to those Two Heads of Faith and Good Life, which are all the Subject of the ancient Sermons and Homilies.

'5. That no Preacher, of what Title or Denomination soever, shall presume causelesly, or (without Invitation from the Text) fall into bitter Invectives, and undecent railing Speeches against the Persons of either Papists or Puritans, but modestly and gravely, when they are occasioned thereunto, by the Text of Scripture, free both the Doctrine and the Discipline of the Church of England from the Aspersions of either Adversary, especially when the Auditory is suspected to be tainted with the one or the other Infection.

'Lastly, That the Archbishops and Bishops of the Kingdom (whom his Majesty hath good Cause to blame for this former Remisness) be more wary and choice in their Licensing of Preachers, and revoke all Grants made to any Chancellor, Official, or Commissary, to pass Licenses in this kind. And that all the Lecturers throughout the Kingdom of England (a new Body severed from the ancient Clergy, as being neither Parsons, Vicars nor Curates) be Licensed henceforward in the Court of Faculties, but only from a Recommendation of the Party from the Bishop of the Diocese, under his Hand and Seal, with a Fiat from the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, a Confirmation under the Great Seal of England. And

'that

A. Reg. 20. An. Christi 1622.

'that such as do transgress any one of these Directions, be suspended by the Bishop of the Diocese, or, in his Default, by the Archbishop of the Province, ab Officio, & Beneficion, for a Year and a Day, until his Majesty, by the Advice of the next Convocation, shall prescribe some further Punishment.

Observations upon the Directions.

The Directions the Archbishop recommended to his several Diocesans, that they might be put in Execution with Caution, And then may be observed, that the King's Affections tended to the peaceable Comportment of his People, that both Papist and Puritan might have a quiet Being; which preponderation of his put them in Æqui-librio; nay, the Papist was in the prime Scale. But this new thing called a Lecturer, he could by no means endure, unless he pass'd through all the Briers of his several Courts to the Broad Seal, which was a kind of pungent Ordeal Tryal, to which he must put his Teste me ipso, and then it was Orthodox; so that though Lecturers were not absolutely forbidden, yet the Charge and Trouble to come to it, made the way inaccessible. Preachers by an Order of Star-Chamber in Heaven were first Licensed, with an Ite, prædicate, before Henry VIIIth's time; and certainly they have a Great Seal from thence for what they do: Therefore it behoves them to take heed what they say, lest that Spirit they receive Directions from bind them not up.

Papists the Fomenters.

But this Animosity of the King's against Puritans, was thought to be fomented by the Papists, whose Agent Bishop Laud, was suspected to be, though in Religion he had a Motley Form by himself, and would never, (as a Priest told me plainly in Flanders) bring his Neck under the Obedience of the Roman Yoak, tho' he might stickle for the Grandure of the Clergy. And now he began to be Buckingham's Confessor, (as he expresseth in his own Notes) and wore the Court Livery, tho' the King had a sufficient Character of him, and was pleased with Asseveration to protest his incentive Spirit should be kept under, that the Flame should not break out by any Preferment from him. But that was now forgotten, and he crept so into Favour, that he was thought to be the Bellows that blew these Fires. For the Papists used all the Artifices they could to make a Breach between the King and his People, that they might enter at the same for their own Ends: Which, to accomplish, they slily close with the Chief Ministers of State, to put the King upon all his Projects and Monopolies displeasing to the People, that they might the more Alienate their Affections from him: Sowing their Seeds of Division also betwixt Puritan and Protestant; so that (like the second Commandment) they quite exclude the Protestant; for all those were Puritans with this High-grown Arminian-Popish Party, that held in Judgment the Doctrine of the Reformed Churches, or in Practice live according to the Doctrine publickly taught in the Church of England. And they attribute the Name of Protestant,

1. To such Papists, as, either out of Policy or by Popish Indulgence, hold outward Communion with the Church of England.

2. To such Protestants, as were either tainted with, or inclinable to their Opinions.

3. To indifferent Men, who imbrace always that Religion that shall be commanded by Authority. Or,

4. To such Neutrals as care for no Religion, but such as stands with their own liking; so that they allow the Church of England the Refuse both of their Religion, and ours.

Regians and Republicans.

Then they strive to make a Division of Regians and Republicans: The Regians are the great Dependents upon the Crown, both in Church and State, who swell up the Prerogative, preaching and distilling into the King the Almightiness of his Power. That all that the People hath is the King's, and that it is by his Mercy they have a bare empty Being. And this hoisting up of the King, they knew, would stir up the Republicans to oppose him in his Designs, by which they pinch (as the King thinks) his Prerogative; feeding a Strife betwixt Law and Prerogative, whereby they escape the Dint of both, and hope the Fire they kindle will break out at last to consume their Adversaries. That these Things were acted and fomented by Papists, was very probable, for they were great Sticklers about the Court and Council-Table. But it was too apparent that some of the Clergy (to make their way the smoother to their wished End) began so to adore the King, that he could not be named, but more Reverence was done to it than to the Name of God; And the Judges in their itinerant Circuits (the more to enslave the People to Obedience) being to speak of the King, would give him such Sacred and Oraculous Titles, as if their Advancement to higher Places must necessarily be laid upon the Foundation of the Peoples Debasement.

On the other side: The well-affected to Religion (that knew no other Inclination than the Dictates of their own Reason, Experiences of former Times, and the constant Practices of the Romanists for propagating their own Designs) did, by their Writings and Discourses, strive to warm the King's cold Temper, and put fresh Spirits into his chilled Veins; shewing the Tyranny of the incroaching Monarchy of the House of Austria, (who was Rome's great Factor) and how just and secure the opposing of such a growing Power will be; That no Sword is so sharp, nor Arms so strong, as those that are cemented with true Religion. The security of Conscience, grounded upon the Word of Truth, being not only a Bulwark to defend, but the best Engine to oppose Idolatry and Ambition. Thus stood the Kingdom divided in it self.

The King active in the Treaty.

But as the King strove (after this Rupture betwixt him and the Parliament) to settle Things at home, and keep his People in Obedience, so he was as active abroad to keep up his own Reputation: For he made a full account to salve up all these Miscarriages by the intended Match with Spain, that his People might see he could discern further into the intrinsical Matters of State than they, and so make the Error theirs. Therefore he plied it by his Ambassadors and Agents, and all Indulgences to Recusants were admitted to sweeten their Addresses. The Lord Vaux, a Papist, had freedom to transport Four Thousand English, to reinforce the King of Spain's Armies, both against our King's Confederates of Holland, (under whose Protection his banished Children had Refuge) and against their Country it self the Palatinate, which the King so much endeavoured to preserve.

The Articles of Marriage long a settling.

The Articles of Marriage had taken up much time in Debate, between the Commissioners of the two Kings, before they could be brought to any Form, and the principal Articles (that concerned Religion) had many various Shapes put upon them, till they were dress'd to their Minds;

Minds: And when they were fitted and fashioned by them, the Pope stripp'd them naked, and put upon them what Garment they pleased: He hath his Index Expurgatorius in every thing. And, to dead our King's hopes, the Pope urges, Quod Ecclesiastici nullis legibus subjaceant, nisi suorum superiorum Ecclesiasticorum; That the Ecclesiasticks should be subject to no Laws, but what they brought along with them; which gave Liberty to do what they pleased, and to be punished for their ill Doing how they pleased. That the Children of the Infanta might be brought up in the Popish Religion, Usque ad Annos nubiles, till it be well rooted in them: And that she might have a publick Church in the City for all Comers, besides her Chappel in the Court, which extended to little less than an open Toleration. Some other Rubs the Popes threw in the way, which the King stumbled at, not being in the Articles treated on betwixt him and the King of Spain, which he insists on to that King, disclaims any Treaty with the Pope, tho' his Agent Gage made daily Addresses to him by Cardinal Bandino, with whom our King held † Correspondence. And he requires the Lord Digby in Spain to press that King to a final Resolution, that he might provide some other Match for his Son, if this should not succeed; For (saith he) We have in a manner already done that which is desired, as all the Roman Catholicks have found; which if the Pope had known, it is to be presumed, he would not so much have insisted upon these Points. And the sending and resending betwixt Spain and Rome, and Rome and Spain, spends Time, and may serve for a Colour to draw the Treaty in infinitum. But yet willing he was to have some Anchor-hold for his Hopes: For in the same Letter he saith, Neverthelesse if you find it a thing impossible for them to resolve without a Reply to Rome, and that they do earnestly desire it, we are contented that you shall yield them two Months time after your Audience, and longer we cannot expect.

Quæ semel est imbuta recens servabit odorem Testa diu.

Our King's Resolution.

These Resolutions were sent Post into Spain, inclosed in this following Letter, which is very necessary to be inserted here, tho' taken from Mr. Pryn's Collection, who had this and others among the Lord Cottington's Papers, (a great Agent afterward in the Spanish Affairs) and are the bitter Kernel, preserved by Cottington when the Shell of the Treaty was broke.

Sent to Digby in Spain.

'Right trusty, &c. Your Dispatch of the 9th of August gave us so much Contentment, and so great Hopes of Satisfaction, in all those Businesses, which you have there to Treat with that King, as we could not expect any further Difficulties: Notwithstanding by that which hath come to our Hands immediately after, as well by George Gage from Rome, as by our Ambassador Sir Richard Weston at Brussels, and our Ministers in the Palatinate; We find that neither the Dispensation is granted for the Match, nor the Treaty of Cessation so near a Conclusion, as we conceived it would have been, now that the Auxillaries and all other Obstacles are removed. But on the contrary side, that new Delays and Excuses are invented, or Garisons in the Palatinate in the meantime blocked up, Heidelberg it self actually besieged: Which Proceeding, tho' our Ambassador hath expostulated with the Infanta and the Commissioners, as injurious to us, and ill beseeming their Professions hitherto, yet is there not that Readiness shewed to give us such Contentment therein as we might justly expect, but Answers still protracted and put off for Advantage, whilst our Forces there remain in great Distress, and the Town and Castle of Heidelberg likely in a few Days to be lost, for it cannot hold out long, as we are informed. This Dealing seems the more strange unto us, for that the late Dispatch of the King of Spain was (before the News of the Siege, and that our Ambassador had propounded any concerning it) come unto the Infanta. But because you shall be particularly informed of the whole Carriage of the Business, we have given Order that Copies shall be sent you of all the Dispatch, and then you shall see how these Proceeding agree with the Hopes and Promises which are given us from thence.

1622.

Spanish Juggling.

'Hereupon therefore our Pleasure is, That you shall immediately, and with as much speed as you may, crave Audience of that King, and represent unto him the Merit which we may justly challenge unto our self, for our sincere Proceeding with the Emperor, and him, in all the Course of this Business, notwithstanding the many Invitations and Temptations which we have had, to engage our self on our Son-in-Law's Part. That we have had, both from the Emperor and him, Hopes given us, from time to time, of extraordinary Respect, howsoever our Son-in-Law had deserv'd, which we have attended, and expected even to the very last, with much Patience, and in despight (as it were) of all the Opposition that hath been made to shake our Resolution in that behalf. If now when all Impediments are removed, and that the Way is so prepared, as that the Emperor may give an End unto the War, and make some present Demonstration of his Respects towards us, in leaving us the Honour of holding those poor Places, which yet remain quietly and peaceably, until the general Accommodation, the same shall nevertheless be violently taken from us, what can we look for when the whole shall be in his Hands and Possession? who amusing us with a Treaty of Cessation, and protracting it industriously, (as we have Reason to believe) doth in the mean time seize himself of the whole Country; which being done, our Ambassador shall return with Scorn, and we remain with Dishonour.

'I shall not need to furnish you with Arguments for the unfolding and laying open this unfriendly Dealing more plainly unto them; your own Reason and Observation will find enough out of the Dispatches, whereof Copies are sent unto you; as namely, The withdrawing of the Spanish Forces, and leaving the Business wholly in the Hands of the Emperor and the Duke of Bavaria; The Stile of the Infanta, in answering our Ambassador with Recriminations, which was not her manner heretofore; The slight and frivolous Answer given by the Marquis of Bedmar unto our Ambassador, when he acquainted him with the Siege of Heidelberg; The quarrellous Occasion taken by the Emperor for calling the Diet at Ratisbon, contrary to his own Promise, which, in his Dispatch to us, he confesseth to have broken, Austrian Juggling.

† There is oftner than once mention made of the King's and Buckingham's Correspondence with the Cardinals Ludovisio and Barberini, in the Collection of Original Letters above mentioned. In one of them, Buckingham sends to the King a Letter, he had wrote to Cardinal Ludovisio, for his Majesty's Amendments,

A. Reg. 20. An. Chriſti 1622.

'as you will ſee by the Copy. All which, and 'many more, which your own Judgment (in 'the peruſal of the Diſpatches) will ſuggeſt un-'to you, do miniſter unto us Cauſe ſufficient of 'Jealouſy on the Emperor's Part, as you ſhall 'plainly tell that King; altho' we will not do 'him that Wrong as to miſtruſt, that he gives 'the leaſt Conſent to it. In this Confidence, 'with much Earneſtneſs, we ſhall ſtill ſolicite 'him, that, for the Affection he bears us, and 'the Deſire which we ſuppoſe he hath, that 'there may continue for ever a perfect Amity 'betwixt us and the whole Houſe of Auſtria, he 'will not ceaſe to do all good Offices herein; 'letting him know directly, That in theſe Terms 'we cannot ſtand with the Emperor; but that, 'if Heidelberg be won, or the Siege continue, 'or the Ceſſation be long unneceſſarily delay'd, 'we muſt recall our Ambaſſador from Bruſſels, 'and treat no more, as we have already given 'Order; hoping, that whatſoever Unkindneſs 'we ſhall conceive againſt the Emperor upon 'theſe Occaſions, it ſhall not be interpreted to 'reflect in any ſort upon the entire Affection 'that is at this preſent, and as we hope ſhall al-'ways continue, betwixt us and the Crown of 'Spain. And therefore, as we have heretofore 'ſundry times promiſed, in Teſtimony of the 'Sincerity of our Proceedings, and of our 'great Deſire to preſerve the Amity inviolable 'between us and the whole Houſe of Auſtria, 'That in caſe our Son-in-Law would not be go-'verned by us, that then we would not only 'forſake him, but take part, and join our For-'ces with the Emperor againſt him; ſo you 'may fairly repreſent unto that King, That in 'like manner we have Reaſon to expect 'the ſame Meaſure from him, that (upon 'the Emperor's Averſeneſs to a Ceſſation and 'Accommodation) he will likewiſe actually 'aſſiſt us, for the Recovery of the Palatinate, 'and Electoral Dignity, unto our Son-in-Law, 'as it hath been oftentimes intimated from 'Spain.

'To conclude, we ſhall not need to ſay any 'more unto you touching this Point, but to let 'you ſee, That our Meaning is, to carry all 'Things fair with that King, and not to give 'him any Cauſe of Diſtruſt or Jealouſy, if you 'perceive that they intend to go really and 'roundly on with the Match: Wherein never-'theleſs we muſt tell you, that we have no 'great Cauſe to be well pleaſed with the Dili-'gences uſed on that part, when we obſerve, 'that after ſo long an Expectance of the 'Diſpenſation, upon which the whole Buſineſs '(as they will have it) depends, there is no-'thing yet returned but Queries and Objections. 'Yet becauſe we will not give over our Pa-'tience a while longer, untill we underſtand 'more certainly what the Effect thereof is like 'to be, wherein we require you to be very wa-'ry and watchful, conſidering how our Ho-'nour is therein engaged; we have thought fit 'to let you know, how far we are pleaſed to 'enlarge our ſelf, concerning thoſe Points de-'manded by the Pope, and ſet down by way of 'Poſtil unto the Articles agreed upon betwixt 'Spain and us, as you ſhall ſee by the Power 'which Gage brought us from Rome, whereof 'we have ſent you a Copy, and our Reſolutions 'thereupon ſigned with our own Hand, for your 'Warrant and Inſtruction. And further than 'that ſince we cannot go without much Pre-'judice, Inconvenience, and Diſhonour to our 'ſelf and our Son, we hope and expect the 'King of Spain will bring it inſtantly to an 'Iſſue, without further Delay, which you are 'to preſs with all Diligence and Earneſtneſs, 'that you may preſently know their final Reſo-'lution, and what we may expect thereupon 'But if any Reſpite of time be earneſtly de-'manded, and that you preceive it not poſſible 'for them to reſolve until an Anſwer come from 'Rome, we then think it fit that you give them 'two Months time after your Audience, that 'we may underſtand that King's final Reſolution 'before Chriſtmas next at the furtheſt.

Wanſted, 9 Sept. 1622.

The King abuſed.

This Letter doth not only diſcover the Shuf-fling and Fox-like Contrivances of the Houſe of Auſtria to Work and Earth themſelves in the Palatinate, but alſo the Scorns and Reproaches put upon our King, and (if I may ſo call them) his Terriers, who (with little Bayings only) let them work till they had got into their Faſt-neſſes and ſtrong Holds, and then they may bay at leiſure, and blame their lazy Belief. But notwithſtanding our King threatens in his Let-ter, if Heidelberg be loſt, and the Ceſſation de-lay'd, he will Treat no more; yet the Deſire of the Match was ſo radicated in his Heart, that neither the Loſs of Heidelberg or Manheim that ſucceeded it, nor the Blocking up of Franken-dale, (the laſt ſtrong Hold, of his Son-in-Law's Inheritance) could mortify his Hopes: But as the Emperor beſieged thoſe Towns with his Ar-mies, ſo he beſet the King of Spain with his Treaties. And the Lord Digby, tho' quicken'd by this Letter, did not lay open the cunning Carriage of theſe Contrivers, (which tended to root out the Reformed Religion in Germany) nor preſs home theſe Particulars, as he was en-joined; but only let the King of Spain know, That his late Father, by the Advice of his Eccleſia-ſticks in Spain, had conſented to the Articles of Mar-riage, in Matters of Religion, five Months ſince; yet there were Demurs upon theſe Points, notwithſtanding that the King of Great Britain complied in all things, then demanded particularly, what he would do in Fa-vour of the Catholicks; But now, after two Years time, the Pope, of his own accord, without any Intimation to Spain) had ſent directly for England, propounding to the King his Maſter, not only many Alterations in the Capitulations, (before a Diſpenſation could be granted) but intruded ſomething new, which the King would by no means yield unto: Wherefore, to expe-dite the Buſineſs, (the King having neglected all other Treaties of Marriage for his Son theſe ſix Years paſt, only in reſpect of this Treaty) he is commanded to declare plainly to the King of Spain, how far the King his Maſter may condeſcend in Matters of Religion; and if that will give Content, to proceed to a Concluſion of the Marriage, without more Delays (ſeeing he hath yielded to much more than was capitu-lated in the late King of Spain's time); if this will not ſatisfy, that then, without Loſs of more Time, the King his Maſter may diſpoſe of his Son, and the King of Spain of the Infanta, as they pleaſe.

Digby faulty.

Theſe Things were ruminated on by the ſlow-pac'd Spaniſh Gravity, and fair and plauſible An-ſwers preſented, that, like Fruits of Diſſimula-tion, gave but ſmall Nouriſhment to Hope, yet it kept it alive, (tho' in a drooping Condition) and it was only ſuſtain'd till they could bring their Ends about. Which our King now ſuſ-pecting, (as he had good Cauſe) from the con-ſtant Intelligences given him, of the Diminu-tion of his own Forces in the Palatinate, and the growing Strength of the Enemy, he diſ-patches

A. Reg. 20. An. Christi 1622. patches this second Letter to the Baron Digby, to let the King of Spain know how sensible he was of being abused, and how loth he was to see it.

Second Letter to Digby. 'RIght Trusty, &c. There is none better 'knoweth than your self, how we have laboured, ever since the beginning of these unfortunate Troubles of the Empire, (notwithstanding all Opposition to the contrary) to 'merit well of our good Brother the King of 'Spain, and the whole House of Austria, by a 'long and lingering Patience, grounded still 'upon his Friendship and Promises, that Care 'should be had of our Honour, and of our 'Childrens Patrimony and Inheritance. We 'have acquainted you also from time to time, 'since the beginning of the Treaty at Brussels, 'how crosly all Things have there proceeded, 'notwithstanding all the fair Professions made 'unto us, both by the King of Spain and the 'Infanta, and all his Ministers, and the Letters 'written by him unto the Emperor, and them 'effectually, (at least as they endeavoured to 'make us believe); but what Fruits have we of 'all these? Whilst we are Treating, the Town 'and Castle of Heidelberg are taken by Force, 'our Garison put to the Sword, Manheim be'sieged, and all the Hostility used that is in the 'Power of an Enemy, as you may see by the 'Relation which we have commanded our Se'cretary to send you. Our Pleasure therefore 'is, That you immediately, as soon as you can 'get Audience, let that King understand, how 'sensible we are of these Proceedings of the 'Emperor towards us; and withal are not a lit'tle troubled to see, that the Infanta (having an 'absolute Commission to conclude a Cessation 'and Suspension of Arms) should now at last, 'when all Objections were answer'd, and the 'former (solely) pretended Obstacles removed, 'not only delay the Conclusion of the Treaty, 'but refuse to lay her Command upon the Em'peror's Generals, to abstain from the Siege of 'our Garisons during the Treaty, upon a Pre'text of want of Authority: So as for avoiding 'of further Dishonour, we have been forced to 'recall both our Ambassadors, as well the Chan'cellor of our Exchequer, (who is already re'turned to our Presence) as also the Lord Chi'chester, who we intended to have sent unto 'the Emperor to the Diet at Ratisbon. Seeing 'therefore that, meerly out of our extraordinary 'Respect to the King of Spain, and the firm 'Confidence we ever put in the Hopes and 'Promises which he did give us, (desiring no'thing more than for his Cause principally to 'avoid all Occasions that might put us in ill 'Understanding with any of the House of Au'stria) we have hitherto proceeded with a sted'fast Patience: trusting to the Treaties, and 'neglecting all other Means, which probably 'might have secured the remainder of our Chil'drens Inheritance, (these Garisons which we 'maintained in the Palatinate being rather for 'Honour sake, to keep a Footing until the ge'neral Accommodation, than that we did rely 'so much upon their Strength, as upon his 'Friendship) and by this Confidence and Secu'rity of ours, are now exposed to Dishonour 'and Reproach. You shall tell that King, That 'seeing all those Endeavours and good Offices 'which he hath used towards the Emperor in 'this Business, on the behalf of our Son-in'Law: (upon Confidence whereof that Securi'ty of ours depended, which he continually by 'his Letters and Ministers here laboured to be'get and confirm in us) have not sorted to any 'other Issue, than to a plain Abuse, both of his 'Trust and ours, whereby we are both of us 'highly injured in our Honour, tho' in a dif'ferent Degree; we hope and desire that, out 'of a true Sense of this Wrong offered unto us, 'he will, as our dear and loving Brother, faith'fully promise, and undertake upon his Honour, '(confirming the same also under his Hand and 'Seal) either that the Town and Castle of Hei'delberg shall, within Threescore and ten Days 'after your Audience, and Demand made, be 'rendred into our Hands, with all Things there'in belonging, to our Son-in-Law, or our 'Daughter, (as near as may be in the State 'they were when they were taken) and the 'like for Manheim and Frankendale, if both or 'either of them shall be taken by the Enemy 'while these Things are in Treaty: As also 'that there shall be within the said Term of 'Seventy Days a Cessation and Suspension of 'Arms in the Palatinate for the future, upon the 'several Articles and Conditions last propoun'ded by our Ambassador Sir Richard Weston, 'and that the general Treaty shall be set a-foot 'again, upon such Honourable Terms and Con'ditions as we propounded unto the Emperor in 'a Letter written unto him in November last, 'and with which the King of Spain then (as 'we understood) seemed satisfied. Or else, in 'case all these Particulars be not yielded unto, 'and performed by the Emperor, as is here pro'pounded, but be refused or delayed beyond the 'time afore mentioned; that then the King of 'Spain do join his Forces with ours for the Re'covery of our Childrens Honours and Patri'mony, which upon this Trust hath been thus 'lost. Or if so be his Forces at this present be 'otherwise so employed, as that they cannot 'give us that Assistance which we here desire, 'and (as we think) have deserved, yet that at 'the least he will permit us a free and friendly 'Passage through his Territories and Domi'nions, for such Forces as we shall send and em'ploy in Germany for his Service. Of all which 'distinctively, if you receive not from the King 'of Spain (within ten Days at the furthest after 'your Audience) a direct Assurance under his 'Hand and Seal, without Delay, or putting us 'off to further Treaties and Conferences; that 'is to say, of such Restitution, Cessation of 'Arms, and proceeding to a General Treaty, as 'is before-mentioned; or else of Assistance, and 'joining his Forces with ours against the Empe'ror; or, at the least, Permission of Passage 'for our Forces through his the said King's Do'minions; that then you take your Leave, and 'return to our Presence, without further stay; 'otherwise to proceed in the Negociation for 'the Marriage of our Son, according to the 'Instructions we have given you,

Gondomar's Master-piece. This Letter was dated the 3d of October: And presently after it was sent away, the King recollected himself, and thought it good Policy to make some Advantage of this Breach with Spain, (if there were one) by letting his People see, he would no longer wait the Spanish Delays; (which they were impatient enough of) therefore his Ambassadors (to hinder the Knowledge of it at home) must conceal the Breach abroad, stay still in the Spanish Court, as if the Business were in full Motion, and ripe for projection: And he must break it to pieces here himself, to make it the more acceptable; either to get the more Love or Money from the People, or for what other Intention is unknown. But the very very next Day he sends this further Direction by Endimion Porter.

A. Reg. 20. An. Christi 1622.

Third Letter to Digby.

'RIght Trusty, &c. We have given you certain Instructions, signed with our Hand, to direct you how to express unto the King of Spain the Feeling we have of the Dishonour put upon us by the Emperor, through our Trust and Confidence in that King's Promises, wherein you have Order to come away without further Delay, in case you receive not Satisfaction to your Demands, in such sort as we have commanded you to propound them. Nevertheless, we are to put you in remembrance of that which we have heretofore told you; in case a Rupture happen between the King of Spain and us, that we would be glad to manage it at our best Advantage. And therefore however you do not find the Satisfaction which we in those Instructions crave from the King of Spain, and have Reason to expect, yet would we not have you instantly come away upon it, but advertise us first, letting us know privately (if you find such Causes) that there is no Good to be done, nor Satisfaction, as you judge, intended us, (tho' publickly and outwardly you give out the contrary) that we may make use thereof with our People in Parliament, as we shall hold best for our Service. And this see you do, notwithstanding any thing in your other Instructions to the contrary. Dated Octob. 4. 1622.

Our King's Patience.

The King, in the first of these two Letters, gives Thirty Days more to the King of Spain to repent of his bad Dealing with him, than was given to the great City, and yet he repented not. And this positive Command, (limiting but Ten Days after Audience for a Resolution in these Points) one would have thought should have produced an absolute Breach, or a perfect Conclusion. But the Spaniard continues in his old Peace still, and would not be spurr'd up, and Digby (now made Earl of Bristol for his good Services) whistles after him his old Note still, assuring our King, That the King of Spain (tho' slow) was real in his Intentions. And if our King had not had a great good Stomach to the Match, he would never have digested this Dealing from a Brother and a Servant; the Pope also at the same time giving him a Bit to chew on, interpreting the Articles where the Children of Marriage were to be brought up, Usque ad Annos nubiles, to be Fourteen Years old, which our King would not consent to, in respect of the Scandal it might produce: For he knew Impressions in Youth, settled by Custom, are not easy to remove, especially where they make Dints upon the Conscience; therefore he pressed the King of Spain, that the Children might not suck in their Mothers Instructions so long time, being less for his Honour: And they, with much Importunity, brought it down from Fourteen to Ten, and there they stuck. Our King expressed himself willing to have them brought up, sub regimine matris, for Seven Years, and that Time should be limited in the publick Capitulations; but if more time were insisted on by the Pope, he would oblige himself privately by a Letter to the King of Spain, that they shall be under their Mother's Regiment for Two Years longer. And seeing there is but One Year more that is betwixt them, the King, in another Letter to the Earl of Bristol, tells him, That if they would not be contented with Nine, he would not stick to give them another Year.

Dated Newmarket, Nov. 24. 1622.

The Palatinate lost.

While they were thus Wire-drawing, Time spun out, Manheim, the chief Strength and Fortress in the Palatinate, was taken by Tilly, the Emperor's General, whereof Sir Horatio Vere was Commander, surrendred upon honourable Conditions, having neither Strength of Men, or Means to resist an Enemy. Heidelberg before it (as the King expressed) was taken by Assault, Sir Gerrard Herbert, the Commander of the Castle, slain, after he had repulsed the Enemy from the Assault, breaking Six Pikes upon them with his own Hand. And now Tilly, (Winter coming on) greedy to finish his Work, sits down before Frankendale, whereof Major Burrowes had the Command, a Man of as much Valour and Experience, as Time the Director, and Spirit the Actor, could make a Man capable of. But all this, and the Strength of the Town to boot, could not have protected them, (their Wants being stronger than their Enemy) if Tilly, had not been drowned up in his Trenches, which forced his Remove.

The Palatinate a strong Country.

And tho' our King said in his last Answer to the Parliament's Petition, That the Enemy would have swallow'd up his Forces in the Palatinate in Eight Days, if my Lord Digby had not succour'd it; yet the weakest of the Three Places, which is Heidelberg, was not taken in a Moment: For Tilly in June last set down before it, and was constrain'd to raise his Siege; being not strong enough; and coming again with a greater Power in the end of July following, he was there above Two Months before he took so much as any of their Out-works. And Manheim and Frankendale are Two such strong Holds, that if they had been well furnished with Men and Provisions, they might have stood out against Tilly; nay, the Great Turk, as well, if not better than Vienna the Imperial City.

Our King satisfied of Spain's good Intentions.

As soon as the King had Notice of the taking of Manheim, he gives Bristol Intimation of it, and was very well satisfied of the King of Spain's good Intentions for the Relief of it, though Order sent to the Infanta arrived not there till the Town was surrendred: Which was the old Spanish Plot of Philip the Second to get Portugal into his Hand; wherein he cheated the Pope himself, delaying his Solicitations, by his Legate Cardinal Riario, (for Don Antonio, Bastard of Portugal) with specious and pleasing Entertainments, till he had gotten the Castle of St. Julians, the greatest Strength of the Kingdom, (then besieged by him) into his Power. And yet our King looked upon this Apparition as real, and thanked the King of Spain for the Good he never intended.

Articles of Marriage.

And now the Articles of Marriage, that had been long hatching, flew up and down from Hand to Hand: The French Historians mention them; so both Mr. Pryn in his Hidden Works of Darkness, as they were found among the Lord Cottington's Papers. These came to me from the Nest, and I have kept them till this time; and comparing them with other Copies, there is scarce a Feather amiss. Nor should they have pestered this Paper, but to shew what great Pains was taken to little purpose; what huge Pretences shoulder'd in to make way for the Spanish Designs which at last dwindled to nothing.

The Articles are these:

1. THat the Marriage be made by Dispensation of the Pope; but that to be procured by the Endeavour of the King of Spain.

2. That the Marriage be once Celebrated in Spain, and Ratified in England, in Form following: In the

Mor-

A. Reg. 20.
An. Chriſti 1622.

Morning, after the moſt Gracious Infanta hath ended her Devotions in the Chappel, She and the moſt excellent Prince Charles ſhall meet in the King's Chappel, or in ſome other Room of the Palace, where it ſhall ſeem moſt expedient; and there ſhall be read all the Procurations, by Virtue whereof the Marriage was celebrated in Spain. And as well the moſt Excellent Prince, as the moſt Excellent Infanta, ſhall ratifie the ſaid Marriage celebrated in Spain, with all Solemnity neceſſary to ſuch an Act; ſo as no Ceremony, or other Thing intervene, which ſhall be contrary to the Roman-Catholick Apoſtolick-Religion.

3. That the gracious Infanta ſhall take with her ſuch Servants, and Family, as are conveniently for her Service; which Family, and all Perſons to her belonging, ſhall be choſen and nominated by the Catholick King, ſo as he nominate no Servant which is Vaſſal to the King of Great Btirain, without his Will and Conſent.

4. That as well the moſt gracious Lady Infanta, as all her Servants and Family, ſhall have free Uſe and publick Exerciſe of the Roman Catholick Religion, in manner and form, as is beneath Capitulated.

The Pope extended this Article, Habeat etiam Eccleſiam publicam Londini, &c.

5. That ſhe ſhall have an Oratory and decent Chappel in her Palace, where, at the pleaſure of the moſt gracious Infanta, Maſſes may be celebrated; which Oratory or Chappel ſhall be adorned with ſuch Decency, as ſhall ſeem convenient for the moſt gracious Infanta; with a publick Church in London, &c.

6. That the Men-Servants and Maid-Servants of the moſt Gracious Infanta, and their Servants, Children, and Deſcendents, and all their Families, of what ſort ſoever, ſerving her Highneſs, may be freely Catholicks.

7. That the moſt gracious Infanta, her Servants and Family, may be freely Catholicks in form following.

8. That the moſt gracious Infanta may have in her Palace her Oratory, and Chappel ſo ſpacious, that her ſaid Servants and Family may enter and ſtay therein. In which there ſhall be an ordinary and publick Door for them, and another inward Door, by which the Infanta may have a paſſage into the ſaid Chappel, where ſhe, and others, as abovesaid, may be preſent at Divine Offices.

9. That the Chappel, Church, and Oratory, may be beautify'd with decent Ornaments, of Altar, and other things neceſſary for Divine Service, which is to be celebrated in them, according to the Cuſtom of the Holy Roman Church; and that it ſhall be lawful for the ſaid Servants, and others, to go to the ſaid Chappel and Church at all Hours, as to them ſhall ſeem expedient.

Holy Roman Church.

10. That the Care and Cuſtody of the ſaid Chappel and Church, ſhall be committed to ſuch as the Lady Infanta ſhall appoint, to whom it ſhall be lawful to appoint Keepers, that no body may enter into them to do any undecent thing.

11. That to the Adminiſtration of the Sacraments, and to ſerve in Chappel and Church aforeſaid, there ſhall be ſo many Prieſts and Aſſiſtants, as to the Infanta ſhall ſeem fit; and the Election of them ſhall belong to the Lady Infanta, and the Catholick King her Brother. Provided, that they be none of the Vaſſals of the King of Great Britain; and if they be, his Will and Conſent is to be firſt obtained.

12. That there be one Superiour Miniſter or Biſhop, with neceſſary Authority upon all Occaſions which ſhall happen, belonging to Religion; and for want of a Biſhop, that his Vicar may have his Authority and Juriſdiction.

13. That this Biſhop or Superiour Miniſter may Correct, Amend, or Chaſtiſe all Roman Catholicks who ſhall offend, and ſhall exerciſe upon them all Juriſdiction Eccleſiaſtical; and moreover alſo, the Lady Infanta ſhall have power to put them out of her Service, whenſoever it ſhall ſeem expedient to her.

A. Reg. 20.
An. Chriſti 1622.

14. That it may be lawful for the Lady Infanta and her Servants, to procure from Rome Diſpenſations, Indulgences, Jubilees, and all Graces, as ſhall ſeem fit to their Religion and Conſciences; and to get and make uſe of any Catholick Books whatſoever.

15. That the Servants of the Family of the Lady Infanta, who ſhall come into England, ſhall take the Oath of Allegiance to the King of Great Britain, provided that there be no Clauſe therein, which ſhall be contrary to their Conſciences, and the Roman Catholick Religion; and if they happen to be Vaſſals to the King of Great Britain, they ſhall take the ſame Oath that the Spaniard doth.

16. That the Laws which are or ſhall be in England againſt Religion, ſhall not take hold of the ſaid Servants. And only the foreſaid Superior Eccleſiaſtical Catholick may proceed againſt Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, as hath been accuſtomed by Catholicks. And if any Secular Judge ſhall apprehend any Eccleſiaſtical Perſon for any Offence, he ſhall forthwith cauſe him to be delivered to the fore-ſaid Superior Eccleſiaſtick, who ſhall proceed againſt him according to the Canon Law.

17. That the Laws made againſt Catholicks in England, or in any other Kingdom of the King of Great-Britain, ſhall not extend to the Children of this Marriage; and, though they be Catholicks they ſhall not loſe the Right of Succeſſion to the Kingdom and Dominions of Great Britain.

18. That the Nurſes which ſhall give ſuck to the Children of the Lady Infanta (whether they be of the Kingdom of Great Britain, or of any other Nation whatſoever) ſhall be choſen by the Lady Infanta, as ſhe pleaſeth, and ſhall be accounted of her Family, and enjoy the Privileges thereof.

19. That the Biſhop, Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, and Religious, of the Family of the Lady Infanta, ſhall wear the Veſtment and Habit of his Dignity, Profeſſion and Religion, after the Cuſtom of Rome.

20. For ſecurity that the ſaid Matrimony be not Diſſolved for any Cauſe whatſoever, The King of Great Britain and Prince Charles are equally to paſs the Word and Honour of a King: And moreover, that they will perform whatſoever ſhall be propounded by the Catholick King for further Confirmation, if it may be done decently and fitly.

21. That the Sons and Daughters, which ſhall be born of this Marriage, ſhall be brought up in the company of the moſt Excellent Infanta, at leaſt until the Age of Ten Years, and ſhall freely enjoy the Right of Succeſſion to the Kingdoms, as aforeſaid.

22. That whenſoever any Place of either Man-ſervant or Maid-ſervant, which the Lady Infanta ſhall bring with her (nominated by the Catholick King her Brother) ſhall happen to be void, whether by Death, or by other Cauſe or Accident, all the ſaid Servants of her Family are to be ſupplied by the Catholick King, as aforeſaid.

23. For Security that whatſoever is Capitulated may be fulfilled, the King of Great Britain and Prince Charles are to be bound by Oath, and all the King's Council ſhall confirm the ſaid Treaty under their Hands. Moreover, the ſaid King and Prince are to give their Faiths in the Word of a King, to endeavour, if poſſible, that whatſoever is Capitulated, may be eſtabliſhed by Parliament.

24. That conformable to this Treaty, all theſe Things propoſed are to be allowed and approved of by the Pope, that he may give an Apoſtolical Benediction, and a Diſpenſation neceſſary to effect the Marriage.

But though our King and Prince ſubſcribed theſe Articles (as they were ſent to them by the Earl of Briſtol) in this manner; Hos ſupra memoratos morates Articulos omnes ac singulos approbamus, & quicquid in iis ex nostrâ parte, seu nostro nomine conventum est, ratum atque gratum habemus, approving and expressing them to be very acceptable unto them. And after they had wrought the King to Sign these large Immunities to the Papists, viz. Quod Regnorum suorum Romanorum Catholici persecutionem nullam patientur, molestiave efficientur, Religionis suæ causa, vel ob exercitium illorum ejusdem Sacramentorum, modò iis utantur absque scandalo, (quod intelligi debet inter privatos parietes) nec juramentis, aut sub alio prætextu qualicunque ordinem Religionis spectante vexabuntur: That the Roman Catholicks should not be interrupted in the Exercise of their Religion, doing it privately without Scandal, not be vex'd with any Oaths in order to the same. What rested but a Closing of both Parties? Yet all would not do; for the Spaniard never intended the Match at all, as is evident by a Letter of the King of Spain's, written to his Favourite the Conde of Olivares, dated the Fifth of November, 1622. found among the Lord Cottington's Papers.

A.Reg. 20. An. Christi 1622.

Spanish Delusion.

The King of Spain's Letter to Olivares.

THE King my Father declared at his Death, That his intent never was to marry my Sister, the Infanta Donna Maria, with the Prince of Wales, which your Uncle Don Baltazer understood, and so treated this Match, ever with intention to delay it, notwithstanding it is now so far advanced, that (considering all the Aversness of the Infanta to it) it is time to seek some means to divert the Treaty, which I would have you find out; and I will make it good whatsoever it be. But in all other things, procure the Satisfaction of the King of Great Britain (who hath deserved much) and it shall Content me, so it be not in the Match.

Thus was our King's Plain-Heartedness deluded, his Honour blemished, his Love among his Subjects diminished, the Time for a positive Answer for the Dispensation from Rome long expired and prolonged; his Childrens Patrimony destroyed, and he left so unsatisfy'd, that the Prince himself, and the Marquess of Buckingham, must go into Spain to unfold this Riddle; where they found it as full of Ænigma's as at first. He that went to tye a Knot there, found it so intangled, that he took some time there to clear it; and when it was clear, he thought it best, Scindere nodum, to cut that at last, which he could not unloose at first.

Bergen besieg'd by Spinola.

The Marquis Spinola having long since left the Palatinate to the Imperial Generals, with a great Army, consisting of above Thirty thousand Men, the last Summer sits down before Berghen-op-Zome, a Town of very great Strength and Importance, upon the Borders of Brabant, and incloses himself with two strong Lines of Circumvallation, notwithstanding all the Power the Town could oppose from within, or Prince Maurice General of the States Army without. And though he were well intrenched for his own Security, yet the Works of the Town were so Impregnable, that he could find no way to gain it, but by starving them; and that could not be done, but by commanding the River; and those Batteries that he planted, to hinder the Access of Shipping with Relief into the Town, were within reach of their Cannon; so that he found there was little good to be done, tending to the Reducing of it. This struck the Marquis to the Heart, that he should bury his Honour, as he had done a great part of his Army, in those bloody Trenches; and therefore he gave scope to his Resolution, to make use of his Time, for he converted his Intentions of Starving, to Assaulting, and his Assaults were the more Furious, because he found they would not last long; and old Morgan, that Gallant Colonel, with his English Brigade, gave them their Hands full, the Scots did Gallant Service in the Town, and their Colonel Hinderson was slain, but many of the Enemy fell on every side; for it is a great Disadvantage for living Bodies to fight against dead Walls, being so high, and unassaultable. A General that goes to besiege a City should have his Access to it (in his Apprehension) as plain as a Mathematician hath a Demonstration (except it be upon some emergent Cause) otherwise there is an Error in his Account; and there cannot be Two, for the Honour dies in the first, which touched the Marquis near, being his great Trouble, and made him and his Enterprize both droop.

Mansfeldt comes into Brabant.

But while he lay there digging Graves, Count Mansfeldt's ranging Army that he brought out of Bohemia, and those Forces that remained of Christian Duke of Brunswick's, after he was beaten by Tilly and Cordova, meeting in the Palatinate, and finding themselves able to do little good there (the Country being ruined, and wanting Provisions to supply them) resolved to bring their Army into the Low Countries, being invited thereunto by the Prince of Orange and the States, to counterpoise the formidable Armies that the King of Spain had then in Motion; for though Spinola's Hands were ty'd to the Trenches, yet Cordova with one Army on one side, and Count Henry van de Berg with another Army on the other side, were dreadful to the Netherlands. The Mansfeldters were not above Twelve thousand strong, Horse and Foot; the Horse were only arm'd with Pistols, the Foot with Muskets; scarce a Pike, or Corslet among them (for Brunswick's Men upon their Defeat for the most part had thrown away their Arms) Money and Provisions they had very little) their Store being now spent) but what they could get by the Sword, or purchase from the Towns and Cities (by Terror) as they passed; Order there was little among them, for Want makes Men Brutish and Ravenous; and there was no way for them but to cut themselves out a Passage into a plentiful Country. On their way, divers of Mansfeldt's Horse mutiny'd for Money, and came swarming about his House where he was quartered, threatning Violence, and were ready to break open his Doors. Mansfeldt having a Spirit full of Magnanimity (and finding Courage best able to quail such Attempts) would not stay so long as to have his Doors broke open, but opened them himself (attended only by those of his Family) with a Case of Pistols in his Hands, and presented himself before them, and his very Presence daunted them; for he did with sweet and affable Language let them know, his own Wants were as great as theirs; and thus when they wanted other Provisions, he fed them with Hopes. But many of these Brunts he had born formerly. Soldiers are like Gamesters, they get a deal of Money at one time, and have none at all another; and when Want pinches, it rages; his House hath been often beset by Mutineers, that threatned to tear him in pieces; and he hath opened his Doors, thrown himself (as it were) among them, and demanded stoutly, What they would have? and having a Case of Pistols always by him, those near him that called for Money were sure to have those Pistols discharged in their Guts: And then he would

A. Reg. 20. An. Christi 1622.

would ask them again, Who would have Money? and they would all slink away, and not a Man dare to open his Mouth; so high and over-powring a Spirit he had! and that only kept him from the Rage of Mutiny, for he knew his own Integrity, that when he had Money he distributed it freely, and the more Ingenuous part of them knew what Money he had, which was brought in great Sums from such Towns and Cities as redeemed themselves from the Plunder of his Soldiers; so that it was not his Hoarding and Covetousness, but real Want made them suffer, and that imboldned his Spirit: For a General that would be safe, when his Soldiers are in want, should not take Refreshment so much as with the tip of his Rod, unless they may be Partakers in it.

The Battle of Fleury.

But with many Necessities, in their March through Lorrain and Lutzenburgh, they came to Fleury, within Eight Miles of Namur, where Corduba with a Spanish Army strove to hinder their Passage; The Conflict was great betwixt them, and many Slain on both sides, and both triumphed in the Victory. For Corduba kept the Field, and Mansfeldt kept his way. But Mansfeldt's Victory was the compleatest, because he attained to his End, which was, to break through Corduba; But Corduba did not attain to his End, which was, to hinder Mansfeldt. Yet the Spanish Bravery was highly exalted with Bonfires, and Rejoycings both at Madrid and Brussels. The Duke of Brunswick lost his Bridle Arm in that Service, and many Gentlemen, both English and Scots, out of Love to the Queen of Bohemia, behaved themselves gallantly, and let the Spaniard know, it was more than an ordinary Shock they encountred with. Among whom, Sir Charles Rich, Brother to the Earl of Warwick, was a principal Person, whose voluntary Spirit, not Necessity, made Danger his Companion, where Honour attended it. Sir James Heyes, Knevet, Humes, Hisborn, and other Commanders, striving for Corrivalship in Bravery.

Brunswick his Arm shot off

Spinola raises his Siege.

Spinola hearing that Mansfeldt was broken through Corduba's Army and come into Brabant, made the Court Splendour of Corduba's Conquest appear but Ignis fatuus, which also something extinguish'd the Glory of his own Fame. For he thought it good Policy (seeing he should be necessitated to leave the Siege of Berghen) to do it at that time, when there might be cause to think it occasion'd by that Accident more than his Default. And therefore as soon as the Prince of Orange and Mansfeldt had joined Forces, though Corduba came to him and reinforced his army, yet Winter drawing on, and his Army almost wasted, he trussed up his Baggage in haste, set his Camp a-fire and departed, leaving to his hungry Enemies good Store of Wine, and other Provisions, in his burning Quarters. And thus stood the Ballance this Year betwixt the King of Spain and the Netherlands.

Buckingham's Medicine to Cure the King's Melancholy.

But our King receiving so many Delays and Dissatisfactions from Spain and Rome, they begot him so much Trouble and Vexation, that crowding into his Thoughts, press'd upon his Natural Temper some Fits of Melancholy, which those about him with facetious Mirth, would strive to mitigate; And having exhausted their Inventions or not making use of such as were more pregnant, the Marquis and his Mother (instead of Mirth) fell upon Prophaneness, thinking with that to please him, and perhaps they were only mistaken in the unseasonableness of the time, being not then suitable to the Humour. For they caused Mrs. Aspernham, a young Gentlewoman of the Kindred, to dress a Pig like a Child, and the old Countess, like a Midwife, brought it in to the King in a rich Mantle. Turpin that married one of the Kindred (whose Name was renowned for a Bishop in the Romances of the Emperor Charlemain) was dress'd like a Bishop in his Sattin Gown, Lawn Sleeves, and other Pontifical Ornaments, who (with the Common Prayer Book) began the Words of Baptism, one attending with a silver Basin of Water for the Service; the King hearing the Ceremonies of Baptism read, and the squeaking Noise of that Brute he most abhorred, turned himself to see what Pageant it was; and finding Turpin's Face, which he well knew, dress'd like a Bishop; and the Marquis, whose Face he most of all loved, stand as a Godfather; he cried out, Away for shame, what Blasphemy is this? And turning aside with a Frown, he gave them Cause to think, that such ungodly Mirth would rather increase than cure his Melancholy.

The King's Choler.

Another time, at Theobalds, the King wanted some Papers that had Relation to the Spanish Treaty, so hot in Motion, which raised him highly into the Passion of Anger that he should not know what he had done with them, being things so Material, and of such Concernment: And calling his Memory to a strict Account, at last he discharged it upon John Gib, a Scotchman, who was of his Bed-chamber, and had been an old Servant to him. Gib is called for in haste, and the King asks him for the Papers he gave him; Gib collecting himself, answer'd the King, he received no Papers from him. The King broke into extream Rage, (as he would often when the Humour of Choler began to boil in him) protesting he had them, and reviling him exceedingly for denying them; Gib threw himself at the King's Feet, protesting his Innocency, that he never received any, and desired his Life might make Satisfaction for his Fault, if he were guilty. This could not calm the King's Spirit, tossed in this Tempest of Passion; and overcharged with it, as he passed by Gib (kneeling) threw some of it upon him, giving him a Kick with his Foot. Which Kick infected Gib, and turned his Humility into Anger, For, rising instantly, he said, Sir, I have served you from my Youth, and you never found me unfaithful; I have not deserved this from you, nor can I live longer with you with this Disgrace; Fare ye well, Sir, I will never see your Face more: And away he goes from the King's Presence, took Horse, and rode towards London. Those about the King put on a sad Countenance to see him displeased, and every Man was inquisitive to know the Cause: Some said, the King and Gib were fallen out; but about what? some Papers of the Spanish Treaty, the King had given him, cannot be found. Endimion Porter hearing it, said, The King gave me those Papers, went presently and brought them to the King, who being becalmed, and finding his Error, called instantly for Gib; Answer was made, he was gone to London: The King hearing it, commanded with all Expedition to send Post after him to bring him back, protesting never to Eat, Drink, or Sleep till he saw Gib's Face. The Messenger overtook him before he got to London; and Gib hearing the Papers were found, and that the King sent for him with so much Earnestness, returned to the Court. And as he came into the King's Chamber, the King kneeled down upon his Knees before Gib, intreating his Pardon,

His Sanguine.

A. Reg. 20. An. Christi 1622.

don, with a sober and grave Aspect, protesting he would never rise till Gib had forgiven him; and though Gib's modesty declined it with some humble Excuses, yet it would not satisfie the King, till he heard the Words of Absolution pronounced. So Ingenuous was he in this Piece of Passion! which had its sudden Variation from a stern and furious Anger, to a soft and melting Affection, which made Gib no Loser by the Bargain.

His Flegmatick Humour. Thus the King's Melancholy, Cholerick, and Sanguine Constitution appeared. But of all the Humours, Flegm was now the most predominant, which made him so tamely swallow those raw Fruits of Spain, that all his Exercise could not well digest.

A Diet at Ratisbone, Jan. 7. In January this Year, the Diet which the Emperor had summoned (contrary to his Promise, as our King intimates) met at Ratisbone, where the Electors and divers other Princes of Germany assembled, either in their own Persons, or by their Deputies. The Imperial Design was to take off the Edge of the Prince's Dissatisfaction, for his harsh Proceedings against the Prince Palatine; wherein he makes him the Ground-work and Cause of all the Wars and Miseries that have happen'd in the Empire. And thinking no Man (as he said) would take the boldness to mediate the Restitution of the proscribed Palatine into the Electoral College, he could do no less than dispose of the Electorate, now (pleno jure) devolved unto him, as Emperor, which he had bestowed on the Duke of Bavaria for spending his Treasure, and hazarding his Blood in his Service, against his own Nephew, the expulsed Palatine. Wherefore he requests the illustrious Presence of Electors and Princes, to give their Opinions, how the Peace of the Empire may be established to prevent all Commotions for the future.

The Opinion of the Protestant Princes. The Princes took this Proposition of the Emperor into Debate, and the Protestant Princes desired Cæsar to consider the Importance of the Business. 'That though his Imperial Majesty, 'in his own Judgment, may have had Cause 'enough to publish the Ban against the Prince 'Palatine; yet they are of Opinion, that in his 'particular Cause, which so nearly concerned 'the disposing of an Electorate of the Empire, 'and so principal a Person of the Electoral 'College, (the sudden doing whereof might 'occasion long and tedious Wars, dangerous 'to the Roman Empire) that Cæsar should not 'of himself have proceeded so rigorously, nor 'without the Advice and Consent of all the 'rest of the Electors, according as it was a'greed upon in the Capitulation Royal, which 'is holden for a Fundamental Law of the Em'pire. Which Course of Cæsar's, even for the 'manner of proceeding in it, was distasted by 'divers, because the Prince Palatine had never 'been legally summoned, but uncited and 'unheard without all knowledge of his Cause, 'and contrary to all ordinary Course had 'been Condemned, and against all Equity op'pressed by the Publication of that Imperial 'Ban. We purpose not to call the Power Im'perial into question, yet we cannot but re'member your Majesty of that Promise made 'in your Capitulation unto the Electors; and 'humbly we admonish Cæsar to stand unto his 'own Word, and not to intermit the Perfor'mance of it. And as for the disposing of the 'Electorate, we desire nothing more, than that 'we could gratify Cæsar with our Suffrages; 'but perceiving so many and so great Diffi'culties in it, we cannot but admonish your 'Majesty of the Danger of it. This being the 'Opinion of our Electors, that seeing your 'Majesty hath graciously called the Diet for 'restoring Peace in the Empire, that it were 'altogether necessary first to remove the Ob'stacles of Peace. And seeing that all the 'Stirs began in Bohemia, Cæsar should do well 'to labour first for the quieting of that King'dom, and command a stay to be made of the 'severe Reformation, and frequent Executions 'there; that so the Hearts of your Subjects, 'being overcome with Grace and Mercy, 'might be sweetly joined to you, and all Fear 'and Distrust utterly taken away: Without 'which, we see no Hope, either how your 'Majesty can sit sure upon your Imperial 'Throne, or how the Electors and Princes can 'be freed of their Fears; being evident, that 'the Bohemians, and others, made desperate by 'the Extremity of their Sufferings, will take 'any Occasion to begin new Troubles, and to 'involve the Empire with new Dangers. All 'the Lutheran States of the Empire likewise, 'which follow the Augustan Confession, have 'their Eyes upon this Bohemian Reformation, 'which though it were given out to be for pri'vate Justice, yet it is so link'd with the pub'lick Cause, that unless it be speedily ended, 'and the two Churches at Prague (granted by 'Rodolphus II. not in favour of some private 'Men alone, but of Christian Elector of Saxony, 'and which had continued free until of late) 'were again opened, and the free Exercise of 'Religion generally permitted, we see no sure 'Peace likely to be in the Empire, but utter 'Ruine rather, and final Desolation, may every 'day be feared. Seeing it was apparently 'known, that it was not those that professed 'the Reformed Religion, who began these 'Troubles; but the Noblemen and great Officers, 'whose Designs, the other were compelled to 'obey.

'And for the Prince Palatine, seeing he is 'already sufficiently punished, it were far more 'commendable in your Majesty, that now at 'last, upon his Submission, you would be plea'sed to restore him to his Lands and Dignities, 'otherwise there is no likelihood of restoring 'Peace to the Empire. And in the transferring 'of the Electorate, this main thing were fit 'to be considered; Whether the Prince Pala'tine, excluded in his own Person, doth debar 'his Children, who (by the Providence of '(their Ancestors) had, before this Act of their 'Father, jus adquisitum, an Hereditary Right 'unto the Electorate; or the Brother of the 'Prince Palatine, who hath no way offended 'your Majesty, nor, by reason of his Mino'rity, could not; Or others of the Kindred 'of the Prince Palatine, should be, or ought to 'be in this Case neglected? If they be, it will 'be hardly taken of other Electors and Princes, 'and occasion various Distrusts betwixt the 'Head and the Members. For the Princes 'allied unto the Prince Palatine, who have been 'quiet hitherto, (upon Confidence of Cæsar's 'Clemency) now perceiving all hope of that 'Dignity unto their Family taken away, must 'needs have Recourse unto Arms, and endea'vour the Recovery of it by force. And if 'Cæsar should die, this Controversy being not 'compounded, it may well be feared, many 'Inconveniences will fall out contrary to 'Cæsar's Desire. For though upon the Advan'tage of his Victories he hath had the Law in 'his own hand, if the Wheel should turn, that 'Side which is lowest will get up again.

A. Reg. 20. An. Christi 1622.

'Therefore we hold it more Wisdom to advise Cæsar, not to proceed too suddenly, but rather to accept the Intercession of other Electors and Princes, as in such Cases hath hitherto been done. Considering the Prince Palatine was then but young, abused by ill Council, and no ways the Author of those Stirs in Bohemia, they being in an Uproar before his coming among them. And if his Majesty would Pardon the Prince Palatine, he should ever oblige the whole Electoral College, and all the Kings and Princes allied unto him; and the Prince himself, and all his Posterity, would be advised (when they remember their Exile) how they Embroil themselves in such Business. Whereas if he saw the Door of Mercy quite shut, and nothing left him but his Life, it would make both him, and his, desperate to attempt, so as there would be no end of the Troubles in the Roman Empire. Cæsar therefore should do far righter, if for his own Honour, and the Publick Good, he would prefer Mercy before Severity, and not pursue these Extremities.'

The Opinion of the Popish Princes.

To these things, the Catholick Princes said, That Cæsar had shewn Causes enough which he had to deprive the Palatine, and the Palatinate being devolved to him, he might dispose of it, without having regard to the Palatine Line, according to his own Pleasure. That his Majesty could not well hold any Terms of Amity with him, though he were restored; and this Impunity would give occasion unto others to offend. As for the matter of Punishment, there would be little difference between the Emperor and the Palatine, seeing that his Majesty's Lands and Dominions are no less wasted than the others, and yet there is great difference in the Cause; for this fell out to Cæsar without his Demerit, and the Palatine did the other, having no necessity to it. That he had refused Mercy, in not acknowledging his Fault, nor seeking for Favour. And it is an unequal Request for Cæsar to accept of any Reconciliation, whilst his General Mansfeldt is yet in the Field, and prosecutes his Cause by force of Arms. The Safety of the Empire consisting in the filling up of the Electoral College, Cæsar hath done very well in a speedy resolving on it, and other Emperors in the like Cases have done the same before.

The Reply of the Protestant Princes.

To which, the other Party answered, That for the Security of the Imperial Dignity, and Safety of the Empire, there is no question, but that it consisted in the Concord of the Electoral College, with the Emperor. And the Prince Palatine hath (as you say) done amiss, yet if Cæsar shall still use Rigour, the Princes of the Lower Saxony are of Opinion, there can be no Peace established in the Empire, the good of which being most worthy to be preferred, Cæsar should do wisely to suffer himself to be intreated, and change Rigour into Clemency, making the Empire by that means glad with a desired Peace, otherwise new Flames were likely to break out in those Places which yet are preserved from burning. That Cæsar had now, by the Aid of the Electors and Princes, recovered his lost Provinces, and wanting nothing but quiet Possession of them, which, this desired Reconciliation was the best Means to effect. The hand of War may be lifted up, but who knows where the Stroak will fall? And Victory is so long uncertain, as the adverse Party hath power to reinforce his Arms. And for the renewing of the War, there is yet a fair Pretence left, for that in bestowing the Electorate, the Prince Palatine's Sons and Brother have been neglected, and with these Principles are the Minds of many of the Princes of the Empire already possessed. The King of Great Britain besides could not but take it ill, that he should now see all his Endeavours take no good effect, but his only Daughter and her Children left in Exile. And as for the manner of this Reconciliation, there might be a particular Treaty and Consultation, wherein Cæsar's Prerogative Imperial being reserved, all Parties might receive Satisfaction, and the Empire once again flourish in Peace. If these Remedies be not applied, it will produce ill Blood, yea Heart-burnings and Distrusts, in the Electoral College it self.

A. Reg. 20.

The Emperor's Reply.

The Elector of Saxony.

These several Answers, delivered to the Emperor the 20th of January, he replied unto, thanking them for their Consultations. And though some (saith he) have wisely heretofore resolved us, that our Proceedings in Proscribing the Palatine was both legal and necessary; yet now we perceive some of you are of Opinion, that, according to our Capitulation Royal, we ought not to have proceeded so far, without the Knowledge and Consent of the Electors. But as we have no ways gone beyond this our Capitulation, but even, before we set out the Ban, punctually considered all that was necessary to be taken notice of; so did we also desire nothing more than that a Diet might be convoked, for the due treating and advising upon this Business. Which Meeting being impeded by the Prosecution of the War by the Palatine, we could do no less, to take down his Courage, than publish the Ban against him: Which Course of ours, seeing it was never intended to be prosecuted to the prejudice of the Electoral College, or against our own Capitulation, we hope that the Electors will not take it otherwise; being that we promise withal so to moderate it, that no Detriment or Prejudice shall result thereby unto the Dignity Electoral.

As for the Translation of the Electorate, and your Advice for Restoring of the Palatinate, there is (I perceive) some difference in your Opinions. One Part wisely, and in favour of us, affirming the great Reason we have to do it: But for the other Party, which adviseth his Restoring, we purpose not so far to Consent unto it, as to the restoring of him to the Electoral Dignity, seeing that in the disposing of it other where, we are resolved that we shall do no more than we have just reason to do; nor will we defer the filling up of the Electoral College, because the dispatching of it doth so much concern the Common Good. But for the Restitution of the Person of the Palatine, you shall see how much our Mind is inclined towards Clemency, and how far we will declare our self to gratifie the King of Great Britain, the King of Denmark, the Elector of Saxony, and other Electors and Princes, interceding for him.

And as concerning our forbidding the Exercise of the Lutherian Religion in the City of Prague; we do not see how it any way concerns this Diet to enquire of, our Letter having signified the Causes that moved us to begin it unto the Elector of Saxony; nor can we think that what we have done there, any of the Neighbour States or Territories need be suspicious of, seeing that we have Sworn oftner than once, in the Word of an Emperour, that we will most Religiously observe the Peace, both of Religion and Civil Government, throughout the Empire. And thus much we could not but advertise this Illustrious Presence of Electors and Princes, and you the Ambassadors of those that are absent.

The Protestants Answer.

The Protestant Electors, and Princes, still persisted in their Resolution, That the Emperour could not translate the Electorate legally; the Words of the Capitulation being clearly these: In all difficult Business, no Process ought to be made, without the Knowledge and Consent of the Electors; and that, without ordinary Process, no Proscription should go out against any one of the States of the Empire, before the Cause were heard. This is the fundamental Law of the Empire, which required no more but to be constantly observed, nor is to be drawn into further Dispute, or Deli-

A. Reg. 20. An. Chriſti 1622.

Deliberation. And it ſtood the Electors upon, to be open-eyed, to ſee to the Obſervation of it, being it concerned the Three Secular Electors eſpecially, whoſe Dignity did by an Hereditary Right deſcend unto their Poſterity, to keep it ſafe and entire, which they hoped that Cæſar would not contradict.

Reſult of all. But the Emperor would not be perſuaded from his own Reſolution; yet in Concluſion, to gratifie the Princes, he was contented to confer the Electorate, with a Priviſo, that the Inveſtiture of the Duke of Bavaria ſhould not be prejudicial to the Children of the Palatine; and ſo the Diet ended.

Feb. 23. The Duke of Saxony was one of the firſt that executed the Imperial Ban againſt the Prince Palatine, aſſiſting the Emperor with a great Army, to level the Power of his fellow Elector when he mounted to be a King, and came ſo near him as Prague; but when he was brought thus low, he would willingly have raiſed him up again, and then the Hand that had done him ſo much Miſchief, was not permitted to do him any Good. But by the Carriage of the Buſineſs (though the Emperor gave fair words) it did after appear, the Auſtrian Policy aimed at the Extirpation of Religion, as well as at the Excluſion of the Palatine and his Children; for he never meant them Title, nor Territory, unleſs he could ſettle both upon a Popiſh Foundation: And to that end there was a private Treaty broached in England, and carried on by ſome of our King's Miniſters of State; That the young Prince Palatine ſhould be bred up in the Emperor's Court, under pretence of marrying his Daughter, but in effect to be trained up in the Popiſh Religion: And our Prince Charles at the ſame time muſt fetch his Wife in Spain; where they hoped the Influence of that Air, their viſible Piety, and their inviſible Plots, would ſweetly inſinuate their Popiſh Principles into him. So impiouſly cunning they are to make others as miſerable as themſelves.

Auſtrian Policy.

The Prince's Journey into Spain. The ending of the Diet in Germany, and our Prince's Journey into Spain, were much about a time. He went with the Marqueſs of Buckingham privately from Court the 17th of February, to New-Hall in Eſſex, the Marqueſs's Houſe, (purchaſed of that unthrift, Robert Earl of Suſſex) and from thence the next day by Graveſend, the ſtraight way to Dover, attended only by Sir Richard Graham, Maſter of the Marqueſs's Horſe; where they were to meet Sir Francis Cottington, who was thought fit to be the Prince's Secretary, and Endimion Porter, who was then taken from the Marqueſs's Bed-Chamber to wait upon the Prince. Cottington was, at firſt, Clerk to Sir Charles Cornwallis's Secretary, when Cornwallis was Ambaſſador in Spain; and being left there an Agent, in the Intervals of Ambaſſadors, was by that means trained up in the Spaniſh Affairs: Porter was bred up in Spain when he was a Boy, and had the Language, but found no other Fortune there, then brought him over to be Mr. Edward Villers's Man in Fleet-ſtreet, which was before either the Marqueſs or his Maſter were acceptable at Whitehall. And Graham at firſt was an Underling of low Degree in the Marqueſs's Stable. It is not hereby intended to viliſie the Perſons, being Men (in this World's Lottery) as capable of Advancement as others; but to ſhew in how poor a Bark the King ventured the rich Freight his Son, having only the Marqueſs to ſteer his Courſe.

The Prince and Buckingham had falſe Beards for Diſguiſes to cover their ſmooth Faces, and the Names of Jack Smith and Tom Smith, which they paſs'd with, leaving behind them Impreſſions in every Place (with their Bounty and Preſence) that they were not the Perſons they preſented; but they were not ſo rudely dealt with as to be queſtioned till they came to Dover, and there the Mayor in a Supercilious Officiouſneſs (which may deſerve the Title of a careful Magiſtrate) examined them ſo far, (being jealous they were Gentlemen going over to Fight) that the Marqueſs (though Admiral was glad to veil his Beard to him in private, and tell him he was going to viſit the Fleet; ſo they had liberty to take Ship, and landed at Bullaign the ſame day, making ſwift Motion by Poſt Horſes (which Celerity leaves the leaſt Impreſſion) till they came to Paris; There the Prince ſpent one day to view the City and Court, ſhaddowing himſelf the moſt he could under a buſhy Peruke, which none in former times but Bald People uſed, but now generally intruded into a Faſhion; and the Prince's was ſo big, that it was Hair enough for his whole Face. The Marqueſs's fair Face was ſhadowed with the ſame Pencil, and they both together ſaw the Queen-Mother at Dinner, the King in the Gallery after Dinner, and towards the evening they had a full view of the Queen Infanta, and the Princeſs Henrietta Maria, with moſt of the Beauties of the Court, at the Practice of a Masking Dance, being admitted by the Duke of Montbaſon, the Queen's Lord Chamberlain, in Humanity to Strangers, when many of the French were put by. *There the Prince ſaw thoſe Eyes that after inflamed his Heart, which increaſed ſo much, that it was thought to be the Cauſe of ſetting Three Kingdoms a-fire: But whether any ſpark of it did then appear, is uncertain; if it did, it was cloſely raked up, till the Spaniſh Fire went out; the Heat whereof made him neglect no time till he came to Madrid.

By Dover.

Paris.

At Bourdeaux, the Duke d' Eſpernon, Governor there, out of a noble freedom to Strangers, offered them the Civilities of his Houſe, which they declined with all baſhful Reſpects, and Sir Francis Cottington, who always looked like a Merchant, and had the leaſt Mien of a Gentleman, (fitteſt for ſuch an Imployment) let him know, they were Gentlemen that deſired to improve themſelves, and had not Breeding ſuitable to his Grandure; which took off the edge of his Invitation, whoſe ſubtile Eye by Converſe might have pried through thoſe fictitious Outſides, to diſcover more than did appear. Bourdeaux.

They paſſed with ſome Difficulties alſo at Bayonne, where the Count de Gramont was Governor, (being the utmoſt part of France, and the Key that opens the Way into Spain) he being a pregnant Man read more than ordinary in them; but where Peace is the School- Bayonne.

* In one of the Original Letters of the Prince and Buckingham to the King, in the Collection abovementioned, the Prince tells him he had been at this Ball, and ſays, Of all that Court there was none to be compar'd for Beauty to the young Queen, which made him more earneſt to ſee her Siſter, his long deſired Miſtreſs. So that it does not appear (at leaſt by that Letter) he had any particular regard to the Princeſs Henrietta Maria at that time, as the Author ſuppoſes.

A. Reg. 20. An. Christi 1622.

Master, Jealousie the Pragmatical Usher hath little to do; therefore out of common Civility he let them pass. And within a small time after they had taken Post, (before they had well passed the Bounds of France) he had Notice by a Courier (that brought Advice thereof to the King of Spain) from Don Carlos de Coloma, Extraordinary Ambassador of England (Gondemar, for his good Service, being sent for home, and advanced) that the Prince of England was among them. . This Hazard the Prince ran, upon Post-Horses, that if he had been discovered, it would not only have questioned his Judgment in the managing of so great an Affair, but he must have remained at the French Mercy, which would have given an Eclipse to the Glory he shined in, in the Court of Spain; for they looked upon this sprightly Journey as a high Remark of a Gallant and Noble Spirit: And happily some Spanish Fancy may now be framing, how many Giant-Difficulties he conquer'd in the way, and what Inchantments he passed among the Beauties of France; for such Romances are frequent among those barren Rosemary Mountains, the Fume whereof is pleasant and helpful to the Brain.

At Madrid. Upon Saturday the 6th of March, they arrived at Madrid. The Prince and Marquess came thither one Day before Cottington and the others, to make the less Noise in Appearances. They lighted at the Earl of Bristol's House in the Evening, and the Marquess brought in the Portmantua; but his Master stay'd without with the Guide, till he had prepar'd a Way for Privacy. The Earl of Bristol was astonish'd at the Sight; but after he had collected himself, his Diligence attended his Duty, and the Prince wanted nothing but Counsel how to order himself, which they took time (till the next Day towards the Evening) to deliberate on. All that Morning the Town was filled with Rumours of the Arrival of some great Prince; and tho' the King of Spain had Intimation by his Letters, yet he kept all private till the Prince express'd himself, which was done that Evening: For Buckingham and Bristol went to the Court, and had private Audience of the King, who sent his Grand Favourite Olivares back with them to congratulate the Prince's coming, who let the Prince know, how happy the King his Master was in the Enjoyment of him there, and what Addition of Grandure his Presence would contribute to the Court of Spain; and that the Obligation was so great, that he deserved to have the Infanta thrown into his Arms. All this while kneeling, kissing his Hands, and embracing his Thigh! the huge and swelling Expressions of Spanish Humility. And from him he went to the Marquess of Buckingham, telling him, That now the Prince of England was in Spain, his Master and he would divide the World betwixt them, with other Rodomontado Fancies. And after he was gone, about Ten of the Clock that Night, the King of Spain came in a close Coach to visit the Prince, who having Intimation of his coming, (such secret Hints among Princes being suitable Invitements) he met him in the Way, and there they spent some time in those sweet, yet formal, Caresses and Embraces, that are Incidents to the Interviews of great Princes, tho' their Hearts and Tongues do seldom accord.

A. Reg. 20. An. Christi 1622.

Gondemar, in Consort, was not without his Strain of Compliment: For he told the Prince upon a Visit next Day, That he had strange News to tell him; which was, That an English-man was Sworn a Privy-Councellor to the King of Spain; meaning himself, who he said was an English-man in his Heart, and had lately receiv'd that Honour.

The next Day the King and Prince had some Interviews in their Coaches passing to the Parada to take the Air, where also he had a Glimpse of his fair Mistress; but the Formality of the Prince's Entertainment was deferred till his Lodgings were made ready in the Court, which was the Sunday following, being that Day invited to Dinner to St. Hierome's Monastery, where the King commanded divers of his Great Officers to attend upon the Prince, which they did bare Headed, and they say it was according to the old Custom of Castile; but King Philip when he was in England found that Respect, and retain'd it ever after in Spain. The Prince would have prevented their Ceremony to him; but they are stubborn, and pertinacious in their very Humility. After Dinner the King came in Person, with his Favourite Olivares, and divers others of the Nobility in Coaches, with Intention on Horseback (for the more State) to conduct the Prince through the Town to the Court, having Horses and all Accoutrements fit for such a Loyal Train. And thus mounted they rode in great Glory through the Streets, (being adorned with rich Tapistry and rare Pictures) as their Kings do to their Coronation. The Spanish Civility plac'd the Prince on the Right Hand of the King, under a rich Cloth of State, supported by many Persons of Quality; Olivares and Buckingham went next the Canopy, and after them the rest of their Grandees in their several Degrees, most Glorious every where to behold, the choice Beauties of the Town and Court presenting themselves to see, and to be seen. At the Court-Gate they dismounted, and then a new friendly Strife began who would enter first; and because that should breed no Difference, they went both together. The Queen and the Infanta, from a Window in the Court, saw them come riding in Triumphant Equipage; and when they alighted, the Infanta retired, and the Queen went to her Chamber, expecting a Visit; and when the King and Prince entred her Chamber, she rose to meet them, making an Obedisance to the Prince suitable to her Greatness and his; and he bowing to the Ground almost in Obedience to her, were both as great Patterns of Civility and Courtesy to the rest of their Train. And after some Compliments, they sate down in Three Royal Seats prepared for them, the Queen in the Middle, the Prince on her Right Hand, and the King on her Left. And in this Stately Posture they discours'd away some half an Hour's time, and then parted. The Queen brought the Prince to the utmost extent of her Chamber, and the King to a Chamber prepar'd for him, (with many Rooms of State, sumptuously adorned) where he left him to his own Attendance, and some great Spanish Condes, as Principal Officers of his Houshould Gondemar ever being one about him, Two Days after the Prince was invited to run at the Ring, where his fair Mistress was a Rides in State to the Court.

. That the King was in great Perplexity lest the Prince might be discovered and arrested in France, appears by a Letter in the foresaid Collection, sent by Griffith the next Day after he left Dover; in which he encloses one to the French King, which he desires the Prince to deliver in case he be discover'd. But if otherways, he desires him, whenever he arrives in the Spanish Territories, to write back to that King a Letter of Excuse, for not waiting on him in his Passage thro' his Country.

Specta-

An. Reg. 20. An. Christi 1622.

Spectator, and, to the Glory of his Fortune, and the great Contentment both of himself and the Lookers on, he took the Ring the very first Course. So seasonable are these little empty Joys, when they are suitable to our Minds and Wishes.

His Royal Entertainment.

All that the Spanish Court could do, was heighten'd into Gallantry and Civilities to the Prince; yet he saw not his fair Mistress but at an undiscerning Distance, and in transitu, as she came from Church. But after all these Splendid and Glorious outside Ceremonies of Entertainment were grown a little old, the Prince began to mind the Business he came about, and desired a more intimate Access to his beloved Infanta, which Olivares promised from Day to Day to accomplish, but still delay'd; and at length, when unperform'd Promises were heighten'd into Shame, he plainly confess'd, That it was agreed by the King and his Council, that he might not see her as a Lover till the Dispensation came, for it would give Scandal to admit him before; yet not to starve him quite in his Desires, (but to keep him short, that he should not surfeit) he had now and then Access to her as a Prince, in a publick way, the King of Spain being always present, and the Earl of Bristol Interpreter; so that nothing could be spoken but those little superficial Compliments, that served as Baits rather to nibble on, then satisfy. But these small Repasts kept up the Appetite.

The English Nobility flock into Spain.

And now the Glories of the English Court left the Northern Sun declining to the West, and came to see the Sun rising in Spain. The Marquess of Buckingham's new Title of Duke came to him also, (that he might be in the highest Rank among the Spanish Grandees) to beard the proudest of them; which afterwards he did. And the Viscount Doncaster (lately made Earl of Carlile) came in all his Glories; of which Two, it was observed by knowing Men, That Buckingham came into Spain of the Spanish Faction, and returned into England of the French Faction: Carlile came into Spain of the French Faction, and returned into England of the Spanish: Thus varying the Scene by Fits, and acting their Parts as the present Fancy moved them. The Lord Kensington, Captain of the Guard to our King, came also to see the Prince, so did the Earl of Denbigh, Edward, Son and Heir to the now Earl of Manchester; the Viscount Mandevill, the Viscount Rochford, and divers others of the Nobility: And the Prince was so circled with a splendid Retinue of his own People, that it might be said, There was an English Court in the King of Spain's Palace.

The Spanish strive to pervert the Prince.

But, together with these specious Entertainments, there were underworking Hopes to have the Prince turn Papist; for (in intervenient Discourses) Olivares and others would press him (with all the Arguments the Court had instructed them in) to a Conversion; intimating, how smooth a Path it would make to the Infanta's Affections; for when he, that was to be Lord of her Heart, and the best Friend she had, would be an Enemy to her Religion, it could not but be a great Obstacle to her Love. And when the Danger of it was proposed to them, as likely to bring a Rebellion in the Nation, if their Prince should be perverted; they promised to assist him with an Army against such Rebellious People. But if he would not admit of a present and sudden Alteration publickly, yet that he would be indulgent, when the Infanta came into England, as to listen to her in Matters of Religion; which the Prince promised to do. Nay, his own familiar Friend Bristol (as it was Articled against him afterwards by Buckingham) did strive with a gentle Hand to allure him that way, as bringing with it an Addition to the Grandure of the Kings of England, That none of them could ever do great Things that were not of that Religion.

Thus was the Prince beset, and Time ran away in Discourses; the Dispensation being purposely delay'd; for some at that time in the Spanish Court said it was come, and sent back again to Rome, (being too forward and active) that it might have more Weight put upon it, and then it would not make so much hast; for now it came too soon to dispatch their Work: For they Subtilly consider'd, that Time and continual Dropping might leave those Impressions upon the Prince's Spirit, that Dispatches cannot effect. Therefore they made new Queries, that clapp'd new Remora's upon the Articles, that being tangled in Disputations betwixt England and Spain, and in Controversies of Religion betwixt the Prince and some of their cunning Sophisters, (which they set a-work) that before the Way could be well cleared on both sides, their Design (which was the Prince's Perversion) might mature and ripen. For the Earl of Bristol confessed afterwards, That it was a general receiv'd Opinion in the Spanish Court, that the Prince came thither with Intention to be a Roman Catholick: And Gondomar pressed Bristol not to hinder so pious a Work, assuring him, they had the Duke of Buckingham's Assistance therein.

So doth the Pope.

And it was evident enough their Hopes were great, by the Pope's Letter to the Bishop of Conchen, Inquisitor-General in Spain; wherein he excites him not to slip the Opportunity Providence had put into his Hand, of extending his Piety to the outermost Nations. The Prince of England being now in the Court of Spain, that glorious Temple (as it were) that hath been a Bulwark to the Pontifical Authority, and an Academy for Propagation of Religion, he desires he may not stay there in vain; but that some of the Impressions of the Piety of so many Catholick Kings as have lived there may be imprinted on him, that he may be won with all Sweetness, as many of his Noble Ancestors have been, who have submitted their Crown'd Heads and Imperial Power to the Roman Obedience. And to this Glorious Victory, and Eternal Triumph of Celestial Beatitudes, the Treasures of Kings, and Legions of Soldiers, cannot contribute; but the Weapons of Light, that must come from Heaven, whose Splendour enlightening the Prince's Eyes, shall dazle his Errors, and establish his Mind in Meekness. And he charges the Bishop and all his Fraternity to use the best Strength and Industry they can to this purpose. So that the Prince was continually laid at, by the insinuating Orations of cunning Jesuits; the feigned and couzening Miracles of reclused Holiness; the splendid and specious Solemnities of their formal Processions; the rare and admirable Pictures of their reputed Saints; besides many other painted Devices and subtle Artifices brooded among them.

And the Pope used all the Rhetorick of his Cabalistical Consistory of Holy Chair to charm him to his Obedience, as may be seen by this Letter, which he writ to him himself.

By his Letter

'MOst Noble Prince, Health and Light of
' Divine Grace. Forasmuch as Great Bri- ' tain hath always been fruitful in Virtues, and

Men

A. Reg. 20. An. Christi 1622.

'Men of Merit, having filled the one and the 'other World with the Glory of her Renown, 'she doth also very often attract the Thoughts 'of the Holy Apostolical Chair to the Conside-'ration of her Praises. And indeed the Church 'was but then in her Infancy, when the King 'of Kings did choose her for his Inheritance, 'and so affectionately, that it is thought the 'Roman Eagles prevailed not so much as the 'Banner of the Cross. Besides, that many of 'her Kings, instructed in the Knowledge of 'the true Salvation, have preferred the Cross 'before the Royal Scepter, and the Discipline 'of Religion before Covetousness, leaving Ex-'amples of Piety to other Nations, and to the 'Ages yet to come; so as having merited the 'principal and chief Places of Blessedness in 'Heaven, they have obtained on Earth the 'Triumphant Ornaments of true Holiness. 'And altho' now the State of the English Church 'be alter'd, yet we see the Court of Great Bri-'tain adorn'd and furnish'd with Moral Virtues, 'which might serve to support the Charity that 'we bear unto her, and be an Ornament to the 'Name of Christianity; if withal she could 'have for her Defence and Protection the Or-'thodox and Catholick Truth. Wherefore, by 'how much the Glory of your most Noble Fa-'ther, and the Apprehension of your Royal 'Disposition, delights us, with so much more 'Zeal we desire that the Gates of the Heavenly 'Kingdom might be open'd unto you, and that 'you might purchase to your self the Love of 'the Universal Church. Moreover, it being 'certain that Gregory the Great, of most blessed 'Memory, hath introduced to the English Peo-'ple and taught their Kings the Law of the 'Gospel, and the Respect to Apostolical Au-'thority; we as inferior to him in Holiness 'and Virtue, but equal in Name and Degree of 'Dignity, it is very reasonable that we, follow-'ing his blessed Steps, should endeavour the 'Salvation of those Provinces, especially at this 'time, when your happy Design (most Noble 'Prince) elevates us to the Hope of an extraor-'dinary Advantage. And as you have taken a 'Journey into Spain to the Catholick King, 'with Desire to Ally your self to the House of 'Austria; so we do commend your Design, and 'indeed do testify openly in this present Busi-'ness, That you are he that takes the principal 'Care of our Prelacy. For seeing that you de-'sire to take in Marriage the Daughter of Spain, 'we may easily from thence conjecture, that 'the ancient Seeds of Christian Piety, which 'have so happily flourish'd in the Hearts of the 'Kings of Great Britain, may (God prospering 'them) revive again in your Soul. And in-'deed it is not to be believed, that he that loves 'such an Alliance, should hate the Catholick 'Religion, and delight to oppress the Holy 'Chair. To that purpose we have commanded 'to make continually most humble Prayers to 'the Father of Lights, That he would be pleas-'sed to put you as a fair Flower of Christendom, 'and the only Hope of Great Britain, in Pos-'session of that most Noble Heritage that your 'Ancestors have purchased for you, to defend 'the Authority of the Sovereign High Priest, 'and to fight against the Monsters of Heresy. 'Remember the Days of old, enquire of your 'Fathers, and they will tell you the Way that 'leads to Heaven, and what Way Temporal 'Princes have taken to gain an Eternal King-'dom. Behold the Gates of Heaven opened, 'the most Holy Kings of England (who came 'from England to Rome accompanied with An-'gels) did come to Honour and do Homage to 'the Lord of Lords, and to the Prince of the 'Apostles, in the Apostolical Chair; their 'Actions and Examples, being as so many 'Voices of God, speaking and exhorting you 'to follow the Course of the Lives of those, to 'whose Empire you shall one Day attain.

'Is it possible that you can suffer Hereticks 'should hold them for impious, and condemn 'those whom the Faith of the Church testifies 'to Reign in Heaven with Jesus Christ, and 'have Command and Authority over all Prin-'cipalities and Empires of the Earth? Behold 'how they tender you the Hand of this truly 'happy Inheritance, to conduct you safe and 'sound to the Court of the Catholick King; 'and now desire to bring you back again into 'the Bosom of the Roman Church; beseeching, 'with unspeakable Sighs and Groans, the God 'of all Mercy for your Salvation, and do stretch 'out to you the Arms of the Apostolical Cha-'rity, to embrace you with all Christian Af-'fection; even you, that are her desired Son, 'in shewing you the happy Hope of the King-'dom of Heaven. And indeed you cannot give 'a greater Consolation to all the People of the 'Christian World, than to put the Prince of the 'Apostles in possession of your most Noble 'Island, whose Authority hath been held so 'long in the Kingdom of Britain for the De-'fence of Kingdoms, and for a Divine Oracle; 'the which will easily arrive, and without Dif-'ficulty, if you open your Heart to the Lord 'that knocks, upon which depends all the Hap-'piness of that Kingdom. It is from this our 'great Charity that we cherish the Praises of 'the Royal Name; and that which makes us 'desire that you and your Royal Father might 'be stiled with the Name of Deliverers and Re-'storers of the Ancient and Paternal Religion of 'Great Britain. This is it we hope for, trusting 'in the Goodness of God, in whose Hands are 'the Hearts of Kings, and who causeth the 'People of the Earth to receive Healing; to 'whom we will always labour with all our 'Power to render you gracious and favourable. 'In the Interim take notice by these Letters the 'Care of our Charity, which is none other 'than to procure your Happiness; and it will 'never grieve us to have written them, if the 'reading of them stir but the least Spark of Ca-'tholick Faith in the Heart of so great a Prince, 'whom we wish to be filled with long continu-ance of Joy, and flourishing in the Glory of 'all Virtues. Given at Rome, in the Palace of St. Peter, the 20th of April, 1623. in the Third Year of our Popedom.

The Pope's Cunning.

This Letter of the Pope's expresses not only the sleek and smooth Ways that Soul-Merchant takes to purchase his Proselytes, but the End he proposes to himself; which is, to bring them under the Roman Obedience; otherwise, whatsoever they do or profess is Heresy. And to build up the Towers of this great Babel, the Name of the most high God is brought down among them, and used as a Master-Builder. Every Profession lays that Name as a Foundation, tho' the Superstructure be but Straw and Stubble of Hypocrisy, which a Whirlwind shall scatter; and the Time is coming that her Lovers shall be destroy'd, and fiery-cloven Tongues shall confound their Language. The Prince was not slack in answering this Letter, which happily he might think would quicken the Pope to dispatch the Dispensation, when he should find so little Cause for Delays, by his closing so nearly nearly with him: Which whether out of Policy, or real Intention, cannot be asserted; but the Letter was thus:

A. Reg. 21. An. Christi 1623.

The Prince's Answer.

MOST Holy Father, I received the Dispatch from your Holiness with great Content, and with that Respect which the Piety and Care wherewith your Holiness writes doth require. It was an unspeakable Pleasure to me to read the generous Exploits of the Kings my Predecessors, to whose Memory Posterity hath not given those Praises and Elogies of Honour that were due to them. I do believe that your Holiness hath set their Example before my Eyes to the end that I might imitate them in all my Actions; for in Truth they have often exposed their Estates and Lives for the Exaltation of the Holy Chair: And the Courage with which they have assaulted the Enemies of the Cross of Jesus Christ, hath not been less than the Care and Thought which I have, to the End that the Peace and Intelligence, which hath hitherto been wanting in Christendom, might be bound with a Band of true Concord: For like as the Common Enemy of Peace watcheth always to put Hatred and Dissention between Christian Princes, so I believe that the Glory of God requires that we should endeavour to unite them. And I do not esteem it a greater Honour to be descended from so Great Princes, than to imitate them in the Zeal of their Piety: In which it helps me very much to have known the Mind and Will of our Thrice Honoured Lord and Father, and the Holy Intentions of his Catholick Majesty, to give a happy Concurrence to so laudable a Design: For it grieves him extreamly to see the great Evil that grows from the Division of Christian Princes, which the Wisdom of your Holiness foresaw, when it judged the Marriage, which you pleased to Design, between the Infanta of Spain and my self, to be necessary to procure so great a Good: For 'tis very certain, that I shall never be so extreamly affectionate to any thing in the World, as to endeavour Alliance with a Prince that hath the same Apprehension of the true Religion with my self. Therefore I entreat your Holiness to believe, that I have been always far from encouraging Novelties, or to be a Partisan of any Faction against the Catholick Apostolick Roman Religion: But on the contrary, I have sought all Occasions to take away the Suspicion that might rest upon me; and that I will employ my self for the time to come to have but one Religion and one Faith, seeing that we all believe in One Jesus Christ. Having resolved in my self to spare nothing that I may have in the World, and to suffer all manner of Discommodities, even to the hazarding of my Estate and Life, for a Thing so pleasing unto God. It rests only, that I thank your Holiness for the Permission which you have been pleased to afford me, and that I may pray God to give you a blessed Health here, and his Glory, after so much Travel which your Holiness takes within his Church. †‡†

Signed,

CHARLES STUART.

A fatal Letter.

It may well be a Quere, Whether this Profession of the Prince, in suffering all Discommodities, even to the hazarding of State and Life, did not rest upon him at his Death? as may be said hereafter: But there is a long Race for him to run before he come to that End. It seems he had either a good Will to write this Letter, or a bad Council to indite it, or both conjoined, that were as careful to please the Pope, as they were hopeful it would never come to see the Light, till the Flame of it would be too visible. For if the Prince intended really (when he had Power) to Introduce Popery into England, this Letter in a bloody Colour too apparently would have been discovered; and if his Intentions were formal, and only to close with the Pope for his present Accommodation, How black would every Character of this Letter look to the Roman Rubrick, and what a Tincture of Scandal would it leave upon the true Religion? for Fallere fallentem may be a fit Motto for a bad Man, not a good Christian; so that whatsoever his Intentions were, the Act was evil: And I could suspect it as a forged Letter, but that it hath been asserted by so many Authors both at home and abroad.

The Dispensation comes to Madrid.

The Pope finding by this Letter, and some other private Intimations, the Prince's good Affections to the Roman See, thought it high time to dally no longer, but to draw him altogether with the Cords of Love; therefore he dispatches the Dispensation to his Nuncio at Madrid, six Months after the Prince's Arrival

---

†‡† I shall not venture to say any thing for or against the Truth of this Letter to the Pope, it being generally agreed upon, that there was one in Answer to another of the Pope's.

But its but doing Justice to the Memory of this Prince to take Notice, that in all that Collection of Original Letters I have so often quoted, there is no mention made of any Letters from the Prince to the Pope, nor of the Pope to him, though at the same time the most minute Accidents that happened to the Prince at Madrid are there set down.

It's likewise observable, that in all that Collection, and in all the other Letters I have seen of King Charles, when Prince of Wales, he constantly subscrib'd Charles P. and never Charles Stuart.

It's true, there is in that Collection a Letter of Buckingham's before the Prince went to Spain, wherein, as I said elsewhere, he desires the King's Amendments to one of his to Cardinal Ludovisio, but not a Word of any to the Pope.

It's likewise true, that in a Letter in that Collection, dated at Madrid, March 10. 1623. the Prince and Buckingham, after having told the King all the Remora's they met with in their Business, and how difficult it would be to get the Pope's Dispensation; they add this Expression, If the Pope will not grant the Dispensation, then we desire to know how far we may engage you in the Acknowledgement of the Pope's Spiritual Power: For we almost find, if you will be contented to acknowledge the Pope chief Head under Christ, that the Match will be made without him. But what Answer King James made to this Letter, does not appear in that Collection.

It must also be own'd, That the Truth of the Concessions mention'd by our Author to have been made by King James to the Court of Rome, in order to facilitate the Spanish Match, were never call'd in question by any other Author of Repute. And in a Letter contain'd in the aforesaid Collection, King James acquaints the Prince and Buckingham, then at Madrid, with his sending over Two Chaplains, Maw and Wren, with Ornaments for the Prince's Chappel, whom he had fully instructed how to demean themselves there; That so (says he) their Behaviour and Service may be decent and agreeable to the Primitive Church, and yet as near the Roman Form as can lawfully be done: For it has ever been my Way (continues he) to go with the Church of Rome Usque ad aras; meaning, as I suppose, as far as the Mass, or Sacrifice of the Altar exclusive.

There must certainly have been Transactions on foot at that time that were not fit to be made publick, nor even to be communicated to the Council. This is clear from another Letter in that Collection of King James's, wherein he desires the Prince and Buckingham to continue to write to him always in one and the same Letter; assuring them, He would be very wary not to acquaint his Council with what Secrets they should write. But (says he) I have been troubled with Hamilton (meaning the Marquess) who being present by chance when I received your first and second Packets from Madrid, would needs peer over my Shoulder (for that is his Word) when I was reading them, offering to help me to read any hard Word: And in good Faith (continues he) he is in this Business, as in all things else, as unstable and uncertain as the Moon.

there,

A. Reg. 21. An. Christi 1623.

there, with a little Bob at the Tail of it, yet to amuse them; which was, That the King of Great Britain and the Prince should give Caution to perform what was stipulated between them and the King of Spain, especially in those Articles which were in Favour of the Roman Catholicks in England, and other his Majesty's Dominions; requiring at least some Sovereign Catholick Prince should engage for them by Oath. This made some little Demur; for being sent into England, the King answered, That he could give no other Caution but his own and the Prince's Royal Words and Oaths, confirmed by his Council of State, and exemplified under the Great Seal of England: But this would not satisfy: Therefore the King of Spain undertook it; and it was thought a Spanish Device, That, by undertaking such an Engagement, he might not only the more endear himself to the King of Great Britain, and to the Prince his Brother, but have a more colourable Pretext to make War against England, if the Roman Catholicks there had not full Satisfaction and Freedom according to the Articles: And the King of Spain, knowing or assuring himself that no Catholick Prince would take such an Oath, offered himself to satisfy the Pope. And a Committee of Ecclesiasticks in Spain were appointed to debate the Case in relation to the King's Conscience, Whether he might take such an Oath for them? and they (being doubtless, resolved on it before) concluded affirmatively: And that if the King of Great Britain and Prince should fail in the Performance of these Capitulations, the King of Spain might save his Oath, by vindicating the Breach thereof upon them with his Sword. And now this Monster-difficulty being overcome by the Spanish Bravery, the very same time, Articles, that our King and Prince had signed, (as are before related) were sent into England for our King and his Privy-Council to swear to; and there was not a Rub left for either Party to stumble at.

But whilst these things were in motion in Spain, they were much regretted and badly resented in England; the Spirit almost of the whole Nation being averse to this Union, which made many vent their Passion by their Pens, as well as their Tongues. Amongst the rest, the Archbishop of Canterbury, knowing that a Toleration was to be admitted, (though he stood tottering in the King's Favour, and had the Badge of a Puritan clapt upon him) thought it better to discharge his Conscience, though he hazarded all, rather than be silent in such a Cause, where the Glory of God, and the Good of the Kingdom, were so highly concerned. Therefore he writes this Letter to the King,

The Archbishop's Letter to the King against Toleration.

May it please your Majesty,

I Have been too long silent, and am afraid by my Silence I have neglected the Duty of the Place it hath pleased God to call me unto, and your Majesty to place me in. And now I humbly crave Leave I may discharge my Conscience towards God, and my Duty to Your Majesty; and therefore I beseech Your Majesty to give me Leave freely to deliver my self, and then let Your Majesty do with me what You please. Your Majesty hath propounded a Toleration of Religion: I beseech you, Sir, take into your Consideration what the Act is, next what the Consequence may be. By your Act You labour to set up that most Damnable and Heretical Doctrine of the Church of Rome, the Whore of Babylon. How hateful will it be to God, and grievous unto your good Subjects, the true Professors of the Gospel, that your Majesty, who hath often disputed and learnedly written against those wicked Heresies, should now shew your self a Patron of those Doctrines, which your Pen hath told the World, and your Conscience tells your self, are superstitious, idolatrous, and detestable? Add hereunto what You have done in sending the Prince into Spain, without the Consent of your Council, the Privity and Approbation of your People. And though, Sir, You have a large Interest in the Prince, as the Son of your Flesh, yet hath the People a greater, as the Son of the Kingdom, upon whom (next after Your Majesty) their Eyes are fixed, and Welfare depends: And so tenderly is his going apprehended, as, believe it, Sir, however his Return may be safe, yet the Drawers of him to that Action, so dangerous to himself, so desperate to the Kingdom, will not pass away unquestioned and unpunished. Besides, this Toleration which you endeavour to set up by Proclamation, cannot be done without a Parliament, unless your Majesty would let your Subjects see, That You will take unto your self a Liberty to throw down the Laws of the Land at your Pleasure. What dreadful Consequence these things may draw after them, I beseech Your Majesty to consider. And, above all, lest by this Toleration, and Discontinuance of the true Profession of the Gospel, whereby God hath blessed us, and under which this Kingdom hath for many Years flourished, Your Majesty do not draw upon the Kingdom in general, and your self in particular, God's heavy Wrath and Indignation. Thus, in Discharge of my Duty towards God, to your Majesty, and the Place of my Calling, I have taken humble Boldness to deliver my Conscience. And now, Sir, do with me what You please.

Thus did our Solomon in his latter time (though he had fought with the Beasts at Ephesus, as one saith of him) incline a little too much to the Beast; yet he made his Tale so good to the Archbishop of Canterbury, (what Reservations soever he had) that he wrought upon the good old Man (afterwards) in the Conclusion of the Work, to set his Hand as a Witness to the Articles. And his Desires were so heightned to the Heats of Spain, (which boil'd him to such a Distemper) that he would listen to nothing, and almost yield to any thing, rather than not to enjoy his own Humour.

Arguments for and against a Toleration.

Divers of his intimate Council, affecting Popery, were not slack to urge him to a Toleration, and many Arguments were used inciting to it; as, That Catholicks were the King's best and most peaceable Subjects, the Puritans being the only Sticklers and the greatest Disturbers of the Royal Peace, trenching too boldly upon the Prerogative, and striving to lessen the Kingly Power: But if the King had Occasion to make use of the Catholicks, he should find them more faithful to him than those that are ever contesting with him. And why should not Catholicks with as much Safety be permitted in England, as the Protestants are in France? That their Religion was full of Love and Charity, (where they could enjoy it with Freedom;) and where Charity lays the Foundation, the upper Building must needs be Spiritual. But these Arguments were answer'd, and many Reasons alledged against them, proving the Nature of the Protestant Religion to be compatible with the Nature of the Politick Laws of any State, of what Religion soever; because it teacheth, That the Government of any State, whether Monarchical or Aristocratical, is Supream within it self, and not Subordinate to any Power without; so that the Knot of Allegiance thereunto is so firmly tied, that no humane Power can unloose or dissolve it. Whereas, on the contrary, the Roman Religion, acknowledging knowledging a Supremacy in another, above that Power which ſwayeth the State, whereof they are Members, muſt conſequently hold, that one Stroke of that Supream Power is able to unſinew and cut in ſunder all the Bonds which tye them to the Subordinate and Dependent Authority; and therefore can ill accord with the Allegiance which Subjects owe to a Prince of their own Religion, which makes Papiſts intolerable in a Proteſtant Common-wealth. For what Faith can a Prince or People expect from them, whoſe Tenet is, That no Faith is to be held with Hereticks? That the Proteſtants in France had merited better there than the Papiſts had done in England; the one, by their Loyalties to their Lawful King, having ranſomed that Kingdom with their Bloods, in the Pangs of her deſperate Agonies, from the Yoak of an Uſurper within, and the Tyranny of a Foreign Scepter without; the other ſeeking to write their Diſloyalties in the Heart-blood of the Princes and beſt Subjects of this Kingdom. That the Number and Quality of the Profeſſors of theſe different Religions in either Kingdom is to be obſerved: For in France the Number of the Proteſtants were ſo great, that a Toleration did not make them, but found them, a conſiderable Party, ſo ſtrong, as they could not have been ſuppreſſed without endangering the Kingdom: But a Toleration in England would not find, but form, the Papiſts to be a conſiderable Party, (witneſs their Encreaſe by this late Connivancy; a Thing which ought mainly to be avoided: For the Diſtraction of a State into ſeveral powerful Parties is always weakning, and often proveth the utter Ruin thereof.

A. Reg. 21.
An. Christi 1623.

The Match concluded in England.

Theſe things were laid open to the King, but all were waved by the King of Spain's Offering His Engagement to the Pope, by Oath, That he and the Prince his Son ſhould obſerve and keep the Articles ſtipulated betwixt them, did exceedingly affect him: And the Articles now coming to cloſe up all, they were engroſſed, with a long Preamble, declaring to all the World the much deſired Union betwixt him and the King of Spain, by the Marriage of his Son to the Infanta Maria, Siſter to the King: To which end he had ſent his Son into Spain, to treat and conclude the Match; together with George Duke of Buckingham, John Earl of Briſtol, Sir Walter Aſton and Sir Francis Cottington Baronets, Commiſſioners on his Part for the ſaid Treaty; and on the behalf of the King of Spain, John de Mendoza and Luna, Marquis of Monſtes Claros, Didaco Sarmiento de Acuna Earl of Gondemar, and John de Ciriza Secretary to the Secret Council: Which Commiſſioners for both Parts, qualified by a Diſpenſation from his Holineſs, after long and deliberate Diſpute in ſo ſerious a Matter, Communi conſenſu atque judicio in aliquas capitulationes & conditiones, ad rem terminandam & adſtipulandam accommodatas, quae ſic ſe habent, convenerunt, by one Conſent and Judgment, had determined and concluded the ſame.

The Preamble to the Articles.

Then followed the before-recited Articles, after which this long Poſtſcript atteſting them.

The Poſtſcript to the Articles.

THE Treaty aforeſaid, and all and ſingular the Capitulations in the ſame contained and ſpecified, are acceptable to Us; and from Our certain Knowledge, ſo as much as doth concern Us, Our Heirs and Succeſſors, We do approve, allow, confirm and ratify, all and every of them: And We do promiſe by theſe Preſents, bona fide, in the Word of a King, laying aſide all Exception and Contradiction, inviolably, firmly, well and faithfully, to keep, obſerve and fulfil the ſame, and to cauſe them with Effect to be kept, obſerved and fulfilled: And laying Our Hand upon the Holy Evangeliſts, We do confirm the ſame by Oath; in the Preſence of the Illuſtrious and Noble-Men, John de Mendoza and Carolus à Colonna, Ambaſſadors of his Majeſty the Catholick King, reſident in our Court; notwithſtanding all Opinions, Sentences and Laws to the contrary. In Faith and Witneſs that theſe Articles, and all and ſingular the Premiſſes, were ſubſcribed with Our own Hand, We have cauſed Our Great Seal to be put to them, in the Preſence of the most Reverend Father in Chriſt, George Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Primate of all England; the moſt Reverend Father in Chriſt, John, Biſhop of Lincoln, Keeper of the Great Seal of England; and Our beloved Couſins, Lionel, Earl of Middleſex, Lord High Treaſurer of England, Henry Viſcount Mandevil, Preſident of Our Council; Edward Earl of Worceſter, Keeper of Our Privy Seal; Lodowick Duke of Richmond and Lenox, High Steward of Our Houſhold, James Marqueſs Hamilton, James Earl of Carliſle; Thomas Earl of Kelley; Oliver Viſcount Grandiſon, and the Reverend Father in Chriſt, Lancelot, Biſhop of Wincheſter, Dean of Our Royal Chappel, and Our Beloved and Faithful, George Baron Carew of Clopton, Maſter of our Great Ordnance of England; Arthur Baron Chicheſter of Belfaſt, High Treaſurer of Our Kingdom of Ireland; Sir Thomas Edmonds Kt. Treaſurer of Our Royal Houſhold; Sir John Sucklin Kt. Comptroller of Our Houſhold; Sir George Calvert Kt. One of Our Principal Secretaries; Sir Edward Conwey Kt. another of Our Principal Secretaries; Sir Richard Weſton Kt. Chancellor and Sub-Treaſurer of Our Exchequer; and Sir Julius Cæſar Kt. Maſter of Our Rolls; all of them of our Privy Council. Dated at Our Palace at Weſtminſter the Twentieth Day of July, in the One and twentieth Year of Our Reign.

This Train of Witneſſes are ſet down to ſhew who were then of our King's Council; though ſome of them ſet their Hands to it much againſt their Wills, and ſwore with as little Zeal to obſerve and keep (as much as in them lay) all the aforeſaid Articles; ſuch Power have Kings over Mens Reaſons and Conſciences.

There was ſome little Conteſt betwixt our King and the King of Spain's Ambaſſadors, about ſome particular Ceremonies obſerved in ſwearing of theſe Articles; for our King having written and ſpoken againſt the Pope's Holineſs, would not admit him to be ſo ſtiled in his Oath: But the Ambaſſadors refuſed to proceed further, unleſs that Title were conſented unto; ſo that our King, (affected ever to be accounted a Peace-maker) though he were Defender of the Faith, was forced to lay by his Shield, (admitting him to be holy who was moſt unholy;) and ſo the Strife ended. Some other little things were ſtood upon by the Ambaſſadors, but the King's Patience ſurmounted all their Demands. And in the Cloſe of the Buſineſs, he invited the Ambaſſadors to a Royal Feaſt at Whitehall; where, after Dinner, retiring into the Council-Chamber, the King took another private Oath, to obſerve certain Articles in Favour of Roman Catholicks, for a free Exerciſe of their Religion in all his Dominions; whereto he proteſted to do what in him lay, that the Parliament ſhould confirm the ſame. And thus was the great Buſineſs accompliſhed, which gave our King ſo much Content, that (being tranſported with an Aſſurance of the Match) he was heard to ſay, Now all the Devils in Hell cannot hinder it; ſo ſecure was he of it in his Private Articles ſworn to.

An. Reg. 21. An. Christi 1623.

own Opinion: But one that heard him, said to others standing by, That there was never a Devil now left in Hell, for they were now all gone into Spain to make up the Match.

Jesuites swarm.

This Forwardness of the Union with Spain, and Indulgence to Papists, made Jesuites and Priests swarm in every Corner, setting up their subtile Traps to catch wavering Spirits: And they could not hear of a Man of Estate that was sick, (for Persons of Quality were only aimed at) but they would tamper with his weak Conscience, and perswade him to the Charity of their Religion, whereby his Soul (that was tainted with Earthly Corruptions, and must needs be purged by Fire before it can come to God) should escape the Pains of Purgatory; or if it went thither, their Prayers could redeem them thence; with such Stuff as this deceiving many poor Souls. But their most specious juggling Argument (which did catch many Ignorant Persons) was the Visibility of their Church in all Ages, (as they pretended) and their great Question, Where the Protestant Church was before Luther? Among the rest, one Edward Buggs Esq; living in London, aged Seventy Years, and an old professed Protestant, was seduced by them in his Sickness; and after his Recovery, being troubled in Mind, at his Request and Desire there was a Publick Conference and Dispute appointed at Sir Humphrey Lynd's House; Lynd being a Friend to Buggs, and a Gentleman of great Knowledge and Integrity, who was able to grapple with the Jesuites himself; yet he modestly desired Doctor White and Doctor Featly, Protestants, to encounter with Father Fisher, and Father Sweet Jesuites: Where Featly laid their juggling Tricks at their Doors; protesting to acknowledge himself overcome by them, if they could prove out of any good Author, (let them brag what they would of the Visibility of their Church in all Ages) that in City, Parish, or Hamlet, within Five hundred Years next after Christ, there was any visible Assembly of Christians to be named, maintaining or defending either the Council of Trent in general, or these Points of Popery in special.

Dispute publickly

1. 'That there is a Treasury of Saints Merits, 'and superabundant Satisfactions at the Pope's 'disposing.

2. 'That the Laity are not commanded by 'Christ's Institution to receive the Sacrament of 'the Lord's Supper in both kinds.

3. 'That the Publick Service of God in the 'Church, ought, or may be celebrated in an 'unknown Tongue.

4. 'That private Masses (wherein the Priest 'saith, Edite & bibite ex hoc omnes, and yet eateth and drinketh himself only) are according 'to Christ's Institution.

5. 'That the Pope's Pardons are requisite or 'useful, to release Souls out of Purgatory.

6. 'That the Effect of the Sacrament dependeth upon the Intention of the Minister.

7. 'That Extream Unction is a Sacrament 'properly so called.

8. 'That we may worship God by an Image.

9. 'That the Sacred Host ought to be elevated, or carried in solemn Procession.

10. 'That Infidels, and impious Persons, yea 'Rats and Mice, may eat the Body of Christ.

11. 'That all Ecclesiastical Power dependeth 'on the Pope.

12. 'That he cannot err in Matters of Faith.

13. 'That he hath Power to canonize Saints, 'to dispose of Kings and Kingdoms at his Pleasure, &c.

Here Mr. Sweet interrupted him, saying, These were Scholastical Points, not Fundamental.

To which Doctor White replied, These things which are defined in your Council of Trent, are to you Matter Fundamental: And whatsoever Article denied makes a Man an Heretick, is Fundamental.

But the Denial of any of these, makes a Man an Heretick.

Ergo, Every one of these Articles is Fundamental.

To which Argument, nothing being answer'd, Doctor Featly proceeded.

But the Jesuites not being able to prove, that any of these things were in practice in the Primitive Times of Christianity, (but that they were fobb'd in by several Popes and Councils in latter Times, to serve their own Turns) waved the Argument, and insisted upon other Particulars, not material to the Point; striving to confound one thing with another, (as their manner is) that they might complicate, and wrap up in Obscurity, all that was spoken: Which Mr. Buggs perceiving, rested fully satisfied and confirmed in the Truth.

A great Judgment, of an unfortunate Mishap.

But thus the Jesuits ranged up and down seeking whom they might devour, and their Insolency being greater, and more notorious at this time than at others, the Mischief that fell to them in this Height of their Pride and Greatness, is very remarkable: For at a Sermon in Black-Friars, where Father Drury, a Jesuite, vented his pestilent Doctrine to an Auditory of near Three hundred People, the Floor of the Chamber (being an upper Room) fell down, and killed the Preacher, and almost (if not) a full Hundred of his Auditory outright, maiming and bruising most of the rest; many of them lying a long time under the Rubbish, crying for Help, and with much Difficulty recovered their broken Limbs. Thus many times we might immediately see the Hand of God, (who is the Lord of Life and Death) though through wilful Stupidity (because we must judge modestly) we look upon these Accidents by mediate and second Causes; thinking an old House can destroy so many Lives, without the Permission of that Supream Authority that orders all things both in Heaven and in Earth.

Brunswick raises an Army.

The Duke of Brunswick this Spring, (being healed of his Wounds received in the last Battel with Mansfield, and having gotten an Artificial Arm to manage his Horse, which he could do with a great deal of Dexterity) whereby his own Interest and Power, and the Assistance of his Friends, (being but a younger Brother, and having nothing but the Bishoprick of Halverstat for his Portion) he raised a great Army in the lower Parts of Germany, about Brunswick and Munster, consisting of about Sixteen thousand Foot, and Five thousand Horse, every way compleatly armed, and accomplished with a gallant Train of Artillery; the Horses, Wagons, and Carriages in such trim and suitable Equipage, as shewed, by their Suitableness in Furniture, they had not been patched up, nor hastily hurried together. His Design (being invited thereto) was to join with the Prince of Orange, to be revenged of the Spaniard for the Loss of his Arm the last Year: But the chief Motive (as he always pretended) was his Respects to the Queen of Bohemia, who in those Days (whether out of Pity for her suffering so much, or out of Fear that Religion would yet suffer much more) carried a great Stream of Affection towards her.

The

A. Reg. 21. An. Christi 1623.

His Chief Officers.

The Commanders in chief of this Army under the Duke of Brunswick, were, Duke William of Wimar, Marshal-General of the Field; Count Stirum, General of the Horse; Count Isenburg, General of the Ordnance; and Kniphuisen, Serjeant-Major-General; Men acquainted with War, and Danger. But whether the Divine Fate had laid a mouldring Hand upon this gallant Army, or whether the Enemy with a full Hand had charmed some of these great Officers (as by the carriage of the Business may be suspected) to be of his Party, was not discovered; but the Ruine of it was as strange for the Manner, as unknown for the Means: For after Brunswick had taken a Resolution at Kettington in Brunswickland, to join with the Prince of Orange, he declined all Occasions of encountring with Tilly the Imperial General, who was with an Army at a good distance, attending Brunswick's Motion, not knowing (as may be conjectured) whether he would bend his Course into the Palatinate, or into the Low-Countries; so that upon Brunswick's March he left him in his Rear. And lest Tilly should follow him too close, and interrupt him in his March, he divided his Army into Three Brigades: The Van-guard was commanded by Duke William, in which was Three Regiments; his own, Colonel Mayer's, and Colonel Frenck's. Kniphuisen, the Serjeant-Major-General, had the ordering of the Batail; the Colonels under him were Guertsken, and Spar. And the Count de la Tour brought up the Rear, with Duke Bernard of Wimar's Regiment, the Rhinegraft, and Colonel Spees; with Direction, that these Three Bodies should keep equal Distance, and observe this Order:

Their Order in Marching.

That having in their March the Enemy at their Backs, if the Rear-guard made a Halt, the Batail should do the same, and consequently the Van-guard, (according to the best Discipline) attending with firm Foot the Cause of the Halt, that they may be ready to put themselves in order for Service, if Occasion were presented. The Army thus coming to pass any Passage, while the Van-guard did advance, the Batail and Rear-guard should make a stand, with the Front towards the Enemy. The Van-guard being pass'd, should face the Passage, and stay for the Batail; which being pass'd also, should do the same for the Rear-guard, that they might be ready upon the approach of an Enemy to assist one another. With this Order and Direction they began to march into Westfalia; Brunswick trusting to Stirum, Kniphuisen, and Frenck, who being Natives of the Country, gave him Assurance of the Safe-Conduct of his Army by Ways short and commodious. And he commanded, especially the General of the Horse, to send out Parties of Horse every way, that he might have Intelligence of the Enemy's Motions; who gave him Assurance, that the Enemy's Army was not within Thirty English Miles, when by other hands, at the same time, he had certain notice, that the Enemy was within Three English Miles with his whole Power. This Miscarriage made Brunswick haste away to Newburgh, the next Town; where resting a little, he took a Resolution to march all Night, to recover Time and Ground again, that Stirum's Negligence had made him lazily lose: And to that end he commanded Kniphuisen, and Count Isenburg, to make the Baggage march at Eleven a Clock at Night, the Cannon at Midnight, and the Army two Hours after: But Brunswick getting up at Three a Clock in the Morning, hoping to find his Commands obeyed, and the Army in a good Forwardness of advance, found nothing done, and these great Officers in their Beds. This Disobedience of his Officers troubled Brunswick much; but he was constrained to Diligence, as well as Patience; and hastning them away, they pretended Forwardness, but made it Eight of the Clock in the Morning before the Rear-guard stirred out of their Quarters.

The General of the Horse falters.

From Newburgh to Statloo-Bridge (a Place of Security) was but Fourteen English Miles, and there were in that way Seven Passages or Straits, where a few Men might oppose an Army. The Bagage, Cannon, and Munition, (except Six Pieces with Munition that marched with the Rear-guard) had pass'd them all; and the Foot, Three of them, without disturbance: But Count Stirum with the Horse loitered still behind at Newburgh, which caused Brunswick to make the whole Army face about and stay for the Horse; sending a strict Command to Stirum, with all Speed to come up and join with the Foot, and not to skirmish with the Enemy at any rate. But he stayed so long, that the Enemy began to charge him in the Rear, before he advanced to the Third Passage; so that he sent to Brunswick for Five hundred Musketeers, to amuse the Enemy, till he had passed the Third Passage with his Horse. The Duke sent these Musketeers according to Stirum's Desire; and advancing his Army forward, he passed the Fourth Passage, and there made the Rear of his Foot face about, the better to favour and receive his Horse: Which having done, he speeds back towards Stirum, to see how the Business went with him; and encountring Kniphuisen, he asked him what the Enemy had done? who answered, Nothing; all is well. But Brunswick going forward, found the contrary; for the Enemy had made a great Slaughter, laying almost a Thousand Horse upon the Ground.

This perplexed Brunswick exceedingly, so that with some Passion he sent a Command to Stirum to advance his Horse towards the Body of the Army, who had stayed Three Hours for them at the Fourth Passage, whither the Duke returned to secure the same; planting Two Pieces of Demi-cannon at the Mouth of the Passage, and leaving Two thousand Musketeers to guard it, for the assistance of the Horse, if the Enemy should come to charge them at the Entrance; and so he marched forward with the rest of the Army. But Stirum drew the Horse into a Body under the side of a Wood, which was in the middle of a spacious Plain, betwixt the Two Passages; and that brought the Enemy to a stand: For they suspected the whole Army stood in Battalia behind that Wood, and therefore did not advance; which shewed they watched only for Advantages. And Stirum seeing the Enemy at a stand, drew his Horse towards the Fourth Passage; which the Enemy observing made all the haste after that could be, to pelt them in the Rear: But the Horse passed the Fourth Passage before the Enemy came up.

So doth the Serjeant-Major-Generals.

Then Brunswick drew off his Cannon, and marched away to the Fifth Passage, leaving Kniphuisen (who undertook it voluntarily) with Two thousand Musketeers, to make good that Passage, which was of that Advantage, that half the Men might have done it; and Two Regiments of Horse were left to give assistance to the Foot, to bring them off when they should retire, and join with the Army. But the Van-guard of Brunswick's Army had scarce entred the Fifth Passage, but he discovered some Musketeers running towards a Wood that was on this side, and not far from the Fourth Passage; and Anno 21. An. Christi 1623. riding back to see whether all stood firm, he met Kniphuisen, and ask'd him, If the Passage was made good? Who answer'd, Take you no Care, trust me. But presently discovering some of the Officers that had command of the Musketeers running towards the Army, he took a more lively Apprehension that the Passage was lost; and meeting Kniphuisen, with some Heat, told him, He had betray'd him: But Kniphuisen excused himself, that he could not keep it against an Army, and complain'd, that the Horse had abandon'd him. But, said he, the next Passage is of as great Importance as the last, and I will undertake to keep that, upon Forfeiture of my Head, to redeem my Credit again; and to that end he desired an entire Regiment of Foot, which the Duke granted him; but assur'd him, he should answer it if any Ill succeeded by his Default.

Whilst the Army was passing the Fifth Passage, the Duke sent to know, whether the Horse, placed according to his Direction in the Rear made good their Station; and he had Intimation, that the Horse were retired close to a Wood, and by that means discovered the Foot to the Enemy. And the Army was no sooner passed the Fifth Passage, but Kniphuisen quitted it to the Enemy, without so much as a Musket shot from them. And the more, to weaken his Force, (before he quitted the Passage) he comes to the Duke, and tells him, (but it was not true) That the Enemy with 30 Cornets of Horse struck towards the Left Hand, to cut a way to the Bagage, to possess that; And Brunswick looking about, perceived in a little Wood not far off a Body of Horse, which proved to be the Prince of Ouldenburgh, who was Colonel of a Regiment of 1000 Horse, whom he sent to resist the Enemy, if they should attempt upon the Bagage. And advancing his Army to the Sixth Passage, he passed that also before the Enemy came to it: But here was Brunswick's Error in trusting Kniphuisen the third time, which was only, as he said, to redeem his former Faults; for he gave the keeping of this Sixth Passage to him also, which he delivered to the Enemy at their first Approach, as he did the others; and drawing the Rear-guard out of the way on the Right Hand, (contrary to Brunswick's Commands) and the General of the Ordnance striking out on the Left-Hand with his Body and Cannon, and Stirum sheltering himself in the Woods with his Horse, the Enemy advanced freely, (seeing them thus scattered) and charged on all sides with his whole Power. But little Resistance being made, (the General Officers leaving the Field) every one shifted for himself. Some escaped over Statloo Bridge, many were drown'd in the River, the Slaughter and Ruine was great, so was the Confusion and Fear. Sir Charles Rich being with Brunswick in this disorderly Business, escaped a great Danger, for in their flight his Horse fell into a Bog, where Brunswick and the rest left him sticking; but being a spritely Horse, (that his Brother the Earl of Warwick had given him) with much Labour he plunged himself out, and saved both himself and his Rider.

Brunswick's Army defeated.

The Relicks of this broken Army that escaped, the Author saw at Eltem on the Hill in Cleveland, and this Relation was made by the Duke of Brunswick to Maurice Prince of Orange for his own Vindication. And from a French Copy that the Duke gave to the Earl of Essex, he translated it then into English, that some of our Nation there might partake of the true Knowledge of his Misfortunes. And the Duke cited his Chief Officers to appear before Prince Maurice, where he laid this Accusation to their Charge; but either the Duke had no Power over them, (being in a strange Country) or no Proof against them for this strange Miscarriage, (being accounted among them La Fortune de la Guerre, but Chance of War) for they all escaped without Punishment.

And some Years after, Kniphuisen was thought fit in the Duke of Buckingham's Voyage to the Isle of Ree to be a Field-Officer in the English Army, which almost (if not altogether) thriv'd as ill: So uncertain is the true State of intricate Transactions! for that which is obvious and visible, may be believ'd an Error; but secret Mischiefs are left to his Discovery, who only knows the Heart.

The Condition of France.

France about this time had her Wounds bound up, and stanch'd the Bloody Issue, by the Pacification of Mountpelier; but it broke out again at Rochel, where some English Ships did the King of France Service, pressed thereto by the Duke of Guise, Admiral of France; and tho' it carried a bad Savour then, that they should fight against the Protestants, being forced thereto, yet it was not so enormous and dangerous to them, as when the Duke of Buckingham afterwards did force the Vanguard, a prime Ship of our King's, and Six other gallant Ships, out of the English Hands, and put them into French Fingering, that they might do the Mischief with them: Which Act was laid upon the Duke's Account, among other heinous Crimes by him committed; and he had dearly pay'd for it, if the Prince, his Fellow-Traveller, (in the First Year of whose Reign it was done) had not acquitted him

But in their intimate and secret Counsels in France it was debated, Whether it were not better to pull such a Goad of Hereticks (as they call'd the Protestants) out of the Side of the Kingdom, that stuck there, to their continual Vexation and Trouble, rather than have their Pain perpetually renew'd, being impossible to heal the Sore but by such an Extirpation: So much Rancour and inveterate Malice sprung up in the Popish Party against them of the Religion, that the Animosity of it extended to little less than another Massacre. And tho our King (who may be said to love them) gave them no Countenance, (whatsoever his Promises were) otherwise than by intreating for them, (being a tickle and tender Point (as he thought) to partake with Subjects against their Prince) yet God sent them Deliverance (such are the Dispensations of his Providence) by one that hated their Religion, as much, if not more, than the French.

For the King of Spain (doubling his Ambition) possess'd himself about this time of some Parts of the Valtolin, thinking to bound France towards Italy, (the Alpes being not so high as his Thoughts) as the Pyrenes had bounded it towards Spain: And the French Activity being loth to be cooped up, thought it better to endure a little Inconvenience at home, than so much Prejudice abroad; and therefore, to oppose him, they closed with the Protestants. And what was it brought them in Obedience? The re-edifying of their ruin'd Temples, the restoring and maintaining their banish'd Ministers, and Security in their Religion and Consciences: So that it was not their Rebellion that was Cause of the War, but the War made against their Religion caused it to be call'd a Rebellion. Thus, when all other Means failed, their worst Enemies (tho' much against their Wills) proved to be their best Friends.

But

A. Reg. 21.

An. Christi 1623.

The March concluded in Spain.

But to return to the Spanish Treaty all this while in Agitation. As soon as the Articles our King had sealed and sworn to observe were come into Spain, and the Prince had ratified and confirmed them, and had sworn to another Article there, wherein he ties up his own Hands, and gave leave to Satan and all his Accomplices to buffet him, (which was, To permit at all times that any should freely propose to him the Arguments of the Catholick Religion, without giving any Impediment; and that he would never directly nor indirectly permit any to speak to the Infanta against the same) the Two Kingdoms of England and Spain (as it were) shook Hands to the Agreement. Preparations were made in England to entertain the Infanta, a new Church built up at St. James's, the Prince's House; the Foundation-stone (with much Ceremony) laid by Don Carlos a Colonna, the Spanish Ambassador, for the publick Exercise of her Religion: Her very Shadows are courted in every Corner; Painters being set a-work to take the Height and Dimensions of this new Star, that was to rise in the North, before it appear'd. Such as hoped to flourish by her Influence, grew up to Exuberancy: What would they do then when they found the Effects of it? Why, be drowned in their own Redundancy: For the moderate Spirit did fore-see what bad Omens this Apparition did threaten. On the other side, in Spain the Substance is as much courted, as the Shadow is here, with the Title of Princess of England; her Maiden Restraints are taken off, and she may come abroad to publick Meetings, where now their Eyes may prattle loving Stories; tho' the great Courtier Olivares gave it no better Title than, The Prince watches the Infanta as a Cat doth a Mouse; too gross an Expression for a Master of those Ceremonies. And, in fine, there was such an Union betwixt the Two Crowns, that it might well be said, Philip and Jacob made one Holiday.

The Palatine Affairs waved.

But this closing betwixt England and Spain, made the Breach the wider in the House of the Palatine; the Restitution of the Palatinate and the Electorate to the Queen of Bohemia and her Children being waved in the Treaty, and a great Sum of Money proposed as a Dowry, which was also lessen'd after the first Proposition, and some part of it promised to be sent with her in Jewels, (which as one said might be Counterfeit as the rest of their Actions) yet our King accepted of all; so eager was he, and greedy of the Match, that no Obstacle could stand in his way which he did not remove. But there was some under-hand Promise, That the Infanta, among the Court-Compliments, should work that Feat, in presenting the Restorative of that Dignity and Country for a Breakfast, to ingratiate her self with the Price her Husband, and as a Pawn of her good Will and Affection to the English Nation: And these Promises, with the Spanish Stamp, were taken in England for current Payment; so that all Things tended to a Conclusion.

New Resolutions on both sides.

But Time in Spain came too swift upon them, they were willing the Infanta should Winter there; but knew not well how to delay the Prince longer. And as they were in this Plunge, ruminating upon, and striving to find out some new Remora to help them, Pope Gregory XV. (that had granted the Dispensation) dies; and then their Subtilties flew upon that Accident to make the Dispensation invalid; yet with a Reserve to keep up our Prince's Spirit, that it should be no hinderance to the Match, for the new Pope would instantly do it: if not, it should be dispatched by the Dean of the Cardinals: And the King of Spain assured the Prince, that if he would stay till Christmas, the Marriage should be really celebrated then. These Delays coming one on the Neck of another, and the Duke of Buckingham having taken some Disgust in Spain, presented all Things to our King in the worst Habit he could put upon them; for there had been some Jars betwixt him and Olivares. Two great Favourites, tho' of different Kingdoms, could not well squat in one Form. Olivares hunted Buckingham so close, that he had almost caught him in his own Burrow; but, instead of his Game, he encounter'd some Vermin, (which Darkness could not distinguish) || who bit him shrewdly; and whether it were by this Common-Hunt I know not; but I am sure it was by the Common-Cry, that he was so displeas'd with the Spanish for it, that he afterwards much inclined to the French. I acknowledge, the Gravity and Dignity of History should not appear in such Metaphorical Habiliments; but that we now live in an Age where Truth is forced to shroud her self in such Attire, lest she should have imprinted on her Face a Mark of Malice against Greatness, which if it be not ballanced with Goodness and Piety, is but an empty and frothy Title.

Buckingham angry.

But it was said, this Tetrical Humour made Buckingham dislike all the Spanish Proceedings; and just in the Nick, when it was on him, † the Queen of Bohemia, by a private Message, gave him some Intimation, that she and her Children were to be thought on, inviting him to be a Witness to the Christening of one of them, which came fit to his Acceptation, not so much out of Affection to the one Party, as in Opposition to the other. And what disrelish'd with him, gave an ill Savour to our King, who having Cause enough to dislike the Spanish Delays, and finding the Hearts of the People bent against the Match, and some near him, as the Duke of Lenox, made Duke of Richmond when Buckingham had his Title, that the Scots might still precede the English; and the Marquess Hamilton made Earl of Cambridge, to intitle him a Peer the last Parliament, a Man of a gallant and stately Presence, one whom the King much listen'd to, and others having as little Affection to it; the Hopes of a Daughter of France, left to give Life yet to a Royal Race, did bate something of our King's keen Edge: So that he wrote to Buckingham, That he could not expect after so long a stay in Spain, and so little done, that they had any cordial Intention to perfect the

|| That Noble Historian the Earl of Clarendon has in his History sufficiently ridiculed this Story. Yet our Author can hardly be blam'd for giving Credit to it, considering it was not only a common Report at that time, but the Spanish Historians took Pains to publish it, out of Prejudice to the Duke of Buckingham, after the Match was broke off.

† There are Two Letters of the Queen of Bohemia to the Duke of Buckingham in the Collection above-mentioned, writ with an unaffected moving Eloquence. In one, she expresses her entire Confidence in his Friendship, notwithstanding all Reports to the contrary. In the other, she implores his good Offices with her Father, and solemnly protests, That what Count Dona or any others had said to him, of her Husband's Diffidence in him, was false; and intreats him to believe no such thing of either her Husband or her. So low was this Excellent Princess brought, that she was obliged to make Court to her own Father's Favourite, in Terms infinitely below the Greatness of her Mind, or of her Birth.

A. Reg. 21. An. Christ. 1623.

Treaty; and therefore conjur'd him to bring his Son back with all speed: But if his Son's Youthful Follies should tie him to a long Expectation, he chargeth him by his Allegiance to come away, and leave him there. This Letter the Duke shew'd to the Prince, and it wrought so upon him, that he took a sudden Resolution to go home.

The Duke and Olivarez quarrel.

The Grandees of Spain having Notice thereof, were much troubled; for their Design was to detain the Prince there all Winter, not only hoping thereby to turn him to their Religion, but to marry him to the Infanta, that there might have been a Co-union between them, that she being with Child before the Spring, they might keep her there till she were deliver'd, that so the Child might be bred up and naturalized a Spaniard, both in Affection and Religion; which this sudden Resolution hindering, it somewhat startled them. Olivarez told Buckingham, That he had promised the Prince should admit of Communion with some Jesuits of theirs in Matters of Religion.

And the Duke answer'd, There had been some already with him; but the Prince (he said) was so well settled in Religion, that he was not to be further alter'd. Olivarez reply'd, You gave me some Assurance and Hope of the Prince's turning Catholick. The Duke told him, It was false. The Conde in a great Rage broke from him, with so much Impatience, that he was scarce able to contain himself, went to the Prince, and told him how unworthily Buckingham had serv'd him: And after his Complaints to him, he found out the Baron Kensington, whom he looked on with an Eye of good Respect, his Civilities and Carriage obliging every where, venting his Passion to him; telling him, That Buckingham had given him the Lye, and that there was nothing a Man of Honour could be more sensible of: That it bred a great Distraction in him, betwixt his Affection to his Master's Honour and his own: For if any Evil did redound to Buckingham by his Hand, (being a Person so near the Prince, who had honoured the Court of Spain with his Presence, and run through great and dangerous Hazards, out of Affection to his Master's Sister, upon whose Actions now all the Christian World are gazing) it would reflect upon the Honour of his Master; and when his own Honour comes in competition with his Master's, the least must give way to the greatest; therefore he desired the Lord of Kensington to tell the Duke, That he had so much of a Gentleman, as to be sensible of the Injury, and so much Power and Courage as to revenge himself; but rather than his Master's Honour should suffer, he would be the Sufferer. The Duke sent the Conde Word again by the said Lord, That he laid a Thing to his Charge that would not admit of a less sharp Answer; for when his Honour comes in competition with the Conde's, he had rather that should suffer than his own. His Passion was quick, but not durable; hot, but not revengful: And he held so high an Esteem of the Conde, that he was more willing to venture upon his Sword than his Malice.

Buckingham goes to the Ships.

This Business being waved by the Conde's Discretion, and they seeing the Prince's Intention bent homeward, made Preparation of Carriages to the Sea-side. The Duke of Buckingham's Departure was sudden, giving them no time to prepare for him, pretending a great Charge to look after the Port of St. Anderò in Biscay, where the Royal Navy of England, under the Command of his Father-in-Law the Earl of Rutland, attended his Directions, that all Things might be accommodated for his young Master: not caring a Fig for the Ceremony of a Spanish Farewel, which happily he might fear, and therefore strive to avoid, and which their Gravities, as they do all other Things, draw out at full length. But because they should not think he ran away, he gave them a short Signal of his Departure, and left the Prince to manage his own Business. And that the Prince's Change of Soil and Air, the great Volatile of Fancy, might produce no Change in his Affection, the King of Spain and he both took solemn Oaths to accomplish the Marriage, and to make the Espousals Ten Days after the Dispensation from the new Pope should arrive. And a Procuration was sealed by the Prince to the King of Spain and Don Carlos his Brother, and left in the Earl of Bristol's Hand to perfect the Work.

Gifts and Presents on both sides.

Among the Specious Ceremonies indented betwixt these two great Princes, the Richness of the Gifts and Presents that pass'd among them were highly remarkable. The King of Spain presented the Prince and all his Noble Train, and the Prince filled the Court of Spain, as it were, with Jewels; no Person of Quality or Merit, but his Name was recorded in the Inventory of the Prince's Bounty, as if England had disfurnish'd and made bare her own Neck to adorn the Breasts of Spain; the Prince presenting his Mistress with such a Necklace of Pearl, that all Spain could not parallel: Pearls that had been long pluck'd from their Watry Beds, and had left few Fellows there: For the Eastern and Western Divers throughout the Catholick Empire could never yet find the like. But these upon the Breach were return'd again; tho' it be now indifferent whether the French or the Spanish have them. The Duke of Buckingham was not close Handed in distributing his Jewels to the Beauties of Spain; tho' his Farewel was private, his Bounty was publick, more suitable to his Master's Honour than his own; which the Lord Treasurer Middlesex found, and repin'd at.

The Prince leaves Madrid.

The Prince took Leave of the Queen of Spain and the Infanta, prepar'd for it in their greatest Magnificence, attended with all their Train of Grandees and Ladies. The Queen spoke her own Adieu in French, which the Prince return'd in the same Language. But the Earl of Bristol was the Medium betwixt the Prince and his Mistress, who, if he may be believ'd, set her Heart to make her self grateful, and therefore this Parting could not be acceptable to her; one of her Arguments being, If the Prince loved me, he would stay for me: But now the Time of Parting approaching, those Arguments were laid aside, and the superficial Ornaments of publick Interview, like a Cloud, interposed it self betwixt them; so that what was darkly lodged in their Thoughts, could only find Light by the Eyes. Their Tongues (the common Orator) could tell what was fit to say, when there were so many by to hear; and if the Eyes had learn'd the Language of the Heart, they quickly forgot it, because they never met again to practise it.

Comes to the Escurial.

The King of Spain brought our Prince to the Escurial, (which was part of his Way to the Sea side) a House of that Superbous and Elegant Structure, that I cannot pass by it without vailing to it, and spending some time in the Survey of it. The Spaniards proudly boast it to be the Eighth Wonder of the World: It was built by Philip II. upon a Spiritual Foundation, which heighten'd into Superstition, produces the most stupendious Effects. Philip at the Siege of St. Quin.

A. Reg. 21. An. Christi 1623.

St. Quintin was perſwaded by his Officers experimented in War, that if ever he would take the Town, he muſt batter down a Monaſtery of Friars (Dedicated to St. Laurence) that ſtood in his way; which he was with much Difficulty wrought to; but that Act (tho' it effected the Work) dinted ſuch an Impreſſion upon his Conſcience, that he vowed to make the Martyr a full and ample Reparation. Some ſay, it was for the Battel he gained againſt the French near St. Quintin, when they came to relieve it upon that Saint's Day; but whether either or both (for they were both accompliſh'd) he built this mighty Fabrick in Form of a Gridiron, (the Emblem and Inſtrument of his Martyrdom) the Handle whereof is the King's palace, of a vaſt Capacity, and the Square of the Gridiron is divided into Twelve ſpacious Quadrangles; in which are Arched Cloyſters, one above, the other below; all Dedicated to Religious Orders, endowed with a Revenue enough to make the beſt Piety proud, every Friar in the Monaſtry having his Man and his Mule; ſo that they live there more like Princes than Prieſts. And in the middle of the Square ſtands a magnificent Cathedral Church, under the High Altar whereof there is a Vault, or rather ſtately Chappel, of moſt excellent poliſhed Marble, built round like an old Roman Pantheon, (which, becauſe it reſembled Heaven, the Romans placed there the Images of their Gods) and this the Founder made the Burial-place for the Kings of Spain, eſtabliſhing this Order, (which is preciſely obſerved) That no Queen ſhall be buried there that is not Mother to a Prince; nor none of the Kings Children but the Firſt-born Son. And round about this Round, in the Marble Wall, plac'd in Stately Order, are many excellently contriv'd Arches, of wrought and burniſh'd Marble, and in every Arch a beautiful and curious Coffin (either of Black Marble or Jet) of whole Stone, covered with the ſame, which are to put the embalmed Bodies in. So that lying there, they ſeem as if they were inthroned, the Beauty of the Place is ſo reſplendent about them: The Richneſs of the Silver Lamps, and Candleſticks blazing with Tapers, adds to the ſhining brightneſs of the Marble, and gives a glorious Luſtre. To ſpeak of the Riches of their Golden Croſſes and Chalices, Wonders of their Giant-like Statues, and the Pleaſure of their Grotto's, Gardens, Walks, Fountains, and Aqueducts, would take up more Time than is fit to allow them here. In fine, it is ſo tranſcendently full of Admiration, that it is to be feared, they that enjoy the Pleaſure thereof, (ſaving their Merits) will look for no other Heaven: For certainly Purgatory (tho' it be the Pope's Kitchen-Garden) hath no ſuch Walks in it, no more had old Elyzium; and therefore this cannot be the Way to Heaven, unleſs it be through Mahomet's Paradiſe.

The Deſcription of it

The Prince feaſted there.

Here the Prince being feaſted, ſealed the Proxy, and ſwore to perform the Marriage as aforeſaid: And the Day of Departure being come, there was a Stag lodg'd in the way, whoſe Chace gave the King and Prince ſome Recreation. The Prince was attended by the Lord Kenſington, and the Earl of Briſtol, who was the Prince's Interpreter; the King of Spain (by Intention) only with Olivares, and the Marquis d'Avila: Olivares was Grand Maſter of the Horſe to the King of Spain, and neareſt Attendant to his Perſon; but to ſhew the Spaniſh Civility, he always waited on the Prince, and the Marquis d'Avila, his Brother-in-Law, attended on the King of Spain. After the Ceremonies of the Stag's Death were performed, the King and Prince, with their Train, declining into a little Wood adjoining, found a Table ſpread with Variety of Meats, and excellent Wines, provided for them, which entertain'd them, as well with Wonder how it came there, as with Refreſhment, after the Serenity of the Air and their Exerciſe had quicken'd their Apetites; concluding merrily, as if the Stag had been in the Plot, and had yielded himſelf to Death purpoſely there, becauſe the Prince's neceſſary Accommodations were ſo near. After the Repaſt, the parting Minute approaching, to perfect all, they gave Leave to the Exerciſe of Compliments. The King expreſſing extraordinary Reſpects to the Prince, ſetting a high Valuation upon his Merit, telling him, Nothing in the World could more oblige him, than the Confidence he had of him, to put himſelf into his Hands, being unuſual with Princes. But he that valued his Honour above all Earthly Things, what the more endeared it to him, in that he gave him, by this Action, an Opportunity to expreſs it: and proteſted, That he earneſtly deſired a nearer Connexion of Brotherly Affection with him, for the more intire Unity betwixt them. The Prince repaying his Noble Expreſſions with the like Civilities, lets him know, how Senſible he was of thoſe high Favours he had found during his Abode in his Court and Preſence; which had ſet ſuch an Eſtimation upon his Worth, that he knew not how to value it; but he would leave a Mediatrix, that ſhould make good his Defects, if he would do him the Honour, and make him ſo happy, as to preſerve him in the good Opinion of her, his moſt fair, his moſt dear Miſtreſs. And ſo embracing each other, they parted.

The King's and Prince's Compliments parting.

This kind Farewel was upon the 12th of September, the King leaving the Prince to be attended to the Sea ſide, by a numerous Train of Spaniſh Courtiers, whereof the Principal were, Cardinal Zapata, the Marquis Aytona, the Earl of Gondemar, the Earl of Monterey, the Earl of Barrajas, who was Steward of the King's Houſhold, but now the Manager of the Prince's Domeſtical Affairs. Theſe Grandees and others had at St. Andero a fair Opportunity to ſee ſome of the Navy Royal of England, and were feaſted aboard the Prince's Ship: But at their Return towards the Shore, the Prince being with them in the Barge, a Tempeſt overtook them with that Fury, that they could neither fetch the Land, nor make to the Ships again, and Night and Darkneſs joining with the Storm, the Rowers fainting with Labour, becauſe they thought themſelves at the end of their Work, their Horror and Fear almoſt heighten'd to Deſpair: In this Calamity, yielding themſelves to the Mercy of the Seas, they ſpy'd a Light from a Ship, near which the Wind had driven them, that gave new Life to Hope, and plucking up their Spirits to fetch that Ship, with the Danger of being broken to pieces by the Ship's Side, at laſt they got aboard. This cooled the Heat of their Ceremonies ſo much, that when the Tempeſt was over, they parted: And the Prince arrived ſafely at Portſmouth upon the 5th of October following, and the next Day at London, where the Peoples Joy, elevated above Bonfire-Expreſſions, might teach miſguided Princes, that LOVE is the firmeſt Foundation of Security and Happineſs.

The Prince is in Danger by a Tempeſt.

When the Prince and Buckingham met at St. Andero, the Spaniſh Entertainments did not take them off from minding their buſineſs: The Duke had time in his Receſs to mature his Conceptions; And whether his Adverſeneſs to the Spaniſh ill Affection wrought upon the Prince,

A Demur upon the Eſpouſals.

A. Reg. 21. An. Christi 1623.

Prince, or whether the Prince's Affection, that was wrought upon in the Spanish Court, lost the Vigour and Virtue, by losing the Object, or whether the united Operations of both, cannot be determined; but one Clark, a Creature of the Duke's, was posted back to Madrid to the Earl of Bristol, to command him not to deliver the Procuration for the Espousals (which the Prince had sealed and sworn to perform) till he had further Order from England; pretending that the Infanta might after the Espousals betake her self to a Cloyster, and defraud him of a Wife. Bristol was much troubled at this Restriction, that a Publick Act of such Eminency, betwixt two such great Princes, highly obliging, should be smothered up by a private Command from one of the Parties that had not Power to do it, having, in true Justice, ty'd up his own Hands, and when the Dishonour of it would so much reflect upon the other Party; and therefore he resolved, (notwithstanding the Prince's Command) if the Dispensation came, to make the Espousals within Ten Days, according to the Agreement: And he would bear himself up, from the Authority he had under the Great Seal of England, to perfect this Work, if he had not within the limited time a Command from our King to the contrary.

The Prince comes to Court cold in his Spanish Affection.

The Duke being jealous of Bristol, from some particular Discontents and ill Resentments betwixt them, and the Prince, fearing he would be too forward in the Espousals, as soon as they landed in England, posted towards the King, (who was then at Royston) where they gave him a fair and plausible Narration of their Proceedings, laying the Load upon the Spanish Delays, and Bristol's Miscarriages: Which the King, as a Father to his Son, and as a Friend to his Favourite, indulged to, taking their Account without Examination as a good and just Payment. And his good Brother of Spain must now be dallied with by Talion Law; not falling off in a direct Line, but obliquely, that the King might thereby measure out to himself a way to his own Ends. And these two great Opposites to Spain, the Prince and Duke, must prepare it, by closing with those of the Council about the King, and others of the Nobility, whose Judgment, not Prejudice, made them averse to the Spanish Superciliousness, cementing their Power with that Strength, that a Parliament must be call'd, and the People consulted with: That they discovering to the King the fraudulent Proceedings of the Spaniard, the King's Integrity and Justice in breaking the Treaty might the more appear to the People, and by that means they should be mounted upon the Wings of the Peoples Affections, as Enemies to that which was so contrary to them. The News of a Parliament to break the Spanish Match was quickly carried about, and, according to their Thoughts, it took much with the People, and gained them much Respect and Honour. But the first thing they did, was to procure an absolute Command from the King to the Earl of Bristol, to suspend the Delivery of the Proxy till Christmas, tho' the Dispensation came, which they effected, and sent away with all speed: In which Letter, Bristol had Instructions to demand the Restitution of the Palatinate and Electoral Dignity, which were both waved and neglected in the Conclusion of the Treaty; but now are set a-foot again, to let the King of Spain see the Edge of their Eagerness was taken off. For (saith the Letter) It would be a great Disproportion for me to receive one Daughter with Joy and Contentment, and leave another in Tears and Sighs.

A. Reg. 21. An. Christi 1623.

But Bristol's Power of deferring the Espousals till Christmas was to be reserved to himself, and not made publick till the Dispensation should come to discover it. And there was a Clause in the Procuration left by the Prince, That the Power of that should be in force but till Christmas, and then to expire; so that the Execution of it was to be respited till it were altogether invalid. And the Spaniard, for his greater Affront, must make all Provision ready for accomplishing so glorious a Work, that all the Eyes of the Christian World looked upon either with Dislike or Affection: The King of Spain (to be his own free Trumpet) sending into England with the Prince Don Mendosa de Alarcana, to our King, to congratulate the Prince's happy Voyage into Spain, and his safe Return into England; and from thence he had Instructions to go into Flanders, Germany and Italy, to make known to all Princes and Potentates, Allies to the King of Spain, how near the Treaty of Marriage (betwixt the Prince of England and the Infanta of Spain) was to be consummated. And the Polonian Ambassador at Madrid, that solicited to have the Infanta for the Prince of Poland, when he saw such Preparations for the Match with England, fainted in his Hopes, and returned home. For as soon as the Dispensation came from the new Pope, (which was in the beginning of December) Bonfires were made throughout all Spain for Joy, and the great Ordnance every where thunder'd out the Noise of it. The 9th of the Month was prefix'd for the Marriage-day, a Tarras being erected betwixt the Court and the next Church, almost a quarter of a Mile in length, covered with Tapistry, for the more Magnificence, and all Things appointed in the highest State for so great a Solemnity. Presents were providing in the Court of Spain for our King and Prince; the Infanta's Family (to take into England) was setled and established; She had used her best Skill among the Sweets of Spain, as one of the Principal of them, to cloth her Lord and Husband with some Suits of perfum'd Amber-Leather, some embroidered with Pearl, and some with Gold: She had practis'd long the English Tongue, to make it natural, by the help of her two Jesuite Tutors, Wadsworth and Boniface, and began to draw the Letters which she intended to have written the Day of her Espousals to the Prince her Husband, and the King her Father-in-Law; her Journey into England being resolved on about the beginning of March.

Preparations are made for the Marriage.

Spanish Delays retaliated.

In this State and Perfection were the Affairs of Spain, when our King's Commands, like a Cloud, overshadow'd the Brightness of them: For Bristol had now Order to declare positively to the King of Spain, That without the Restitution of the Palatinate and the Electoral Dignity, the Treaty should proceed no further. Four Messengers, viz. Mr. Killigrew, Grosby, Wood and Davies, followed each other at the Heels, which raised such a Dust of Discontentment among the People at Madrid, that, as some report, they wished they had broken their Necks by the Way: So highly were the Commonalty of Spain affected with the Match! And if they felt the Influence of this cloudy Message, what did the Lady Infanta and the King do? The one to lose her Lover, the other to lose his Honour: She whose Heart was affected, and he who found himself affronted. But his Answer to Bristol was, The Palatinate was none of his to give, and the Electorate was in the Power of another; but if the Emperor and the Duke of Bavaria would not yield to reason, he would Arm himself on our King's

Of

A. Reg. 21. An. Christi 1623. Part against them. But this would not satisfy, fair Promises having now lost their Vertue; and the King of Spain discerning a Breach approaching by this various Motion, sent to the Earl of Bristol to demand no more Audience of him, to deliver no more Letters to the Infanta, and gave Command that none should call her hereafter Princess of England. This was the end of Seven years Treaty. Wherein the King of England, a King of Peace, in spight of all the Spanish Armadoes, got the Victory, and Spain for many Years did not receive so great an overthrow. Yet they were paid in their own Coin: For at the first, and in the highest Progress of the Treaty, when our King was so eager for the Match, in all likelihood they never intended it; But the Prince's Presence gaining much with both Sexes, his Journey into Spain being esteemed among them so glorious an Action, and the hopes they had now by this Marriage to propagate the Catholick Cause; finding the Prince, as they thought, something inclined that way, better digested their first Intentions, and brought it to the State from whence it declined.

Thoughts of a Match with France. The Duke of Buckingham, by the Insinuation of a long Converse, having brought the Prince up to his own Humour, taught him to look back to the Beauty he had seen in France, which was nearer to him, that he might remember the Spanish no more, now eloigned from him. But the Treaty with Spain must be first dissolved, to give a Tincture of Honour to a proceeding with the other, and nothing but a Parliament [illegible] do that, which they had fore-determined. For a Parliament taking away the Cause, which was a Treaty of Peace, were best able to make good the Effect, which would be a War that must follow it. Therefore a Parliament was summoned to meet the 12th of February, but a sad Accident intervened, which made it to be deferred for some few days.

A Parliament summoned.

The Duke of Richmond dies suddenly. That Morning the Parliament was to begin, the King missed the Duke of Richmond's Attendance, who being a constant Observer of him at all times, the King, as it were, wanted one of his Limbs to support the Grandure of Majesty, at the first solemn Meeting of a Parliament; and calling for him with earnestness, a Messenger was dispatched to his Lodgings in haste, where the King's Commands, and the Messenger's Importunity, made the Dutchess his Wife, somewhat unwillingly, go to the Duke's Bed-side to awake him, who drawing the Curtain found him dead in his Bed. The suddenness of the Affright struck her with so much Consternation, that she was scarce sensible of the Horrour of it; and it was carried with that Violence to the King, that he would not adorn himself that day to ride in his Glories to the Parliament, but put it off to the Nineteenth of February following, dedicating some part of that time to the Memory of his dead Servant, who might serve as a Fore-runner to the King, and an Emblem to all his People; That in the dark Caverns of Man's Body, Death often lurks, which no humane Prudence, or Providence is able to discover: For the Dutchess, to some of her Intimates, confessed afterwards, That she found the Effects of his full Veins that Night that he was found dead the next Morning.

The Dutchess of Richmond's Legend. This Lady was one of the greatest both for Birth and Beauty in her time, but at first she went a Step backwards, as it were, to fetch a Career, to make her mount the higher. She was Daughter to Thomas Viscount Bindon, Second Son to Thomas Duke of Norfolk, and her Mother was Eldest Daughter to Edward Duke of Buckingham, both which Dukes striving to become Kings, lost their Heads. Her Extraction was high, fit for her great Mind, yet she descended so low as to marry one Prannel, a Vintner's Son in London, having a good Estate, who dying, left her Childless, a young and beautiful Widow; upon whom Sir George Rodney, a Gentleman in the West, (suitable to her for Person and Fortune) fixing his Love, had good hopes from her to reap the Fruits of it; but Edward Earl of Hertford being intangled with her fair Eyes, and she having a tang of her Grandfather's Ambition, left Rodney, and married the Earl; Rodney having drunk in too much Affection, and not being able with his Reason to digest it, summoned up his scattered Spirits to a most desperate Attempt; and coming to Amesbury in Wiltshire, (where the Earl and his Lady were then resident) to act it, he retired to an Inn in the Town, shut himself up in a Chamber, and wrote a large Paper of well-composed Verses to the Countess in his own Blood, (strange kind of Composedness!) wherein he bewails and laments his own Unhappiness; and when he had sent them to her, as a sad Catastrophe to all his Miseries, he ran himself upon his Sword, and so ended that Life which he thought Death to enjoy, leaving the Countess to a strict Remembrance of her Inconstancy, and himself a desperate and sad Spectacle of Frailty. But she easily passed this over, and so wrought upon the good Nature of the Earl her Husband, that he settled above Five thousand Pounds a Year Jointure upon her for Life. In his time she was often courted by the Duke of Lenox, who presented many a fair Offering to her, as an humble Suppliant; sometimes in a blue Coat with a Basket-hilt Sword, making his Addresses in such odd Disguises; yet she carried a fair Fame during the Earl's time. After his decease, Lenox and Richmond, with the great Title of Dutchess, gave period to her Honour, which could not arrive at her Mind, she having the most glorious and transcendent Heights in Speculation: For finding the King a Widower, she vowed, after so great a Prince as Richmond, never to be blown with the Kisses, nor eat at the Table of a Subject; and this Vow must be spread abroad, that the King may take notice of the Bravery of her Spirit: But this Bait would not catch the old King, so that she missed her Aim; and, to make good her Resolution, she speciously observed her Vow to the last.

When she was Countess of Hertford, and found Admirers about her, she would often Discourse of her two Grandfathers, the Dukes of Norfolk and Buckingham, recounting the time since one of her Grandfathers did this, the other did that: But if the Earl her Husband came in Presence, she would quickly desist; for when he found her in those Exaltations, to take her down, he would say, Frank, Frank, How long is it since thou wert Married to Prannel? which would damp the Wings of her Spirit, and make her look after her Feet, as well as gawdy Plumes.

One little Vanity of this great Dutchess (with your Patience) may yet croud in this Story: She was a Woman greedy of Fame, and loved to keep great State with little Cost: For being much visited by all the great ones, she had her formality of Officers, and Gentlemen, that gave Attendance, and this Advantage, that none ever Eat with her; yet all the Of her Visitants.

A. Reg. 21.

An. Christi 1623.

Tables in the Hall were ſpread, as if there had been Meat, and Men to furniſh them; but before Eating-time (the Houſe being voided) the Linen returned into their Folds again, and all her People graſed on ſome few Diſhes. Yet whether her Actions came into Fame's fingering, her Gifts were ſuitable to the Greatneſs of her Mind: For the Queen of Bohemia (to the Chriſtening of whoſe Child ſhe was a Witneſs) had ſome taſte of them. And being blown up by Admiration for this Bounty, either by her own Deſign to magnify her Merit, or by others in Mockery to magnify her Vanity, huge Inventories of Maſſy Plate went up and down, from Hand to Hand, that ſhe had given that Queen, and moſt believ'd it; yet they were but Paper Preſents; thoſe Inventories had a non eſt inventus at the Hague; they ſaw the Shell, the Inventory, but never found the Kernel, the Plate. Such difference there is betwixt ſolid Worth, and Airy-Paper Greatneſs. And it is hoped theſe ſlight Intermixtures will be no great Tranſgreſſion, becauſe long ſerious Things do dull the Fancy.

The King having digeſted his ſudden Loſs of the Duke of Richmond, and fitted himſelf to make his Mind known to his People in Parliament, he went to the Houſe the 19th, as is ſaid, and opened himſelf to them to this Effect.

The King's Speech to the Parliament.

TO teſtify to the World how far my Mind hath been from eſchewing to aſſemble a Parliament, and how willing I have been upon all Occaſions to have the Advice of my People, I have at this preſent called you, to approve unto you the earneſt Deſire I have ever had, and ſtill have, to deſerve the Love of my People, by improving your Truſt, and communicating unto you a Matter of as great Conſequence as ever King imparted to his People, to have their Advice and Counſel in.

I ſhall ſay unto you as Chriſt ſaid to the Church, I am your Husband, and you are my Spouſe. And as it is the Part of a good Husband to procure and maintain the Love of his Wife, which he uſually doth by often viſiting her, and upon extraordinary Occaſions communicating the Secrets of his Affairs unto her, and by all gentle and affable Ways to gain her Love; ſo in the Adminiſtration of Government, I deſire to carry my ſelf towards my People. There are two Ways by which a King may ſhew his Love to his People: One is, by a conſtant Adminiſtration of Juſtice according to the Laws eſtabliſhed; the other is, by communicating himſelf to his People, in their Repreſentative, the Parliament. For the firſt, I know there's no particular Man of you that hath not enjoyed the Bleſſing and Benefit of it; which I will ſay nothing of, becauſe you have been all Witneſſes of it; for who hath not found the Fruits of it? If he conſiders the Peace which my Kingdom enjoys, in the midſt of the Miſeries our Neighbours are afflicted with. And tho' I cannot ſay my Government hath been without Error; yet this I can truly ſay, and will avouch it before God, and his Angels, That never King governed with a more pure Sincerity, and uncorrupt Heart, than I have done, far from all Intention and Meaning of the leaſt Error or Imperfection in my Reign.

I have aſſembled you at this time to perform the other part, which is duly to impart unto you a Secret, and a Matter of as great Importance as can be to my Eſtate, and the Eſtate of my Children, I crave your beſt and ſafeſt Advice, and Counſel, as the Writ wherewith you are aſſembled imports, That the King would adviſe with you in Matters concerning his Eſtate and Dignity: And as I have ever endeavoured by this, and the like Ways, to procure and cheriſh the Love of my People towards me, ſo do I hope, and fully believe, that never any King was more beloved of his People, (whom you my Lords and Gentlemen do here repreſent) ſo I would have you truly repreſent their Loves alſo to me, that in you, as in a true Glaſs, I may perfectly behold it, and not as a falſe Glaſs preſents it, not at all, or otherwiſe than it is indeed. Give me your free and faithful Counſel in this matter, which is that of which you have often heard, the Match of my Son: Wherein, as you may know, I have ſpent much Time, with great Coſt, in long Treaty, deſiring always therein (and not without Reaſon, hoping to have effected my Deſires) the Advancement of my Eſtate and Children, and the general Peace of all Chriſtendom: Wherein I have always conſtantly laboured, depending too much upon fair Hopes and Promiſes. But at the earneſt Inſtance of my Son, I was contented (altho' it was of an extraordinary Nature) to ſend him to proſecute his Deſires in Spain; and for his more Safety, I ſent Buckingham (in whom I ever repoſed the moſt Truſt of my Perſon) with him with this Command, To be continually preſent with him, and never leave him, till he returned ſafe again unto me; which he performed, tho' not with ſuch Effect as I expected, yet not altogether without Profit; for it taught me this Point of Wiſdom, that, Qui verſatur in Univerſalibus, &c. is eaſily deceiv'd, and it generally brings nothing to good Iſſue; for before any Matter can be fully finiſhed, it muſt be brought to Particulars. I thought before their going, the Affairs had been produced to a narrow Point (relying upon their general Propoſitions); but when they came to the Matter, it prov'd ſo Raw, as if it had been never treated of, the Generals giving them eaſy way to invade, and afford them means to avoid the effecting of any thing.

The Particulars that paſſed in the Treaty, I mean not now to diſcover unto you, the Time being too ſhort, I refer that to Charles and Buckingham, and the Secretaries, who ſhall relate unto you all the Particulars. And after that, Super totam materiam, I deſire your beſt Aſſiſtance and Advice; what is beſt and fitteſt for me to do, for the Good of the Commonwealth, the Advancement of Religion, and the Good of my Son, and my Children of the Palatine. And of our Eſtate, I know you cannot but be ſenſible, conſidering your Welfare conſiſts in ours; for you ſhall be ſure to have your Share in what Miſery ſhall befall us: Therefore I need to urge no further Arguments unto you for your choiceſt and cureſt Counſel. And I aſſure you, in the Faith of a Chriſtian King, That it is Res integra preſented unto you; and that I ſtand not bound, nor any ways engaged, but remain free to follow what ſhall be beſt adviſed.

To plant is not ſufficient, unleſs, like good Gardiners you pluck up the Weeds that will choak your Labours; and the greateſt Weeds among you are Jealouſies, root them out: For my Actions, I dare avow them before God; but Jealouſies are of a ſtrange depth. I am the Husband, and you the Wife, and it is ſubject to the Wife to be jealous of her Husband. Let this be far from you! It hath been talked of my Remiſneſs in Maintenance of Religion, and Suſpicion of a Toleration; but as God ſhall judge me, I never thought, nor meant, or ever in Word expreſſed, any thing that favoured it. It is true, that, at Times beſt known to my ſelf, I did not ſo fully put thoſe Laws in Execution, but did wink and connive at ſome Things which might have hinder'd more weighty Affairs: But I never in all my Treaties agreed to any thing to the Overthrow or Diſagreeing of thoſe Laws; but, in all, I had a chief Regard to the Preſervation of that Truth, which I have ever profeſſed. And in that Reſpect, as I have a charitable Conceit of you, I would have you have the like of me alſo, in which I did not tranſgreſs: For it is a good Horſeman's Part not always to uſe the Spur, nor keep ſtreight the Rein, but ſometimes

If

A.Reg. 21. An. Christi 1623.

to use the Spur, and sometimes to suffer the Rein more remiss: So it is the Part of a wise King (and my Age and Experience have informed me) sometimes to quicken the Laws with strict Execution, and at other times upon just Occasion to be more remiss.

And I would also remove from your Thoughts all Jealousies, that I might or ever did question or infringe any of your lawful Liberties or Privileges: But I protest before God, I ever intended you should enjoy the Fulness of all those, that from ancient Times give good Warrant and Testimony; of which, if need be, I will enlarge and amplify. Therefore I would have you (as I have in this place heretofore told you, as St. Paul did Timothy) avoid Genealogies and curious Questions, and Quirks and Jerks of Law, and idle Innovations; and if you minister me no just Occasion, I never yet was, nor ever will be, curious or captious to quarrel with you. But I desire you to avoid all Doubts and Hindrances, and to compose your selves speedily and quietly to this weighty Affair. Carry your selves modestly, and my Prayers shall be to God for you, and my Love shall be always with you, that a happy Conclusion may attend this Parliament. God is my Judge, I speak it as a Christian King, never any wayfaring Man, in the burning, dry and sandy Desarts, more thirsted for Water to quench his thirst, than I thirst and long for the happy Success of this Parliament, that the good Issue of this may expiate and acquit the fruitless Issue of the former. And I pray God your Counsels may advance Religion, the Publick Weal, and the Good of me and my Children.

The Bishop of Lincoln's short Harangue.

When the King had thus ended, the Lord Keeper Williams, Bishop of Lincoln, and Speaker to the House of Peers, (who uses always to make the King's Mind further known if there be Cause) told the Parliament, That after the Eloquent Speech of his Majesty, he would not say any thing, for as one of the Spartan Kings being ask'd, Whether he would not willingly hear a Man that counterfeited the Voice of the Nightingale to the Life? made Answer, He had heard the Nightingale. So for him to repeat or rehearse what the King had said, was (according to the Latin Proverb) to ennamel a Golden Ring with Studs of Iron. He doubted not but that the King's Speech had, like Æschines's Orations, left in their Minds a Sting; and as an Historian said of Nerva, that having adopted Trajan, he was immediately taken away, Ne post divinum & immortale factum, aliquid mortale faceret: So he would not dare after his Majesty's Divinum & immortale dictum, mortale aliquid addere.

This is not inserted to shew the Pregnancy and Genius of the Man, but the Temper of the Times; wherein Men made themselves less than Men, by making Kings little less than Gods. In this the Spanish Bravery is to be admir'd, and the French do not much come short of them, who do not idolize their Kings with Sacred Sovereign, Immortal, and Oraculous Expressions; but in their humblest Petitions give him the Title Sir, tell him their Business, and demand Justice of him. But where these Adulations were admitted, tho' it doth not strike suddenly with some incurable Disease, yet the same Hand can make them consume, and in the end waste away to nothing.

But the Parliament, tho' they knew there was an Intention of a Toleration of Popery upon the close of the Spanish Match, sealed up (as it were) their Lips, and would not see the Light that discovered it self through this Cloud that the King cast before it, (tho' some of the Commons had much ado to hold, which he takes notice of at the next Interview, and thanks them for it) but they went on directly to his Business, making it their own, forgetting all former Miscarriages. And upon the 24th of this Month the Duke of Buckingham, accompanied with the Prince as his Remembrancer, made a long Relation of all the Transactions of Spain to both Houses, with all the Advantage he could, to make good his own Actions, some of the Particulars whereof are already related. And he took the first Discovery of the Intention of the King of Spain not to deal fairly with our King (touching the Restitution of the Palatinate) from the Arch-Dutchess juggling in the Treaty at Brussels, which was managed by Sir Richard Weston, our King's Ambassador there, who urged for a Cessation of Arms in the Palatinate, (the Arch-Dutchess pretending Power to draw off the Spanish Forces, if our King would first draw off his) it came to an Agreement; but in the close (after some Delays) she confessed she had no Power to admit of a Cessation, till she had more particular Warrant for it out of Spain.

A.Reg. 21. An. Christi 1623.

Febr. 24. Buckingham's Relation to the Parliament.

That these Shufflings made our King send Porter into Spain for a more resolute Answer, in relation to the Match, and the Palatinate, and assigned him but Ten Days to stay there; in which time Bristol fed him with Hopes, which he found very empty ones: Whereupon Porter went boldly to Olivares, who (in an open-hearted way) told him plainly, That Spain meant neither the Match, nor Restitution of the Palatinate.

Bristol seeing Porter would return with this Answer, perswaded him to speak with Olivares again, who coming to Olivares, found him much incensed for relating the private Intimation he gave him to Bristol, the Publick Minister, and deny'd to speak with Porter any more.

Bristol still puffs up our King with an Assurance both of the Match, and Restitution of the Palatinate; but they proceeding slowly, the Prince desired that he might go himself into Spain, which Buckingham first broke to the King, who with Reasons laid down for it, was drawn to it.

When the Prince came there, the Match at first was absolutely denyed, unless he would be converted, which Bristol perswaded the Prince unto, at least in shew, to expedite his Business.

Then the Spanish Ministers urged for a Toleration of Religion in England, which they hoped (as some of them expressed) would cause a Rebellion; and they offered the Prince an Army to assist him for the Suppression of the same.

But the Prince finding the Spanish did but dally with him, left a Proxy with Bristol to conclude the Match, when the Dispensation came, which the Prince forbad him to deliver. Bristol nevertheless proceeds; and if Gresley had not brought a Revocation of the Proxy from the King over Night, Bristol had made the Espousals the next Day. And always at the end of every Point, he would look upon the Prince for his Approbation and Allowance, who still, as the Duke went on, confirmed the same. And so Buckingham concluded, That if the drawing of us out of Darkness into Light did deserve Thanks, we all ow'd it to the Prince, who by the Hazard of his Person, and by his great Care and Industry, had done this for us.

The Duke highly esteemed,

The Parliament, that looked upon the Duke with a sour Eye, for tempting the Prince to so dangerous a Journey, when they found what ex-

A. Reg. 22. An. Christi 1624.

excellent Effects it had produced, forgot the old Murmurs buzzed against him, and with elevated Voices could scarce be contained from acknowledging him The Preserver of the Nation. This his Discovery is cry'd up every where, and who but the Duke is become the Darling of the Multitude? So dear then was the Prince unto the People, that they tendred his Safety as their own! and so easily might he have retain'd this Love, if by grasping after Shadows he had not lost the Substance: For those People are the soonest deceived that love most to admire.

Little deserved.

The Parliament were but Men, and could at present see no more than the Duke was pleased to shew them through the flattering Glass of this Relation. But when Bristol came over, and (as afterwards he) did discover, that the Duke carry'd the Prince purposely into Spain to be the better instructed in Popery: That he gave hope to the Spanish Ministers of State of the Prince's Conversion, which made them propound far worse Conditions for Religion than had been formerly agreed on: That he professed himself a Papist there, going to Mass, kneeling to and adoring their Sacraments; which the Pope being informed of, sent the Duke a Bull, to persuade and encourage him to pervert the King and Prince, with other pernicious Crimes laid to his Charge in the next King's Reign, (as may appear in due time) none can blame the People for mutable Affections: For when Falshood is so impudent as to hoodwink such an Assembly, with the Veil that Truth her self is wont to put on, who can at an Instant discover it?

The Parliament advise the King to break the Treaties with Spain.

But it was a hard Condition for the banished Palatine to have such Mediators as Buckingham, Bristol and Weston, to make Intercession for him, the Temper of whose Spirits was well known, and which way their Affections tended. But now the Load is all laid upon Bristol, tho' he were at the distance of not being sensible of it, yet it was so heavy, that most Men thought he would never come to have it taken off.

But all things were passed over by the Parliament that reflected upon Particulars, having in their Eye the general Good of the Kingdom, which they strove to manage with Advantage. And the Treaty of the Marriage with Spain being put into their Hands, they crush'd the Brood in the Nest, advising the King to break the Treaty, and proclaim open War with that King: Which they did not do suddenly, as if they had been eager upon a War, but with good Advice, and deliberate Consideration, as the most immediate Means for the Establishment of Religion, and settled Peace; protesting to assist the King, for the regaining of the Palatinate, with their Lives and Fortunes. Upon which Declaration and Resolution, the King determined to send instantly Post into Spain to his Ambassadors, to signify to that King, That the Parliament advised him to break off the Treaties, and to recover the Palatinate by War; and the Post had his Dispatch to that purpose, when the King repented him of what he had done, and (like the Husband now jealous of his Wife) writes to Secretary Conway this Letter, to impede and delay the Business.

The King's Letter to Secretary Conway.

I Doubt not but you have heard what a stinging Petition against the Papists the Lower House have sent to the Higher House this Day, that they may jointly present it to me: You know my firm Resolution not to make this a War of Religion. And seeing I would be loth to be Conny-catch by my People, I pray you stay the Post that is going into Spain, till I meet with my Sone who will be here to morrow Morning. Do it upon Pretext of some more Letters ye are to send by him; and if he should be gone, hasten after him, to stay him upon some such Pretext, and let none living know of this, as ye love me: And before Two in the Afternoon to morrow you shall without fail hear from me. Farewel.

April 3. 1624.

Conjectures on the King's Letter.

By this Letter it appears, that the King thought the Petition against Recusants of such high Consequence, that if he should not give the Parliament a good Answer, it might make a Rupture with them; and therefore he will see further in the Nature of this Petition, before he will break with the King of Spain; and know more of the Prince his Son's Mind, happily whether he would yet accept of his old Mistress, or expect a new one: Or whether the King feared that the Parliament would not make good their Promises to stand with their Lives and Fortunes in the Gap when this great Breach was made, and so couzen him, may be mystical Conjectures from mystical Expressions, grounded upon the Words of a King: Or whether any or all of these (like the King's Heart inscrutable) are meant in the Letter, is not here determined. But the King hastens to the House, and finding no such terrible Things in the Petition, (the Lords being not so quick in the Resolution of it, as the King was in the Apprehension of it) he stirs not those Waters, but sounds the Depth of the Parliament's Intentions, by propounding his Doubts, and requiring a Solution to them, in order to a War, with Prudence and Caution.

The King's second Speech to both Houses.

My Lords and Gentlemen all,

'I have Cause first to thank God with my 'Heart, and all the Faculties of my Mind, 'that my Speech which I delivered in Parliament hath taken so good Effect among you, 'as that, with an unanime Consent, you have 'freely and speedily given me your Advice in 'this great Business, for which I also thank you 'all as heartily as I can. I also give my particular 'Thanks to the Gentlemen of the Lower House, 'for that I hear, when some among them would 'have cast Jealousies and Doubts between me 'and my People, you presently quelled those 'Motions, which might have hindred the happy 'Agreement I hope to find in this Parliament. 'You give me your Advice to break off the 'Treaties, as well concerning the Match, as 'the Palatinate. And now give me Leave, as 'an old King, to propound my Doubts, and 'hereafter give me your Answer.

'First, it is true, that I who have been all the 'Days of my Life a peaceable King, and have 'had the Honour in my Titles and Impress to 'be stiled Rex Pacificus, should without Necessity 'embroil my self in a War; which is so far 'from my Nature, and from the Honour I have 'had both at home and abroad, in endeavouring to avoid the Effusion of Christian Blood, '(of which too much hath been shed) and so 'much against my Heart, that unless it be upon 'such a Necessity, that I may call it (as some 'merrily say it of Women) Malum Necessarium, 'I shall be loth to enter into it. And I must 'likewise acquaint you, that I have had no 'small Hopes given me of obtaining better 'Conditions for Restitution of the Palatinate, 'and that even since the setting down of this 'Parliament. But be not jealous, nor think me 'such a King, that would, under Pretext of 'asking your Advice, put a Scorn upon you, 'by disdaining or rejecting it. For you remember

A. Reg. 22.

An. Christi 1624.

'ber, that in my first Speech unto you, for Proof 'of my Love to my People, I craved your Advice in this great and weighty Affair. But in 'a Matter of this Weight, I must consider how 'this Course may agree with my Conscience 'and Honour; and next, according to the Parable uttered by our Saviour, (after I was resolved of the Necessity and Justness of the 'Cause) to consider how I shall be enabled to 'raise Forces for this Purpose.

'As concerning the Case of my Children: I 'am now old, and would be glad, as Moses saw 'the Land of Promise from a high Mountain, '(though he had not Leave to set his Foot in it) 'so would it be a great Comfort to me, that 'God would so long prolong my Days, as if I 'might not see the || Restitution, yet at least to 'be assured that it would be; that then I might 'with old Simeon say, Nunc dimittis servum tuum Domine! Otherwise it would be a great Grief 'unto me, and I should die with a heavy and 'discomforted Heart. I have often said, and 'particularly in the last Parliament, (and I shall 'be ever of the Mind) that as I am not ambitious of others Mens Goods or Lands, so I desire not to enjoy a Furrow of Land in England, 'Scotland, and Ireland, without Restitution of the 'Palatinate, and in this Mind I will live and 'die.

'But let me acquaint you a little with the 'Difficulties of this Case: He is an unhappy 'Man who shall advise a King to War; and it 'is an unchristian thing to seek that by Blood, 'which may be had by Peace. Besides, I think 'your Intentions are not to engage me in a War, 'but withal you will consider how many things 'there are requisite thereunto. I omit to speak 'of my own Necessities, they are too well 'known: Sure I am, I have had the least Help 'in Parliament of any King that reigned over 'you these many Years: I have let you know 'that my Disabilities are encreased, by the 'Charge of my Son's Journey into Spain, (which 'I was at for his Honour, and the Honour of 'the Nation) by sending Ambassadors, by Maintenance of my Children, and by assisting of 'the Palatinate. I have incurred a great Debt 'to the King of Denmark, which I am not able 'to pay. The Low-Countries (who in regard 'of their nearness are fittest to help for the Recovery of the Palatinate) are at so low an 'ebb, that if I assist them not, they will be scarce 'able to subsist. The Princes of Germany, that 'should do me any good, are all poor, and 'weak, and disheartned, and do expect Assistance from hence.* For Ireland, I leave it to 'you, if that be not a Back-door fit to be secured. For the Navy, I thank God it is now in 'a better Case than ever it was; yet more must 'be done; and before it can be prepared as it 'ought to be, it will require a new Charge, as 'well for their own Strength, as for securing of 'the Coasts. My Children (I vow to God) 'eat no Bread but by my means; I must maintain them, and not see them want. My Customs are the best part of my Revenues, and 'in effect the Substance of all I have to live on: 'All which are Farmed out upon Condition, 'That if there be War, those Bargains are to 'be anulled. Subsidies ask a great Time to 'bring in; and if you assist me that way, I must 'take them up before-hand upon Credit, which 'will eat up a great part of them.

'This being my Case, to enter into a War 'without sufficient Means to support it, were 'to shew my Teeth, and do no more. In the 'mean time, I heartily thank you for your Advice, and will seriously think upon it; as I pray you to 'consider of these other Points. My Treasurer, 'to whose Office it appertains, shall more at 'large inform you of those Things that concern my Estate.

'Thus freely do I open my Heart to you; 'and having your Hearts, I cannot want your 'Helps; for it is the Heart that opens the Purse, 'not the Purse the Heart. I will deal frankly 'with you, shew me the Means how I may do 'what you would have me; and if I take a Resolution upon your Advice to enter into a War, 'then your own Deputies shall have the disposing of the Money; I will not meddle with it, 'but you shall appoint your own Treasurers.

'I say not this with purpose to invite you to 'open your Purses, and then to slight you so 'much as not to follow your Counsel, nor engage you before I be engaged my self. Give 'me what you will for my own Means; for I 'protest none of the Money which you shall 'give for these Uses, shall be issued but for 'those ends. If upon your Offer I shall find 'the Means to make a War honourable and 'safe, (and that I resolve to embrace your Advice) then I promise you on the Word of a 'King, That although War and Peace be the 'peculiar Prerogative of Kings, yet as I have 'advised with you in the Treaties, on which 'War may ensue, so I will not Treat nor accept of Peace, without first acquainting you 'with it, and hearing your Advice, and there 'in go the proper way of Parliament, in conferring and consulting with you: And happily, Conditions of Peace will be the better, 'when we are prepared for War, according 'to the Proverb, That Weapons breed Peace.

'Your kind Carriage gives me much Contentment; and that comforts me which my 'Lord of Canterbury said, That there was not a 'contrary Voice among you all, like the Seventy Interpreters, who were led by the Breath 'of God.

'I am so desirous to forget all Rents in former Parliaments, that it shall not be my default, if I be not in love with Parliaments, 'and call them often, and desire to end my 'Life in that intercourse between Me and my 'People, for making of good Laws, reforming 'Abuses, and maintaining the good Government of the Commonwealth: Therefore go 'on chearfully, and advise of these Points, and 'my Resolution shall be then declared.

The Parliament close with the King.

None can blame the King for being too cautelous or wary in such an Eruption as this, so contrary to his Nature (as he saith himself) a War was a new World to him, fearing to lay out by it more than he should receive. And in this, he was like the Man, that when his Master gave great Charge to go and gather up his Rents in the Country, and to take a pair of Pistols with him, to bring home his Money with the more Security, After the Master had appointed him to pay so much in one Place,

|| Neither he nor his Son saw the Restitution of the Palatinate, it falling out in the Year 1648, when the Monarchy of England was under a fatal Eclipse, and its King's Head within Two Months of being laid on the Block.

* King James was mistaken in this: For his Daughter the Queen of Bohemia, and her Children, might have starv'd for him, if the States of Holland and some Foreing Princes had not help'd to support them.

and

A. Reg. 22. An. Christi 1624.

and so much in another, that the Man saw he should not receive so much as he should disburse, Bid his Master take his Pistols again, he should not use them. So the King fearing that when the War was begun, there would not be wherewithal to maintain it, Thanked the Parliament for their Advice, and he would consider better of it. And they feeling the King's Pulse by his Expressions, resolved now not to let him flag, but to keep up the temper of his Spirit, that a little thing would make decline again: And therefore they seriously settled to their Business, and answered his Expectation fully, which they presented unto him shortly after, in these Words, to his great Satisfaction.

Most Gracious Sovereign,

Their Declaration. 'WE your Majesty's most humble and Loyal Subjects, the Lords and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, do 'first render to your Sacred Majesty our most 'dutiful Thanks, for that, to our unspeakable 'Comfort, you have vouchsafed to express your 'self so well satisfied with our late Declaration 'made unto your Majesty, of our General Resolution, in pursuit of our Humble Advice, to 'assist your Majesty, in a Parliamentary-way 'with our Persons and Abilities. And whereas your Majesty, in your Great Wisdom and 'Judgment, fore-seeing that it will make a 'deeper Impression, both in the Enemies of 'that Cause, and in your Friends and Allies, 'if they shall not only hear of the chearful Offers, but also see the real Performance of your 'Subjects towards so great a Work; Your Majesty was pleased to descend to a particular 'Proposition for the advancing of this great 'Business. We therefore in all humbleness most 'ready and willing to give your Majesty and 'the whole World an ample Testmony of our 'sincere and dutiful Intentions herein, upon 'mature Advice and Deliberation, as well of 'the Weight and Importance of this great Affair, as of the present Estate of this your 'Kingdom, (the Weal and Safety whereof, is, 'in our Judgment, apparently threatned, if your 'Majesty's Resolution for the Dissolving of the 'Treaties, now in question, be longer deferred, and that Provision for Defence of your 'Realm, and Aid of your Friends and Allies, 'be not seasonably made) have with a chearful 'Consent of all the Commons, (no one dissenting) and with a full and chearful Consent of 'the Lords, Resolved, That upon your Majesty's Publick Declaration for the Dissolution 'and utter Discharge of both the said Treaties 'of Marriage, and the Palatinate, in pursuit of 'our Advice therein, and towards the Support 'of that War which is likely to ensue: And 'more particularly for those Four Points proposed by your Majesty; namely, for the Defence of this your Realm; the Securing of 'Ireland; the Assistance of your Neighbours, 'the States of the United Provinces, and other 'your Majesty's Friends and Allies; and for the 'setting forth of your Royal Navy; we will 'grant for the present the greatest Aid which 'ever was given in Parliament. That is to say, 'Three intire Subsidies, and Three Fifteens, to 'be all paid within the Compass of one whole 'Year, after your Majesty shall be pleased to 'make the said Declaration; the Money to be 'paid into the Hands, and expended by the 'Direction of such Committees, or Commissioners, as hereafter shall be agreed upon at this 'present Session of Parliament. And we most 'humbly beseech your Majesty to accept of 'these First Fruits of our hearty Oblation, 'dedicated to that Work which we infinitely 'desire may prosper, and be advanced. And 'for the future to rest confidently assured, That 'we, your Loyal and Loving Subjects, will never fail in a Parliamentary-way to Assist your 'Majesty in so Royal a Design, wherein your 'own Honour, and the Honour of your most 'Noble Son, the Prince, the Ancient Renown 'of this Nation, the Welfare and very Subsistence of your Noble and Only Daughter and 'her Consort, and their Posterity, the Safety 'of your own Kingdom and People, and the 'Prosperity of your Neighbours and Allies, are 'so deeply engaged.

The Treaties with Spain dissolved.

The Parliament by this Declaration came up so close to the King, that he could make no Evasion, but rested contented now in his latter time (when the Almonds (as it were) begun to Blossom upon his Head) to plunge himself into a War, which brought him again to the Parliament, to thank them for their Readiness to assist him; telling them, That he is willing to follow their Advice in the Annulling and Breach of these Two Treaties. They have given enough to begin a War, but when the end will be, (he said) God knows. Yet he will engage for himself and his Son, his Successor, That no means shall be left unused for Recovery of the Palatinate. And for all his old Age (if it might do any good) he would go in Person to further the Business. But, as he his contented to have the Parliament Committees to dispose of the Moneys by their Directions, so the Design must not be acted by publick Councils: For whether he shall send Two Thousand or Ten Thousand; whether by Sea or Land, East or West, by Diversion or Invasion, upon the Bavarian or Emperor, that must be left to the King. And this he did that there might be no Jealousies, but to smooth every Rub betwixt them.

And to put it in Execution, a Council of War is chosen out of the old and long discontinued Militia of Ireland, and some others of the Nobility; and upon Result of their Counsels (after some Debate) it was concluded to send Six thousand Men for the present into the Low-Countries, to joyn with the States Forces against the King of Spain's mighty Armies, under the Command of Marquis Spinola, that threatned the next Summer to over-run the Netherlands, that weakning the Spaniards in Flanders, they might have the more free Access into Germany.

The Spanish Ambassador accuses Buckingham of Treason.

‡†‡ The Dissolution of the Treaties with Spain, and the Preparation for War resounding in every Ear, gave such an Alarm to the Spanish Ambassador, the Marquis of Inoiosa, that whether out of Truth and Knowledge (as he pretended) or Malice only, cannot be determined: But he sent

---

‡†‡ The Story of this Affair Bishop Hacket has given us at large from the Lord-Keeper Williams's Notes in the History of his Life, which was thus:

The Spanish Ambassador Inoiosa had found a way to instil into King James a Jealousie of Buckingham, wherein the Prince himself wanted not his Share. The Things objected against him were chiefly these: 1st, That the King was so besieg'd by the Creatures of the Prince and Duke, that he could not be acquainted with the Affairs of Court, or Parliament; and was as much a Prisoner as King John of France in England, or Francis the First at Madrid; and could not be spoke with, but [illegible] that watch'd him. 2dly, That there was a strong Machination in hand, that had turn'd the Prince, a wise Obedient Son

A. Reg. 22. him before, to the quite contrary. 3dly, That there was a form'd Design to restrain him from the Exercise of the Government in all A. Reg. 22.
his Three Kingdoms. 4thly, That the Duke had brought the King into Contempt with the Parliament and the Court, as a faithful
An. Christi and unactive Prince, and addicted to an inglorious Peace while his Daughter and her Children were in the Hands of their Enemies. An. Christi 1624. 5thly, That the Duke had divulg'd the King's Secrets. 1624.

A Memorial, containing these and a great many other Articles against Buckingham, was secretly put into the King's Hands by an Instrument of Inojosa's, and was more then enough to distract a Mind less timorous in it self than his.

Bishop Hacket tells us, That the King, grown with this perplexity, prepar'd to go to Windsor, to shift Ground for the better Ease of his Mind; and that, taking the Prince with him, he found a slight Reason to leave Buckingham behind him just as the Duke was putting his Foot in the Boot of the Coach. This Disappointment drew Tears from Buckingham, and an humble Prayer to the King, That His Majesty would let him know what could be laid to his Charge to offend so Gracious a Master, and vow'd by his Saviour to purge it, or confess it. All he could get from the King in Answer was, that he was the unhappiest Creature alive, to be forsaken by them that were dearest to him: which was utter'd and receiv'd with Tears in his own Eyes, as well as the Prince's and the Duke's.

This coming to the Lord Keeper Williams's Ears, He made hast (says Hacket) to Wallingford-house, and had much ado to be admitted to the Duke in his sad Retirement, whom he found lying on a Couch in that unmoveable Posture, that he would neither sit up nor Speak, tho' invited twice or thrice with Courteous Questions. At length the Duke open'd his Case to the Keeper, who advis'd him to make hast after the King to Windsor before Night, and never to stir from the King's Person Night nor Day: For (said he) the Dangerous, that some may thrust themselves in, to push on His Majesty to break utterly with the Parliament; and upon that, their next Hopes will be, to see the Duke sent to the Tower; and God knows what might next happen.

The Duke follow'd the Keeper's Advice, while the other in the mean time found out the Occasion of all this Stir from the Spanish Ambassador's Secretary, through the means of a Mistress he kept; which ended in a full Reconciliation between the King and Buckingham. Thus far Hacket.

The Truth is, King James had been so long lull'd asleep by the Allurements of the Court of Spain, that it was no easie Matter for the Parliament, or Buckingham himself, the greatest of Favourites that ever was, to awaken him. But still, it seems, the Spanish Match (tho' publickly broke off) kept some Root in his Mind.

There are Two Original Letters of Buckingham to King James, in the above-mention'd Collection, which, tho' without Date, appear to me to be writ about this Time. As they sufficiently discover King James's Unsteadiness in these Matters, so they express more, in my Opinion, of the Duke of Buckingham's Honesty and Fidelity to his Master and the Publick, than all that has been said in his Vindication or Praise either then or since. One of them is endors'd upon the Back with the Prince's Hand; and the other, if I mistake not, by Archbishop Laud's, having compar'd it with other Writings of that Prelate. They run thus

Dear Dad and Gossip,

H*Aving more Business than it was fit to speak to you without a Letter, I was once resolv'd to have waited on you my self: But presently came to me the News of the* Spanish Ambassador's going to you, which hath diverted my Resolution at this Time; because I will not increase that in you, which I have always found too much; and that I will not let the Ambassador think you are distracted, tho' this gives enough and too much to your People. I have, to save your Leisure, writ some Things to (the Word here is either Aran, or Arun, I know not which) by whom I likewise expect an Answer: Only I will trouble your self with this, That I beseech you to send me your plain and resolute Answer, Whether if your People resolve to give you a Royal Assistance, to the Sum of Six Subsidies and Fifteens, with a Promise in case of Necessity, to assist you afterwards with their Lives and Fortunes, whether then you will not accept it, and their Counsel to break the Match, with the other Treaties? And whether or no, to bring them to this I may not assure some of them under hand, (because its fear'd, when your Turns are serv'd, you will not call them together again, to reform Abuses and Grievances, and the making of Laws for the good Government of the Country) That you will be so far from that, that you will rather win them; desiring nothing more than their Love and Happiness, wherein your own is included? Sir, I beseech you think seriously of this, and resolve once constantly to run one way: For as long as you waver between the Spaniard and your own Subjects, to make your Advantage of both, you are sure to do with neither. I should for my own Contentment, tho' I am sure I do you some Service here, and would be able, if you would do openly and heartily with me, do you more, wait on you oftener; but that you go in Two Ways, and my self only in One. It occasions so much Disputes, that till you be once resolv'd, I think it of more Comfort and Ease to you, and safer for me, that I hide away: For to be of your Opinion, would be Flattery; and not to speak humbly my own, would be Treachery. Therefore I will at this Time, with all the Industry of my Mind, serve you here; and pray for the good Success of that, and the Lengthening your Days, with all the Affections of his Soul that will live and die in Love of you.

Your Majesty's most humble Slave and Dog,

STEINY.

The other Letter runs thus Verbatim:

Dear Dad and Gossip,

N*Otwithstanding this uncharitable Interpretation I find made of a Thankful, Loyal Heart, in calling my Words Cruel and Catonick, in Obedience to your Commands, I will tell the House of Parliament, That you having been in the Fields this Afternoon, have taken such a fierce Rheum and Cough, as not knowing how you will be this Night, you are not able to appoint them a Day of Hearing: But I will forbear to tell them, That, notwithstanding your Cold, you were able to speak with the King of* Spain's Instruments, tho' not with your own Subjects. All I can say, you must look to your own Safety, and those that depend of yours: I pray God you may at last attain it, otherways I shall take little Comfort in Wife or Child; tho' now I am suspected to look more to the Rising Sun than my Maker and Father. Sir, Hitherto I have ty'd my self to a punctual Answer of yours. If I shall give my self leave to speak my own Thoughts, they are so many, that tho' the Quality of them should not grieve you, coming from one you wilfully and unjustly reject; yet the Number of them are so many, that I should not give over till I have troubled you: Therefore I shall only tye my self to that which shall be my last and speedy Refuge, to pray the Almighty to encrease your Joys, and appease the Sorrows of your Heart.

This Letter is blotted in several Places, and ends thus abruptly: And it is to be regretted that we have not the King's Answers to them, if any there were.

sent to the King, to let him know, that the Duke of Buckingham had some dangerous Machination a-foot that tended to his Destruction, and the best he could expect would be a Confinement to a Country-house in some Park during his Life; the Prince being now in full Abilities, and ripe in Government. This Concussion was strong enough to shake an old Building that was of a fearful and tottering Temper; (especially if he consider'd how his Mother was put by her Government, to say nothing of Prince Henry) but the Violence of it did not work, because the Operation was somewhat mitigated by the Duke's Protestation of his Innocency: For the King, at the next Interview, saying to him, Ah! Steiny, Steiny, (which was the familiar Name he always used to him) wilt thou kill me? The Duke, struck into an Astonishment with the Expression, after some little Pause collected himself, and with many Asseverations strove to justify his Integrity; which the good King was willing enough to believe: And Buckingham finding, by some Discourse, that Padre Macestria the Spanish Jesuite had been with the King, he had then a large Theme for his Vindication, turning all upon the Spanish Jesuitical Malice, which proceeded from the Ruines of their quashed Hopes. And the King knowing Inoiosa and all that Party very bitter against Buckingham; and though he did not directly accuse the Prince to be in the Conspiracy with Buckingham, yet he reflected upon him; for such an Attempt could never have been been effected without his Privity: Therefore out of the Bowels of good Nature he did unbelieve it; and after Examinations of some Persons the Duke's Intimates, and their constant Denial upon Oath, (which they had no good Cause to confess) the King was content (being loth to think such an Enterprize could be foster'd so near his own Bosom) to have the Brat strangled in the Womb: And he presently sent into Spain, to desire Justice of that King against the Ambassador's false Accusation, which he said wounded his Son's Honour through Buckingham's Side; which Sir Walter Aston represented to the King of Spain, (for Bristol was coming over to justify his Actions to the Parliament.) But the Duke of Buckingham's Reputation there procured no other Satisfaction than some little Check of Formality: For when Inojosa was recalled home, he was not lessen'd in Esteem. Thus was this Information waved; though there might be some Cause to suspect, that the great Intimacy and Dearness betwixt the Prince and Duke (like the Conjunction of two dreadful Planets) could not but portend the Production of some very dangerous Effect to the Old King.

A. Reg. 22. An. Christi 1624.

Bristol sent to the Tower.

But the Duke's Reputation, tho' it failed in Spain, held footing in England; for Bristol no sooner appeared, but he is clapt up in the Tower. Their Juggling Practices (whereof they were both guilty enough) must not yet come to Light to disturb the Proceedings in Parliament, Bristol had too much of the King's Commission for what he did, (though he might overshoot himself in what he said) which was not now to be discovered. Yet the Rigour of that Imprisonment would have sounded too loud, if he had not had a suddain Release; who finding the Duke high mounted yet in Power, and himself in no Degree to grapple with him, was content with Submission to gain his Liberty, and retire himself to a Country-privacy.

The Lords being now at Leisure, began to consider of that Stinging Petition (as the King called it) against Papists, how necessary it was to joyn with the Commons, to supplicate the King to take down the Pride of their high-flying Hopes, that had been long upon the Wing, watching for their Prey, and now they are made to stoop without it. And after some Conferences betwixt both Houses about it, the Petition was reduced to these Two Propositions, and presented to the King as Two Petitions.

The Parliaments Petition against Recusants.

'WE your Majesty's most humble and loyal Subjects, the Lords and Commons Assembled in Parliament, do in all Humbleness offer unto your Sacred Majesty these Two Petitions following:

1. 'That for the more Safety of your Realms, 'and better keeping your Subjects in Obedience, and other Important Reasons of State, 'your Majesty would be pleased (by some such 'Course as you shall think fit) to give present 'Order, That all the Laws be put in due Execution, which have been made, and to stand 'in force against Jesuites, Seminary-Priests, and 'others, having taken Orders by Authority derived from the See of Rome, and generally 'against all Popish Recusants. And as for Disarming, that it may be according to the 'Laws, and according to former Acts and Directions of State in that Case. And yet that 'it may appear to all the World, the Favour 'and Clemency your Majesty useth towards all 'your Subjects of what Condition soever: And 'to the intent the Jesuites and Priests, now in 'the Realm, may not pretend to be surprized; 'that a speedy and certain Day may be prefixed by your Majesty's Proclamation, before 'which Day they shall depart out of this Kingdom, and all other your Highness's Dominions; and neither they nor any other to return or come hither again upon Peril of the 'severest Penalties of the Laws now in force 'against them. And that all your Majesty's 'Subjects may thereby also be admonished, not 'to receive, entertain, or conceal any of them 'upon the Penalties and Forfeitures, which by 'the Laws may be imposed on them.

2. 'Seeing We are thus happily delivered 'from that Danger which those Treaties now 'dissolved, and that Use which your ill-affected 'Subjects made thereof, would certainly have 'drawn upon us, and yet cannot but fore-see, 'and fear, lest the like may hereafter happen, 'which would inevitably bring much Peril upon your Majesty's Kingdom: We are most 'humble Suters unto your gracious Majesty, to secure the Hearts of your good Subjects by the Engagement of your Royal Word 'unto them, That upon no Occasion of Marriage or Treaty (or other Request in that behalf from any Foreign Prince or State whatsoever) you will take away or slacken the 'Execution of your Laws against Jesuites, 'Priests, and Popish Recusants.

'To which our humble Petitions (proceeding from our most Loyal and Dutiful Affections towards your Majesty, our Care of our 'Country's Good, and our own confident Perswasion, that these will much Advance the 'Glory of Almighty God, the everlasting Honour of your Majesty, the Safety of your 'Kingdoms, and the Encouragement of all your 'good Subjects) we do most humbly beseech 'your Majesty to vouchsafe a Gracious Answer.

The King prepared for it.

The King was prepared for the Petition, having given his own Resolution the Check at present, that whatsoever he might do hereafter, yet now he would comply; and therefore he sends for both Houses to Whitehall, to sweeten them with a gentle Answer to this Petition, that might take off those Sour Aspersions that this Miscarriage in Government might happily cast upon him. And we will not say, but his Intentions might rove towards the end, though he gave too much Liberty (through a Natural Easiness in himself) to those that he trusted with Management of great Affairs, by evil Means to pervert that end, which made him guilty of their Actions: For where true Piety is not the Director, Carelesness, as often as Wilfulness, carries Men out of the way. But he had this Principle, and made often use of it, (like ill Tenants when they let things run to ruin) to daub all over again when forced to it, and find no other Remedy. This was the effect of what he said in his own Excuse.

The King's Answers to the Parliament's Petitions, April 23.

My Lords and Gentlemen of both Houses,

'I Cannot but commend your Zeal in offering this Petition to me; yet, on the other side, I cannot but hold my Self unfortunate, that I should be thought to need a 'Spur to do that which my Conscience and 'Duty binds me unto. What Religion I am of, 'my Books do declare, my Profession and Behaviour doth shew, and I hope in God I shall 'neverlive to be thought otherwise; surely I 'shall never deserve it. And for my part, I 'wish it may be written in Marble, and remain to Posterity as a Mark upon me when I shall swerve from my Religion: For he that doth dissemble with God, is not to be trusted with Men.

'to

A. Reg. 22. An. Christi 1624.

'My Lords, for my part, I protest before God, That my Heart hath bled when I have heard of the increase of Popery. God is my Judge, it hath been such a great Grief to me, that it hath been as Thorns in my Eyes, and Pricks in my Sides, and so for ever I have been, and shall be, from turning another way. And, my Lords and Gentlemen, you shall be my Confessors, that one way or other it hath been my Desire to hinder the Growth of Popery, and I could not be an honest Man if I should have done otherwise: And this I may say further, That if I be not a Martyr, I am sure I am a Confessor, and in some Sense I may be called a Martyr, as in the Scripture, Isaac was persecuted by Ismael, by mocking Words, for never King suffered more ill Tongues than I have done, and, I am sure for no Cause; yet I have been far from Persecution, for I have ever thought that no way increased any Religion more than Persecution, according to that Saying, Sanguis Martyrum est Semen Ecclesiæ.

'Now, my Lords and Gentlemen, for your Petition, I will not only grant the Substance of what you craved, but add somewhat more of my own. For the two Treaties being already annulled, (as I have declared them to be) it necessarily follows of it self, that which you desire; and therefore it needs no more, but that I do declare by Proclamation, (which I am ready to do) That all Jesuites and Priests do depart by a Day; but it cannot be, as you desire by your Proclamation, to be out of all my Dominions; for a Proclamation here extends but to this Kingdom.

'This I will do, and more; I will Command all my Judges, when they go their Circuits, to keep the same Courses for putting all the Laws in Execution against Recusants, as they were wont to do before these Treaties; for the Laws are still in force, and were never dispensed with by me. God is my Judge, they were never so intended by me. But, as I told in the beginning of the Parliament, you must give me leave as a good Horse-man, sometimes to use the Reins, and not always to use the Spurs. So now there needs nothing but my Declaration for the disarming of them, that is already done by the Laws, and shall be done as you desired, And more, I will take Order for the shameful Disorder of the Resorting of my Subjects to all Foreign Ambassadors; of this I will advise with my Council how it may be best reformed. It is true, that the Houses of Ambassadors are Privileged Places; and though they cannot take them out of their Houses, yet the Lord Mayor and Mr. Recorder of London may take some of them as they come from thence, and make them Examples. Another Point I will add, concerning the Education of their Children, of which I have had a particular Care, as the Lord of Canterbury and the Bishop of Winchester, and other Lords of my Council, can bear me Witness, with whom I have advised about this Business: For, in good Faith, it is a shame their Children should be bred here as if they were at Rome. So I do grant not only your Desire, but more: I am sorry I was not the first mover of it to you; but had you not done it, I should have done it my self.

'Now for the Second Part of your Petition; You have there given me the best Advice in the World; for it is against the Rule of Wisdom, that a King should suffer any of his Subjects to transgress the Laws by the Intercession of other Princes; and therefore assure your selves, that (by the Grace of God) I will be careful that no such ‖ Conditions be foisted in upon any other Treaty whatsoever: For it is fit my Subjects should stand or fall to their own Laws.

If the King had seriously and really considered the Minute of this Petition, the very last Clause, wherein the Glory of God, and the Safety of his Kingdoms, so much consisted, as the Parliament wisely express and fore-see, and, which the King saith, is the best Advice in the World, and which he promised so faithfully to observe in the next Treaty of Marriage for his Son, it might perhaps have kept the Crown upon the Head of his Posterity. But when Princes break with the People in those Promises that concern the Honour of God, God will let their People break with them to their Ruin and Dishonour. And this Maxim holds in all Powers, whether Kingdoms or Common-wealths: As they are established by Justice; so the Justice of Religion, which tends most to the Glory of God, is principally to be observed.

The King promises much, performs little.

The King grants them more than they desire, but not so much as they hope for; they have many good Words thick sown, but they produce little good Fruit: Yet the Parliament followed the Chase close, and bolted out divers of the Nobility and Gentry of Eminency, Popishly affected, that had Earth'd themselves in Places of High Trust and Power in the Kingdom, as if they meant to undermine the Nation: Viz.

A Swarm of Popery.

Francis Earl of Rutland, the Duke of Buckingham's Wives Father; Sir Thomas Compton, that was married to the Duke's Mother; and the Countess her self, who was the Cynosure they all steered by; the Earl of Castle-Haven; the Lord Herbert, after Earl of Worcester; the Lord Viscount Colchester, after Earl of Rivers; the Lord Peter; the Lord Morley; the Lord Windsor; the Lord Eure; the Lord Wotton; the Lord Teinham; the Lord Scroop, who was Lord President of the North (and which they omitted, the Earl of Northampton, Lord President of Wales, who married his Children to Papists, and permitted them to be bred up in Popery); Sir William Courtney, Sir Thomas Brudnell, Sir Thomas Somerset, Sir Gilbert Ireland, Sir Francis Stonnors, Sir Anthony Brown, Sir Francis Howard, Sir William Powell, Sir Francis Lacon, Sir Lewis Lewkner, Sir William Awberie, Sir John Gage, Sir John Shelly, Sir Henry Carvel, Sir Thomas Wiseman, Sir Thomas Gerrard, Sir John Filpot, Sir Thomas Russel, Sir Henry Bedingfield, Sir William Wrey, Sir John Conwey, Sir Charles Jones, Sir Ralph Conyers, Sir Thomas Lamplough, Sir Thomas Savage, Sir William Moseley, Sir Hugh Beston, Sir Thomas Riddall, Sir Marmaduke Wivell, Sir John Townsend, Sir William Norris, Sir Philip Knevit, Sir John Tasborough, Sir William Selbie, Sir Richard Titchborn, Sir John Hall, Sir George Perkins, Sir Thomas Penruddock, Sir Nicholas Sanders, Kts. besides divers Esquires Popishly addicted, either ‖ King James, in the Treaty of Marriage between the Prince and the Daughter of France, the end of this very Year, agreed to the very same Conditions which he in this Speech, promises never to grant in any other Treaty whatsoever.

in their own Perſons, or by means of their Wives, too tedious to be expreſſed here. And theſe were diſperſed and ſeated in every County, who were not only in Office and Commiſſion, but had Countenance from Court, by which they grew up and flouriſhed, ſo that their Exuberancy hindred the growth of any Goodneſs or Piety their Malice pleaſed to drop upon.

Herba mimoſa. Theſe Men being now touched, began to ſhrink in their Branches, like the new-found Indian Plants, but they quickly put out again; for though this Diſturbance or Movement came upon them by the Diſſolution of one Treaty, yet they preſently got heart, and ſpread again by the other which was in Agitation.

A Treaty of Marriage with France. For our King, after the Breach with Spain, loth to be refuſed in France, (where the Younger Daughter to Henry the Great was reſerved to be the Fatal Mother of a Diſherited Royal Iſſue) durſt not venture upon an Overt Treaty, but ſends over the Lord Kenſington, newly made Earl of Holland, who was to ſound the King and Grandees of France, whether the Match were feaſible before he would begin to Treat publickly. He remained a Month in France, and moved not a Word, though they apprehended his Addreſs was to that end. While the Prince was in Spain, they looked upon the Count Soiſon as a fit Match for the Princeſs Henrietta Maria; but our Prince's Gallantry (as they eſteemed it there) and his ſpritely Carriage in ſo dangerous and hazardous a Journey, both by Sea and Land, took ſuch Impreſſions in the Friſk of the French Humour, and raiſed him to ſuch a height of Bravery among them, that they were impetuouſly violent in deſiring the Match: Inſomuch, as upon the very firſt Overture, the King of France told the Earl of Holland, That he had rather have the Prince of England to his Brother, than any Man in the World. And when the Treaty was begun, the Spaniſh Factors began to play their Parts with the Pope, ſo that he ſent to the King of France to get ſome Immunities in the Articles now in Treaty for the Catholicks in England, and that there might be publick Exerciſe of the Popiſh Religion for the Princeſs. This the Earl of Holland oppoſing, the King of France told him, That if he would go on with the Treaty, he would be tied no further to the Pope's Rules than did conſiſt with Reaſon: For he did acknowledge the next Dioceſan Biſhop to him, in his Dominions, to have as much Power as he. So that the Treaty went on with a pretty Admittance of the Catholick Religion, and Romiſh Miniſters about the Princeſs, to a private, and almoſt obſcure Condition; ſo eager was the King of France for the Match.

But the Jeſuitical Party, both here and there, were inceſſantly Laborious for a greater Liberty; and the King's Chief Agent in the Treaty, Monſieur de Vieuxvill, having pulled on him the Odium of the People, (through ſome Miſcarriages) being committed Priſoner by the King, to protect him from their Rage, the Cardinal Richelieu entring then into his Infancy of Favour, being preferred by the Queen-Mother to be a Manager of the Treaty, whoſe Intimate he was, and more Stubborn for promoting the Catholick Cauſe, yet all this could give no ſtop to the Career, but that the Match would be made up, upon very eaſy Terms.

But when the King of France underſtood, by his Miniſters and Agents in England, how eager our King was for the Match, (for he deſired it above all earthly Bleſſings, as one near him ſaid of him) for beſides the Reproach he thought would fall upon him by another Breach, he ſhould loſe the Glory of a Conjunction with Kings (which he highly wound up his Opinion to) to Sublime, and as it were, Deify his Poſterity in the Eſteem of the People, ſo that he would almoſt ſubmit to any thing, rather than the Match ſhould not go forward: Which the King of France finding, he bated his Humour of Earneſtneſs for it, and deſcended by the ſame Steps and Degrees that he found his Brother King advanced to it, and got ſeveral great Immunities for the Papiſts by it; notwithſtanding all our King's fair Promiſes to the Parliament, as may be ſeen by thoſe Articles ſealed and ſworn to by our King, ſome few Months before his Death.

* But a little before this, (when the Hopes of the Match with France began to bud) the Earl of Carliſle was ſent over to mature and ripen the Proceedings with the Earl of Holland, to bring the Treaty to ſome Perfection; yet with private Inſtructions, That if they could find by

* The Archbiſhop of Embrun's Secret Embaſſy to England happen'd about this time, which it's no Wonder our Author knew nothing of, it not being made publick till within theſe few Years, at the end of Mon ſieur d'Argon's Memoirs.

The Archbiſhop was a Man of Cunning and Intrigue, a Monk, and ſent over by the Courts of Rome and France. He was therefore the propereſt Tool they could employ, and his Errand was not only to obtain good Terms for the Roman Catholicks in England, upon the Account of this Match with France, but likewiſe to ſound King James about his Thoughts of the Romiſh Religion; for they had always entertained an Opinion that he was inclined that way. It ſeems the Duke of Buckingham was acquainted beforehand with his coming; for he ſent as far as Canterbury to meet him, and Conduct him to London. He was immediately upon his Arrival admitted to Buckingham, and by him brought to the King, into whoſe intire Confidence he ſo far wrought himſelf at his firſt Audience, that immediately thereupon all the Priſons in England were ſet open to the Prieſts and Miſſionaries, notwithſtanding King James, the Seſſion of Parliament before, had ſolemnly promis'd to put the Laws in Execution againſt them.

The Archbiſhop had gained ſuch an Aſcendant over the King, that, as we are told in his printed Narrative, King James taking him one Day by the Hand, us'd to him this Expreſſion, You are the Man (ſaid he) ſent me from God, to whom I may freely open my Mind: And then told him, He had always a good Opinion of the Church of Rome, and for it had ſuffered great Misfortunes ever ſince his Birth.

Thereupon he open'd to the Archbiſhop a Project he had long in his Thoughts, of Uniting all Proteſtants to the Pope: And was willing, in order to bring it about, to concert Meaſures with the French King, that there might be a Meeting at Dover and Bologne of Able Divines of both Sides; adding, That the Archbiſhop himſelf was the fitteſt Man in the World to negotiate ſuch an Affair with the Roman Catholicks abroad, while he was uſing his Credit and Intereſt with the Proteſtants to bring them to a Compliance. Withal, King James told him, He had ever a great Love and Eſteem for the preſent Pope ſince the time, when Cardinal, he had wrote a Copy of Verſes upon the Death of his Mother, which ſhew'd him to be a Man of Senſe and good Nature.

In fine, the Archbiſhop was ſo perfectly well ſatisfied with King James, and his Errand to England, that he wrote to the French King to aſſure him, That by the frequent Converſation he had with him, he queſtion'd not his Inclinations to reſtore the Catholick Religion in England. Inſomuch, that he tells us, That when the News came to France of King James's Death; the French King ſaid to him with the greateſt Concern, Now all our Hopes of England are loſt.

Thus far the Archbiſhop of Embrun; and what Credit may be given to his Narrative, let the Reader judge, when at the ſame time he conſiders the whole Thread of King James's Actions, their

A. Reg. 22. An. Christi 1624.

their Spanish Correspondencies (as the Earl of Carlisle was a little Hispanioliz'd) that the Match there had any Probability of taking effect with the new Propositions, that then they should proceed no further in the French Treaty: So earnest was the King for the one, so violent for the other; the Sophisticate Drugs of the Spanish Restitution of the Palatinate, having not yet lost their Operation. Thus the Ambition of Princes (that devolve all their Happiness upon glorious Extractions) doth choak and smother those Considerations that Religion (like a clear Light) discovers to be but gross and cloudy Policy, which vanishes often, and comes to nothing.

The Lord Treasurer questioned in Parliament.

The Duke of Buckingham swol'n with Grandure (having two great Props to support him) doubted not to Crush any thing that stood in his way, so that he fell very heavily upon his Cousin the Earl of Middlesex, Lord-Treasurer; for he remember'd how he repined at the Moneys that were spent in Spain, and his Comportment to him since his coming over (Middlesex being naturally of a Sullen and Proud Humour) was not such as (he thought) did become his Creature: Therefore he resolved to bring him down from that Height he had placed him in; and quickly found the Means to do it: For great Officers that dig deep in Worldly Treasures, have many Underminers under them; and those that are not just to themselves or others, must make use of such as will not be so Just to them; so that a Flaw may easily be found, whereby a great Breach may be made. And as Middlesex had not Innocency to Justify himself, so he wanted Humility whereby others might Justify him, which made him fall unpitied. The Prince (that was Buckingham's Right Hand) took Part against him in the House of Lords, where he was Question'd; which the King hearing of, writes to the Prince from New-Market, (whether he often retired to be free and at ease from cumber and noise of Business) That he should not take Part with any Faction in Parliament against the Earl of Middlesex, but to reserve himself, so that both Sides might seek him; for if he kindled to take away his Servants, the time would come that others would do as much for him. This wise Advice speaks Buckingham, a little declining from the Meridian of the King's Favour, or the King from his; for if the King did know that Buckingham was his chief Persecutor, it could not but relish ill with the Duke to have the King plead for him: If the King did not know, there was not then that Intimacy betwixt them that used to be. But the Treasurer's Actions being throughly canvased (though he had not had such great Enemies) he was found Guilty of such Misdemeanours, as were not fit for a Man of Honour to commit; so that the Parliament thought to Degrade him, but that they looked on as an ill Precedent: But though they took not away his Titles of Honour in Relation to his Posterity (who had not offended) yet they made him utterly uncapable of Sitting in the House of Lords as a Peer: And for his Fine, it was so great, that the Duke (by Report) got Chelsey-House out of him for his Part of it.

Harman's Story.

There was an odd Accident happen'd in Northamptonshire while this Treasurer was in his Greatness. One Harman, a Rich Man, (that knew not well how to make use of his Riches) having some bad Tenants, and being informed that one of them, which owed him Money, had furnished himself to go to a Fair, to buy some Provisions for his Accommodation; Harman walks (as by Accident) to meet him in the way to the Market: When he saw his Tenant, he ask'd him for his Rent; the Man (that was willing otherwise to dispose of his Money) denied he had any: Yes, I know thou hast Money, said Harman, (calling him by his Name) I prithee let me have my Rent; and with much importunity the Man pulled out his Money, and gave all, or the most Part of it, to his Landlord. This coming to some Pragmatical Knowledge, the poor Man was advised to Indict his Landlord for Robbing him, and taking his Money from him on the High-way; which he did, and Harman for his sordid and base Carriage, being ill beloved in the Country, was found Guilty, but repriev'd by the Judges; and Harman hearing the Lord-Treasurer had a Secretary of his Name, he applied himself to him, promising to give him all his Estate (having no Children) if his Lord would bring him out of the Danger he was in; which the Lord-Treasurer by his Power with the King did effect, and Harman his Man within a short time after (by the other's Death) enjoyed an ample Estate.

The Lady Finch Viscountess of Maidstone.

The King, being a good Master, did by his Bounty much indear his Servants unto him, and seldom denied any Man a Reasonable Suit: This Treasurer by his Greatness also procured the King, by Patent (after the Example of the Countess of Buckingham) to create Elizabeth, the Widow of Sir Moyle Finch of Kent, Viscountess of Maidstone, a Lady of great Fortune; and having a Mind suitable to it, she laid the Foundation of a Noble Family; Intailing not only this Title, but in the next King's Reign, the Earldom of Winchelsea upon her now flourishing Posterity. But it is thought this Treasurer got well by laying the Ground-work to this great Structure; for Copt-Hall (a Noble Seat in Essex) came to his hand from this Lady at a small value; which is the principal House he left to his Family.

Four Regiments sent into Holland.

This Spring gave Birth to four brave Regiments of Foot, (a new Apparition in the English Horizon) Fifteen hundred in a Regiment, which were raised and transported into Holland under Four gallant Colonels; the Earl of Oxford, the Earl of Southampton, the Earl of Essex, and the Lord Willoughby, since Earl of Lindsey. These Four Regiments being well Armed, and Exercised in Holland, were ready to march into the Field with Maurice Prince of Orange, General of the States Army; who having an Opposite, the Marquis Spinola as subtile, and more daring than himself, they both lay at the Catch, and their Wariness prevented many a Mischief. Maurice finding Spinola with the Spanish Army hankering about Breda, either thinking himself not ready enough to Encounter him, or not strong enough to Grapple with him, permitted him to work himself within Two strong Lines of Circumvallation, fortified with several Forts and Redoubts, notwithstanding that Breda was his Darling Town, and the Honour of his Excellency. And while Spinola was thus working, he diverted his Army into Cleveland to take in Cleve-Castle, a Poor and inconsiderable Place, which was surrendred to him as soon as he presented his Cannon before it; and when he had done that, and Spinola had finished his Works, he brought his Army to a little Village called Mode, which was close by Spinola's Quarters, and there intrenched himself by his side: But the Enemy attended their Work, and would not busie themselves to look after him, being strongly fortified, and the Spinola besieges Breda.

Mmmmm 2 Way

A. Reg. 22. An. Christi 1624.

Way open for their Convoys to bring Provisions out of Flanders, which went always very strong; and Prince Maurice would not go so far out of his way from his Victual Ships to interrupt them, lest he should want Provisions for his own Army. But his great Design of lodging so near the Enemy was to amuse them, that they should bend their Eyes and Thoughts upon him there, and neglect that the more which he aimed at; for he had the Surprising of the strong Castle at Antwerp in his Fancy, which (he was informed) at that time had but small Force in it; and he was so assured to prevail, that he would have none but the Dutch to have the Honour of it. But they attempted the Business so blunderingly, that they were discover'd, and lost their Labour; and so with some few little Bickering of small Parties of Horse betwixt the Two intrenched Armies, the whole Summer was shuffled away; and Winter approaching, the Prince seeing little good to be done there, drew his Army to Rosendale and Sprang, Villages adjacent, where they attended Opportunities of doing the Enemy Mischief. But the Glory of Prince Maurice began to decay; the loss of this Town (which he now gave as gone) came so near his Heart, that he went sick from the Army to the Hague, and never returned to it again.

Cruelty at Amboina.

While these Things were in Motion, Truth, that comes often with a Leaden Foot, brought News out of the East-Indies, that the Year 1622, gave Birth to a Mischief of so horrid a Countenance (for a Private one) that no Time or Age could Parallel. The Dutch (while the English, their great Supporters, were fighting for them at their own Doors) grasping at all the Treasures and Spices of the Eastern World, had not only wormed out the Spaniards and Portugueze from many Islands and Colonies there, but (with unbounded Covetousness and Ambition) strove to hinder their Neighbours and best Friends, the English, from that free Commerce with the Natives they ever enjoy'd; so that many bickerings happed among them, till the Controversy was taken up by publick Treaty and Stipulation, agreed on betwixt our King and the States of the Netherlands, in the Year One Thousand six hundred and nineteen. And according to this Agreement, the English being as they thought secure, planted their Factories among them, where, after they had reaped the Fruit of their great Danger and Hazard, for some two Years, with much grumbling and repining, the Dutch began to practice their utter Extirpation: Not by a Massacre, for that had been a Merciful Mischief, but by Torture (to make their Cruelty Justice) in so horrid and savage a Manner, as if they had sucked their Rage from Indian Tigers.

The English accused of Treason.

Amboina was the bloody Stage where they acted this black Tragedy; and Fire and Water were their Engines, which are ever cruel Masters when they get Power: For pretending the chief Agent, Captain Gabriel Towerson, and the rest of the English Factory, had an Intention, by the Assistance of some few poor Japonesses, to possess themselves of the Castle, and expel the Dutch out of the Island; they seiz'd upon them, and set their bloody Engines a-work, having no other Accusers but them. The Racks extending their Sinews, drew them out at Length; and the Waters which they subtilly forced into their Mouths, by their own respiration and breathing, swelled all their Bodies to a huge Proportion, making their very Eyes ready to bolt out of their Heads; and such whose sturdy Innocence would not be compell'd to accuse themselves, they burned the Soals of their Feet with Candles, till the Moisture which dropt from them extinguish'd the Flame, and with those burning Instruments made such holes in their Sides, that they might see their Entrails, yet would not see their Innocence: So Exquisite were they in their Devillish Cruelty, as will be ghastly to express; what was it then to suffer! Thus having tired the poor Men with Tortures, and they being willing to die quickly, confess'd whatsoever their cruel Tormentors would have them say. The Dutch having in this Furnace wrought them to accuse themselves, with their pestilent Formality, got their Confessions under their Hands, and so concluded their Barbarism, with cutting off some of their Heads.

The improbability of the Attempt by the English.

There were not Twenty Englishmen, nor above Thirty Japonesses, in their whole Island, with whom they were said to Machinate this Conspiracy, and the Castle had in it Two hundred Dutch Soldiers, and Eight Ships riding before it well Mann'd, whereof two of them were above Twelve hundred Tuns a-piece: Besides, the Dutch had Two other Castles in the same Island; and what Probability could there be (if the Plot were as plain as their Malicious Tongues could make it) that so weak a Force should attempt upon so many, having Men enough in the Ships and Castles to have devoured the Attempters? And if they had effected their Work, what would the end have been but Ruine to their Estates, and everlasting Infamy to their Memories? knowing the Dutch were by the last Agreements to have that Castle 1619. confirmed by the King, who hated Treason in any Man with his very Soul. Whereas the Men were of well-known, upright Conversation, loathing such Baseness, and every Man of them, with Christian Impressions, sealed the last Gasp of his Life with a Protestation of his Innocency.

Ten of the English lost their Lives, whereof Captain Towerson was one; the rest, with Rack'd, Burnt, and Macerated Bodies, were sent out of the Island to other English Plantations, and so the whole Factory was destroyed. The Dutch seizing into their Hands greedily (which they only Gaped after) the whole Trade, which they have ever since enjoyed. And to put a fairer Gloss upon this mad Mischief, Nine Japonesses, and One Portugal, that they would needs have to be Complotters with the English, were rack'd (poor Men) to the same Confession, and then Executed; there being more Horror in the Examination of the Fault, than in the Punishment of it.

This Cruelty had made an incurable Wound betwixt the two Nations (the Noise of it giving Animosity enough) but that it was new Skin'd over, the bloody Garment taken off by Dutch Apologies, and presented at Court with a Face of Justice: For nothing must come thither but in such Attire, as the great Ones about the King will please to put upon it; who might be wrought to any temper by that Forge that could frame such flagitious Actions: For they that had Barbarism enough to perpetrate the One, had Baseness enough to practice the Other. But leaving their Consciences besmear'd with this Gore, which they cannot wipe off, but may stick to them yet; we proceed to the Story.

All this while Count Mansfeldt wanted Employment; and having prepared his way both in France and England for gathering an Army, he Ship'd himself in Zealand, in the Speedwell

(a

A. Reg. 22. An. Christi 1624.

(a Ship of our King's, commanded by Sir John Chidle) that was sent expresly for his Transport, which, in going out, run upon the Sands, and was, with the Violence of foul Weather, split in pieces: Mansfeldt, and some of his Followers, with difficulty escaping in her long Boat, got aboard a Pink that brought him into England; the Captain and the rest of the Company attending the Ship's Fate, were swallowed up in the Sea.

Mansfeldt goes into England.

While Mansfeldt remained in England, after some few Nights he was Lodg'd at St. James's, the Prince's House; Served and Attended in great State by some of the King's Officers, and Feasted with divers of the Nobility with much Magnificence: In which time a Press went through the Kingdom, for raising Twelve thousand Foot, which, with some Cavalry that Mansfeldt expected in Germany and France, would make up the Body of a considerable Army. Mansfeldt's Design was to go into Germany, thro' France, and he had fair Promises from thence, not only of Admission to pass through the Country, but Assistance from it. These 12000 were digested into Six Regiments. The Colonels were, the Earl of Lincoln; the Lord Doncaster, eldest Son to the Earl of Carlisle; the Lord Cromwell; Sir Charles Rich; Sir John Burrows, late Governour of Frankendale, and Colonel Grey a Scotchman, that had been an old German Commander, one that affected Buff in the time of Peace, and wore it in the Face of the Court, which the King seeing him in, and a Case of Pistols at his Girdle (which he never well liked of) he told him merrily, He was now so Fortified that if he were but well Victualled, he would be impregnable. Two Troops of Horse were also raised for this Service; the Earl of Lincoln had the Command of the one, and one Gunter, an ordinary Horse-Rider, was thought the fittest Man to command the other; as if none could command Horse, but such as could make them curvet in a Riding-House. And the Ignorance of these Times shews, that unpractical Reason cannot put forth it self to the Height, being bound up for want of Exercise; for we set a Valuation and Esteem upon German and French Horse, when (like them) we knew not our own Strength, for there are not in the World a more gallant Cavalry, both for the Activity of the Riders and Ability of the Horses, than may be formed in England, as Experience hath lately demonstrated.

Forces raised for him.

These being already in Kent for Transport about the Beginning of February, and Shipping provided, the French began to falter in their Promises, (notwithstanding our intimate Correspondence by the Treaty of Marriage agreed on) pleading many Inconveniencies in the passing of an Army through the Country; and the more, because our Men were so unruly in Kent (where some of them were tried by Martial Law) what would they be then in a strange Country? These being but Demurs, not Denials, the whole Army is Shipp'd, and put over to Calais, to wait the French Leisure; but the Charge of Shipping (being above 100 Sail that attended that Service) required more Speed than their faint and sickly Promises did expedite; for the French dallying with them, and delaying them, happily upon Design (the Queen of France being then more affected to the Spanish, and a less Enemy to her Blood and Kindred, than they have found her since) after a long stay, Mansfeldt was forced to leave the Hopes of his French Horse, and sail with his Army into Zealand. There the Soldiers lay at the Rumkins a long time in their Ships not suffered to land: For the States, not dreaming of such a Body of Men, could not determine suddenly what to do with them; besides, the Inland Waters being frozen, Provisions would grow short for their own Army, much more for them. After some stay in Zealand, they sailed up to Geertruidenberg in Brabant, which Town being not well provided with Victuals, they were not suffered to land; but continuing on Shipboard, the Ships, stuffed and pestred with Men, wanting Meat and all manner of Necessaries, such a Stench and Pestilence grew among them, that they were thrown into the Sea by multitudes; so that many Hundreds (if I may not say Thousands) beaten upon Shores, had their Bowels eaten out with Dogs and Swine, to the Horror of the Beholders. Those Bodies that drove up near those Towns where the English were, had great Pits made for them, wherein (being thrown by heaps) they were covered with Earth; but upon those Shores where they were neglected, (as they were in many parts of Holland) a great Contagion followed: And of Mansfeldt's Twelve thousand Men, scarce the Moiety landed.

The Design ruin'd.

This Winter Quarter, at Rosendale, was also fatal to the Earl of Southampton, and the Lord Wriothesley his Son. Being both Sick there together of burning Feavers, the Violence of which Distemper wrought most vigorously upon the heat of Youth, overcoming the Son first, and the drooping Father having overcome the Fever, departed from Rosendale with an Intention to bring his Son's Body into England, but at Berghen-op-zoom he died of a Lethargy in the View and Presence of the Relator, and were both in one small Bark brought to Southampton.

The Death of the Earl of Southampton and his Son.

And now our King found, by dear Experience, that the Favours he had done the King of Spain (in Protecting his Subjects and Seas from being Infested and ruined by Turkish Pirates, furnishing his Arsenals, and giving way to the Lord Vaux, and Sir Edward Parham, to transport so many English into Flanders) tended much to his Prejudice. For his Subjects in a strange Country, by this Means, fought one against another, which was a kind of an uncivil War; nor was it their voluntary Intention; for the English, that were shipped for Flanders, were tempted over by Popish Allurements, not knowing but that they were to go into Holland, which made them run away as they got Opportunity. But our King did not live to see how his Forces in the Low-Countries dwindled to nothing. And the Result of all is, That though he were a wise Prince, yet Blessings did neither attended his Counsels, nor Actions: So that it is not Human Wisdom, but Divine Directions, that orders and disposes all Things to a good End.

The Marquess Hamilton died before our King, suspected to be poysoned; the Symptoms being very presumptuous, his Head and Body swelling to an excessive Greatness, the Body being all over full of great Blisters, with variety of Colours; the Hair of his Head, Eye-brows, and Beard, came off being touch'd, and brought the Skin with them; and there was a great Clamour of it about the Court, so that Doctors were sent to view the Body; but the Matter was huddled up, and little spoken of it, only Doctor Eglisham, a Scotchman, was something bitter against the Duke, as if he had been the Author of it. The Marquess's Son had a little before married the Earl of Denbigh's Daughter, who was the Duke of Buckingham's Niece, and yet this Tie could not oblige a Friendship betwixt them, because the Marquess was a true

The Death of the Marquess of Hamilton.

A. Reg. 23. An. Christi 1625.

to the Marriage. This Diſtance, and other Diſcontents, occaſioned ſome tumorous Diſcourſes, which reflected much upon the Duke, but they never broke out in this King's Time, being bound up cloſe (as it was thought) more by the Duke's Power than his Innocency.

The Death of the King

And not long after him, whether our King's Care for his Grand-Children, or the Hazard and Danger of his own Perſon at home (being ever full of Fears) or his Engagement in a War abroad, (being contrary to his very Nature) or whether his full Feeding and continual Uſe of Sweet Wines, (which he abundantly affected) ſet the groſs Humours a work, or what other Accident cauſed his Diſtemper, is uncertain; but he fell Sick of a Tertian Ague, which is not dangerous in the Spring, (if we believe the Proverb) and had ſome few Fits of it: After which he fell into a Fever, which was too violent for him. A little before his Death he called for the Prince his Son, who riſing out of his Bed ſomething before Day, and preſenting himſelf before him, the King rouſed up his Spirits, and raiſed himſelf up as if he meant to ſpeak to him; but Nature being Exhauſted, he had no Strength to expreſs his Intentions, but ſoon expired, being upon Sunday Morning, the 27th of March, 1625. at Theobalds, in the Nine and fiftieth Year of his Age, and Two and twentieth Year compleat of his Reign. And was Buried at Weſtminſter with great Solemnity the 7th of May following.

The Death of Maurice Prince of Orange, April 23. 1625.

Not long after our King's Death, (as if the Time and Seaſon, as well as the Diſeaſe, were Epidemical to Princes) old Maurice the Prince of Orange died; and his Brother Prince Henry (being made General of the States Army) put his Fortune into an unhappy Ballance, which loſt much of the Weight. For either valuing his Soldiers Lives leſs than his Brother, or the Loſs of ſo brave a Town as Breda more, or thinking to ſpring up with more Glory (Phœnix-like) from the Aſhes of his Brothers Funerals (being recruited with the Relicks of Mansfeldt's Army) he ſet upon one of Spinola's ſtrong Works at Terheiden, either to relieve the Town, or beat the Enemy out of his Trenches, but he failed in both, and loſt many gallant Men (eſpecially Engliſh) in the Enterpriſe.

The Death of the Earl of Oxford.

The Earl of Oxford having the Leading of the Van, (being a Man corpulent and heavy) got ſuch a ſweltring Heat in the Service, that though he came off without Hurt from the Enemy, yet he brought Death along with him; for he fell Sick preſently after, went to the Hague, and there died. The other two Gallant Colonels Eſſex and Willoughby, ſurvived to Command two Engliſh Armies in a Civil-War, Eſſex being General for the Parliament and Willoughby for the King, in Kinton-field in Warwickſhire, where Eſſex remained Victor, the King being there in Perſon, and leaving him the Honour of the Field, his General Willoughby, then Earl of Lindſey, being Slain in the Battel. But there will be a long Tract of Time and Diſcourſe before theſe Armies encounter, being the firſt Cloud of that fiery Exhalation, which broke out in the next King's Reign, and could not be quenched without the Blood of many thouſands of the Nation.

The different Carriage of Two Princes of Orange.

But the different Carriage of theſe two Sons of Mars, the two Brothers, Maurice and Henry, is very obſervable: Which ſhall be left to the Judgment of the Great Maſters in the Art of War, whether Error were the greater (ſo apt is the Under World to ſpy out great Mens Errors) Maurice that had a powerful Army of the States, and was reinforced with Six thouſand Engliſh, gallant and reſolute Men, that would have hugg'd a daring Enterprize, yet durſt not encounter Spinola, when he lay open to his Aſſault, but let him work himſelf into his Faſtneſs and rather bear the Burthen in his own Breaſt, than diſturb him, Or Henry, when Spinola's Works were in full Strength, confirmed by Time and ſettled Order, the oppoſite to the confuſed End he aimed at, to throw ſo brave a part of his Army upon eminent Deſtruction? Or is there not a Time and Period prefixt to earthly Things, and the All-Diſpoſing Power to that end, doth either infatuate or eſtabliſh Counſels? This Town and old Prince Maurice, as may be ſaid, were loſt together.

The King patient in Sickneſs.

But our King, that was very much Impatient in his Health, was Patient in his Sickneſs and Death. Whether he had received any thing that extorted his Aguiſh Fits into a Fever, which might the ſooner ſtupify the Spirits, and haſten his End, cannot be aſſerted; but the Counteſs of Buckingham (who traffick'd much with Mountebanks, and whoſe Fame had no great Savour) had been tampering with him in the Abſence of the Doctors, and had given him a Medicine to drink, and laid a Plaiſter to his Side, which the King much complained of, and they did rather exaſperate his Diſtemper than allay it: And theſe Things were admitted by the inſinuating Perſuaſions of the Duke her Son, who told the King, They were approved Medicines, and would do him much good. And though the Duke after ſtrove to purge himſelf for this Application, as having received both Medicine and Plaiſter from Dr. Remington at Dunmow in Eſſex, who had often cured Agues and ſuch Diſtempers with the ſame; yet they were Arguments of a complicated kind, not eaſy to unfold; conſidering that whatſoever he received from the Doctor in the Country, he might apply to the King what he pleaſed in the Court; beſides the Act it ſelf (though it had been the beſt Medicine in the World) was a Daring not juſtifiable; * and ſome of the King's Phyſitians mutter'd againſt it, others made a great Noiſe, and were forced to fly for it; and though the ſtill Voice was quickly ſilenced by the Duke's Power, yet the

* Dr Egliſham, one of the King's Phyſitians, was oblig'd to flee beyond Seas for ſome Expreſſions he had mutter'd about the manner of his Majeſty's Death, and liv'd at Bruſſel, many Years after. It was there he publiſh'd a Book, to prove King James was poyſon'd; giving a particular Account of all the Circumſtances of his Sickneſs, and laying his Death upon the Duke of Buckingham and his Mother. I have read the Book ſome Fifteen Years ago in the Hands of Don Pedro Ronkillo, the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, who told me it had been tranſlated into High-Dutch, about the time Guſtavus Adolphus was entring into Germany for recovering of the Palatinate; and that by a Secret Order of the Court of Bruſſels, to throw Dirt upon the Royal Family of England. Among other Remarkable Paſſages I remember in the Book, there is one about the Plaiſter that was apply'd to the King's Stomach. He ſays, It was given out to have been Mithridate, and that one Dr. Remington had ſent it to the Duke, as a Medicine with which he had cur'd a great many of Agues in Eſſex. Now Egliſham denies it was Mithridate, and ſays, Neither he nor any other Phyſitians could tell what it was. He adds, That Sir Matthew Liſter and he being the Week after the King's Death at the Earl of Warwick's Houſe in Eſſex, they ſent for Dr. Remington, who liv'd hard by, and asking him; What kind of Plaiſter it was he had ſent to Buckingham for the Cure of an Ague, and whether he knew it was the King the Duke deſign'd it for? Remington anſwer'd, That one Baker, a Servant of the Duke's, came to him in his Maſter's Name, and deſir'd him, if he had any certain Specifick Remedy againſt an Ague to ſend it him; and accordingly he ſent him Mithridate ſpread upon the Clamorous made so deep Impressions, that his Innocence could never wear them out. And one of Buckingham's great Provocations was thought to be his Fear, that the King being now weary of his too much Greatness and Power, would set up Bristol, his deadly Enemy, against him, to pull him down. And this Medicine was one of those Thirteen Articles that after were laid to his Charge in Parliament, who may be misinformed, but seldom accuse any upon false Rumour, or bare Suggestion; and therefore it will be a hard Task for any Man to excuse the King his Successor for dissolving that Parliament, to preserve one that was accused by them for poisoning his Father.

A. Reg. 23. An. Christi 1625.

Lamb a Witch.

For Dr. Lamb, a Man of an Infamous Conversation, (having been arraigned for a Witch, and found guilty of it at Worcester; and arraigned for a Rape, and found guilty of it at the King's Bench-Bar at Westminster; yet escaped the Stroke of Justice for both, by his Favour in Court) was much employ'd by the Mother and the Son, which generally the People took notice of, and were so incens'd against Lamb, that finding him in the Streets in London in the Year 1628. they rose against him, and with Stones and Staves knock'd out his Brains, as may be more particularly related in its due time.

Butler a Mountebank.

And besides Lamb, there was one Butler, an Irishman, (which vaunted himself to be of the House of Ormond) who was a kind of Mountebank, which the Duke and his Mother much confided in. This Butler was first an Apprentice to a Cutler in London, and before his Time expired quitted his Master, having a running Head, and went to the Bermudaes, where he lived some time as a Servant in the Island; and walking by the Sea-side with another of his Companions, they found a great Mass of Ambergreece that the Seas Bounty had cast up to them, which they willingly conceal'd, meaning to make their best Markets of it. Butler being a subtle Snap, wrought so with his Companion, with Promises of a Share, that he got the Possession of it; and in the next Dutch Ship that arrived at the Bermudaes, he shipp'd himself and his Commodities for Amsterdam, where having sold his Bargain at a good Rate, and made his Credit with his Fellow-Venturer cheap enough, engrossing all to himself, he came into England, lived in a gallant and noble Equipage, kept a great and free Table at his Lodgings in the Strand, which were furnished suitable to his Mind, and had his Coach with Six Horses, and many Foot-men attending on him, with as much State and Grandure as if his Greatness had been real. But tho' his Means lasted not to support this long, yet it brought him into great Acquaintance; and being pragmatical in Tongue, and having an active Pate, he fell to some Distillations, and other odd extracting Practices, which kept him afloat; and some Men thought he had gotten the (long dream'd-after) Philosopher's Stone; but the best Recipe which he had to maintain his Greatness, after his Ambermoney fum'd and vapour'd away, was suspected to come from his Friends at Whitehall: And the Story of his Death (if it be true) is one great Evidence of some secret Machination betwixt the Duke and him, that the Duke was willing to be rid of him: For Mischief being an Ingrosser, is unsecure and unsatisfy'd, when their Wares are to be vented in many Shops. Therefore he was recommended upon some plausible Occasion by the Duke's Means (as Fame delivered it) to some Jesuites beyond the Seas; where he was entertained with a great deal of specious Ceremony and Respect in one of their Colleges or Cloysters; and at Night they attending him to his Chamber with much Civility, the Chamber being hanged with Tapistry, and Tapers burning in stretched-out Arms upon the Walls; and when they gave him the Good-night, they told him they would send one who should direct him to his Lodging; and they were now sooner out of this Room of Death, but the Floor, that hung upon great Hinges on one side, was let fall by Artificial Engines, and the poor Vermin Butler dropp'd into a Precipice, where he was never more heard of. That there are such secret Inquisition-Conveyances, of a horrid Nature, is obvious; and such close Contrivances may fly up and down upon the Wings of Rumour; but it is impossible to find out the Bottom of such black Pit-falls, but with as much Danger as those that find the bitter Effects of them. And this was reported to be the end of Butler.

The Description of King James.

But to conclude with our King, whom this do concern. He was born a King, and from that Heighth the less fitted to look into inferior Things; yet few escaped his Knowledge, being, as it were, a Magazine to retain them. His Stature was of the middle Size, rather tall than low, well set, and somewhat plump, of a ruddy Complection, his Hair of a light brown, in his full Perfection, had at last a Tincture of white. If he had any predominant Humour to ballance his Choler, it was sanguine, which made his Mirth witty. His Beard was scattering on his Chin, and very thin: And tho' his Clothes were seldom fashion'd to the Vulgar Garb, yet in the whole Man he was not uncomely. He was a King in Understanding, and was content to have his Subjects ignorant in many things: As in curing the King's-Evil, which he knew a Device, to aggrandize the Virtue of Kings, when Miracles were in fashion; but he let the World believe it, tho' he smil'd at it in his own Reason, finding the Strength of the Imagination a more powerful Agent in the Cure, than the Plaisters his Chirurgions prescrib'd for the Sore. It was a hard Question, Whether his Wisdom and Knowledge exceeded his Choler and Fear? Certainly the last Couple drew him with most Violence, because they were not Acquisitions, but Natural. If he had not had that Allay, his high touring and mastering Reason had been of a rare and sublim'd Excellency; but these Earthy Dregs kept it down, making his Passions extend him as far as Prophaneness, that I may not say Blasphemy, and Policy superintendent of all his Actions; which will not last long, (like the Violence of that Humour) for it often makes those that know well, to do ill, and not be able to prevent it.

He had pure Notions in Conception, but could bring few of them into Action, though they tended to his own Preservation: For this upon Leather, but knew not till then that it was design'd for the King. But, continues Eglisham, Sir Matthew Lister and I shewing him a Piece of the Plaister we had kept after it was taken off, he seem'd greatly surpris'd, and offer'd to take his Corporal Oath, That it was none of what he had given Baker; nor did he know what kind of Mixture it was.

But the Truth is, This Book of Eglisham's is wrote with such an Air of Rancour and Prejudice, that the manner of his Narrative takes off much from the Credit of what he Writes.

was

A. Reg. 23. An. Christi 1625. was one of his Apothegms, which he made no timely use of. Let that Prince, that would beware of Conspiracies, be rather jealous of such, whom his extraordinary Favours have advanced, than of those whom his Displeasure hath discontented. These want Means to execute their Pleasures, but they have Means at pleasure to execute their Desires. Ambition to Rule, is more vehement than Malice to Revenge. Though the last part of this Aphorism, he was thought to Practice too soon, where there was no cause for Prevention; and neglect too late, when Time was full ripe to produce the Effect.

Some Parallel'd him to Tiberius for Dissimulation, yet Peace was maintained by him as in the Time of Augustus: And Peace begot Plenty, and Plenty begot Ease and Wantonness, and Ease and Wantonness begot Poetry, and Poetry swelled to that Bulk in his time, that it begot strange Monstrous Satyrs against the King's own Person, that haunted both Court and Country, which express'd, would be too bitter to leave a sweet Perfume behind him. And though bitter Ingredients are good to Embalm and Preserve dead Bodies, yet these were such as might endanger to kill a living Name, if Malice be not brought in with an Antidote. A. Reg. 23. An. Christi 1625. And the Tongues of those Times more fluent than my Pen, made every little Miscarriage (being not able to discover their true Operations, like small Seeds hid in earthy Darkness) grow up, and spread into such exuberant Branches, that evil Report did often pearch upon them. So dangerous it is for Princes, by a remiss Comportment, to give Growth to the least Error; for it often proves as fruitful, as Malice can make it.

But, alas good King! here was an end of his Earthly Empire; and little did he imagine, that the last Period to Great Britain's Monarchy would not much exceed the Time of his own Reign, and in the true Extent come short of it.

Soli Deo Gloria.

THE CONCLUSION TO THE Discreet Reader.

Having now finished, (I will not say perfected) my little Work of this Great King, without Prejudice to his Person, or Envy to his Dignity, not having (for filthy Lucre Sake) any Man in Admiration, and willing to be less than the least in the Time's flatuous Opinion: I hope to free my self from that rigid censorious Humour, that foams in the Mouths of such whom the Venom of Passion hath corrupted, that I may clear the Way the better over the Precipices and prodigious Passages that will be found in the next King's Reign, which, to attempt, is a Daring unexpressible. For History seldom follows Truth so near the Heels, where a various and mixed Multitude may either pretend to, or really know more than one Man can well relate; and where Affection or Dislike to particular Men would willingly cover or sordidly lay open those Blemishes, which may besmear, if not quite deface, the living Character yet imprinted in their Memories. For though they that write near the Times are said to write partially, either for Fear or Friendship, yet they that write Truth, must either do it from private Knowledge, or publick Report; and who can know better than they that live near the Times? according to the French Proverb, Ce qu'on voit, est plus certain, que ce qu'on oit; and as Horat. saith, Oculis potius credendum quàm Auribus. The Waters are the purest at the Fountain; they mingle and gather Dross by running through divers troubled Channels. And as every thing in a clear Spring will be perspicuous, so the Soil of Falshood or Mistake (if any be cast into it) will be the more visible. But some may retort the Argument, and say, In troubled Fountains the Waters are not so pure as they will be when they are further from the Spring; that Time may settle them, and then Men will take up that which runs clearest. But, nimium altercando Veritas amittitur, Truth may be lost in a Croud. And as all things are not to be spoken, so some things are not to be concealed; for it derogates from the Glory of God to have his Justice obscured, his remarkable Dispensations smothered, as if we were angry with what the Divine Power hath done, who can debase the Spirits of Princes, and is mighty among the Kings of the Earth. And though the Priest's Lips should keep Knowledge, yet (as the Prophet saith) he can make them contemptible and base before all the People. And therefore why should we grudge and repine at God's Actions? for his Thoughts are not as our Thoughts, nor his Ways as our Ways. His Judgments should teach us Wisdom, and his glorious Proceedings should learn us Righteousness, that his Anger may be turned away from us. And let them that stand, take heed lest they fall. For though God rewarded Jehu with the Kingdom, for the good Service he did him; yet because he walked not with him, God visited the House of Jehu, and laid the Blood of Jezreel, which he was commanded to shed, upon the Head of his Posterity. But all the Arguments of Men and Angels will neither penetrate nor make Impression in some ill-composed Tempers, till they are softened with the Fire of Love; and that holy Flame is best kindled with Patience, by willingly submitting to the All-disposing Providence that orders every thing: Before whose Alter (waiting for the Season of Grace) I will ever bring the best Fruits of my Labours. But if that which I intend should not come to Perfection, (the Day of Man's Life being but as a Dawning, and his Time as a Span) I will never be displeased with my Master (in long and dangerous Labours) for calling me away to Rest before my Work is done.

FINIS.

AN

INDEX

To the SECOND VOLUME of the Compleat

History of ENGLAND.

A.

Abbot, Dr. George, made Archbishop of Canterbury, pag. 643. Founds an Hospital, and lays the first Stone, 651. Kills a Park-keeper by Mischance, 658. Acquitted of any Crime, ibid. Refuses to be concern'd in the Countess of Essex's obscene Trial and Divorce, 692. Writes Reasons against it, which are answer'd by King James, ibid. Desires Queen Anne to recommend Mr George Villiers to the King's Favour, 697. Forbids the reading the Book of Sports, 709. Retires upon his killing the Park-Keeper, 751. He is restor'd to his Palace, and makes the Widow's Fortune, ibid. His Letter to King James to dissuade him from tolerating Popery, which was one of the Articles of Marriage between the Prince of Wales and the Infanta, 768. Yet is a Witness to the Articles, ibid.

Abuses in the Roman Church, offer'd by the German Princes to the Pope to be redress'd, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55.

Admiralties of England and France, a Treaty concerning them, 32.

Adelphus, Duke of Holstein, comes into England to court Queen Elizabeth, 393. How he was receiv'd, ibid.

Alasco, John of, a Polish Lord, his Reception in England, and dishonourable departure, 491.

Albert, Cardinal and Archduke of Austria, made Governour of the Netherlands by the King of Spain, 591. Besieges and takes Calais, ibid. Marry'd to the Infanta of Spain, 610. Besieges Ostend, 641.

Albany, John Stuart Duke of, recall'd from France, and made Vice-Roy of Scotland, 26. Seizes the King's Person, 27. Invades England, but retires, 51. Goes to France to sollicite Succours, ibid. Escapes the English who waited to intercept him, and gets into Scotland, 57. He invades England, but to no purpose, ibid. Accompanies Francis I. into Italy, 62. Is detach'd to take Naples, ibid. He loses his Authority in Scotland by his Absence, 63. Convoys the Pope to Marseilles to meet Francis I. 169.

Alençon, Margaret Dutchess of, Sister to Francis I. visits him in Prison, 68. Treats with Charles V. for his Release, ibid. 60. Contrives his Escape, ibid. The Plot discover'd, ibid. Her Picture sent to Henry VIII. 59.

Alençon, Francis Duke of, propos'd to Queen Elizabeth for a Husband, 445. Desires to come to England, and the Queen's Answer, 447. Renews his Addresses to the Queen, 451. Taken into Custody by order of his Mother, ibid. Sides with the Protestants, 472. The Match again reviv'd, 455. See Anjou, Francis Duke of.

Allen, Dr. John, Archbishop of Dublin, murder'd by the Rebel Fitzgerald, 181.

Allen, a Popish Priest, stirs up Fitzmorris's Rebellion, 464. Found among the Irish Rebel Prisoners, 475. Sends Priests to debauch the English Soldiers, 54.. Made a Cardinal, 545. Sent into the Low Countries, to forward the Invasion of England, ibid.

Alost betrayed to the Spaniards by the English, 495.

Alva, Duke of, sent Governour to the Netherlands to extirpate the Protestant Religion, 415. Drives the Flemmings thence, and occasions the War there, 416. His Cruelty and Tyranny, ibid. Stops the English Effects, ibid. Enrag'd at the English, 417. Against invading England, and why, 441. Loses the Dominion of the Sea in the Low Countries by his Oversight, 443. Treats with the English, and why, 446. His Cruelty, 449. Is recall'd, ibid.

Alured, Mr. Imprison'd for writing against the Spanish Match, 654.

Ambassage, a numerous one from Francis I. to Henry VIII. 31. and from Henry VIII. to Francis I. 32.

Another from France to England, and England to France, to swear the Peace concluded between the two Nations, 70. Another, 83, 85. To Denmark, 610. From Muscovy to Russia, 629.

Ambassador, French, first objects against the Legitimacy of the Princess Mary, 81.

Ambassador from the King of Æthiopia to the Pope, 161. Suspected to be counterfeit, ibid.

Ambassador, Muscovite, his Presents to King James, 648.

Ambassador, whether he ought to reveal Treason against a Prince, 533.

Ambassadors, Spanish and French, dispute about Precedence at the Treaty of Vervins, 605.

Amboyna, the Cruelty there, 787.

Amiens surpriz'd by the Spaniards, 604. Re-taken by Henry VI. ibid.

Anabaptists severely dealt with in Germany, 97. Oppos'd by the Protestants, 177. Proclamation against them in England, 384. Two burnt by Henry VIII. 216.

Ancre, Marquis of, his Fortune and miserable End, 708.

Angoulesme, Duke of, third Son to Francis I. a Treaty of Marriage between him and the Lady Elizabeth, afterwards Queen, 179.

Angus, Earl of, his Escape at the Rout at Musselborough, 285.

Anhalt, Prince of, the King of Bohemia's General, hurts his Affairs by Faction, 722. His Cowardice at the Battle of Prague, 724. Revolts to the Emperor, 725.

Anjou, Henry Duke of, propos'd to Queen Elizabeth for a Husband, 410. A Treaty for it, 433. It cools, and why, 434. Chosen King of Poland, 447.

Anjou, Francis Duke of, invited to the Netherlands by the States, 460. His Match with Queen Elizabeth goes forward, 461, 463. The Treaty concluded, 484. Chosen Governour of the Netherlands, 485. Comes into England, ibid. Favourably receiv'd by the Queen, but not by the People, 486. Goes to the Netherlands, and leaves the States with Dishonour, 488. His Death, 501.

Annates paid to the Pope, put down by a Statute in Henry VIII's Reign 155. Occasions his first Breach with him, 156.

Anne of Cleves, promis'd to the Duke of Lorrain's Son, 221. She comes into England, is dislik'd by the King, but he marries her, 221, 222. The Affair of her Divorce, 223, 224.

Anne of Denmark marry'd to King James in Norway, 557. Her Death, 661 [Out of Willson] Her Court and Favourite, 685. Heads a Faction against Car, and why, 697. Her Answer to Archbishop Abbot about recommending Mr. George Villiers to the King, ibid. Believ'd her belov'd Son Prince Henry was poison'd, and why, 714. Her Death and Character, 719.

Anniversary, Queen Elizabeth's, of her Reign first celebrated, 430.

Anspach, Marquis of, General in the Palatinate against Spinola, his Backwardness to a Battel, 723.

Antonio, Don, King of Portugal flies to Queen Elizabeth for Protection, 484.

Antwerp sack'd by the Spaniards, 455.

Apparel, Excess of, restrain'd, 452, 475.

Aquinas, Thomas, his Writings mightily admir'd by King Henry VIII. 38.

Arden, Mr. of Warwickshire, a Papist, hang'd for Treason, 495.

Argyle, Earl of, his Protestation concerning the Murder of the Lord Henry Darly, Husband to Mary Queen of Scots, 424. Routed by the Popish Lords in Scotland, 576.

Armada, the Invincible one, set out against England, 542. Its Strength, 545. Destroy'd by the English, 546, 547, 548.

Arminianism spreads in Cambridge, 648. When it was first broach'd, 715. See Remonstrants.

Arminius, his Death and Disciples, 715.

Arabella Stuart, Lady, ill treated by James VI. King of Scots, 461. A Plot to set her up against him in England, 663. Marries Sir William Seymour, 702. Imprison'd for it, 703. Her Death, ibid.

Arran, James Earl, deposes Cardinal Beton from the Regency, and treats of a Marriage between Mary Queen of Scots and Prince Edward, Son to Henry VIII. 234. King Henry offers him his Daughter Elizabeth to effect it, ibid. Depos'd by Beton, 251.

Arran, James Earl of, Son to James Hamilton Duke of Castleherault, recommended by the Scots Protestants to Queen Elizabeth, to be her Husband, 382.

Arrol, Earl of, rebels against King James VI. of Scotland, 571.

Articles, the six of Faith and Worship, publish'd by Henry VIII. 202. Establish'd by Act of Parliament, 218. Censures on them, 219. The German Protestants promise to answer them, 220.

Arundel, Fitzallen Earl of, fin'd by the Earl of Warwick's Means in Edward VI's Reign, 309. His Charge against him when Duke of Northumberland, 331. Turns the Lady Jane's Council for Q. Mary, 332. He arrests Northumberland, ibid.

Arundel, Henry Earl of, hopes to marry Q. Elizabeth, 383. Travels, 399. His Death, 4..

Arundel, Philip Howard Earl of, writes to Queen Elizabeth as he was about to fly out of England, 503. Taken and imprison'd, 504. Fin'd, 512. Try'd by his Peers, 551, 552. His Charge, 552. And Defence, 552, 553. He is condemn'd, but is spar'd, 553. Dies in the Tower, 587.

Arundel, Thomas Earl of, turns Protestant, 646. Affronts the Lord Spencer in the House of Lords, and is sent to the Tower, 737. His Submission, ibid.

Arundel, Sir Thomas, beheaded for the Duke of Somerset's pretended Plot, 325.

Arundel Humphry, Head of the Devonshire Rebels against Edward VI. 295. The Demands of him and his Followers, 292. The Answer to them, ibid. They besiege Exeter, 294. Are routed, ibid. Again, 295. Endeavour to rise again, but cannot, ibid.

Ascham, Mr. Roger, his Death, Character, and Writings, 416.

Ask, Robert of Yorkshire, his Rebellion against Henry VIII. 205. His State and Numbers, 206. His Followers demand Hostages for him on a Treaty, 207. King Henry's Answer, ibid. Comes to Court, is well receiv'd, and dismiss'd, 211. Hang'd, 212.

Askew Mrs. Anne, a Protestant, defends her self with Arguments out of Scripture against her Persecutors, 262. Burnt in the Reign of Henry VIII. ibid.

Association, a general, in defence of Queen Elizabeth's Person against all her Enemies, 499. Confirm'd by Act of Parliament, 503.

Atabaliva Emperor of Peru, his Conference with a Monk about the Christian Religion, 70, 71.

Aubespine, Monsieur de l', the French Ambassador, his Reasons for saving Mary Queen of Scots, 531. Answer'd at large, 531, 532. He plots Queen Elizabeth's Death, ibid. Charg'd with it, ibid. His weak Defence, 533. Reprimanded by the Lord Burleigh, ibid.

Audley Thomas, Esq; chosen Speaker of the House of Commons, 136. Made Lord Keeper, 162.

Austria, Don John of, made Governor of the Netherlands, 456. Signs the perpetual Edict, 458. His Design to marry the Scots Queen, and invade England, ibid. His Dissimulation and Treachery, ibid. Gains the Battle of Gemblours, 460. His Death and Character, 461.

B.

B*Abington, Anthony*, conspires to kill Queen Elizabeth, 515. A large Account of his Conspiracy, 515, 516. 'Tis discover'd, and himself taken, 517. His Behaviour at the Gallows, 518.

Bacon, Sir Nicholas, made Lord Keeper by Queen Elizabeth, 369. His Politicks accus'd and justify'd, 372. Judge of the Dispute between Protestants and Papists, ibid. Accus'd as being against the Scots Succession, 395. His Speech to the Queen in behalf of the Lords to marry, 399. A noble Saying of his in honour of his Queen, 431. Libel'd by the Papists, 446. His Death and Character, 464.

Bacon, Sir Francis, sworn of the Privy Council, 646. Made Lord Keeper, 647. His pompous Procession to Westminster, ibid. Lord Chancellor, 648. Lord Verulam, 649. Complaints against him, 651. Made Viscount St. Albans, thanks the King for seven Royal Favours, 656. Convicted of Bribery; pretends he is weary of his Place, and resigns it loaden with Calumnies, 657. He writes to the Lords, ibid. Fin'd 40000*l.* and other Punishments, ibid. Imprison'd, ibid. Zealous for a Union with Scotland, 676. His Speech against Car's Friends in the Star-Chamber, 700. Ungrateful to his Patron the Earl of Essex, 734. Reflections on his and his Wife's Conduct ibid. His Petition to the Lords, 734, 735. He loses his Peerage, ibid. His extreme Poverty, 735. His Description and Character, 736.

Bagnall, Sir Henry, quarrels with the Earl of Tyrone, 574. Accuses him to the Lord Deputy, 581. Drives Macguire from before Monaghan, ibid. Intercepts and suppresses the Earl of Tyrone's Letters, wherein he promis'd to submit, 587. Complain'd of by Tyrone, 588.

[illegible] Sir [illegible], his Bravery at the taking of Calais, [illegible]

[illegible] a Popish Priest, one of the Conspirators to assassinate Queen Elizabeth, 5[illegible] [illegible] dies penitent, 518.

Balmerino, Lord, his Case about the Letter written by King James to the Pope, laid to his Charge, 666.

Baltinglas, Lord, flies out of Ireland, 495. His Letter to the Earl of Ormond, ibid.

Bambridge, Christopher, Archbishop of York, sent by Henry VIII. to reside at Rome, 6. He serves the Pope with his Master, and is made a Cardinal, 7. Suppos'd to be poison'd, 23.

Bancroft, Dr. Richard, made Archbishop of Canterbury, 642. His severe Character in opposition to Archbishop Whitgift's Sweetness and Moderation, 665. His Death, 685. A Satyrical Distich upon him, ibid. His Example imitated by Archbishop Laud, ibid.

Barbarossa the Pirate makes himself King of Algiers, and dying, leaves the Kingdom to his Brother, 33. Who does great Mischief at Sea, 135. He is too hard for Andrew Doria, 139. His vast Preparations against Italy, 179. Makes himself King of Tunis, 180. Puts Charles V's Spy to death, ibid. Driven out of Tunis by Charles V. ibid. Defeats Andrew Doria, 215. Takes Nizza by the Assistance of the French, 240. His great Age and Death, 249.

Barbary Company establish'd, 510.

Barnevelt, his Advice to Henry IV. against a Peace with Spain, 604. Beheaded in Holland, 661. A main Support of the Arminian Heresy, 715. Heads the Remonstrants against the Prince of Orange, 718. He is seiz'd and put to death, ibid. His Imployments, ibid.

Baronets, when first made, 695.

Barrow, Henry, the great Sectary executes in Queen Elizabeth's Reign, 570.

Bartholomew's Hospital founded by Henry VIII. 266. The Foundation confirm'd and enlarg'd by Edward VI. 324.

Barton, Elizabeth, vide Nun of Kent.

Basilides, John, Emperor of Muscovy, sends an Ambassy to Queen Elizabeth, 408. His Tyranny and Fear of his Subjects, ibid. Grants the English several Privileges, 417. Sends another Ambassy 418. Desires a Wife out of England, 492. His Death, ibid.

Baskervile, Sir Thomas, General in an Expedition against the Spanish in the West-Indies, 584. His Success, ibid. 585. Sent to Picardy with 2000 Men, 595. His Death, 602.

Bassano, Alphonso, the Spanish Admiral, attacks Lord Thomas Howard at the Azores, 565.

Bath and Wells, Dr. John Clerk Bishop of, his Advice about the Divorce, and Henry VIII's Reply, 99.

Battle of Ravenna, 11. Of Spurrs, 16. Of Hoddenfield, 18. Of Pavia, 63, 64. Of Scrifeles, 244. Of Musselborough, 285. Of St. Quentin, 355. Of Dreux, 391. Of Gemblours, 460. Of Tournhault, 597. Of Fleury, 760.

Bavaria, Duke of, has the Prince Palatine's Electorate bestow'd on him, 761. Reasons for and against it at the Diet of Ratisbon, 761, 762.

Beaumont, John, Master of the Rolls, his Corruption and Punishment, 319.

Becket, Thomas, his Bones burnt, 215. A short History of him, ibid.

Bedford, Francis Russel Earl of, sent to attend at the Christning of James VI. King of Scotland, 401. His Negotiation there, ibid.

Bele, Dr. a Preacher, raises a Tumult in London, 28.

Bellarmine, Cardinal, charges King James with Inconstancy towards the Pope, 666.

Bellingham, Sir Edward, his Successes in Ireland, 291.

Benevolence, one rais'd by Henry VIII. 249. Requir'd by King James, 696. Reasons against it, ibid.

Berghenopzoom besieg'd in vain by Spinola, 759.

Bertie, Peregrine Lord Willoughby, his Ambassy with Garter to the King of Denmark, 488. Does not succeed, ibid. Made General of the English Forces in the Service of the States of Holland, 541. Sent to the Assistance of Henry IV. against the Guisards, 556.

Beton, Cardinal, forges a Will of James V to appoint him Regent during the Minority of Mary the Scots Queen. 234. Depos'd by the Earl of Arran, ibid. Rules all again by means of a French Faction, 235. Persecutes the Protestants, 263. Is kill'd at St. Andrews, ibid.

Beza, Theodore, his Admonition and Prophecy to Charles IX. 446.

Bible translated and burnt, 152. The Consequences of having the Bible in the vulgar Tongue, ibid. Henry VIII. publishes a Translation of it, 213. Not to be translated, so decreed by the Council of Trent, 259. [illegible] den to be translated by Henry VIII. [illegible]

Biez, Marescal, defeated by the Earl of Hertford, 250.

Bigot, Sir Francis, rebels against Henry VIII. Taken and executed, 211.

Bilney, Thomas, and others, their Martyrdom in the Reign of Henry VIII. 155.

Bingham, Sir Richard, sent against Tirlogh, 613. His Death, ibid.

Bird, the Bully, kill'd by Sir Thomas Colvin, whom he had provok'd to fight him, 737.

Biron, Marshal, his Conference with Queen Elizabeth, 642. Beheaded in France, 649.

Bishop, John, a Papist writes against the Pope's power of deposing Princes, 487.

Bishopricks, six new ones erected, 217.

Bishops, sign a Declaration against the Pope's Supremacy, 182. Against General Councils, 203. Several imprison'd for opposing Edward VI's Reformation, 289. Several turn'd out by Queen Mary, and several restor'd, 333. Thirteen die in a Year, 358. Queen Mary's, their Cruelty, 368. They oppose the Reformation, 372. The Names of those depriv'd by Queen Elizabeth, 376. And of those made in their room, 377. Laws concerning their Installment, 401. Their Indiscretion increases the number of the first Dissenters, 410. A Bill brought into the House of Commons against them, rejected by Q. Elizabeth, 503. Three Scots ones consecrated at London, 643. Apply early to K. James, 662. They distil into K. James the Maxim of, No Bishop, no King, 665. Have a Conference with the Puritans at Hampton-Court, ibid. Severe to them after their Victory, ibid. Hinder their going to New-England, 694.

Blunt, Sir Christopher, his Trial, 638.

Bodley, Sir Thomas, recommended by the Earl of Essex to be Secretary of State, 594. Sir Robert Cecil prefer'd, ibid. Founds the Bodleian Library, 610.

Body, Mr. stab'd by a Popish Priest in Cornwal for pulling down Images, 291.

Boetius, his Treatise of the Consolation of Philosophy translated by Q. Elizabeth, 573.

Bohemia, the Rise of the Troubles there, 760.

Boleyn, Mrs. Anne, waits on Mary the French Queen to France, 21. Stays there behind her, 33. She returns to England, 46. The King enamour'd with her, 106. Banishes her the Court to prevent Suspicion, ibid. Recalls her immediately, ibid. Hates Cardinal Wolsey, 121. Her Descent and Fortune before the King marry'd her, 122. She forwards Wolsey's Disgrace, 123. Created Marchioness of Pembroke, and accompanies Henry VIII. in his second Interview with Francis I. 160. Her Marriage with Henry VIII. encourag'd by the French King, ibid. She is mary'd to him, 161. The Crown settled upon her Issue by the King, 174. Her Troubles, 193. Her Letter to the King, 194. Her Death and Character, 195. Her Descent and Fortune, by Mr. Camden, 363, 364, 365.

Bonner, Edmund, carries Henry VIII's Appeal to a General Council to the Pope, 170. Writes for his Supremacy, 182. Committed to the Fleet, and why, 289. His Appeal to Q. Mary's Commissioners to be restor'd, 333. His Butchery, 350.

Boris, Theodorides, Emperor of Russia, kind to the English, 550.

Bothwel, Earl of, submits to the English, 286. His lewd Character, 403. Murders the Lord Henry Darly, and marries his Wife Mary Queen of Scots, ibid. 404. He flies, ibid. Imprison'd, and why, 557. Attempts to seize King James's Person, 567. And again, ibid. Hides in England, 571. Demanded by King James, and abandon'd by Queen Elizabeth, ibid. Throws himself at the King's Feet, ibid. His Party prevail, ibid. Rebels, and publishes a Manifesto, 575. A Proclamation against him in England, 576.

Boulogne, the Siege of, by Henry VIII. 245. Taken, 246. The French attempt to surprize it, but are repuls'd, 248. Other fruitless Attempts upon it, 249, 250, 254. By Monsieur Chastillion, 292. By the French King, 300. Deliver'd up by a Treaty for a Sum, 313.

Bouillon, Robert de la Mark Duke of, defies the Emperor Charles V. 42.

Bourbon, Charles Cardinal of, proclaim'd King of France, in opposition to the King of Navarre, 556.

Bowes

Bourbon, Charles, Duke of, defends Milan for Francis I. against Maximilian the Emperor, 25. An Account of his Defection to the Emperor, and for what Reasons, 58. He beats the French, 59. Owns Henry VIII. to be King of France, 61. Invades France, but without Success, ibid. 62. He waits upon Francis I. taken Prisoner at the Battle of Pavia, and how he was receiv'd by him, 64. The Emperor requires that he should be made King of Provence, 65. Francis I. offers him his Daughter in Marriage, 66. The Dutchess of Alençon, his Sister willing to marry him, 68. Made Duke of Milan, 69. What was done for him at the Treaty of Madrid, 73. Besieges Rome, and is kill'd, 82. His Heirs restor'd by the Treaty of Cambray, 133.

Bourks, their Rebellion in Ireland, 506. Suppress, 507.

Bourn, a Popish Priest, lik'd to be kill'd by the People, 334. Sav'd by Bradford and Rogers, both afterwards burnt, ibid.

Bowes, Sir Robert, sent Ambassador to James VI. of Scotland, 482. Returns without Audience, ibid.

Bowes, Sir Jerom, his Ambassy to J. Basilides Emperor of Russia, and the Rarities he brought home, 493.

Boyer, Mayor of Bodmin, hang'd on a Gallows he had provided for another, 291.

Brandon, Charles, courts Wolsey to keep in favour with Henry VIII. 15. Accompanies the King to Picardy, ibid. Made Lord Lisle, and propos'd to the Princess Margaret, Sister to the Emperor Maximilian, for a Husband, 17. Vide Duke of Suffolk.

Breda besieg'd by Spinola, 787.

Breton, Andrew, a Scotch Pyrate infests the British Seas, 7. Kill'd in fight by the English, ibid.

Brill, the first Port Town seiz'd by the Netherlanders, 443.

Bristol, John Digby made Earl of, 737. Indeavours to prevent the Prince of Wales to Popery, 765. Sent to the Tower, 784.

Bristol erected into a Bishoprick by Henry VIII. 218.

Bromley, Sir Thomas, made Lord Chancellor, 464. His Behaviour at the Scots Queen's Trial, 521, 522. His Death, 542.

Brook, Robert, Esq; chosen Speaker of Queen Mary's second Parliament, 344.

Brown, Robert, broaches the Schism of the Brownists, 494.

Brunswick, Duke of, desires the Lady Mary in Marriage, 313. Raises an Army, 371.

Buchanan, his Notions of the Liberty of the Scots Nation, 415. A Character of himself and his Book call'd the Detection, 424. Highly favour'd by the Regent Murray, 425. His Saying of his Climate, Country, and Age, 489. His Learning and Genius, ibid. His History forbidden by James VI. 500.

Buckingham, Edward Stafford Duke of, repines at the Charge he was forc'd to be at for the Interview between Henry VIII. and Francis I. 35. His spendid Appearance, ibid. Turns out Charles Knevet his Steward for exacting upon his Tenants, ibid. Hated by Cardinal Wolsey, and why, 40. Accus'd of Treason by Knevet, 41. The Articles against him, ibid. His Title to the Crown if Henry VIII. had no Issue, ibid. His Confession to the Constable of the Tower, ibid. His Trial, Condemnation, last Speech and Execution, ibid. The last High Constable of England, 42.

Buckingham, George Villers Marquiss of, rules all in K. James I's Reign, 727. His Family advanc'd and swarm at Court, ibid. K. James's Care to provide for them, ibid. Rul'd by his Mother, ibid. His Amours, 728. Commended by K. James in Parliament for his readiness to serve the Members, 730. Corresponds with Cardinals Ludovisio and Barberino, 754. His profane Mirth to divert K. James, 760. Reprov'd by the King, ibid. Goes with the Prince to Spain, 763. Has private Audience of the King of Spain at Madrid, 764. Made Duke, 765. He and Olivarez quarrel, 774. Returns to England with the Prince, 776. Relation to the Parliament, 779. Highly esteem'd, 780. Accus'd of Treason by the Spanish Ambassador, 782.

Buildings magnificent in England, 458. Restrain'd in and about London, 570. And in London by a Proclamation of K. James, 681.

Bull, the Pope's, for granting to Henry VIII. the Title of Defender of the Faith, 38, 39. Pius V. against Queen Elizabeth, 429.

Buonvisi, the Pope's Agent, betrays Henry VIII's Councils to the French King, 8.

Burchet, Peter, an Enthusiast, his desperate Actions, 459. He is hang'd, ibid.

Buren, Count de, defeats the Mareschal d'Annebault, 210.

Burges, Mr. his Sermon against Ceremonies before K. James, 667. Silenc'd for it, and turns Physician, ibid. Makes an excellent Physician, and is restor'd to the Ministry, ibid. Accompanies Sir Horatio Vere to the Palatinate, 723.

Burgh, William, an Irishman, made a Baron by Q. Elizabeth, and dies of Joy, 471.

Burgundy, Charles V's King at Arms, carries his Reply to Francis I's Challenge, 93. His Audience, 94, 95.

Burleigh, William Cecill Lord, his Answer to the Bp. of Ross's Plea as an Ambassador, 435. A Design to massacre him at Paris, 444. Made Lord Treasurer, 445. Libel'd by the Papists, 446. His Speech to the Scots Ambassador sent to excuse his Mistress's refusing Audience to Sir Robert Bowes, 482. His Behaviour at the Scots Queen's Trial, 521, to 525. Sent to give her notice of the Sentence against her, 528. Examines and reprimands the Fr. Ambassador for plotting Q. Elizabeth's Death, 533. Puts the Queen on demanding of the Hollanders the Mony she had been out for 'em, 585. For a Peace with Spain, 608. His saying of the Ld Essex who oppos'd it, ibid. His Death and Character, 609. His Issue, 610.

Burroughs, Thomas Lord, made Deputy of Ireland, 602. Takes Black Water Fort from Tyrone, 603.

Burroughs, Sir John, kills Sir William Drury in a Duel, and why, 557. Takes a rich Prize from the Spaniards, 569.

Butler, Edmund, and Peter, rebel in Ireland against Q. Elizabeth, 423.

Butler, James, and Peter, rebel in Ireland, 590. James's Head is cut off, and Peter hanged, 591.

C.

CAIUS, Dr. his Fortune, Charity, Death and Character, 450.

Calais taken by the Duke of Guise, 356. Q. Elizabeth's Negotiations to recover it, 373. Gave up to the French, 374. Demanded by Q. Elizabeth, 406. Besieg'd by the Archduke Albert 591. And taken ibid.

Calis taken by the Earl of Essex, 592, 593.

Calvert, George, made Secretary of State by K. James I. 651. An Hispanioliz'd Papist, 749. Sets K. James against the Protestants, 740.

Cambden, William, his Preface to His History of Q. Elizabeth, 361.

Cambridge, University of, scruple to decide the Question of the Divorce, 153. Prostitute their Degrees to illiterate Persons when K. James visited them, 643.

Campegio, Cardinal, his poor Attendance and publick Entry as Legate at London, 32. His Commission jointly with Wolsey to hear the Cause of the Divorce, 101, 107. He arrives in England, and has Audience of the King and Queen, 123. Has a Bull for the Divorce, but will not part with it, 106. Shews it the King, ibid. He prorogues the Conclusion of the Business of the Divorce abruptly, 118. His Coffers search'd at the Custom-house, 123. His Complaints to the King, and the King's Answer, ibid. He's the Pope's Legate at the Diet of Ausburg, 149.

Campian, Edward, the Jesuit, comes into England, 477. Put to the Rack, ibid. Hang'd, 487.

Cannon, Brass, first cast in England, 188.

Car, Thomas, of Fernihurst, ravages the Borders of England, 425. His Castles destroy'd by the English, 426. Charg'd with the Murders of Sir Francis Russel, 505. His Death and Character, ibid.

Car, Robert, made Viscount Rochester, and Knight of the Garter, 643. Earl of Somerset and Lord Chamberlain, ibid. Question'd for the Murder of Sir Tho. Overbury, 644. Turn'd out of his Places and committed, ibid. He and his Wife indicted of Felony, 645. His Wife condemn'd to be hang'd, ibid. Himself convicted of Felony, ibid. Releas'd from a tedious Imprisonment, 658. His Rise and Favour occasion'd by an Accident 686. Rivals the Prince in an Amour and is hated by him, 686. Countess of Essex in love with him, ibid. His adulterous Commerce with her, 688. Rules all 691. Betray's his Friend Sir Tho. Overbury to K. James, 691. Desires the Countess of Essex in Marriage, 692. Is marry'd in great Pomp, 693. Sends Poison to Sir T. Overbury, 694. His Devices to raise Mony, 695. Made Lord Chamberlain, 696. The Queen heads a Faction against him, 697. Declines in the King's Favour, 698. Deserted by him as soon as he was accus'd of Sir Tho. Overbury's Death, ibid. Condemn'd for it, 699. Writes to K. James for a fuller Pardon than he had granted him, ibid. Threatens to discover an important Secret else, ibid. His long Life and Character, ibid. 700.

Cardan's Saying of Edward VI. 326.

Cardinalships, twenty, sold by the Pope.

Carew, Sir Peter, rises in Arms against Q. Mary about the Spanish Match, 340. Flies, ibid. Is taken, but not beheaded, ibid.

Carlisle, Christopher, his Bravery, Death and Character, 574.

Carne, Sir Edward, lays down the Character of Q. Elizabeth's Ambassador at the Pope's Command, 373. his Death, 388.

Carthagena taken by Sir Francis Drake, 509.

Cassalis, Sir George, Henry VIII's Agent at Rome for the Divorce, 141. His Letter to him about a Bull offer'd by the Pope for two Wives, ibid. Paul III's Discourse with him about reconciling King Henry to the Papacy, 196.

Casimir, John, Prince Palatine, his Reception in England by Q. Elizabeth, 463.

Castile, Constable of, his saying to Charles V. threatning to have him thrown over a Gallery, 216.

Castle Herault Hamilton, Duke of, joins with the Protestants in Scotland, 579. Turn'd out of his Dukedom, 393. Demands the Regency, 415. Imprison'd by the Regent Murray, 418. Forc'd to fly from the Confederate Lords and the English, 426. He and the Lords of his Party send an Embassy to the Duke of Alva for Aid, ibid. His Death and Character, 454.

Catena, Hieron. his Account of the Pope's and Spaniards Design against Q. Elizabeth, 441, 442.

Catesby, Robert, the chief Contriver of the Gun-powder Plot 674. Kill'd as he was about to be seiz'd, 675.

Cathay, a Passage thither sought, and with what probability, 456.

Catholick King, when he of Spain was first so stil'd, 26.

Cavendish, Captain Thomas, of Suffolk, his Voyage round the World, 540. To the Straits of Magellan, 566. His Death, ibid.

Cecil, Sir William, made Secretary of State, 320. His Evidence against the Duke of Somerset, ibid. A Privy Counsellor to Q. Elizabeth, 369. Defam'd by Libels, 399. A Plot against him, 417. His Conduct as to the Case of the March between Mary Queen of Scots and the Duke of Norfolk, 420. Perswades the Duke to marry some other Woman, 419. Sent to treat with the Scots Queen, ibid. Made Lord Burleigh, 431. His Patent, ibid. See Burleigh.

Cecil, Sir Robert, his Son made Secretary of State, 594. The Earl of Essex displeas'd at it, ibid. Master of the Wards, 599. His Conference with Henry IV. about a Peace with Spain, 604. With his Council, 605. Proclaims K. James, 661. His Cunningness to deceive Q. Elizabeth's discovering his Correspondence with him, 662. His Hatred to Raleigh, 663. Made Earl of Salisbury, 664. Vide Earl of Salisbury.

Ceremonies, a Sermon against them, 667.

Cetona, Marquiss of, a Spy in England from the Duke of Alva, 421.

Challenges refus'd by great Generals, 283.

Challenges from the French King to the Emperor, and the Emperor to the French King, 92, 93.

Challoner, Sir Thomas, Ambassador in Spain, his Spirit, 328. His Death and Character, 399.

Chamberlain, Sir Thomas, Ambassador in Spain his Servant put into the Inquisition, 384.

Chancellor, Richard, first discovers a Passage into Muscovy, 354. Cast away, ibid. vid. 400.

Chaplains, K. Edward's, sent to preach all over the Kingdom in several Circuits, 327.

Chappel, Henry VII's finish'd, its Cost, 2.

Chaumont, the French General, besieges Pope Julius in Bononia, 2.

Charles, Grandson of Maximilian the Emperor, visits K. Henry at Tournay, 17. A Proposal of a Marriage between him and the Princess Mary K. Henry's Sister, ibid. He is design'd for Ann Daughter to Ladislaus King of Hungary, 19. Succeeds Ferdinand King of Spain in that Kingdom, 26. Enters into a League with Henry VIII. ibid. Refuses to confirm it, 28. His Voyage to Spain, and Transactions there, 33. Contracted to Louise of France by the Treaty of Noyon, 31, 33. Is chosen Emperor by the name of Charles V. Emperor of Germany, 33. Gains Cardinal Wolsey by Mony and Promises to his Interest, 34. He comes to Dover, and thence passes to Flanders, 35, 36. The State of his Affairs with respect to France, ibid. Has an Interview with Henry VIII. at Gravelin, 37. Calls a Diet at Worms against Luther, 38. His War with Francis I. and the Cause of it, 41. Refers the Difference between them to Cardinal Wolsey, 43. Comes to England, 47. Install'd Knight of the Garter at Windsor, where he concludes a Treaty of Peace and Marriage with the Princess Mary, ibid. Convoy'd to Spain by the Earl of Surry, 50. Requires the Princess Mary to be deliver'd to him, 63. How he receiv'd the News of his Victory at Pavia, and the French King's being taken Prisoner, 64. He begins to grow cold towards Henry VIII. 65. His Proposals for a general Peace to Francis I. ibid. Treats of a Marriage with Donna Isabella of Portugal, ibid. His Answer to the French King's Proposals, ibid. He visits Francis I. during his Imprisonment, 68. He marries the Infanta of Portugal, 70. He consults with his Council about the Delivery of Francis, and afterwards concludes a Treaty with him, 71 to 74. Visits him in a very friendly manner, ib. His Answer to Francis I's Message, 77. His Reflection on the Confederates that had form'd a League against him, ibid. His Answer to Francis I. second Message, 78. To his Apology, 79. To the Pope's Letter, ibid. Sollicites the Cardinals to call a Council without the Pope, ibid. His Apology for taking the Pope Prisoner written to Henry VIII. 82. His Answer to the King's Demands, 83, 86. Makes Overtures of Peace, and applies to the Cardinal without effect, 85. Gives the Pope his Liberty, 86. His Dissimulation about the Pope's Confinement, 87. His Answer to Francis I. Defiance, ibid. And to Henry VIII. 88, 89. His Answer to the French King's Challenge, 92, 93, 94. His Behaviour in this, more gallant than the French King's, 95. Grants Liberty of Conscience to the Reformed, 97. Engages to assist his Aunt Queen Catherine to the utmost against the Divorce, 102. He sends to the King about it, 104. Treats with the Earl of Desmond, 105. Leagues with the Pope, 129. He goes to Italy, his magnificent Entry into several Cities, 131. He pardons Sforza, and restores him to his Dutchy, 136. He meets the Pope and is crown'd at Rome, ibid. He deprives Florence of its Liberty, and sets up a Duke there, 139. He goes to Germany, ibid. His Speech to the Diet of Ausburg, 149. Desires a General Council, ibid. Publishes a severe Decree against the Protestants 150. Disputes himself, ibid. His League with the Protestant Princes, 159. Has an Interview with the Pope about a Council and Queen Catherine, 161. His Answer to the English Ambassador's Notification of the Divorce, 166. His Reasons for a General Council, ibid. Treats with the Scots King, ibid. Remonstrances between him and Francis I. 154, 167. Is appointed to execute the Pope's Sentence against the King, 175. Aspires to the Universal Monarchy, ibid. His Designs upon Africa, 180. Takes Tunis, ibid. Proposes a Peace to Henry VIII. 188, 197. Offers Milan to Francis I's third Son, on what Terms, 197, 198. Challenges him, ibid. Invades France, but to no purpose, 199. Declar'd a Rebel and Felon by Francis I. 209. Has an Interview with him, 215. Deny'd Money by the Cortes, 216. Affronted by the Grandees of Spain, 217. Passes thro' France to Flanders, 220. His Reception by Francis I. ibid. His unfortunate Expedition to Algier, 210. Francis I. invades his Dominions, he complains to the Pope, 231. The Pope's Answer, and Charles's Reply of the French King's breach of Treaties, 232. His Treaty with Henry VIII. 236, 237. His Straits, 239. His an Interview with the Pope, who quarrels with him [illegible] League with Henry VIII. ibid. His Agreement with the Protestants offends the Pope, 244. Makes an abrupt Peace with the French, 246. His Designs against the Protestants, 258. Prepares for War against them, 260. Threatens to throw the Cardinal of St. Cross into the Adige if he dissolv'd the Council of Trent, 261. Too hard for the Protestants, 262. Differs with the Pope, ibid. Requires that the Lady Mary may have Mass said in her House, but is refus'd by K. Edward VI. 313, 315. Demands Aid of Edward VI. against France, 320. Is answer'd with an Offer of it against the Turks, 322. How he prevented Cardinal Pool's marrying the Lady Mary, 346. Resigns the Empire, 353. His Death, 358.

Charles, Archduke of Austria, a Suitor to Q. Elizabeth, 382. Her Answer, 383. Propos'd to her again, 398. The Earl of Sussex sent to treat of the Match, 407, 408. The Archduke weary of being put off, marries another, ibid.

Charles IX. the French King, concludes a Peace with Queen Elizabeth, 394. Intercedes but in vain for the Scots Queen's Liberty when imprison'd by the Scots, 406. His Answer to Q. Elizabeth's Demand of Calais, ibid. Marries the Emperor's Daughter, 433. Why he favour'd the Scots Queen, 442. His Affection to her abates, ibid. Concludes a Treaty with Queen Elizabeth, 443. He orders the Protestants to be massacred, 444. Owns it, 446. His miserable Death, ibid.

Charnock, John, one of the Conspirators to assassinate Queen Elizabeth, 516. Takes their Oath readily, ibid.

Chastillon, Cardinal Odet de, retires into England, 426.

Chastillon, Monsieur, attempts to surprize Rallaigh, how prevented, 292.

Cheek, Sir John, writes a Book to convince Ket's Rebels of their Errors, 299. Taken in Flanders in Q. Mary's Reign, 340. Renounces his Religion, ib.

Cheek, Sir Hatton, his Duel with Sir Thomas Dutton, and Death, 683, 684.

Chester erected into a Bishoprick by Hen. VIII 218.

Christiern, King of Denmark, driven out of his Territories for Tyranny, 57. Comes into England, ibid. The Danes refuse to accept of him again, or to admit his Son to reign over them, 68. Inclines to the Reform'd Religion, 96.

Christiern II King of Denmark, comes into England, 642, 676.

Church-men, covetous, Laws against them, 436.

Cicily, Sister to the King of Sweden, comes to England to visit Q. Elizabeth, 398.

Clanricard, Mack-William, an Irishman, made Earl of, by Henry VIII. 238.

Clanricard, Earl of, his Sons rebel, 445. And are supprest, ibid. His Son stir again, are supprest, and himself imprison'd, 457.

Clarenceux, King at Arms, his Speech to Charles V. when he defy'd him in the name of Henry VIII, 88. Wolsey's Treachery to him, 90.

Clement, James, a Monk, stabs Henry III. of France, 556.

Clergy of England refuse to give the Pope a Supply, 24. The Abuses among them first redrest by the House of Commons, 137, 150. Fall into a Premunire and buy their Pardon of Henry VIII. 150. They give the King the Title of Supreme Head of the Church, &c. ibid. Injunctions laid on them by Henry VIII. 204.

Clergy, Scots, fly from James VI. into England, 500. Not favour'd by Q. Elizabeth for their Insolence and Innovations, ibid. Summon a Convention without his Authority, 571.

Cleyberd, his Insurrection against Q. Mary, 353, 354. Hang'd at Bury, ibid.

Clifford, Sir Nicholas, made Knight of the Order of St. Michael by Henry IV. 579. Oblig'd to resign the Ensigns of it by Q. Elizabeth, ibid.

Clifton, Lord, imprison'd for Words against the Lord Keeper, 648. Kills himself, 650.

Clinton, Lord, takes and burns Conquet, 357.

Cloth, the Mart for it propos'd to be settled in England, 317.

Clothiers about to mutiny for want of Trade, 90.

Coaches first brought into England, 481.

Cobham, Lord, taken up for Sir Walter Raleigh's Plot, 641.

Coin, Reasons against exporting it, 77. The Value of it, 78. Proportion of Gold to Silver in the Reign of Henry VIII. ibid. Base made, 314. Regulated by Q. Mary, 335. Reduced by Q. Elizabeth, 385. In Ireland alter'd, 65.

Cole, Dr. his Sermon when Archbishop Cranmer was burnt, 352.

College, Chelsea, when, and why first erected, 685.

Colleges in both Universities resign'd into the Hands of the King by Act of Parliament, 254. Nothing done in it, ibid.

Cologne, Herman, Archbishop of, turns Protestant, 252. Cited by the Emperor, ibid. Excommunicated and depriv'd by the Pope, 259. Forc'd to surrender his Archbishoprick, 262.

Colonna, Prospero, his Successes in Italy against the French, 46.

Colonnas take Rome, 79. The Cardinal threatens to call a Council and depose the Pope for Simony, 81. Is for murdering him, 85.

Comet, one seen, 352, 488, 718.

Commons, the House of, first redress the Abuses of the Clergy, 137. Dealt roughly with by Henry VIII. 151. Detest his Marriage with Q. Catherine, 153.

Compton, Sir Thomas, his Duel with Bird the Bully in K. James's Reign, 727.

Concealers, a Grievance redrest by Q. Elizabeth, 445.

Concordat, a Treaty so call'd made by Francis I. with Pope Leo, 10. Derogatory to the Liberties of the Gallican Church, 25.

Condé, Prince of, taken Prisoner at the Battel of Dreux, 391.

Conference at Hampton-court between the Prelates and Puritans, 665. A Blind to set up Episcopacy in Scotland, ibid.

Conquet taken and burnt by the Lord Clinton, 357.

Constable, Sir William, one of Ask's Rebellion, 212.

Constables, petty, sixty six hang'd at once at Durham, 423.

Conway, Sir Edward, Secretary of State, an illiterate Person, 721. K. James's Jest on him, ibid.

Cook, Sir Anthony, Edward VI's School-master, his Death and Character, 457. Happy in the Marriage of his Daughters, ibid.

Cook, Sir Edward, made Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, 642. Banish'd Westminster-Hall by K. James, 646. Made a Privy Counsellor, 648. His Wife entertains the King and Nobility, and does not invite her Husband, ibid. Committed to the Tower, his Papers ransack'd, 658. Tax'd of Dishonesty in the Earl of Suffolk's Case, 659. Wilson's severe Character of him, 680. Turn'd out for saying some Words that look'd as if he thought Prince Henry was poyson'd, 689. Sends for Car the King's Favourite to examin him about Sir Thomas Overbury's Death, 698. Is in disgrace for some bold Expression at the Trial of Sir Thomas Monson, one of Overbury's reputed Murderers, 702. His Breach with the Lord Chancellor Egerton, and the Occasion of it, 704. He is brought on his Knees at the Council Table, 705. His Faults, ibid. A short Character of him, ibid. Rises again at Court, 705. K. James's rude saying to him, 748.

Cook, Mr. Clement, his Son committed to the Tower, and why, 657.

Cooley, Mr. his bold Speech in Parliament in Q. Mary's Reign, 356.

Copley, Thomas, an English Fugitive made a Baron by the French King, 458. Excuses it to Q. Elizabeth, ibid.

Cordell, William, Esq; chosen Speaker of Q. Mary's fifth Parliament, 355.

Corduba, General of the Spanish Army, fights Count Mansfeldt, in the Plains of Fleury, 760. Boasts of a Victory without reason, ibid.

Cornwallis, Sir Thomas, disswades Q. Mary from sending the Princess Elizabeth out of England, 368.

Cortez, Hernando, discovers and conquers Mexico, 34.

Cottington, Mr. Clerk to an Ambassador's Secretary, knighted and made Secretary to the Prince, 763. Accompanies him to Spain, ibid.

Cotton, Sir Robert, sent to ransack Sir Edw. Coke's Papers, 658.

Coverdale, Dr. Miles, Bishop of Exeter, pardon'd by Q. Mary at the Intercession of the King of Denmark, 336.

Council, Henry the VIII's, 2. They ingross all the Administration of Affairs, 4. Some of them give Reasons for a Breach with France in favour favour of the Pope, 7. And some against it, 8.

Council, Edward VI's, how they divided themselves into several Committees for dispatch of Business, 327. Articles to regulate the Hearing of Causes before them, 328.

Council, Q. Elizabeth's first. 369

Council, General, summon'd by the Emperor and Fr. King against the Pope Julius II. 6 They are excommunicated, but still act, 7. They remove to Lions, and suspend the Pope's Authority, ibid. Call'd Schismaticks by the Holy League, 13.

Council, General one held by Pope Julius at the Lateran in Rome, in opposition to that at Lions, 7. They undo all that the other had done, ibid.

Council, General, that at Trent meet, 240. Open, 251, 252. How receiv'd, ibid. A Book publish'd against it by the Protestants, ibid. Consist but of 43 Persons, 257. Their first Acts, ibid. 259. A thin Assembly decide great Matters, ibid. Their Decrees and Acts, 200, 661. Afraid of the Protestants Army, 261. Their further Debates and Acts, ibid. 262.

Councils, General, the English Bishop Decree concerning them, 203.

Counsellors, English, take Mony from the French King, 32.

Cowel, Dr. a Civilian, writes against the Common Law, and is approv'd by K. James, 681.

Cranfield, Sir Lionel, his mean Descent, 717. Made Lord Treasurer, ibid. Atack'd by a Minister in a Sermon, 729.

Cranmer, Dr. Thomas, sent by Henry VIII into Italy to get the Opinion of Foreign Universities about the Divorce, 140, 163. Made Bishop of Canterbury, ibid. Cites Queen Catherine to appear before him, and pronounces Sentence of Divorce, 163. 164, 165. Appeals to a General Council, 170. Is Godfather to the Princess Elizabeth, afterwards Queen, 169. A Friend to Queen Ann Bolen, 194. Sends his Wife to Germany for fear of the six Articles, 219. Writes to K. Henry in behalf of Cromwel, 223. Imprison'd, excommunicated and depos'd, 334. His Merits with Q. Mary, 336. Offers to defend K. Edward's Constitutions, ibid. Try'd for Treason, condemn'd and pardon'd for it, ibid. Proceeded against for Heresy, ibid. His Dispute with the Papists, 344. Condemn'd to be burnt, ibid. Degraded, 352. Recants, ibid. Repents of it, ibid. And is martyr'd, 353.

Creation of Noblemen, 20, 212, 24, 320, 331, 349, 371, 440, 602, 641, 642, 659, 664, 765.

Cromwell, Thomas, Servant to Woolsey, chosen a Member of Parliament, defends his Master in the House of Commons, and saves him from a Charge of Treason, 129. Is Instrumental in the Premunire of the Clergy, 15. Is Secretary of State, 176. Made Visitor General of the Monasteries, in order to their being supprest, 186. Made a Baron, Lord Privy Seal, and the Kings Vicegerent in Ecclesiastical Affairs, 202. Murmurs against him, 205. Proposes the Match with Anne of Cleves, and why 221. Made Earl of Essex, Lord Great Chamberlain, and Knight of the Garter, 222. Hated by Stephen Gardiner, and others, ibid. Arrested and condemn'd unheard, 223. Writes to the King and is beheaded, 232. His Descent and Character, ibid.

Cuffe, his Trial about the Earl of Essex's, Rebellion, 636. Speech at his Execution, 639.

Cumberland, Henry Earl of, his Loyalty in Ask's Rebellion, 206.

Cumberland, George Clifford Earl of, takes Lancerota and Porto Rico, and returns to England, 621.

D.

DACRES, Lord of the North, try'd for Treason and acquitted, 177.

Dacres, Lord Thomas of the South, beheaded for Murder, 228.

Dacres, Ld George, his unfortunate Death, 408.

Dacres, Leonard, Plots to carry off the Scots, Queen, 420. Rebels, 421. Engages the Lord Hunsdon, ibid. Is beaten, flies to Flanders, and dies poor, ibid.

Dale, Mr. the Queen's Agent with the Prince of Parma, his Discourse with him about the Spanish Invasion, 545.

Dale, a Parish Clerk in Yorkshire, rebels against Edward VI and is hang'd, 300.

Danes out of Humour with the English, and why, 550.

Danvers his Tryal about the Earl of Essex's Rebellion, 638. Beheaded, 640.

Darcy, Thomas Lord, sent with Forces into Spain to assist Ferdinand against the Moors, 7. Forc'd to join in Ask's Rebellion, 206. Attends him as his Counsellor, ib. One of the Yorkshire Rebels Commissioners to treat with Henry VIII 207. Excuses himself, but is Imprison'd, 211. Try'd and beheaded, 213.

Dasse, Monsieur sent with an Army by the French King to relieve the Scots, 291.

David, Henry, and his Servants barbarously murder'd by John Desmond, 472.

Davis, Captain John, his Voyages to the North, to find out that Passage to the East-Indies, 10.

Davison, William, Secretary of State, his Management to get Q. Elizabeth to sign the Warrant for Mary Queen of Scots's Death, 534. Try'd for it after she was executed, 536. His Answer to the Charge, 537 The Judges and others Censure of him in the Starchamber, ib. 538. His Request, 538. Ill us'd, ib. His private Apology to Sir Fr. Walsingham, ib.

Dauphin and the Duke of Orleans his Brother Sons of Francis I. deliver'd Hostages to Charles the Vth. for their Father's performance of the Treaty of Madrid, 15. Their coarse Treatment in Spain, 130. Better us'd, 135. The Articles and Manner of their Delivery, 139, 142.

Dauphin, Henry, Son to Francis I. attempts to surprize Boulogne, but is repuls'd, 248. Insuccessful in other Places, 249.

Derby, Ferdinand Stanly Earl of, instigated to rebel by Hesket and other Outlaws, 574. He discovers the Plot, ib. His Relation to Henry VIII. ib. His Death, 580. Thought to be poison'd, ib. His Daughters Title to the Isle of Man consider'd, ib.

Derry, London, burnt by an Accident, 409.

Desmond, James Earl of, hated by the Earl of Kildare, and why, 40. Treats with the French King, 57. Declar'd Traitor, 96. Treats with the Emperor, 105, 166.

Desmond, Gerald Earl of, rebels against Queen Elizabeth, 398. Gives Battel to his Enemy the Earl of Ormond, 410. Supriz'd by him and sent into England, ib. His Territories invaded by Sir William Drury. 457. He rebels, 473. 474. His Impudence, ib. In Distress, ib. He is slain, 495. His vast Estate, ib.

Desmond, John, his Barbarity, 472. Heads the Spaniards in Ireland, 473. Defeates the English, is himself slain, ib.

Desmond, James, hang'd, 474.

Devices, or Emblems; several sent to Mary the Scots Queen during her Imprisonment, 500. Philip II's proud one, 509. The vain ones by the Earl of Leicester, 541. The States of Holland, ib. Q. Elizabeth's on her Triumph over the Spanish Armado, 548. The Earl of Arundel's a traitorous one, 552.

Diet of Worms condemn Luther, 38. Send the Centum Gravamina, or hundred Grievances, to the pope be redrest, 51———55. Otherwise threaten him, ib.

Diet of Nuremburgh decree that a General Council should be call'd, 61.

Diet of Spire, their Moderation towards Luther, 96. They desire a National Council, and the Decree of Worms to be suspended, ib. The Princes and Cities assembled their by themselves and Deputies protest against the Emperor's Order, and thence the name of Protestants is deriv'd, 97.

Diet of Ausburg, 140. The Confession given In their by the Protestants Princes and Cities, ibid.

Diet, at Worms against the Council of Trent, 252.

Diet at Ratisbon end in a Rupture between the Emperor and the Protestants, 260.

Difference between the English and Danes about the Fishery in Norway and Iceland, 625.

Digby, Sir Everard, one of the Conspirators in the Gunpowder Plot, 654. Hang'd, 676.

Digby Sir John, made Lord Digby and sent to Spain to negotiate the Match between Prince Charles and the Infanta, 715. Is Popishly affected, ib. Sent to Germany to require the Palatinate, 731 Gives an account of his fruitless Negotiation in Parliament, 738. Sent again to Spain to negotiate the Match, 749 His scandalous Reception in Spain, ib. 750. King James's Instructions to him about the Match, 754. Second Instructions, 756 His Third, 757. Created Earl of Bristol, ib. See Bristol, Earl of.

Dissenters from the Church of England when they first discover'd themselves, 410. Their Obstinacy, ib. They disturb the Churches Peace, 446. They increase, 494. They grow bold and write against the Church, 516. Those of the Presbytery begin to shew themselves, ibid.

Divorce, History of the famous one between Henry VIII. and Queen Catherine, 99. Reasons of it, ibid. K. Henry's private Ones, 100. & 106. The Debates of the two Universities before Archbishop Warham, 107. The Cause try'd before the Delegates, 107, 108. The Bull for the Marriage Objected against, 104, 105. The Bull and Brief for the Dispensation of the Marriage, 109, 110, 111. Objections against them. 112. Witnesses examin'd, 113, 114. Pope Julius II's Letter about the Dispensation, 115. Another, 116. K. Henry's Protestation against the Match before it was consummated, 116, 117. Bull for a new Dispensation, 118, 119, 120. The Conclusion of the Business prorogu'd abruptly by Cardinal Campegio, 118. The Pope will hear the Cause himself, 120. His Brief to that purpose, 121. The Opinion of foreign Universities about the Divorce, 140, 152. The House of Lords write to the Pope for it, 141. Promoted by the French King, 154. Sentence pronounc'd by Archbishop Cranmer, 163——165. An Account of it by Mr. Cavenar, 364.

Donatus the Venetian Ambassador to James I. banish'd by the Republick, skulks in London 652.

Doria, Andrew, imploy'd by the French King, 84. Takes Genoa for the French, 86. Beats Moncada the Emperor's General, is disgusted with the French, deserts to Charles V. and is made his Admiral, 98. His War with Barbarossa, 139. Takes Coron from the Turks, 159. Defeated by Barbarossa, 21.

Dormer, Robert, made a Lord, and the Manner of it, 644.

Dorset, Thomas Grey Marquiss, sent with an Army into Spain, 9. Abus'd by the Spaniards, 10. He returns home, 11 His Actions at the famous Tournament at Paris, 22. Sent against the Scots, 56.

Dort, Synod of, 648. The English Deputies there, ib. 719. They quash the Arminian Heresy, ib.

Doughty, John, put to Death by Sir Francis Drake, 478.

Drake, Sir Francis, his Parentage, 477. His Education, 478. His first Voyage to America, ib. His second Voyage, ib. His Successes by Sea and Land, ib. 479, 480. His Return and Treatment by the Queen after he had sail'd round, the World, ib. Tax'd with Cruelty, ib. His Third Voyage, 509. And Success, ib. And Booty, 510. Sent against Cales and the Spanish Coasts, 540. His Prizes, ib. Made Vice-Admiral at the Spanish Invasion, 543. His Actions in the Fight with the Armada, 546, 547, 548. He and Sir John Norris set out a Fleet against Spain at the Charge of the Adventurers, 563. The Expedition not very fortunate, and the Fault laid on him, 564. Sent to the West-Indies, 784. His Actions and Death, 785.

Dreux, Battle of, 391.

Drunkenness, when first brought into England, 484.

Drury, Sir William, takes Edinburgh Castle, 449. His Actions in Ireland, 457. Made Deputy, 471. His Actions, 473. Kill'd in a Duel by Sir John Burroughs, and why, 557.

Dublin besieg'd by the Earl of Kildare's Son 181. A University erected there by Q. Elizabeth, 566.

Dudly, Edmund, call'd to account by Henry VIII. 3. His Speech before the Council, ib. The Charge against him, ib. He's committed to the Tower, ib. Crimes of which he is accus'd 4. Try'd and found guilty, 5. Attainted in Parliament, 6. Beheaded, ib.

Dudly, John, his Son restor'd in Blood, 8. Made Viscount Lisle, 242. See Viscount Lisle.

Dudly, John, Earl of Warwick, his eldest Son condemn'd, 334. Dies in Prison, 332.

Dudly, Ambrose, his second Son, pardon'd by Q. Mary,

Dudly, Robert, his third Son, imprison'd by Q Mary, 333. Highly favour'd by Q. Elizabeth, 383. Hopes to marry her, ib. Propos'd to the Scots Queen by Q. Elizabeth, 397. Made Earl of Leicester, 395. See Earl of Leicester.

Dudley, Lord Guildford, marry'd to the Lady Jane Gray, 324. Condemn'd by Queen Mary, 336. Desires to see his Wife, but she will not admit it, 343. Is beheaded, ib.

Duelling punish'd by King James, 647. He makes a Speech against it, ib. Between the English and Scots in his Reign, 688.

Duncomb, Mr. his tragical Story, 724.

Dutton, Sir Thomas, his Duel with Sir Hatton Cheek, and the occasion of it, 684.

Durham Bishoprick dissolv'd by Act of Parliament in the Reign of Edward VI. 323. The Temporalities given to the Duke of Northumberland, ib.

E.

EArthquake, a dreadful one in Herefordshire, 433. Another in Dorsetshire, 493.

East-India Company first establish'd, 540 Trade thither first put in practice, 566. Settled by Q. Elizabeth, 626.

Ecclesiastical Courts attack'd in Q. Elizabeth's Reign, 564. Defended, ib.

Edinburgh Castle taken by the English, 449.

Edward, Prince, born, 212, 273. Said to be cut out of his Mother's Belly, 273. A Treaty of Marriage between him, and Mary Queen of Scots, 234.

Edward the Sixth King of England, writes a Journal of his Reign, 274. Under the Tuition of Dr. Cox and Mr. John Cheek, ib.

His great Proficiency, ib. Cardan's Character of him, 255, 326. Comes to London on his Father's Death, ib. Is crown'd, 276. His general Pardon, ib. His Vertues? as Clemency shewn in the Instance of Jane Butcher, ib. His Courage, 277. His Care and Knowledg of Affairs of State, &c. ib. Entertains a Treaty with France, 278 Prepares for War with Scotland, ib. 278. Sends an Ambassador thither to treat of a Marriage between him and the Queen of Scots, 278. Hostilities begun, 279. Reformation carri'd on in his Reign, 289. The Common Prayer Book call'd his Book, 290. His Answer to Ket the Rebel's Demand, 297. His two Uncles quarrel, 301. A Report of his Death, 303. He rides thro' London, ib. Carri'd off by the Protector Somerset, 304. He is forc'd to abandon him to his Enemies, 307. Brought to London by the Lords, 308. Concludes a Peace with France, 312. Rejects the Emperor's Demand to have Mass said in the Lady Mary's House, 313, 315. His Letter to her about it, 316. His Instructions to Dr. Wotton, whom he sent to the Emperor about it, 317, 318. His ready Answer to the French Ambassadors at fourteen years old, 319. A Treaty of Marriage between him and the eldest Daughter of France, 318, 319. Avoids entring into a League with the German Protestant Princes, and why, 321. How prevail'd upon to sign a Warrant for the Execution of his Uncle the Duke of Somerset, 324. Repents of it, 325. His rare Endowments, 326. Grants a Commission to several Bishops, and others to reform the Canon Law, 397. Sends his Chaplains to preach all over England in several Circuits, ib. Writes a Discourse of a Mart in England with his own hand, 318. Borrows Mony at Antwerp, ib. His Answer to the Emperor's Demand of it, 320. Retrenches his Expences, 321. Has the Measles and Small-pox, 322. His Progress, ib. His Illness increases, 320. His Discourse with Bishop Ridley, ib. Is very ill, 324. The People murmur upon it, ib. His Charitable Acts, ib. The Import of the King's Letters Patent for Lady Jane to succeed him, [326] An Account of his Disease and Death, [327] His Funeral Rites perform'd after the Protestant way, 334.

Egerton, Thomas, Esq; made Lord Keeper, 596. Endeavours to prevail with the Earl of Essex, who had insulted the Queen, to beg her Pardon, 608.

Egmont, Count, beats the Mareschal de Termes, and takes him Prisoner, 357.

Ecker, Sir Ralph, carries Ask and his Rebels Petition to the King, 206. Detain'd by him, ib.

Elizabeth, Princess, Daughter to Henry VIII. born, 169. The Crown setled upon her in default of his Heirs Male, 175. A Treaty of Marraige between her and the Duke of Angoulesme, third Son of Francis, 179. Illegitimated by Act of Parliment, 195, 196. High Treason to affect her Legitimacy, 220. Offer'd in Marriage to the Prince of Spain, 257 Propos'd in Marriage to the King of Denmark's Son, 318. She will not consent to it, ibid. Waits on her Sister Q. Mary, 333. Arrested by Sir Thomas Wyat, and imprison'd, 343. Gardiner's Designs against her, ibid. Debates about her, 349. She is discharg'd, ibid. Her great Favour with her Brother Edward VI. Her Character before Queen, 366. Professes herself of the Romish Religion, 367. A Design to send her out of England, and exclude her the Crown, ibid. Proclaim'd Queen, 369. Her Care of Religion and Government, ibid. Refuses K. Philip's Offer of Marriage, and consults about setling the Protestant Religion, 370. Crown'd, 371. Her Respect for some Popish Principles, ibid. Her Endeavours to recover Calais, 373. Her Maxims as to Peace and War, 374. Makes Peace with Scotland and France, ibid. Her Spirit, ibid. Her Answer to the Speaker of the House of Commons Speech about her Marrying, 375. Her Care of Religion and the Government, 377. Her Answers to foreign Princes who mediated for Favour to the Papists, 378. In securing good Terms with K. Philip, ibid. The Guises the Occasion of her foul Grudg against Mary Queen of Scots, 379. She assists the Scots Protestants, 380. Her Saying of the French, ibid. Concludes a Peace with the Scots and French, 382. Her many Suiters, ibid. The Reception and Answer she made 'em, 383. Refuses to grant the Scots Queen Passage into Scotland from France, 386. Her Answer to the Scots Queen's Demand of being declar'd Heir of the Crown, 387. To the Pope about the Council of Trent, 388. Her glorious Government, ibid. Her Advice to the Scots Queen about marring, 390. Assists the French Protestants openly, ibid. Concludes a Peace with Charles IX. the French King, 394. Goes to Cambridge, makes a Latin Oration there, 395. Is against the Scots Queen's marrying, the Lord Henry Darly, 396, 397. Has a Privilege of making any two of her Subjects Knights of the Order of St. Michael, 399. Again importun'd to marry, ibid. Goes to Oxford, and makes a Latin Oration, ibid. Her Speech to the Parliament for importuning her to marry, 401. Favours the Scots Queen's Title, ibid. Intercedes for her Liberty, when imprison'd by her Subjects, 404, 406. Demands Calais, ibid. Makes Peace between the Queen Regent in France and the Protestants, 410. She will not let the Scots Queen who fled to England come to Court, 411. She advises with her Council what to do with her, and resolves to detain her, 412. Hears the Cause between her Deputies and the Earl of Murray's by Commissioners, 413, 414, 415. Receives ill Impressions of the Scots Queen from the Regent Murray, ibid. Stops some Spanish Mony, 416. She pities the Scots Queen, 418. Discovers the D. of Norfolk's intended Match with her, 420. Fears he will rebel, 421. Rebellions in the North against her suppress'd, 422, 423. Assists the French Protestants, 423. She helps James VI's Party in Scotland, 426. Her Answer to foreign Ministers, who interceded for the Scots Queen's Liberty, 427. Pius V's Bull against her, ibid. Her Power almost Sovereign in Scotland, 429, 430. Sparing of her Honours, 431. Her Answer to the French King's Proposal of a Marriage with Henry Duke of Anjou, 433. Again, 433. Plots against her by the Pope and Spanish King, 441. Justifies her Conducting imprisoning the Scots Queen to the French King, and enters into a Treaty with him, 442. Banishes the Netherlands, 443. Falls sick of the Small pox, 445. The Duke of Alenson propos'd to her for a Husband, ibid. Concludes a Treaty with the Duke, Alva, 446. Her Generosity, ibid. Is for marrying, 447. Sends an Army into Scotland, 449. Believes Reports to the Scots Queen's prejudice, 451. She renews the League with France, and leaves Religion out, 452. Denies several Requests made by Requesens Governor of the Netherlands, 453. She refuses the Sovereignty of Holland and Zealand, 454. Relieves the Netherlanders, 456. Her Saying of the Irish, 457. Concludes a League with the Netherlanders, 458. Her Saying about marrying the E. of Leicester, 461. Relieves the States of the Netherlands with Mony, 463. A Gun shot into her Barge, ibid. Her kind Saying of her People upon it, ibid. Justifies Drake's Expedition in America, 480. Her Opinion of the Spaniards Right to the West-Indies, ibid. Protects Don Antonio King of Portugal, 484. Appoints Commissioners to conclude a Treaty of Marriage with Alenson or Anjou, ibid. She defers it, and why, 485. Her Favours to him in England, ibid. Why she preferr'd a single Life, ibid. Angry with those that were against the Match, ibid. She is zealous for Uniformity in Worship, and puts some Brownists to death, 494. She inclines to set the Scots Queen at liberty, 499. Rejects a Bill brought into Parliament against the Bishops, 503. Endeavours to strengthen with Foreign Alliances with Protestants, 504. Takes the Netherlanders into her Protection, 508. And upon what Conditions, ibid. Angry at the E. of Leicester's Power in Holland, and writes to him about it, 511. Supplies the King of Navarre with Mony, 512. Makes a strict League with James VI. of Scotland, 513, 514. Escapes Babington's Conspiracy, and grants a Commission to try the Scots Queen, 515—520. Her Speech to the Parliament against publishing the Sentence against the Scots Queen, 526, 527, 528. She prays them to find out some other Expedient, 526, 527. Justifies the Sentence against the Queen of Scots by her Answer to the French Ambassador, 531. The French Ambassador hires Stafford to kill her, 532. Set against the Scots Queen, 533. Prest to execute her, ibid. Signs the Warrant for it, 584. But disowns the Knowledge of her Execution, 586. Writes then to the Scots King, ibid. Uses Davison ill for it, 537, 538. She prevents a Scots War, and how, 539. Her Preparations to resist the Spaniards in 88, 543, 544. Reviews the Camp at Tilbury, 548. Medals struck on her Triumph over the Spaniards, ib. Her Procession to Paul's to return Thanks, 549. Assists the King of Navarre, and encourages the French King against the League, 555, 556. Her Foreign Expence, 558. Her Frugality, ibid. Her Saying about levying of Taxes and Impositions, ibid. Assists the States again, and Henry VI. 558, 559. Her Saying of dividing the French Monarchy, 560. Her Care of Henry IV. 561, 562. Us'd ill by him, 562. Asserts the Rights of the Church, 565. Assists the French King again, 568. Visits Oxford, 569. Her Care of Scotland, 571. Libels against her in Germany; her Answer, 572. Mediates a Peace between the Swede and Muscovite, and the Turks and Transylvanians, ibid. Her Letter to Henry IV. on his turning Papist, 573. She translates Boetius, ib. A Plot to poison her by the Papists, 577. Her Christian Courage, ib. Her Answer to Henry IV's Ambassador about a War with Spain, 582. Her Expence in Henry's Quarrel, ib. Demands the Mony she had been out for the Hollanders, of the States, 585. She accepts their Proposals of repaying it, 586. Rejects the Irish Rebels Demands, 589. Fits out a Fleet and Army against the Spaniards, 591. Her Instructions to the Generals, ib. Her Treaty with Henry IV. against Spain, 594. Her Answer to a rude Speech of the Polish Ambassador, 600. Lends Henry IV. more Mony, 601. She endeavours to hinder his making a Peace with Spain, 604, 605. Thinks of a Peace herself, 606. Reasons for and against it, ib. 607. Gives the Earl of Essex a Box on the Ear, 608. Translates Salust de Bello Jugurth, Horace de Arte Poet. and Plutarch de Curiositate, 611. Her Behaviour about the E. of Essex, from 614 to 637. Her Answer to the Scotch Commissioners, 640. Her Speech to her Parliament, [642.] King of France's Complaints to Queen Elizabeth, [649.] Her Answer, [650.] Falls sick at Winsor [652.] Her Coronation Ring taken off, ib. Grows melancholy, ib. Declares her Successor, [653.] Dies, ib. King James's hastiness to have the Mourning for her over, 681.

Elphington, Sir James, offers to kill Car, K. James's Favourite, 690. Hinder'd by Prince Henry, ib.

Elsmere, Egerton Lord, Lord Chancellor of England, his Quarrel with Sir Edward Coke, and on what occasion, 704. Resigns the Seals, and retires, 705.

Elways, Sir Gervase, hang'd near the Tower, 645. His Treachery to Sir T. Overbury, 694. His Repentance, 699.

Emden, the Mart remov'd thither from Flanders by the English, 394.

Empson, Sir Richard, call'd to an account by Henry's VIII's Council 3. He is committed to the Tower, ib. His mean Birth, ib. Crimes of which he is accused, 4. Try'd at Northampton, and found guilty, 5. Attainted in Parliament, 6. Beheaded, ib.

Episcopacy, 130 Ministers silenc'd by King James in Scotland for opposing it, 653.

Erasmus, his Letter to Luther about Moderation, 37. To Cardinal Campegio about the Protestants, 150.

Erick, King of Sweden, a Suitor to Queen Elizabeth, 382. The Queen's respectful Answer, ibid.

Essex, Walter Devereux, Earl of, his unfortunate Expedition to Ireland, 450, 451, 455. His Death and Character, 456. Suppos'd to be poison'd by Leicester, and why, 457.

Essex, Robert Devereux his Son Earl of, goes against Spain with Sir John Norris without the Queen's leave, 554. Sent to the Assistance of Henry IV. 562. Knights several Persons, and gives offence, ib. Impos'd on by the French King, ib. Challenges Monsieur Villars Governour of Rouen, 568. Returns to England, ib. Propos'd as Successor to the Crown of England, 576. Made General of an Expedition against Spain, 591. His Actions at Cadiz, 592, 593. Complains of the other Commanders, 594. His Narrative of this Expedition, 594. Displeas'd, and why, ib. Made General in a second Expedition against Spain, 597. Quarrels with Sir Walter Raleigh, 598. Takes several Places from the Spaniards, ib. He returns, 599. His Pique against Sir Walter Raleigh increased, and his Discontent, 599. Made Earl Marshal, ib. Against a Peace with Spain, 608. A hard Saying of the Lord Burleigh's against him, ib. Insults the Queen, and defends it, 608. Receiv'd again into Favour, 609. Made Lord Deputy of Ireland, 614. Leads his Army to Munster, ib. Parleys with Tir-Oen the Rebel, 615. The Queen writes to him thereon, ib. He is discontented, 616. Returns into England, ib. Is confin'd, ib. His Misconduct represented by the Lord Keeper, Lord Treasurer, Lord Admiral, &c. 617. Brought before the Commissioners, 626. His Sentence, 627. His Message to the Queen with her Majesty's Answer, 628. He is summon'd before the Council, but refuses to appear, 630. His Insurrection, &c. 631, 632. His Arraignment, 633. And Trial, 634, 635, 636. Discovers his Associates, ib. Is beheaded, 637. His Family and Character, ib.

Essex, Robert Devereux Earl of, restor'd in Blood, 663. Marries the Lady Frances Howard, 686. The ill Effects of that Marriage, ib. His Wife's wicked Contrivances against him, 687. He carries her into the Country to reform her, but in vain, ib. Divorc'd from her at her Suit formally, 691. Goes to the Palatinate War, 722. His Bravery, 723. Sollicites Succours for the Palatinate, 725. K. James's rough Saying to him, when the Nobility presented their Petition against Scots and Irish Titles, 747.

Estampes, Anne, Dutchess, Mistress to Francis I. favours the Protestants in France, 177.

Evans, Mr. his Bravery at Cales, 593.

Evers, Sir Ralph, his Loyalty in Ask's Rebellion, 206. Made a Lord, and slain in Scotland, 249.

Exchange, Royal, built, 431, 643.

Exchequer, a Plot to rob it, 353.

Exeter, Hen. Courtney Marquis of, beheaded, 216.

Exeter, Courtney Marquiss of, one of the three Persons Queen Mary thought of for her Husband, 339. Accused by Sir Thomas Wyat, 343. Clear'd by him at his Death, ib. Imprison'd, ib. Discharg'd, ib.

Exeter, besieg'd by the Devonshire Rebels, 294. A Famine there, ib. The Siege raised, 295.

F.

Fairfax, Mr. his Innocence and cruel Usage in France, 740.

Family of Love, a Heresy so call'd, 477.

Faro taken by the English, 593.

Feag, Machhugh, rebells in Ireland, 581. Like to be surpriz'd, ib. Submits, 588. Rebels again, 590. Slain, 591.

Feckenam, Dr. Abbot of Westminster, his vain Attempt to seduce the Lady Jane Gray to Popery, 342, 343.

Felton, John, hang'd for putting the Pope's Bull against Q. Elizabeth, 438.

Ferdinand, King of Spain, his Disposition towards Henry VIII. 5. Enters into a League with the Pope against the French, 6. Abuses the English that came to his Assistance, 9, 10. He conquers Navarre, ib. His Dissimulation, 11, 12, 18. His Death and Character, 25.

Ferdinand, Brother to Charles V. claims the Kingdoms of Hungary and Bohemia, and by what Right, 38. Illegally chosen the King of the Romans, 150. Crown'd, 151. After War he is accused of Partiality to the Protestants, 177.

Ferdinand, Emperor of Germany, offers one of his Sons to Q. Elizabeth, 378.

Ferdinand II. not acknowledg'd by the Bohemians, 720. Procures the Elector Palatine chosen King in his stead, 721.

Feria, Count of, Philip II's Ambassador in England, negotiates his Marriage with Queen Elizabeth, 370. Marries a Daughter of Mr. William Dormer, 381. Incenses the Pope against the Queen, 384. Puts an Englishman in Spain into the Inquisition, ib.

Ferrar, Dr. Bishop of St. David's, depriv'd by Q. Mary, 333, 336. His rigid Temper, 359. Burnt at Carmarthen, ib.

Ferrara, Alphonso d'Este Duke of, supported by the French against Pope Julius II. 6. Excommunicated by the Pope, ib. That Excommunication declar'd void by a National Synod in France, ib. Submits to the Pope, and is pardon'd, 11.

Fetherstone, William, an Impostor, pretends to be Edward VI. 352. Hang'd, ib.

Fight, Naval, betwixt the English and French, 11. Another, 13.

Finch, Lady, made Viscountess Maidstone, 583.

Fitton, Sir Edward, his severe Government in Ireland, causes a Rebellion, 445.

Fitzgerald, Thomas, Son to the Earl of Kildare, rebels against Henry VIII. and murders the Archbishop of Dublin, 181. Forces the Citizens of Dublin to admit his Soldiers to besiege the Castle, ib. Writes to the Pope to be King of Ireland, ib. He submits, and is hang'd with his five Uncles, 182, 212.

Fitzgerald, Gerald his younger Son, his Escape, 212. Flies to Cardinal Pool, ib.

Fletcher, Dr Richard, Bishop of London, kills himself with Grief and Tobacco, 596.

Flowry, Battle of, 560.

Florentines lose their Liberty, 139.

Floyd, his Punishment for speaking against the King of Bohemia, 657.

Flushing seiz'd by the Netherlanders, 443.

Foix, Gaston de, routs the Pope's Army, 7. Gains the Battel of Ravenna, but is himself slain, 11.

Foreigners, their Testimony not to be admitted, 429. But in some cases, ib.

Forrest, Friar, burnt in a Fire made of a Welch Image, 213.

Fosscarini, Ambassador to James I. strangled at Venice for communicating some State Arcana's to the Countess of Arundel and others, 659.

Foster, Sir John, the occasion of a Tumult between the English and Scots Borderers, 452.

Foulcars, Merchants of Antwerp, lend Edward VI. vast Sums, 318.

France, great Disturbances there in the Reign of Lewis XIII. 708.

Francis I. succeeds Lewis XII. the French King, and confirms the Peace with Henry VIII. 22. For which he pays a million of Crowns, ib. His Treachery, ib. His Success in Italy, 25. He enters into a League with Maximilian the Emperor, 29. Bribes Cardinal Woolsey to his Interest, 30. Enters into a League with Henry VIII. 31, 32. Bribes Woolsey and the English Counsellors, 32. Is a Candidate for the Empire, 33. Treats with Woolsey about the Rendition of Calais, 35. Has an Interview with Henry VIII. 36, 37. The Causes of his long War with Charles V. 42. Declar'd by King Henry the VIII. to have broken the Peace, 43. Refuses to have the difference referr'd to Cardinal Woolsey, ib. Why he permitted Henry VIII. to declare War with him, 46. Visits the Duke of Bourbon, after he knew he intended to desert him, 59. His Affairs unfortunate, ib. His Expedition into Italy, 62. He besieges Pavia, ib. Fights, and loses the Battel of Pavia, 63, 64. His Bravery, ib. He is taken Prisoner, ib. His Usage, ib. How he resented the Propositions of Peace sent him by Charles, 66. His Proposals, ib. He desires to be remov'd into Spain, 68. His Sickness, ib. And Conference with Charles V. ib. He is visited by his Sister the Dutchess of Alenson, ib. Her Contrivance for him to escape, discover'd 69. His bold Message to the Emperor, ib. He concludes the Treaty of Madrid, and swears to it, 74. The Articles agree'd on to be observ'd at his Delivery, as to the Form of it, 75. He is contracted to Donna Leonora the Emperor's Sister, 74. The Manner of his Delivery, and his Joy on his Arrival in France, 75. Confesses he owes his Liberty to Henry VIII. ib. Refuses to confirm the Treaty of Madrid, ib. Absolv'd from his Oath by the Pope, 76. Enters into a League against Charles V. 76, 77. His Council and Parliament declare the Treaty of Madrid null, 77. His Message to Charles, ib. His second Message to Charles, 78. His Apology, ib. Leagues with Henry VIII. 79, 84. Made Knight of the Garter, 85. He defies Charles V. 87. And challenges him, 91. And gives him the lye, ib. How he excused his Breach of Faith, and is answer'd, 92, 93. His Conduct generally condemn'd, 94. His Discourse with Burgundy Charles VI's King at Arms, 95. Gains much in Italy, and loses it, 97, 98, 129. His Inconstancy, 135. He encourages and assists the Protestant Princes of Germany, 151, 152. His second Interview with Henry VIII. 160. His Opinion about a general Council, 163. Remonstrances between the Emperor and him, 154, 167. His Interview with the Pope, 169, 170. His Treachery, 170. Inclines to the Protestants, 177. Raises a bloody Persecution against them, ib. His Treaty with the Turk discover'd, he falls sick of Grief, 180. His Fawning and false Embassy to the German Protestant Princes, 187. Prevaricates with Henry VIII. 196. Conquers Savoy, ib. And great part of Piedmont, 197. His Answer to Charles V's Challenge, 198. Sets the Turk on the Emperor, 209. He entertains Charles V. in France, 220. Quarrels with Charles and Henry too, 225, 226. Strives again to stir up the Turk to a War, 227. Sends him rich Presents, and falls upon the Emperor's Dominions, 231. He helps Barbarossa to take Nizza in Italy, 240. Offends the Roman Court, ib. Great Designs against him, 245. Employs 25 Galleys lent him by the Turks against the English, 250. Concludes a Peace with Henry VIII. 255. Pretends he will renounce the Papacy, 256. Resolves in conjunction with Henry VIII. to reform Religion in his Kingdom, 257. His Sorrow for that King's Death, ib. Practizes with the Scots against the English 278.

Francis II. the French King, usurps the Arms of England, in right of his Wife Mary Queen of Scots, 378. Breaks the Peace, and assists the Scots, 379. His Death, 384.

French land in Sussex, and are repulsed, 13.

French Protestants their first Civil Wars, 389, 390. Assisted by Q. Elizabeth, 390. They desert the English, 391. Assisted by Q. Elizabeth again, 410, 415, 423. Massacred at Paris, 444.

Frobisher, Sir Martin, his Voyage for Discoveries, 456. His Actions in the Fight against the Spanish Armada, 546. Commands a Squadron in it, 547. Slain at the Siege of Crodon in Bretagne, 578.

Fugitives, Popish, excite Foreigners against their Country, 477.

Fyall taken by Sir Walter Raleigh, 598.

G.

Gage, Robert, of Surrey, one of the Conspirators to assassinate Q. Elizabeth, 516.

Gardiner, Stephen, sent to Rome to negotiate the Divorce, 100. Threatens the Pope, 106. Made Secretary, 120. Consents to the King's Title of Supreme Head of the Church, 151. Employ'd to get the Opinion of the University of Cambridge about the Divorce, 153. One of the Judges that sat with Cranmer to denounce the Sentence of Divorce, 163. Made Bishop of Winchester, ib. Sent to the Interview between the Pope and French King at Marseilles, 169. Renounces the Pope's Supremacy by Oath, 179. Writes for the King, 182. His Advice to King Henry against a League with the German Protestants, 192. Serves the French King, when Embassador in France, 214. Censur'd for his Severity against Protestants, 241. His wicked Designs against Q. Catherine Par, 263. Falls into disgrace, ib. Committed to Prison for opposing K. Edward VI's Reformation, 289. Released and made Lord Chancellor by Q. Mary, 333. Crowns Q. Mary, 336. His Designs against the Lady Elizabeth, 343. His Advice to take her off, 349. His Designs against Cardinal Pool, 351. His Death, and Character, ib.

Gargrave, Thomas Esq; Speaker of the House of Commons in Q. Elizabeth's first Parliament, his Speech to her about marrying, 375.

Garret,

Garnet, Henry, Provincial of the Jesuits, hang'd, 642. Confessor to the Gunpowder Plotters, 674. His Trial and Execution, out of Wilson, 676.

Gates, Sir John, a main Instrument of the Lady Jane's Advancement, . Executed, 332.

Gavilock, Hugh, strangled by the E. of Tyrone, 561.

Geneva asserts its Liberty and expels the Bishop, 196.

Genoa taken by the Imperialists, 46. Taken by Doria for the French, 86.

Gib, a Scots man, kick'd by K. James, 760. the King begs Pardon of him on his Knees, ib.

Gifford, Gilbert, a Priest, reveals Babington's Conspiracy, 516.

Gilbert, Sir Humphry, goes over with Forces to the Assistance of the Netherlands, 443. He is drown'd going to Newfoundland, 494.

Globe, first sail'd round, 72.

Glocester erected into a Bishoprick by Henry VIII. 218.

Gonzaga, Julia, like to be surpriz'd by the Pirate Barbarossa, 179. She escapes half naked, 180.

Goodrick, Dr. Bishop of Ely, made Lord Keeper, 323. His Character, ibid. A Temporizer, 334.

Gowry, William Ruthen Earl of, seizes the Person of James VI. of Scotland, and why, 489. He is try'd and condemn'd, 496. Beheaded, 497. A Fast order'd by K. James in England for his Deliverance from him, 641. A day appointed to be kept yearly for it, 667. Ministers turn'd out for refusing to mock God, as they call'd it, in keeping it, ib. Their Conspiracy against the Life of the King never believ'd, ibid.

Gowry's Conspiracies, 626.

Granades first cast into England, 241.

Granvill, Cardinal, uses the English in the Netherlands ill, and why, 394.

Gravamina Centum, the hundred Grievances offer'd to the Pope by the German Princes to be redress'd, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55. Clement VII. said they smell of Heresy, 61.

Gray, Patrick, James VI's Agent in England, his Treachery, 500, 688.

Greenland, the Dutch too hard for the English there, 649. The Rise of their Quarrel, 650.

Greenvile, Sir Richard, his Bravery and Death at the Azores, 565.

Grievances in K. James's Reign, 731.

Gresham, Sir Thomas, Q. Elizabeth's Merchant builds the Royal Exchange, 431. His Death, 464.

Grevill, Fulk Lord Brook, his Sordidness to the Lord S. Albans in his Poverty, 736.

Grey Friars near New-gate given to charitable Uses by Edward VI. 324.

Grey, Leonard Lord, beheaded, and why 227.

Grey, Lord of Wilton, his Forwardness in the Service of Henry VIII. against the French, 256. Commands in Scotland, and is successful there, 290, 292. Suppresses a Rebellion in Oxfordshire, 292. Marches against the Devonshire Rebels, 293.

Grey, Arthur Lord, made Deputy of Ireland 474. Drives the Spaniards out of it, 475. Successful against the Rebels, 481. Accus'd of Cruelty, ib. His Defence of Davison in the Star chamber, 537. His Death, 574.

Grey, Thomas Lord, taken up for Sir Walter Raleigh's Plot, 641. His Concern in it 663.

Grimaldi, an Italian, Informer in the Reign of Henry VII. takes Sanctuary for fear of Henry VIII. 3.

Grindal, Dr. Edmund, Archbishop of Canterbury, his Death and Character, 494.

Grotius, Hugo, of Amsterdam, one of the Heads of the Arminians or Remonstrants, 715. Seiz'd and condemn'd, 718. Finds Mercy and makes his Escape, ibid.

Guasto Marquiss del, Charles V's General, his Reception by Francis I. on a Cessation of Arms, 210.

Guernsey, Divine Service order'd to be us'd there, 319.

Guise, Duke of, takes Calais, 356.

Guise, Princes of, their Endeavours to set their Niece the Scots Queen on the Throne of England, 378, 379. Their Practices against Q. Elizabeth, 389.

Guise, Duke of, sets on foot the Holy League against the Protestant Succession in France, 555. Why he was so much honour'd by the Papists, ib. Forces the King to do what he would have him, ib. He and his Brother murder'd, 556.

Gundemar, Count, lands in England Ambassador from Spain, 653. His Life in danger by an Accident, ib. Said to be imprison'd in Spain for promoting the Spanish Match, 659. Complains of Sir Walter Raleigh to K. James, 713. A Favourite as well as an Ambassador, 714. Governs the King, ib. His Jest on the English Climate, and Influence on Affairs, 725. Gets Advantages for the Papists, 726. His Power, ib. His Artifices, ib. His Jest on Buckingham's being rul'd by his Mother, 728. On the Musters in England, ibid. Boasts that he had releas'd 4000 Papists, 750. His Saying to the Prince of Wales at Madrid, 764.

Gunpowder first made in England, 388. 700 Barrels blown up at Mechlin, the dreadful Effects of it, 261.

Gunpowder Plot discover'd, 642. A large account of the Plot, 674. Principal Actors in it, ib. Executed, 675. Father'd upon the Puritans by the Jesuits, 676.

Guyana, Sir Walter Raleigh's first and second Voyage thither, 584, 712.

Guyenne, the French King at Arms, his Speech to Charles V. when he defy'd him in the name of his Master, 87. His second Message with Francis I's Challenge of the Emperor, 92.

H.

Haddington fortify'd by the Lord Grey of Wilton, 290. Besieg'd by the French and Scots, 291. Reliev'd by the Earl of Shrewsbury, ib. Like to be surpriz'd, but is sav'd by the Valour of the English ib. Demolish'd, ib.

Hacket of Oundle in Northamptonshire, his Blasphemies, 563. Is hang'd, 564.

Hackwell, Dr. writes a Book against the Spanish Match, and is imprison'd by K. James, 658.

Hamburgh, a Factory settled there by the English in Q. Elizabeth's Reign 417.

Hamilton, the Family, in disgrace with James VI. of Scotland, 464.

Hamilton, a Scots man, murders the Regent Murray and flies to France, 425. Tempted to assassinate Admiral Coligny, but refuses it, ib.

Hamilton kill'd in a Duel by Newton about Words spoken against K. Edward VI. 291.

Hamilton, Marquiss of, his Death, 789.

Hammont, Matt. of Norwich, his Impiety, 464.

Hampton-Court built by Cardinal Woolsey, and given to Henry VIII. 68.

Hanse Towns sends Provisions, &c. to Spain, 554. Their Ships taken by the English, ib. Their Complaints and the Queen's Answer, 555. Complain to the Emperor of Hardships in England, 586. The English Ambassador's Answer, ib. Procure the English Merchants to be forbidden to trade to Germany, 600. They are forbidden to trade here, ib.

Harman's Story, 787.

Harper, Sir George, rises in Arms with Sir Thomas Wyat against Q. Mary, 341. Revolts from him and discovers the whole Conspiracy, 342.

Harpsfield, Dr. Bonner's Chaplain, his wicked Sermon before the Convocation in Q. Mary's Reign, 338.

Hastings, Sir Edward, revolts from the Lady Jane Grey to Q. Mary, 331. Q. Mary's Letter to him, ib.

Hastings, Sir Francis, his account of K. Philip's Match with Q. Mary, and the Design of it, 339, 340.

Hatton Sir Christopher, made Lord Chancellor by his Enemies, 542. His Death and Character, 566.

Havre de Grace deliver'd to Q. Elizabeth's Troops, 390. Surrendred to the French, 392. Occasion'd by a Sickness, or rather Plague, 393.

Hawkins, Sir John, ill treated by the Spaniards in America, 410. Wounded by the Enthusiast Burchet, 449. His Actions in the Fight against the Spanish Armada, 546. Commands a Squadron in it, 547. Sent to the West Indies against the Spaniards, 584. Dies of Grief, ib. Hawkins, Richard his Son, his Adventures in the South Sea, 579. Taken Prisoner by the Spaniards, ib.

Hay James, the form of his being made English Lord by K. James, 644. His pompous Embassy to France to treat of a Marriage between Prince Charles and a Daughter of France, 703, 704. His extravagant Expences and Vanity in his Embassy to Germany, 730. His Character, 731. How treated by the Prince of Orange, ib. His second Embassy to France 740. Made Earl of Carlisle, and goes to the Prince at Madrid, 765. He is seduc'd there to be of the Spanish Faction, ib.

Hayman, Sir Peter, a zealous Member of the House of Commons, sent to serve in the Palatinate, 749.

Hayward follows Sanders too much in his History, 301, 302. Faults in it, 289, 290, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 309, 310, 312, 315. Endeavours to expose the Protestant Bishops, 315. More Errors, 317. False Characters of Persons, 320. Again, 317, 318, 319, 322, 323.

Heath, Dr. Nicholas, Bishop of Worcester, committed to Prison for opposing K. Edward VI's Reformation, 289. Persuades the Duke of Northumberland to die a Papist, 331. Made Archbishop of York, 349. Made Lord Chancellor, 352. His Speech about Q. Elizabeth's Succession, 369. Refuses to be present at her Coronation, 371. Depriv'd, 376.

Hesse, Philip Landgrave of, takes Arms against Charles V. in defence of the Protestant Religion, 260. Forc'd to defend his own Country, 262.

Henry VI. his Canonization mov'd for at Rome, 103.

Henry VIII. his Education, Learning and Valour, 1. He is obstinate and cruel, 2. His Council, ib. Keeps Lawyers at a distance, ib. His undoubted Right to the Crown, ib. He punishes his Father's ill Ministers, 3. He marries the Princess Catherine, 4. Establishes a new Troop of Horseguards, ib. Foreign Princes contemporary with him, 5. In high Esteem at home and abroad, 6. His Exercises and Diversions, ib. Enters into a League with Ferdinand King of Spain in defence of the Pope, ib. Sends him Aid against the Moors, 7. He sends Deputies to the Council held by Pope Julius at the Lateran in opposition to that at Lions, ib. He is for a breach with France in favour of the Pope, and why, 8. He sends an Envoy to require the French King not to disturb the Pope, and Heralds to demand his Dominions in France, ib. Sends the Marquiss Dorset with an Army into Spain to the assistance of Ferdinand against the French, 9. Declares he will go in Person against the French, 11. Builds the biggest Ship that ever was known, ib. Reasons for and against his carrying on the French War in Person, 15. He passes over to the Siege of Terouane, 16. His Answer to the Scots King's Defiance, ib. He beats the French at the Battel of Spurrs, ib. Takes Terouane, razes it, and loses his way in Flanders, ib. Visits the Princess Margaret at Lisle, ib. He takes Tournay, and nobly entertains the Princess Margaret, 17. And arrives in England, ib. He makes Peace with the French King, 19, 20. His Answer to his Sister Margaret, Queen Regent of Scotland, who beg'd a Peace, 20. Sells Francis I. a Peace 22. His extravagant Favours on Woolsey, 23. He disgusts his best Servants by it, 24. His Treaty with the Duke of Milan to assist him against the French, 25. Flatter'd with hopes of the Empire, ib. 28. His Answer, 26. His Treaty with Charles King of Castile, ib. He unhorses Sir William Kingston at a Tournament, 27. He pardons the London Rioters, 28. He rejects the Offers of the Empire, 29. He is persuaded by Woolsey to restore Tournay, and enter into a League with Francis I. 30, 31, 32. Is a Candidate for the Empire, 33. He meets the Emperor Charles the Vth at Dover, 35. He goes with his whole Court to the place appointed for his Interview with Francis I. 36. Meets the French King, ib. Parts from him, 37. His Interview with Charles the Vth at Graveling, ib. He returns to England, ib. Call'd Thrasonicus, and why, 38. He writes a Book against Luther, how 'twas deliver'd to the Pope, who gives him for it the Title of Defender of the Faith, ib. Enters into a Treaty with Charles the Vth against Francis I. 44. He declares War with France, 46, 50. He enters into a Treaty with Charles the Vth at Windsor, 47. His Ways to raise Mony, 50. Authority given him by Parliament in cases of Attainder, 56. Gives Woolsey leave to ruin several Religious Houses, and likes the Example, 61. He assists the young King of Scotland, 63. He sends an Ambassador to Charles the Vth to require quire his Inheritance in France, but to no purpose, 61. He endeavours to procure a General Peace and the Delivery of Francis I. then Charles's Prisoner, ib. Levies a Tax, or Benevolence without consent of Parliament, 66. His Amours with Mrs Blount, 68. He concludes a Treaty with Louise Regent of France in the French King's Absence, 69. He breaks with Charles the Vth, 75. Chosen Protector of the Pope's League against him, but avoids it, 77. League with Francis I. and offers him his Daughter the Princess Mary in Marriage, 79, 80. Gives the Pope Mony, 82. Refuses to answer the Emperor's Letter of Apology for imprisoning the Pope, 83. His Demands of the Emperor, ib. 86. He aspires to Church Supremacy, 85. He defies Charles V. by his Heralds, 88. First mistrusts the Cardinal, 90. He makes a Truce with Charles, ib. His Answer to the Spanish and French Ambassadors, 91. He advises the French King not to give the Emperor the Lie in his Challenge, 92. How he first came to think of the Divorce from his Q. Catherine, 99. He applies to the Pope, 99. The Difficulties he met with at Rome, 100, 103. His Opinion of Monasteries, 102. Sends the Bull for the Divorce, but cannot get it, 106. He is satisfy'd by the Doctors of both Universities, 117. He appears before the Delegates, 118. He threatens to renounce the Pope, 123. His Generosity, 135. He sends for the Opinion of Foreign Universities about the Divorce, 136. Forbids bringing in Bulls against him, 143. Assumes the Title of Supreme Head of the Church, 151. Deals roughly by the House of Commons, ib. His kind Carriage to Queen Catherine, 153. Yet never sees her more, 154. He assists the Protestants in Germany, ib. His Speech to the Commons about the Divorce and the Clergy, 158. Cited to Rome, 159. His second Interview with Francis I. 160. He marries Ann Bolen, 161. Is formally divorc'd from Q. Catherine, 166. Stiles the Pope only Bishop of Rome, 168. Appeals to a General Council, 170. Sentence against him set up at Dunkirk, 172. His Proceedings upon it, 173. Throws off the Obedience, but not the Religion of the Church of Rome, ib. Invites James V. of Scotland to an Interview, but he excuses it, 177. Assists the Lubeckers and Hamburghers, ib. Declar'd Supreme Head of the Church by Act of Parliament, 178. Suppresses three Monasteries, ib. His Answer to the French King's Ambassador on Charles V. offering his Cousin the Lady Mary to that King's Son, 179. Puts some Friars to Death for denying his Supremacy, 181. Excommunicated by the Pope, he leagues with the Protestants of Germany, 184. Invites the Scots King to an Interview again, but in vain, ibid. Resolv'd to suppress Monasteries, 185. He sends an Embassy to the German Protestants to reconcile and incourage them, 186. His Answer to the Emperor's Proposals of Peace, 188. Unites Wales to England, 191. Suppresses the lesser Monasteries by consent of Parliament, ib. His Answer to the German Protestants Proposal of a League, 192. Puts Ann Bolen his Queen to Death, 195. Marries Mrs Seymour, ib. Will not be reconciled to the Pope, 196. Offended with Francis I. 199. Publishes the six Articles, 201. His Injunctions on the Clergy, 204. Murmurs and a Rebellion by the Papists, 207. Writes an Answer to the Rebels Demands, 207, 208. Declares against the Pope's Power of calling a Council, 211. Other Rebellions, ib. His Negotiations with the German Protestants, and their Objections to his Reformation, 213, 217. He treats of a Marriage with the Dutchess of Milan on Q. Jane's Death, 214. Puts down Relicks and Pilgrimages, 215. Disputes with Friar Lambert for Transubstantiation, 216. Puts several Persons to Death for corresponding with Cardinal Pool, ib. His Policy to excuse his suppressing the greater Monasteries, 217. Erects six new Bishopricks, 218. Why he kept to the old Religion, 220. Endeavours in vain to get Francis I. to enter into a League with him, 221. Marries Ann of Cleves, yet dislikes her, ib. 222. Endeavours again to have an Interview with the Scots King, but cannot, ib. Is divorc'd from Ann of Cleves, 224. Marries Catherine Howard, 225. Raises a cruel Persecution about the six Articles, 226. Has Catherine Howard put to Death for Adultery, 229. Calls himself King of Ireland, 230. Declares a War with James V. King of Scots, and requires Homage of him, 232. Fond to get Mary Queen of Scots marry'd to his Son Prince Edward, 234. The Marriage Articles sign'd and broken, 235. Causes of his War with France, 236. His Treaty with the Emperor, ib. 237. Puts out a new Book of Religion, 238. Marries the Lady Catherine Par Widow to the Lord Latimer, 239. Sends the Emperor assistance against Francis I. 240. Impower'd to dispose of the Crown by Will, 241. His War with Scotland, 243. His Preparations for an Expedition against France, 244. Passes over in great State to the Siege of Bulloign, 245. Enters the Town, 246. Returns, 248. His Care for strengthening his Coasts, 249. His Art in War, ib. His Fleet worsts the French, 250. His last Speech to the Parliament for Peace and Moderation, 253. Concludes a Peace with Francis I. 255. He and Francis I. resolve to reform Religion in their Kingdoms, 257. Forbids the Translation of the Bible, 262. Angry with Q. Catherine Par for disputing with him against Popery, 263. Consents that Articles be drawn up against her, ib. He excuses her and removes her Enemies, ib. Is taken ill of his last Sickness, 266. Founds St. Bartholomew's Hospital, ib. His Death, ib. And Character, ib. His Faults, 267. One of the most glorious Princes of his Age, ib. His Funeral describ'd, 275.

Henry II. the French King, send's an Army into Scotland, 291. His some Advantages over the English in the Bulloignois, 300. Besieges Bulloign, ib. Concludes a Peace with Q. Elizabeth, 374. He endeavours to make the Scots Queen, Queen of England, 378. Kill'd at a Tournament, ib.

Henry III. the French King, favours Mary Queen of Scots, 451. War with the Protestants, 452. Refuses to deliver up the English Popish Refugees, 497. To protect the Netherlanders, 507. Mediates for the Scots Queen's Life with Q. Elizabeth, 531. His Ambassador hires a Man to kill Q. Elizabeth, 533. The Holy League set on foot against him, 551. He is incourag'd by Q. Elizabeth, ib. Does what the Duke of Guise will have him, ib. Orders him to be stab'd, 556. Stab'd himself, ib.

Henry IV. King of Navarre succeeds him 556. Driven to great Straits, ib. Q. Elizabeth sends him Succours, and he marches against Paris, ib. Assisted by her again, 558. Excommunicated by the Pope, 574. Imposes on Q. Elizabeth's Generosity and Friendship, ib. Breaks his Promise, 561. Does not do well by her, 569. Turns Papist, and his Reasons for it, 573. Q. Elizabeth's Letter to him upon it, ib. Confesses he owes all to her, 574. The Holy League against him dissolv'd, 578. Declares War with Spain, 582. On what Terms the Court of Rome admitted of his Recantation, 583. His Treaty with Q. Elizabeth against Spain, 594. His Conference with Secretary Cecil about a Peace with Spain, 604. Makes a private Treaty, ib. A Character of him, 606.

Out of Wilson.

Massacred, 643. Gives James I. intimation of the Designs of the Papists against him, 675. Despises him, 683. Stab'd by Ravillac, 684. His Saying to the Lord Sanquir, the Occasion of that Lord's Death, 688.

Henry, Prince, Son to K. James, his Birth, 577. Q. Elizabeth stands Godmother to him, ibid. His Death, 623.

Out of Wilson.

Created Prince of Wales, 684. His Character, ib. He is popular, ib. Proposals of a Match between him and the Infanta of Spain, 685. Hates Car his Father's Favourite, 686. In love with the Countess of Essex, ib. He slights her, ib. His Death, 680. Suspected to be poison'd, ib. An admirable Letter of his on a Match propos'd between him and a Daughter of France, ib. His Saying to Sir James Elphinston who offer'd to kill Car, 690. He is open'd and bury'd, ib. Favour'd Sir Walter Raleigh, 714. Sir Walter's Love for him, ib.

Henry Stuart Lord Darly, marries the Scots Queen, 397. Proclaim'd King, ib. Q. Elizabeth will not let him have that Title from her Ministers in Scotland, 401. Set against the Queen of Scots by Morton, 403. Is for murdering the Earl of Murray, dissuaded by his Wife, ib. Murder'd by Earl Bothwel, ib. A Protestation of the Lords Argile and Huntley relating to his Murder, 404.

Henry, King of Navarre, marri'd to Margaret the French King's Sister, 444. The Massacre of the Protestants at his Wedding, ib. Taken into Custody by order of the Queen Mother, 451. Supply'd with Mony by Q. Elizabeth, 512, 555. See Henry IV.

Herbert, Edward, Lord of Cherbury, his History of Henry VIII. pag. 1. &c.

Herbert, Lord, lies down before Tournay, 16. Created Earl of Worcester, 20. Will not suffer the Mareschal Chandee to enter Tournay with Banners display'd, 32.

Herbert, Sir Gerard, Governour of Heidelberg, slain at the taking of it by Count Tilly, 757.

Herbert, Mr. Francis, his brave Defence of Darvo against the Rebel O Neal's Son, 181.

Herbert, Sir Edward, Ambassador in France, recall'd for treating the Constable de Luines irreverently, 657. Irreverently treated by the Constable, 758.

Hermitage, burnt, 155, 218.

Hertford, Edward Seymour Earl of, sent with Forces against the French, 226. Sent into Scotland with an Army, 242. Burns Edinburgh and other Towns, 243. Defeats the Mareschal de Biez, 250. Sent into Scotland again, 251. Governor of Bulloign, 254. See Somerset, Duke of.

Hertford, Edward Seymour Earl of, marries the Lady Catherine Grey of the Royal Blood, 389. How he was punish'd for it, ib.

Hesketh, Richard, endeavours to persuade the Earl of Derby to rebel against Q. Elizabeth, 574. He is hang'd, ib.

Heywood, Jasper, the first Jesuit that ever came into England, 497.

Hicks, Mr. his Bravery and Infamy at the same time in France, 742.

Higham, Clement, Esq; chosen Speaker of Q. Mary's third Parliament, 345. His Speech, ibid.

High-Commission-Court a Grievance in King James I's Reign, 681.

Holland falls off from the Spaniards, 446. The States assisted by Q. Elizabeth, 510. They make the Earl of Leicester Governor of their Provinces, 511. Complain of him, 512, 540. Jealous of the English, 541. They choose Count Maurice Governor of their Provinces, ib. Their Answer to Q. Elizabeth's Demands of Mony the had been out upon them, 585. Their Proposals to repay it accepted by the Queen 586.

Hollanders fall upon the English in the East-Indies, 654. King of Spain proposes a Peace to them, and on what Conditions, 656. A Treaty concluded with him, 683. They suspect K. James, ib. Disunion in their Provinces, 714 to 718.

Holt, a Jesuit, his horrid Designs against the Life of Q. Elizabeth, 582.

Homage due from the Scots King to the King of England, prov'd by many Examples in Henry VIII's Declaration of War against James V. 232.

Hooker, Richard, his Death and Character, 619.

Hooper, Dr. Bishop of Glocester, depriv'd by Q. Mary, 333, 335. Condemn'd and burnt at Glocester, 349.

Hospital, Michael, Chancellor of France, his Speech to the English Ambassadors who demanded Calais, 406.

Howard, the Lord Edward, Lord Admiral, and Thomas, Sons of the Earl of Surrey, kill Barton the Scotch Pirate, 7. The Lord Edward, accompanies the Marquiss Dorset in his Expedition to Spain, 9, 10. Lands in France, 11. His brave Answer to the French, ib. Fights the French Fleet, ib. And again, 13. In which Battle he was lost, ib. His Brother the Lord Thomas succeeds him as Admiral, ib. His bold Message to the Scots King, 18. Created Earl of Surrey, 21.

Howard, Thomas Lord, imprison'd for privately contracting Marriage with the Lady Margaret Douglass King Henry's Niece, 201.

Howard, Charles, Lord of Effingham, made Admiral of England to resist the Spanish Armada, 543. Fights the Spanish Fleet in the Channel, 546, 547. His Care, ib. Disperses them, 547, 548. Sent with a Fleet against Spain, 591. Made Earl of Nottingham, 599. The Reasons for it mention'd in his Patent, ib.

Howard, Lord Thomas, attack'd at the Azores by Bassano the Spanish Admiral, 565. Sent with the Earl of Essex in his second Expedition against Spain, 597. Made Lord Walden, 602.

Howard, Katherine, marry'd to Henry VIII. 225. Her Incontinence before and after Marriage, 228, 229. She is attainted, and beheaded, ib.

Howard, Frances Lady, Daughter to the Earl of Suffolk, marry'd to the Earl of Essex, 686. Is an ill Wife, ib. She is in love with Car the King's Favourite, ib. Her wicked Contrivances with Anne Turner to gain the Love of Car, 687. Her immodest Practices to prevent her Husband's enjoying her in the Country while she was there, ib. Her adulterous Commerce with Car, 688. Enrag'd with Sir Tho. Overbury for opposing her Marriage with him, 691. Plots his Death, ib. The Divorce between her Husband and her su'd out, 682. The Cheat she put upon the Matrons who were to examine her, ib. The Sentence of Divorce, ib. Marry'd to the Earl of Somerset, 693. Apprehended for the Murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, 698. Condemn'd, 699. Lives obscurely and in ill terms with her Husband Car, ib. Her loathsom Death, ib.

Hue propos'd to be one of the two Ports in England for settling a Mart for Cloth, 317.

Hume Castle surpriz'd, and the English Garrison put to the Sword, 291.

Hungerford, Walter Lord, beheaded, and why, 215.

Hunsdon, Robert Carey Lord, suppresses Leonard Dacre's Rebellion, 422. Commands an Army to guard the Queen's Person at the Spanish Invasion, 547.

Huntley, Earl of, challenges the Duke of Somerset, General of the English Forces, 282. Answer'd by the Earl of Warwick, ib. Disowns the Challenge, 283. Taken Prisoner, 286. His Answer to one who ask'd him how he lik'd the Scots Match, ib.

Huntley, Earl of, his Protestation concerning the murder of the Lord Henry Darnly, Husband to Mary Queen of Scots, 404. Stir'd up by the Spaniards to a Rebellion, 551. Is pardon'd, ib. Kills the Earl Bothwell's Friend Murray, 567. Rebels against King James, 471. Flies to France, 576.

Hussey, Lord, try'd and beheaded for Dr. Makrel's Rebellion, 212.

I.

Jackman and Pitman endeavour to find out the North Passage to the Indies, 479.

Jacobs, Lady, her Contrivance to get Mony of Gondomar, 726.

James IV. King of Scots, his Disposition towards Henry VIII. 5, 6. Resents the Death of Barton the Scot Pirate, 7. He leagues with France against England, 12. His Reply to the English Ambassador, ib. Defies the King of England, ib. He denounces War, and invades England, 18. His Answer to the Earl of Surrey's Challenge, and Defence of his Invasion, ib. He gives Battle; his Valour, and Death on the spot, ib.

James V. declar'd King at two years old, 26. His Person seiz'd by the Duke of Albany, 27. Deliver'd by the English Party in Scotland, 83. Has the Emperor's Order sent him, 166. Concludes a Treaty of Peace with Henry VIII. 176. Excuses an Interview with him, 177. He excuses it again, 184, 193. Goes in disguise to France, and marries Magdalen the French King's Daughter without the Privity of the King of England, ib. Caress'd by the Pope to act against K. Henry, 196. Marries Mary of Guise his second Wife, 202, 222. Refuses an Interview again, 222. Promises an Interview, 227. Yet refuses to come at the time, 228. Henry VIII. declares War with him, 229. His Army routed by Sir Thomas Wharton, 233. He dies of Grief, or as others say, of a Wound receiv'd in the Fight, ib. His Character, ib.

James VI. King of Scotland, born, 399. Recommended to Q. Elizabeth by his Mother the Scots Queen, 401. Crown'd by his Mother's Resignation, 405. Takes the Government on himself, and sends an Ambassador to Q. Elizabeth, to demand his Lands in England, 461. His extraordinary Favour to Monsieur Obigney, 464. Refuses Audience to Q. Elizabeth's Ambassador sent to complain of him, 482. Has the Earl of Morton beheaded, who was the best Friend to England in all Scotland, 483. Seiz'd by the Earl of Gowry and others, 489. Courted by the English and French, 491. Makes his Escape, 492. His Answer to Walsingham's Advice, ib. His Proceedings against Earl Gowry 498. His Subjects invade England, 500. Several exil'd Lords return in Arms, and are reconcil'd to him, 506. He makes a strict league with Q. Elizabeth, 513, 514. Mediates with Q. Elizabeth for his Mother's Life, 530, 531. Q. Elizabeth's Letter to him, disowning the Knowledge of the Scots Queen's Death, 536. Will not give Audience to her Ambassador, 539. He is for War with her, and why he did not undertake it, ib. Is zealous against the Spanish Invasion, 544. Kind Offers made him by Q. Elizabeth, 548. A pleasant Saying of his on the Spanish Invasion, 549. A Rebellion by Huntley, and other Papists, 552. He Pardons Huntley, ib. He marries Anne of Denmark in Norway, 557. Delivers up Orork the Irish Rebel to Q. Elizabeth, 561. Two Attempts of Earl Bothwell against him, 567. His Answer to Q. Elizabeth about Papists and the Spaniards, 571. Forc'd to pardon Bothwell, ib. Asserts his Authority, ib. Scots Clergy summon a Convention without his Warrant, 572. Marches against the Popish Lords, 576. Raises Forces against the Spaniards, 581.

From Cambden's Annals.

James I. King of England, invited to come to England, 641. Arrives at London, and makes eighty Knights promiscuously, ib. Crown'd in a Storm, 641. Finds fault with some things in the Liturgy, 642. Makes Peace with Spain, ib. Proclaim'd King of Great Britain, France and Ireland, that the Name of England might be extinct, ib. Makes Speeches to the Parliament about a Union of the two Kingdoms, ib. Lavish of his Honours, 641, 642, 643, 644, &c. to 659, and 664, 665. His Advice to Sir Francis Bacon when he gave him the Seals, 647. Exacts a great Sum of Mony of the Londoners, ib. Goes to Scotland, and returns, ib. Reprimands the Doctors of Cambridge for favoring Arminianism, 648. Permits Sports on the Lord's Day, 649, 709. Writes Meditations on the Lord's Supper, and dedicates the Book to the Marquis of Buckingham, 651. Falls sick upon the Road from Newmarket, ib. Visits the Lord Mayor's, to procure a match for John Villiers, the Marquiss of Buckingham's Brother, with the Mayor's Daughter, 652. Writes a Book of the Inauguration of a King, 653. Makes a pompous Procession to Paul's, ib. Silences 170 Ministers for opposing Episcopacy in Scotland, ib. Sends a small Assistance to his Son in Law the King of Bohemia, 654. Threatens the Londoners with Soldiers, 657. Angry with the Parliament, and why, 658. Publishes a Book of his Reasons for dissolving them, 659. Stands bare to Sir Henry's [illegible] ib.

Wilson's History of him, 661.

Enters England, 662. His Favour to some Popish Lords, 663. Crown'd with his Queen, ib. His Behaviour at the Conference at Hampton Court between the Prelates and Puritans, 665. Puts out a severe Proclamation against Jesuits, ib. Willing to have the Pope his Friend, 666. Writes to Pope Clement VIII. and recommends the Bishop of Vaison for a Cardinal's Cap, ib. Disowns it to Q. Elizabeth, but not clear'd of it, ib. Impatient of being seen publickly, 667. His tedious Speech to his first Parliament, 668 to 673. Zealous for a Union of the two Kingdoms, ib. Finds out the meaning of the dark Letter to the Lord Monteagle about the Gunpowder Plot, 675. Suppos'd to have some Intimation of it from Henry IV. of France, ib. Rumors of his Death, 676. His Speech about the Union, 678. Murmurs against him, and why, 680. His hastiness to have the Mourning for Q. Elizabeth over, 681. Offends the Lawyers by dropping some Expressions against the Common Law, ib. Prais'd by his Ministers, 680, 681. His Speech about the Common Law, 681. His Proclamation to restrain the new Buildings in London, 683. The Illegality of it, ib. His first Appearance in foreign Affairs mean, and his Conduct the same, ib. Affronts put upon his Ambassador at the Treaty between Spain and Holland, ib. Contemn'd by Henry IV. ib. And suspected by the Dutch, ib. Dissolves the Parliament, 684. A Censure of his Behaviour on his Mother Q. Mary's Death, 686. Why he commanded nobody to appear in mourning soon after the Death of his Son Pr. Henry, 690. Marries his Daughter the Princess Elizabeth to the Elector Palatine, ib. Promotes the Countess of Essex's Divorce, and her Marriage with Car, 692. Answers Archbishop Abbot's Reasons against it himself, ib. Gives her in Marriage to Car, 693. Sells Knighthood cheap, 695. His Bounty, ib. Holds his second Parliament, 696. Requires a Benevolence, ib. His extreme Familiarity with Buckingham set up against Car, 697. A very odd Letter of his to the Duke, ib. An Expression of his said to be spoken in Council concerning Sir Tho. Overbury's Death, 702. Comes to the Star-chamber, and speaks to the Court against several Corruptions, 706. Goes to Scotland, 708. His Bounty to his new Favourite [illegible] ib. Delights in detecting Impostures, 711. Said to have discover'd Sir Walter Raleigh's Design to the Spanish Ambassador, 712. His Favour to Gondomar the Spanish Ambassador, and why he hated Sir W. [illegible], 714. Opposes the Arminians in Holland strenuously, 715, 716, &c. Yet they are afterwards highly favour'd in his and his Son's Reign, 719. Sends an Ambassador to mediate a Peace between the Emperor and the Bohemians, 720, 721. His Backwardness to assist his Son in Law, the King of [illegible] 721. His Ambassy comes to [illegible] For [illegible] of Spain, and [illegible] the [illegible] Treaty, ib. [illegible] A particular [illegible] [illegible] Family, [illegible] 728. A [illegible] Speech to his [illegible] [illegible] abroad [illegible] Remonstrance to [illegible] testant Religion, [illegible] Tented 741. [illegible] ib. His Answer [illegible] about their Remon[illegible] 743 [illegible] Reflections upon it [illegible] The Nobility [illegible] him against [illegible] Lords, 747. He is angry with them, and the Earl of Essex in particular, ib. Dissolves the Parliament, 748. Severe Reflections upon him, ib. Scandalously reflected upon abroad, 749. Orders all imprison'd Papists to be releas'd, 750. Tolerates Arminianism, 751. His Directions for Preachers 752. Permits the Lord Vaux to transport 4000 men into the Netherlands against the Hollanders, 753. Holds a Correspondence with Cardinal Bandino, and other Cardinals, 754. His Instructions to his Ambassador Digby about the Spanish Match, ib. Spain's Juggling with him, ib. Second Instructions to Digby his Ambassador in Spain, 756. His third, 757. His Patience ib. Deceiv'd by the Spaniards, and yet satisfy'd with them, ib. The Treaty of Marriage with the Infanta concluded, ib. The Articles of it, ib. 758. Further impos'd on, 759. Reproves the Marquis of Buckingham [illegible] Mirth to divert him, 760. He begs pardon of one [illegible] for kicking him on his knees, ib. Sends the Prince and the Marquis of Buckingham into Spain, 763. Afraid of the Prince's being [illegible], 764. His own Saying of his Concessions to the Church of Rome, 767. Keeps his Transactions about the Match private from his Council, ib. The Match concluded in England, 769. The Articles publick and private, ib. Match agreed in Spain, 775. The Spaniards make delays about the Match, 776. His Speech to the Parliament, 778. His Letter to Secretary Conway, 780. Speech to both Houses, ib. His Answer to the Parliament's Petition about Recusants, 784. Enters on a Treaty of Marriage with France, 785. His Death, 789. Account of his Sickness, 790. Description and Character of him, 791.

Jane Grey, Lady, marry'd to the Lord Guilford Dudley, 324. Proclaim'd Queen, 329. Averse to it, ib. Her Age and Character, ibid. Her Transactions at home and abroad on her Accession to the Crown, 330. Writes to several Gentlemen to take Arms for her, 331. Her Answer to her Father when he demanded the Regalia of her, 332. Her Person seiz'd, ib. Condemn'd, 336. She is too hard for Dr. Feckham Abbot of Westminster, who would have perverted her to Popery, 342, 343. Her Piety and Courage at her death, ib. Her last Speech, ib. She is beheaded, ib.

Jeannin, Monsieur, the French Ambassador at Constantinople, his Account of King James's pretending the Dutch were dependent on England, by his Ambassador there, 683.

Jenkinson, Anthony, his Voyages and Discoveries, 468.

Jerningham, Sir Robert, at once Gentleman of the Bed-chamber to Henry VIII. and Francis I. 97. Dies of the Plague before Naples, 98.

Jesuits,

An INDEX to the Second Volume.

Jesuits, their Order first founded by Ignatius Loyola, 226. Creep into England first, 476. Banish'd, 497. Extirpated here, 643. King James's seeming or real Severity against them, and the occasion of it, 665. Father the Gunpowder Plot on the Puritans, 676. Invite the Spaniards to invade England, 676. A Proclamation against them, 684. Their juggling, 709. Pretend to dispossess a Boy possest of a Devil, 710. Driven out of Bohemia by the Protestants, 72[illegible]. They swarm, 728. The Jesuits indulg'd by the Pope, 729.

Jewel, Dr. John, Bishop of Salisbury, his Death and Character, 437.

Images taken down out of all Churches, 292. Censur'd by the People, ib. Backwardness in doing of it, ib.

Impostor, one pretending to be possest with a Devil discover'd, 710, 711.

Inclosures forbidden, 289.

Indulgences, extravagant ones sent into England and elsewhere, 19. The Cause of the Reformation, ib. Oppos'd in England, 30. A Speech against them before the Clergy, ibid. 10000 taken by the English as they were carrying to America by the Spaniards, 568.

Indies, East and West, the Limits of the Portuguese and Spaniards Dominions there, 80.

Infanta of Spain set up for Successor to the Crown of England by the Papists in Q. Elizabeth's Reign, [illegible]. Their Pretences for it, ib.

Informers punish'd, 7.

Inniskilling besieg'd by Maguire, 581. Reliev'd by Sir William Russel Deputy of Ireland, ib.

Interview between Henry VIII and Francis I between Guisnes and Ardres, the Preparations for it, 34. The Order of it, 35. Charles V. endeavours to break it off, ib. But in vain, 36. A Discription of the Place, ib. The Interview, ib. The Magnificence and Exercises there, 36, 37. Between Charles V. and Henry VIII. at Gravelling, 37. A second between Henry VIII. and Francis I. 160. Between Charles V. and the Pope, 130, 135, 161. Between Charles and the Pope again, 239.

John D'Albret King of Navarre, excommunicated by the Pope, and driven out of his Territories by the French and Spaniards, 9, 10. His Death, 11.

Ireland, Affairs of, 40, 46, 57, 96, 180, 211, 227, 230, 238, 291, 314, 322, 380, 385, 391, 398, 409, 410, 423, 424, 430, 437, 445, 450, 455, 457, 460, 461, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 506, 507, 542, 548, 550, 561, 566, 574, 581. Rebellions there, 587 to 591, 602, 603, 617, 619, 620, 621, [631,] [644,] [645,] [646,] [647,] [651,] [652.]

Ireland, Governours there, their several Names, 398. Q. Elizabeth's Saying of 'em, 457.

Irish taught to war by Sir John Perrot, 542, 588. Truces with them prejudicial, 588.

Judges, the Scots Queen's, a List of them, 519. The Form of the Session of the Court, 522. Pronounce Sentence against her, 525. Confirm'd by Parliament, 526.

Judges Itinerant, their Flattery of K. James in their Circuits, 753.

Juliers Siege, 683.

K.

Katherine, Princess, Widow to Prince Arthur, marry'd to King Henry VIII his Brother, and for what Reasons, 3, 4. Made Regent during the King's Absence in France, 15. Her Divorce first put in agitation, 99. Surpriz'd at it, 102. Her Carriage upon it, and Hatred to Cardinal Wolsey, ib. 121. Engages the Emperor in her Interest, ib. Her Behaviour 103. Her Answer to Campeius the Legate, ib. Her Council before the Delegates at the Trial of the Cause, 107. Protests against their Jurisdiction, and is pronounc'd contumacious, 108. And again 109, 114. Refuses to refer her Case, 153. She never sees the King more, 154. She sollicites her Affair at Rome, 156. She is cited to appear before Archbishop Cranmer, 163. The Sentence of Divorce pronounc'd against her, ib. 164, 165. Order'd to use the Stile of Princess Dowager only, 165. Her Marriage pronounc'd valid at Rome, 173. Made void by Act of Parliament, and she no more to be stil'd Queen, 174. Two Bishops sent to inform her of it, 175. Her Reception of them and the Message, ib. 176. Her Death, 188. The Letter she wrote the King just before she dy'd, ib. Her Funeral, ib.

Katherine de Medicis, the French Queen, her vain Title to the Crown of Portugal, 474. Excites Q. Elizabeth against Philip II. ib.

Katherine Grey, Lady, attempted to be stolen by the Spaniards, and why, 373. Her Suffering for marrying the Earl of Hertford, 389. And Death, ib.

Kemish, Captain, Sir Walter Raleigh's Servant, brings him some Ore of a Gold Mine at Guiana, 712. Puts his Master on that Expedition, ib. Kills himself in resentment of some Words said to him by Sir Walter, 713. His Death the Ruin of the Voyage, ib.

Kent, Earl of, his Saying to the Scots Queen when she was executed, 534.

Kent, the Nun of, pretends to prophesy against Henry VIII's marriage with Anne Bolen, 169. Attainted in Parliament, 172. Punish'd with her Accomplices, 176. Several eminent Persons gave credit to her, ib.

Ket, Robert, a Tanner of Norfolk, raises a Rebellion against the Gentry, 295. His Seat of Justice, ib. Seizes Norwich, 297. His and his Followers Demands, ib. They reject the Kings Answer and Pardon, ib. Are routed, 299. Are taken with his Brother, ib. Hang'd, 303. His Brother hang'd on a Steeple to the great scandal of the Papists, ib.

Keys, Robert, hang'd for the Gun-powder Plot, 675.

Kildare, Gerald Fitz-Gerald Earl of, his Quarrel with the House of Ormond, 40. He is imprison'd for his disrespectful Carriage to the Cardinal, 41. Restor'd to the Lieutenancy of Ireland, but is again in trouble try'd and condemn'd, 96. A Warrant sign'd by Wolsey for his Execution without the King's Knowledge, ib. Made Lieutenant of Ireland again, 181. Accus'd of ill Practices, and sent for to England, ib. His Son rebels, ib. His Son and five Brothers hang'd, 182.

Kildare, Henry Earl of, dies of Grief for the Death of his Foster Brothers kill'd in Tyrone's Rebellion, 605.

Kingston, Sir William, unhors'd at a Tilt by Henry VIII, 37. Constable of the Tower, 194. His Conference with Q. Anne Bolen, ib. 195.

Kingston, Sir Anthony, hangs the Mayor of Bodmin, 295. The particular manner of it, ib. Hang's a Miller's man for a jest, 296. Seiz'd for a Plot to rob the Exchequer, 353. Dies on the Road, ib.

Knevett, Sir Edmund, attacks Ket and his Rebels, but is worsted, 297.

Knevett, Charles, Steward to the Duke of Buckingham, turn'd out of his Service for exacting on his Tenants, 38. Does him ill Offices, 40. Accuses him of Treason, 41.

Knighthood sold cheaply, 695.

Knights of the Bath made by Q. Mary, 337.

Knights of the Carpet, 90. made by her, ib.

Knights of Calis, a List of them, 593.

Knights, So made at once by K. James, 642.

Knox, Mr. preaches K. James VI. of Scotland's Coronation Sermon, 405.

L.

Lake, Secretary, his Trial for injuring the Countess of Exeter, fin'd and turn'd out of his Office, 651. Reads his Confession, 653.

Lamb, Dr. a Witch, 790.

Lambert, Mr. burnt for opposing Transubstantiation, 216.

Lancaster, Captain James, his Voyage to the East-Indies, and Adventures, 565, 566. The first that put that Trade into a method, ib. His Voyage to the West-Indies, and Successes at Brazil, 579.

Langey, Monsieur, his Embassy from Francis I. the French King to the Protestant Princes of Germany, to reconcile matters of Religion, 187, 188.

Latimer, John Lord, one of the Yorkshire Rebels Commissioners to treat with Henry VIII. 207. His Widow, Lady Katherine Parr, marry'd to Henry VIII. 239.

Latimer, Dr. Bishop of Worcester, made so by Anne Bolen's Interest, 195. Is for keeping up some Monasteries, 217. Resigns his Bishoprick on account of the six Articles, 220. Vindicated for the Sermon he preached about the Lord Thomas Seymour, against Sanders and Hayward, 301, 302. His Dispute with the Papists, 344. Condemn'd to be burnt, ib. Burnt, 357.

Laud, Dr. Bishop of St. Davids, is said to be a reputed Papist, 751. To have a motley Form of Religion of his own, 753. K. James has no great Opinion of him, ib.

Lautrec, Francis I.'s General, beaten out of Italy by the Imperialists, 46. His Successes in Italy, 86. His further Successes there, 97. He dies of the Plague, 98. His Character, ib.

Law, the Practice of it interrupted during the Wars between the Houses of York and Lancaster, 1.

Laws made in the Reign of Henry VIII. 6, 8, 12, 19, 23, 24, 56, 138, 151. Relating to the Abuses of the Clergy, 155, 156. Trade, 57, [illegible], 162, 163, [illegible], 172, 173, 175, 189, 191. About Monasteries and Supremacy, ib. About the Succession, 190, 204, 207, 218, 224, 229, 238. About the Succession again, 243, 247. Other Laws, 251. In Edward VI's, 290, 310, 323. In the Reign of Q. Mary, 337, 338, 344, 346, 350, 351, 355, 356, 360. In the Reign of Q. Elizabeth, 382, 386, 391, 401, 426, 488, 503, [illegible], 602. In the Reign of K. James, 641, 657, 676.

Law Ecclesiastical Commissions granted by K. James to reform them, 656, 757.

Lawyers, no Common admitted to be of Henry VIII's Council, 2. Offended with James I. for speaking against the Common Law, 681. His Speech, 682.

League, Holy, what it was 8—12. A grand one against Louis XII, 13. Against the Turks by Maximilian, Charles of Castile, and Henry, 19. By Henry VIII. and Francis I. against them, 31. One against Francis I. 59. One in Italy against Charles V. 69. The Clementine League against Charles, 76, 77. Another between Henry VIII. and Francis I. 83. Between the Emperor and the Pope, 129. A kind of universal one concluded at Rome, 156. Of Smalcald, among the Protestant Princes, 170. Of Nice, between Charles V. and the Protestants, 239. Between the Kings of England and France, 16.

League, Holy, famous one in France, set on foot by the Duke of Guise, 555. Dissolved, 578.

Lecturer, discouraged by K. James, 753.

Lee, Edward, Archbishop of York, forced to join in Ask's Rebellion, 206. Attends him at one of his Consistory, ib.

Leicester, Robert Dudley Earl of, accuses the Lord Keeper Bacon for being against the Scots Succession, 395. A Treaty set on foot for his Marriage with the Scots Queen, 396. He is against the Match, and why, ib. Hates the Earl of Sussex, and why, 398. Made Knight of the Order of St. Michael, 399. How he endeavour'd to set the Queen against a foreign Match, and prais'd a home one, 407. For marrying the Scots Queen to the Duke of Norfolk, 419, 420. Discovers it to the Queen, ib. His Letter to Sir Francis Walsingham in France, about the Queen's marrying the Duke of Anjou or any one else, 434. He gets a Clause into an Act of Parliament with an ill design upon the Succession, 436. A design to massacre him at Paris, 444. Suppos'd to have poison'd the Earl of Essex to marry his Widow, 457. Q. Elizabeth's Saying against her marrying him, 461. Confin'd to his House, and why, 463. Sets an Associaton on foot in defence of the Queen's Person, 499. Sent General to the Assistance of the States of Holland and Zealand, 510. His Instructions, ib. Absolute Authority conferr'd on him by the States, 511. The Queen writes angrily to him for accepting it, ib. His Actions in Holland, ib. 512. Complain'd of by the States, he returns, ib. For poisoning the Scots Queen, and sends a Divine to Sir Francis Walsingham to prove it lawful, 519. His ill Conduct in Holland, 540. The first that had the Title of Excellency, 541. Several vain Medals struck by him, ib. Procures a Pardon by his Tears and Flattery, ib. Commands an Army at the Spanish Invasion, 543. His Death, 549. Titles and Character, ib. His Goods sold to pay his Debts to the Queen, 550.

Leith besieg'd by the English, 381.

Lennox, Matthew Earl of, imploy'd by the French King to break off the intended Marriage between Edw. VI. and the Q. of Scots, 2[illegible].

Lennox, D'Aubigny Duke, his Descent, 464. No[illegible] and Favour with K. James VI. of Scotland, ib. Q. Elizabeth sends an Friend to England, 481. Driven out Ambassador to accuse him, to England, and of Scotland, 489. Comes [illegible] returns to Scotland, as Earl of his Gallantry.

Lennox, Matthew 2nd James V. of Scotland, if 235. Design'd to [illegible] without Issue, ib. His Treaty [illegible] that King dy'[illegible] with

With Henry VIII. and Marriage with the Lady Margaret Douglas, 243. His Expedition into Scotland, ib. Sent into Ireland in order to invade Scotland, 263. His Descent from the Blood Royal of Scotland, 395. Why recall'd out of England by Mary Queen of Scots, 396. His Wife petitions Q. Elizabeth for Justice against Mary the Scots Queen, for the Murder of the Lord Darley his and her Son, 412. Petitions Q. Elizabeth to protect his Grandson James VI. 418. Made Regent of Scotland, 436. Slain, 436. His Wife's Death, 461. Her Troubles occasion'd by Love, ib.

Lerma, Duke, Minister of State in Spain, uses the Lord Digby, K. James's Ambassador for the Match, ill, 749, 752.

Leveson, Sir Richard, Admiral, attacks the Spanish Gallies in the Port of Sesimbria, [647.] Takes two Gallies and a Carack, ib.

Lewis XII. the French King, his Disposition towards Henry VIII. 5, 6. Supports the Duke of Ferrara against the Pope, 6. Joins with Maximilian the Emperor in summoning a General Council, ib. His Successes in Italy, 11. His War with Henry VIII. in Picardy, 16, 17. A Grand League against him, 17. Renounces the Council of Pisa, and makes Peace with the Pope, 19. With K. Henry VIII. ib. Marries the Princess Mary his Sister by Proxy, 20, 21. And at St. Denis in Person, ib. His Death, 22.

Lewis XIII. persecutes his Protestant Subjects, and besieges their Towns, 740.

Lewis, King of Hungary, drown'd in his Flight from the Turks, 78.

Lewis, Duke of Longueville, and other Persons of great Quality taken by the English at the Battel of Spurs, 16. Concludes the Treaty of Peace and Marriage between Lewis XII. and Henry VIII. and his Sister Mary, 19, 20. Is that King's Proxy for the Marriage, 21.

Leyden, John of, his Heresy, 68.

Leyva, Antonio de, his brave Defence of Pavia, 60, 61. His Actions at that Battel, 62, 63, 64. And when he was Governor of Milan, 86, 98. Beats the Count de St. Paul, and takes him Prisoner, 129. Born on Mens Shoulders at the Emperor's Entry into Bologna, 135. His Reward, 136. Invades France, 199. His Death, ib.

Lincoln, Edward Clinton Earl of, sent by Q. Elizabeth with a noble Train Ambassador to Charles IX. 444.

Lincoln, Dr. John Williams Bishop of, and Lord Keeper, his Letter to the Judges to release the imprison'd Papists, 750. His Fortune, 751. His Generosity and Inconstancy, ib.

Lincoln, John, a Broker, raises a seditious Tumult in London, 28. Hang'd, drawn and quarter'd, ib.

Lind, Sir Humphry, publick Dispute at his House with the Jesuites, 770.

Lisle, John Dudley Lord, made Admiral, and sent against Scotland, 242. Governour of Boulogne, 248. See Warwick, Earl of.

Litany first publish'd in English, 248.

Liturgy corrected, and by whom, 271. To be read in English, 276. K. James finds fault with some things in it, 642.

London too much built in Q. Elizabeth's Time, 476. New Buildings restrain'd by a Proclamation of K. James, 641.

Lopez, Roderigo, Q. Elizabeth's Physician hir'd by the Spaniards to poison her, 577. His Defence, ib. He is condemn'd and hang'd, ib.

Lord's Day Sports upon it permitted by an Order of K. James, 649, 709. A Bp. Abbot forbids the reading of it, ib. The Lord Mayor refuses to comply with it, ib. K. James in a great Passion against him, ib.

Lords, House of, their Letter to the Pope in favour of the Divorce, 141, 142, 143, 144. They address Q. Elizabeth to marry, 399.

Lovel, Sir Thomas, a main Instrument in the promotion of Wolsey, 14. Sent with Forces against the French in Picardy, 21.

Louise Mother of Francis I. left Regent of France, 62. Wou'd have marry'd the Duke of Bourbon, 58. Concludes the Treaty of Cambray in Person, 130. Her Death and Character, 150.

Loyola, Ignatius, founds the Jesuites Order, 216.

Luther, Martin, opposes Indulgences, 29. At first mod[illegible] Favour'd by [illegible] Duke of Saxony, ib. Writes to the Pope, ib. He is cited to Rome, 37. [illegible] His second Letter to the Pope, ib. [illegible] things, ib. Erasmus's [illegible] with him in many [illegible]ter to him for Moderation, ib. Melancthon embraces his Opinions, 38. He opposes the Church of Rome more violently, ib. His third Letter to the Pope, ib. Would have him leave the Papacy for a Parsonage, ib. He is terribly prosecuted, ib. Wrote against by Henry VIII. ib. He grows more obstinate, 55. His Apology to the King for answering his Book too sharply, and K. Henry's Answer, 96. Favour'd by the Diet of Spire, ib. His Books to be burnt by a particular Treaty made at Cambray between Henry VIII. and Margaret Governor of the Netherlands, 135. His Death, 258.

Luttrell, Sir John, taken Prisoner by the Scots, and his Garrison of Broughty-craig cut to pieces, 291.

M

Mackrell, Dr. Prior of Barlings in Lincolnshire, raises a Rebellion against Henry VIII. 205.

Maccarty More, Donald, a Lord of Note in Ireland, surrenders his Territories to Q. Elizabeth, and is made Earl of Glencarn, 391.

Macguire, his Rebellion in Ireland, 575. Besieges Inskilling, 581. Forc'd to raise the Siege, ib. Driven from before Monaghan, ib.

Magdalen, Daughter to Francis I. marry'd to James V. of Scotland, 193.

Mayerne, Sir Theodore, not permitted to come into France, 649.

Maine Cuthbert, a Priest, hang'd, 459.

Malta Isle given to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, who were driven out of Rhodes, 51.

Malby, Nicholas, defeats John of Desmond, and his rebellious Army, 473.

Man, Mr. the English Agent in Spain, ill us'd, 410.

Man, Island, a Contest at Law about it in the Family of Derby, 580. The Spaniards have a Design upon it, ib. Sir Thomas Gerard made Governor of it by Q. Elizabeth, ib.

Mansel, Robert, sent against the Turkish Pirates in the Mediterranean, 654. Does nothing remarkable, 658. The Pirates take 35 English Ships to revenge his Attempts, ib. Sent thither by Gondomar's means, 726.

Mansfeld, the Palatinate General, his Troops quite routed, 659. His Loyalty to the King of Bohemia, and Conduct, 725. Brings his Army into Brabant, 759. An Account of their Mutinying, and his Courage in chastizing them, ib. 760. Fights the Battel of Fleury with Cordova General of the Spanish Forces, and joins Prince Maurice, ib. Comes into England, 788. Forces rais'd for him, ib.

Mantua, Marquis of, made a Duke by Charles V. 139.

Mainwaring, Sir Arthur, his violent Love for Ann Turner, the Countess of Essex's great Confident, 687.

Mar, John Erskin Earl of, chosen Regent of Scotland, 436. Goes into Exile rather than he will ask Pardon of James VI. 492.

Margaret, Princess, Governor of the Netherlands, magnificently entertain'd by Henry VIII. at Tournay, 17. She is pleas'd with Charles Brandon, Lord Lisle, ib. Concludes the Treaty of Cambray, 130. Her Death and Character, 150.

Margaret, Queen Regent of Scotland, begs a Peace of Henry VIII. 20. She marries the Earl of Angus, ib. She flies to England from the Duke of Albany, and is nobly entertain'd by her Brother K. Henry, 27. Offended with her Husband, and why, 50, 63. She is divorc'd from him, and marries Henry Stuart, 95.

Margaret, Queen of Navarre, favours the Protestants, 177.

Margaret, Sister to Charles IX. marry'd to the King of Navarre, 444.

Margaret, Daughter to Margaret Regent of Scotland, contracts Marriage privately with the Lord Thomas Howard, 201. For which she is imprison'd, ib. Marry'd to the Earl of Lennox, 243.

Mart in England motion'd, 328. Reasons against it, ib.

Mary, Queen of Hungary, Regent of Flanders, concludes a Truce between Charles V. and Francis I. 219. Refuses to admit Cardinal Pool into the Netherlands, ib.

Mary, Princess, Sister to Henry VIII. contracted in some measure to Charles Son of the Emperor Maximilian, 17. Marry'd to the French King, 21. Her Proceeding with relation to her Marriage with the Duke of Suffolk, 22. The Treasure she brought to England with her, 23.

Mary of Guise, Queen Dowager of Scotland, passes thro' England, 314.

Mary, Princess, Daughter to Henry VIII. her Birth, 26. Betroth'd to the Dauphin Son of Francis I. in St. Paul's Church, 32. Contracted to Charles V. by the Treaty of Windsor, 47. Demanded by the Scots for their K. James V. 63. Charles V. requires her to be deliver'd to him, ib. A Treaty of Marriage between her and Francis I. 80. Her Legitimacy objected against by the Bishop of Tarbe the French Ambassador, 81. Propos'd to the Duke of Orleans, 83, 84. Offer'd to James V. King of Scots by the Emperor, 166. Depriv'd of the Succession by Act of Parliament, 174. Offer'd by the Emperor to the French King's Son, 179. Illegitimated by Parliament, 199. High Treason to assert her Legitimacy, 200. Propos'd to Don Lewis of Portugal, 214. To Duke William of Cleves, 221. The Crown settled on her on certain Conditions, 241. The Duke of Brunswick desires her in Marriage, [illegible] Is deny'd to have Mass said in her House, [illegible] That Affair at large, 316, 317, [illegible] A Design to steal her, and carry her out of England, 315.

Mary I. Queen of England, takes the Title of Queen on her Brother K. Edward's Death, [illegible] Summons the Nobility to attend her, [illegible] Friends begin to [illegible] Several Gentlemen flock in to her, [illegible] Hastings, 331. Her Friends at [illegible] to reduce the Lady Jane, ib. Proclaim'd at London, 332. She comes thither, [illegible] turns out several Bishops, ib. Restores others, ib. 334. Releases several Noblemen that were Prisoners, ib. Endeavours to ingratiate herself with the People, 335. The Solemnity of her Coronation, 337. Restores Popery, 338. Thinks of marrying, 339. Concludes a Treaty of Marriage with Philip of Spain, ib. Murmurs and a Rebellion under Sir Thomas Wyat about it, 340. Her Speech to the Londoners on Wyat's Insurrection, 341. Conditions on which the Parliament consented to her Marriage with Philip, 345. She marries him, ib. Gives out she's with Child, 348. She begins to reign in Blood, 349, 350. Insurrections against her supprest, 353. Declares War against France in her Husband's Quarrel, 354. Loses Calais, 356. The Loss thought to be the chief Cause of her Death, 358. She dies, ib. Her Message to her Sister Q. Elizabeth, 359. A Character of her, ib.

Mary, the Scots Queen, her Birth and Succession to the Crown, 232. A Scot designing to poison her is deliver'd up by K. Edward, 315. Marry'd to Francis the Dauphin, afterwards Francis II. 358. Claims openly the Crown of England, 378. Refuses to ratify a Treaty made in Scotland, when in France, 384, 385. Her Speech to Sir Nicholas Throgmorton on her being refus'd Passage to Scotland, 386. She escapes the English Fleet, 387. Demands to be declar'd Heir to the Crown, ib. Refuses an Interview with Q. Elizabeth, 390. Q. Elizabeth proposes Robert Dudley to her for a Husband, 393. Dissuaded from it by the French, ib. Insulted by the Scots, ib. A Treaty set on foot for her marrying the Earl of Leicester, 396. She marries the Lord Henry Darley, 397. She takes Arms against the Lords that were against the Match, ib. Refuses to give Q. Elizabeth's Ambassador Audience, 398. Her Title favour'd by the Queen of England, 401. Her Behaviour on the Murder of David Rizzi, 403. Marries Earl Bothwell who murder'd the Lord Henry Darley, 404. She is seiz'd and imprison'd, ib. Very ill us'd, 405. The horrid Crimes laid to her Charge by the Conspirators, ib. She resigns the Crown to her Son, ib. Laments the Irregularities of her Life, ib. Quitted of her Husband's Death, 406. She makes her Escape, and raises an Army, 410. Is defeated, and flies into England, ib. Her Letters upon it to Q. Elizabeth, 411. Her Commissioners and the Regent's Debates in England, 412, 413, 414, 415. She is removed from her first Keeper, and why, ib. She consents to marry the Duke of Norfolk, and on what Terms, 420. Commissioners sent to treat with her, 429. Her Answer, ib. Another Treaty comes to nothing, 431. Writes to the Duke of Norfolk, 432. Plots for her Escape, 432, 433. Her Marriage with the Duke of Norfolk hasten'd, ib. Discover'd, 344. A Treaty with her, ib. The Parliament of England would have her proceeded against as the Wife of an English Peer, 436. Charg'd with ill Designs against Q. Elizabeth, 441. Her Answer, ib. Don John of Austria wou'd marry her, 458. Another Treaty with her comes to nothing, 488. A long Letter of hers to Q. Elizabeth, 489, 490. Her Liberty oppos'd by the [illegible] of the English Party, 491, 492. Her good Promises, 498. Makes Propositions for her Liberty, 499. Remov'd to other Keepers, 501. Deals with the Pope and Spaniards, ib. She is accus'd of Babington's Plot, 517. A Commission to try her, 519, 520. Her Trial, 521——525. Sentence pronounc'd against her, 525. How she bore the News, 528. The Sentence condemn'd, 529, 530. Her Behaviour at her Execution, 534, 535. Her Death, 535. Her Body translated to Westminster, 643.

of

Mary Grey, a Lady of the Royal Blood, her mean Marriage, [illegible].

Masques frequent in K. James's Court, 685.

Mayor of Paris, 444. Excus'd to Q. Elizabeth by the French King, 446.

Maurice, Count of Nassau, chosen Governor of the United Provinces, 541. Gains the Battel of Newport, 597. Will not wear his Garter and George, and on what account, 693. Oppos'd by [illegible] and the Remonstrants in Holland, 716. [illegible] early stop to them, and dishonours [illegible], ib. His Death, 789. Comparison between him and Henry IV. 790.

Maximilian, Emperor of Germany, the State of his Affairs on K. Henry VIII's Accession to the Throne, 5. Enters into a League with Lewis XII against Pope Julius II. and joins with him in summoning a General Council, 6. Abandons the French King and the Council, 11. His Confederacy with Henry VIII. and on what Terms, 13. Comes to Henry VIII's Camp before Terouenne, wears St. George's Cross, and receives his Pay 100 Crowns a day, 6. Leaves the English Camp in Discontent, 17. Renews his League with Henry VIII. ib. Flatters Henry VIII. with hopes that he will resign the Empire to him, 25, 28. He will not trust Cardinal Wolsey, 26. His double Dealing with Henry VIII. 38. Makes League with France, 20. Writes to the Pope to be moderate about Indulgences, ib. And to the Lateran Council, ib. His Character, ib. He was never crown'd, ib. He wrote his own History, ib.

Maximilian II. Emperor of Germany, his Death and Character, 456.

Mayenne, Earl of, driven from the Borders by the Lord Dacres, 314.

Mayne, Duke of, proclaim'd Lieutenant General of the Crown of France against Henry IV. 556.

Mechlin taken and plunder'd by the English, 476.

Medicis, Alexander of, Son of Lorenzo Duke of Urbin, made Duke of Florence by the Emperor Charles V. 139. Murder'd by Lorenzo, and how, 209.

Medina Celi, Duke of, beaten by the Netherlanders at Sea, 446.

Medina Sidonia, Duke of, made General of the Spaniards at their projected Invasion, 545. His Fleet destroy'd by the English, 546, 547, 548.

Melancthon Philip, embraces Luther's Opinions, 38. Brought to the Diet at Spire by the Duke of Saxony, 96. And to the Diet of Augsburg, 119. He disputes with Ecclesius, ib. Sent for by Francis I. 184. And Henry VIII. 187. Writes to K. Henry for a perfect Reformation, 237.

Mendoza, the Spanish Ambassador, commanded out of England by Q. Elizabeth, and why, 497. Publishes a Poem on the Spaniards Victory in 88. before their Armada was defeated, 548.

Merchants sent Guns to Spain in time of War, 569.

Merveille, Francis the Fr. Agent at Milan, the History of his Murder, 169.

Mexico discover'd and conquer'd by the Spaniards, 34.

Middlesex, Earl of, Lord Treasurer, question'd in Parliament, 736.

Mildmay, Sir Anthony, his Saving of the French dealing with the English in their Negotiations, 691.

Mo[illegible]ley debauch'd by a Maid pretending to be possess'd, 452.

Mint, the Profit it brought in to Edward VI. 313.

Mitchel, Sir Francis, his unlawful Practices, 656. His Punishment, ib. The Form of his being degraded, 657. A wretched Justice of the Peace at Clerkenwell, 731. He and his Clerks live among Brothels, subsist by Pensions for Connivancy, ib. His shameful Punishment, 734.

Modena, Abbot, the Pope's Nuncio to England, refus'd to be admitted by Q. Elizabeth, 388.

Mompesson, Sir Giles, a Justice of Peace, his unlawful Practices, 656 He flies, ib. Degraded of his Knighthood, 657. His Crimes, 731. Is the Marquis of Buckingham's Creature, 734.

Monasteries ruin'd by Cardinal Wolsey, and for what, 60, 61. The King advis'd by him to dissolve more, 102. Three supprest by Henry VIII. 178. Speeches for and against suppressing them in Council, 185. Visited by Cromwell, an account of the Visitation, and his Censure, 186. The lesser supprest by Act of Parliament, 291. Vast Numbers supprest, 194. Murmurs at it, ib. More supprest, 216. The greater supprest, 217. The Number of the whole, 218. Settled on the King by Act of Parliament, ib. The Monks begin to flourish in Q. Mary's Reign, 354.

Money paid to the King not lost, 55. Carry'd out in time of War excus'd, ib. Coin'd in such small Pieces that it soon wore out, 56.

Montaigne, Reflections upon his History by the Lord Herbert, 248.

Monson, Sir Thomas accus'd of Witchcraft, 644. Committed to the Tower, 645. Try'd for the Murder of Sir T. Overbury, 702.

Monson, William his Brother, committed about the Murder of Sir Tho. Overbury, 641.

Monteagle, Lord, the Letter written to him about the Gunpowder Plot from an unknown hand, 672. He communicates it to Cecil, and he to the King ib. Rewarded by the King 676.

Montgomery, Philip Herbert Earl of, K. James his Favourite, 635. Switch'd by a Scots man, 658.

Montmorency, Anne de, highly honour'd by Francis I. 210. Banish'd his Presence, 227. Taken Prisoner at the Battle of St. Quintin, 355.

Montmorency, Duke of, Ambassador to Q. Elizabeth, made Knight of the Garter, 414. The Honour of that Family, ib.

More, Sir, Thomas, Judge of the Sheriff's Court, 28. Made a Privy Counsellor, ib. Strives in vain to appease a Tumult in London, ib. Chosen Speaker of the House of Commons, 55 Is for a Supply, ib. K. Henry's Ambassador at the Treaty of Cambray, 130. Made Ld. Chancellor, 136. His Speech in the House of Commons about the Divorce, 152. Resigns the Seals, 162 His Character, ib. Refuses to take the Succession Oath to the Heirs of Ann Bolen by the King, and is imprison'd, 173. One of the Nun of Kent's Accomplices, 176. Committed for denying the King's Supremacy, 183. His Conference with the Sollicitor General Rich, ib. His Facetiousness at his Death, 184.

Morton, Earl of, sets the Lord Henry Darley against his Wife the Scots Queen, 4[illegible] Perswades him to murder Rizzio, and flies into England, ib. Comes into England and is highly against the Scots Queen, 431, 432. His Ingratitude to the Earl of Northumberland, 445. Made Regent of Scotland, 448. Governs well, ib. Turn'd out of the Government, he resumes it, 402. Retires, ib. Imprison'd, 482. Beheaded, 483.

Morton, Dr. Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, detects the Imposture of a Boy pretending to be possest with a Devil, 710, 711.

Morgan, Captain Thomas, carries over Forces to Holland, against the Duke of Alva, 443 His Death and Character, 587.

Morlaix taken by Sir John Norris, 578.

Morris, James Fitz, rebels in Ireland, 473. Humbled by Sir John Perrot, 437. Lands in Kerry with Spaniards, 464. He is slain, 473.

Moth[illegible], Q. Elizabeth, 378. The English Gentlemen Voluntiers in France, 423. The Papists at the Massacre of Paris, 444. Archbp. Whitgift's, 494. Several sent to the Scots Queen 500. Antonio Perez, the King of Spain's Secretary's, after his Flight to England, 578.

Mountague, Anthony Brown Viscount, his Speech for Popery in the House of Lords, 372.

Sent Ambassador to K. Philip, and acts coolly in his Negotiation, 381, 383. His Death and Character, 570.

Mountague, Sir Henry, Lord Chief Justice, made Lord Treasurer, 635. Pays 20000 l. for it, 737. Made Earl of Manchester, ib.

Muley, Hassan, King of Tunis, driven out of his Kingdom by the Pirate Barbarossa, 180. Restor'd by the Emperor Charles V. ib.

Munzer, his Heresy, 63.

Munson, Sir William, Admiral, attacks the Spanish Gallies in the Port of Cezimbra, [647.] Takes two Gallies and a Carack, ib.

Munster in Ireland, the first President there, 398.

Murray, James, Earl of, heads the Scots Protestants against Mary the Scots Queen his Sister, 379. Imprisons the Archbishop of St. Andrews for saying Mass, 393. Opposes the Scots Q's marrying the Lord Henry Darley, 397, 403. Takes Arms and is driven into England, ib. 403. The first occasion of his Disgust, 401. Rules absolutely in Scotland, ib. Is accessary to David Rizzio's Murder, 403. Hated by the Lord Henry Darly, ib. Conspires with Bothwel to kill him, ib. Goes to France, 404. Made Regent on the Resignation of Mary the Scots Queen, 425. Routs that Queen's Army, 411. Calls a Parliament, 412. Comes into England to vindicate himself, ib. Flatters the Duke of Norfolk that he shall marry the Scots Queen, 415. Endeavours to set Q. Elizabeth against her, ib. Persecutes the Queen's Friends, 418. Discovers the Duke of Norfolk's intended Match with the Scots Queen to Q. Elizabeth, 421. He is assassinated, 425. His Character, ib.

Muscovite Ambassador to Q. Mary cast away, 354.

Muscovy, a Passage thither first discover'd by the English, 408. The Original of that Company, ib. The Trade of the English there, 418. A further account of it, 493.

Musgrave, Nicholas, rebels against Henry VIII. and besieges Carlisle, 211. Is routed, ib.

Muskets first invented, 45.

Musselborough, Battel of, 285.

Muster, a general one over all England, 50.

N.

NAunton, Sir Robert, Secretary, first proposes Prince Charles's Match with the Princess Henrietta Maria, 666. Turn'd out of his Office for opposing K. James's assisting the Spaniards with Arms during the Palatinate War, 726.

Naples, besieg'd by the French, 97. The Siege rais'd, 98.

Nassau, the Pleasantness of that Country, 722.

Navarre conquer'd by the Spaniards, and French, 10.

Naw and Curle, the Scots Queen's Secretaries, confess'd she corresponded with Babington, 518.

Neal, Dr. Archbishop of York, diverts King James with merry Stories at Church, 729. Will not let him hearken to a pious Preacher, ib. Complain'd of as a Grievance, ib.

Netherlanders, the Rise of their taking Arms, 416 They continue it, 443. Defeat the Duke of Alva's Fleet, 446. They apply to Q. Elizabeth for Aid, 453. Her Answer, 454. Reliev'd by her, 456. Obtain the perpetual Edict of Don John of Austria, 458 Conclude a League with Q. Elizabeth, ib. They apply to the French King for Protection, and are refus'd, 507. To Q. Elizabeth, and are protected, 508.

Nevill, Sir John, rebels in Yorkshire against Henry VIII. 227. Put to Death, ib.

New Albion, or England, discover'd by Sir Francis Drake, 479. Describ'd 695.

Newport, the Battel of, 614.

Newton, Mr. his Duel with Hamilton about Words spoken against Edward VI. 290. Kills Hamilton, and is cut in pieces by his Friends, 291.

Nicea, in Italy, taken by Barbarossa the Pirate in conjunction with the French, 240.

Nobility, their Petition to K. James against his making so many English men, Scots and Irish Lords, 747.

Nugent, an Irish Judge, hang'd, 481.

Norfolk, Thomas Howard Duke of, retires from Court, and why, 24. He is recall'd, ib. His severe Proceedings with the Citizens of London about Lincoln's Tumult, 28. The Rea-w—th Henry VIII. and Marriage with the Lady Margaret Douglas, 243. His Expedition into Scotland, ib. Sent into Ireland in order to invade Scotland, 263. His Descent from the Blood Royal of Scotland, 395. Why recall'd out of England by Mary Queen of Scots, 396. His Wife petitions Q. Elizabeth for Justice against Mary the Scots Queen, for the Murder of the Lord Darley his and her Son, 411. Petitions Q. Elizabeth to protect his Grandson James VI. 418. Made Regent of Scotland, 426. Slain, 436. His Wife's Death, 461. Her Troubles occasion'd by Love, ib.

Lerma, Duke, Minister of State in Spain, uses the Lord Digby, K. James's Ambassador for the Match, ill, 749, 752.

Leveson, Sir Richard, Admiral, attacks the Spanish Gallies in the Port of Sesimbria, [647.] Takes two Gallies and a Carack, ib.

Lewis XII. the French King, his Disposition towards Henry VIII. 5, 6. Supports the Duke of Ferrara against the Pope, 6. Joins with Maximilian the Emperor in summoning a General Council, ib. His Successes in Italy, 11. His War with Henry VIII. in Picardy, 16, 17. A Grand League against him, 17. Renounces the Council of Pisa, and makes Peace with the Pope, 19. With K. Henry VIII. ib. Marries the Princess Mary his Sister by Proxy, 20, 21. And at St. Dennis in Person, ib. His Death, 22.

Lewis XIII. persecutes his Protestant Subjects, and besieges their Towns, 740.

Lewis, King of Hungary, drown'd in his Flight from the Turks, 78.

Lewis, Duke of Longuville, and other Persons of great Quality taken by the English at the Battel of Spurs, 16. Concludes the Treaty of Peace and Marriage between Lewis XII. and Henry VIII. and his Sister Mary, 19, 20. Is that King's Proxy for the Marriage, 21.

Leyden, John of, his Heresy, 68.

Leyva, Antonio de, his brave Defence of Pavia, 60, 61. His Actions at that Battel, 62, 63, 64. And when he was Governor of Milan, 86, 98. Beats the Count de St. Paul, and takes him Prisoner, 129. Born on Mens Shoulders at the Emperor's Entry into Bologna, 135. His Reward, 136. Invades France, 199. His Death, ib.

Lincoln, Edward Clinton Earl of, sent by Q. Elizabeth with a noble Train Ambassador to Charles IX. 444.

Lincoln, Dr. John Williams Bishop of, and Lord Keeper, his Letter to the Judges to release the imprison'd Papists, 750. His Fortune, 751. His Generosity and Inconstancy, ib.

Lincoln, John, a Broker, raises a seditious Tumult in London, 28. Hang'd, drawn and quarter'd, ib.

Lind, Sir Humphry, publick Dispute at his House with the Jesuites, 770.

Lisle, John Dudley Lord, made Admiral, and sent against Scotland, 242. Governour of Boulogne, 248. See Warwick, Earl of.

Litany first publish'd in English, 248.

Liturgy corrected, and by whom, 371. To be read in English, 376. K. James finds fault with some things in it, 642.

London too much built in Q. Elizabeth's Time, 476. New Buildings restrain'd by a Proclamation of K. James, 652.

Lopez, Roderigo, Q. Elizabeth's Physician, hir'd by the Spaniards to poison her, 577. His Defence, ib. He is condemn'd and hang'd, ib.

Lord's Day, Sports upon it permitted by an Order of K. James, 649, 709. A Bp. Abbot forbids the reading of it, ib. The Lord Mayor refuses to comply with it, ib. K. James in a great Passion against him, ib.

Lords, House of, their Letter to the Pope in favour of the Divorce, 141, 142, 143, 144. They address Q. Elizabeth to marry, 399.

Lovell, Sir Thomas, a main Instrument in the promotion of Wolsey, 14. Sent with Forces against the French in Picardy, 21.

Louise Mother of Francis I. left Regent of France, 61. Would have marry'd the Duke of Bourbon, 58. Concludes the Treaty of Cambray in Person, 130. Her Death and Character, 150.

Loyola, Ignatius, founds the Jesuites Order, 226.

Luther, Martin, opposes Indulgences, 29. At first mo[illegible] ib. Writes to the Pope, ib. Favour'd by the Duke of Saxony, ib. He is cited to Rome, 37. His second Letter to the Pope, ib. [illegible] with him in many things, ib. Erasmus's [illegible]er to him for Moderation, ib. Melancthon embraces his Opinions, 38. He opposes the Church of Rome more violently, ib. His third Letter to the Pope, ib. Would have him leave the Papacy for a Parsonage, ib. He is terribly prosecuted, ib. Wrote against by Henry VIII. ib. He grows more obstinate, 55. His Apology to the King for answering his Book too sharply, and K. Henry's Answer, 96. Favour'd by the Diet of Spire, ib. His Books to be burnt by a particular Treaty made at Cambray between Henry VIII. and Margaret Governor of the Netherlands, 135. His Death, 258.

Luttrell, Sir John, taken Prisoner by the Scots, and his Garrison of Broughtycragg cut to pieces, 291.

M.

Mackrell, Dr. Prior of Barlings in Lincolnshire, raises a Rebellion against Henry VIII. 205.

Maccarty More, Donald, a Lord of Note in Ireland, surrenders his Territories to Q. Elizabeth, and is made Earl of Glencarn, 392.

Maguire, his Rebellion in Ireland, 575. Besieges Inniskilling, 581. Forc'd to raise the Siege, ib. Driven from before Monaghan, ib.

Magdalen, Daughter to Francis I. marry'd to James V. of Scotland, 193.

Mayerne, Sir Theodore, not permitted to come into France, 649.

Mayne Cuthbert, a Priest, hang'd, 459.

Malta Isle given to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, who were driven out of Rhodes, 51.

Malby, Nicholas, defeats John of Desmond, and his rebellious Army 473.

Man, Mr. the English Agent in Spain, ill us'd, 410.

Man, Island, a Contest at Law about it in the Family of Derby, 580. The Spaniards have a Design upon it, ib. Sir Thomas Gerard made Governor of it by Q. Elizabeth, ib.

Mansell, Robert, sent against the Turkish Pirates in the Mediterranean, 654. Does nothing remarkable, 658. The Pirates take 35 English Ships to revenge his Attempts, ib. Sent thither by Gundamar's means, 726.

Mansfeld, the Palatinate General, his Troops quite routed, 659. His Loyalty to the King of Bohemia, and Conduct, 725. Brings his Army into Brabant, 759. An Account of their Mutinying, and his Courage in chastizing them, ib. 760. Fights the Battel of Fleury with Cordua General of the Spanish Forces, and joins Prince Maurice, ib. Comes into England, 788. Forces rais'd for him, ib.

Mantua, Marquis of, made a Duke by Charles V. 139.

Mainwaring, Sir Arthur, his violent Love for Ann Turner, the Countess of Essex's great Confident, 687.

Mar, John Erskin Earl of, chosen Regent of Scotland, 436. Goes into Exile rather than he will ask Pardon of James VI. 492.

Margaret, Princess, Governor of the Netherlands, magnificently entertain'd by Henry VIII. at Tournay, 17. She is pleas'd with Charles Brandon, Lord Lisle, ib. Concludes the Treaty of Cambray, 130. Her Death and Character, 150.

Margaret, Queen Regent of Scotland, begs a Peace of Henry VIII. 20. She marries the Earl of Angus, ib. She flies to England from the Duke of Albany, and is nobly entertain'd by her Brother K. Henry, 27. Offended with her Husband, and why, 50, 63. She is divorc'd from him, and marries Henry Stuart, 95.

Margaret, Queen of Navarre, favours the Protestants, 177.

Margaret, Sister to Charles IX. marry'd to the King of Navarre, 444.

Margaret, Daughter to Margaret Regent of Scotland, contracts Marriage privately with the Lord Thomas Howard, 201. For which she is imprison'd, ib. Marry'd to the Earl of Lenox, 243.

Mart in England motion'd, 328. Reasons against it, ib.

Mary, Queen of Hungary, Regent of Flanders, concludes a Truce between Charles V. and Francis I. 219. Refuses to admit Cardinal Pool into the Netherlands, ib.

Mary, Princess, Sister to Henry VIII. contracted in some measure to Charles Son of the Emperor Maximilian, 17. Marry'd to the French King, 21. Her Proceeding with relation to her Marriage with the Duke of Suffolk, 22. The Treasure she brought to England with her, 23.

Mary of Guise, Queen Dowager of Scotland, passes thro' England, 314.

Mary, Princess, Daughter to Henry VIII. her Birth, 26. Betroth'd to the Dauphin Son of Francis I. in St. Paul's Church, 32. Contracted to Charles V. by the Treaty of Windsor, 47. Demanded by the Scots for their K. James V. 63. Charles V. requires her to be deliver'd to him, ib. A Treaty of Marriage between her and Francis I. 80. Her Legitimacy objected against by the Bishop of Tarbe the French Ambassador, 81. Propos'd to the Duke of Orleance, 83, 84. Offer'd to James V. King of Scots by the Emperor, 166. Depriv'd of the Succession by Act of Parliament, 174. Offer'd by the Emperor to the French King's Son, 179. Illegitimated by Parliament, 199. High Treason to assert her Legitimacy, 200. Propos'd to Don Lewis of Portugal, 214. To Duke William of Cleves, 231. The Crown settled on her on certain Conditions, 241. The Duke of Brunswick desires her in Marriage, 31[illegible]. [illegible] deny'd to have Mass said in her House, 31[illegible]. That Affair at large, 316, 317, [illegible]. A Design to steal her, and carry her out of England, 315.

Mary I. Queen of England, takes the Title of Queen on her Brother K. Edward's Death, 33[illegible]. Summons the Nobility to attend her, ib. Her Friends begin to appear [illegible]. Several Gentlemen flock in to her, 33[illegible]. [illegible] to Sir Ed. Hastings, 331. Her Friends at London combine to reduce the Lady Jane, ib. Proclaim'd at London, 332. She comes thither, 333. She turns out several Bishops, ib. Restores others, ib. 334. Releases several Noblemen that were Prisoners, ib. Endeavours to ingratiate her self with the People, 335. The Solemnity of her Coronation, 337. Restores Popery, 338. Thinks of marrying, 339. Concludes a Treaty of Marriage with Philip of Spain, ib. Murmurs and a Rebellion under Sir Thomas Wyat about it, 340. Her Speech to the Londoners on Wyat's Insurrection, 341. Conditions on which the Parliament consented to her Marriage with Philip, 345. She marries him, ib. Gives out she's with Child, 348. She begins to reign in Blood, 349, 350. Insurrections against her supprest, 353. Declares War against France in her Husband's Quarrel, 354. Loses Calais, 356. The Loss thought to be the chief Cause of her Death, 358. She dies, ib. Her Message to her Sister Q. Elizabeth, 359. A Character of her, ib.

Mary, the Scots Queen, her Birth and Succession to the Crown, 233. A Scot designing to poison her is deliver'd up by K. Edward, 315. Marry'd to Francis the Dauphin, afterwards Francis II. 358. Claims openly the Crown of England, 378. Refuses to ratify a Treaty made in Scotland, when in France, 384, 385. Her Speech to Sir Nicholas Throgmorton on her being refus'd Passage to Scotland, 386. She escapes the English Fleet, 387. Demands to be declar'd Heir to the Crown, ib. Refuses an Interview with Q. Elizabeth, 390. Q. Elizabeth proposes Robert Dudley to her for a Husband, 393. Dissuaded from it by the French, ib. Insulted by the Scots, ib. A Treaty set on foot for her marrying the Earl of Leicester, 396. She marries the Lord Henry Darley, 397. She takes Arms against the Lords that were against the Match, ib. Refuses to give Q. Elizabeth's Ambassador Audience, 398. Her Title favour'd by the Queen of England, 401. Her Behaviour on the Murder of David Rizzio, 403. Marries Earl Bothwell who murder'd the Lord Henry Darley, 404. She is seiz'd and imprison'd, ib. Very ill us'd, 405. The horrid Crimes laid to her Charge by the Conspirators, ib. She resigns the Crown to her Son, ib. Laments the Irregularities of her Life, ib. Quitted of her Husband's Death, 406. She makes her Escape, and raises an Army, 410. Is defeated, and flies into England, ib. Her Letters upon it to Q. Elizabeth, 411. Her Commissioners and the Regent's Debates in England, 412, 413, 414, 415. She is removed from her first Keeper, and why, ib. She consents to marry the Duke of Norfolk, and on what Terms, 420. Commissioners sent to treat with her, 429. Her Answer, ib. Another Treaty comes to nothing, 431. Writes to the Duke of Norfolk, 432. Plots for her Escape, 432, 433. Her Marriage with the Duke of Norfolk hasten'd, ib. Discover'd, 344. A Secretary writ by her, ib. The Parliament of England would have her proceeded against as the Wife of an English Peer, 436. Charg'd with ill Designs against Q. Elizabeth, 441. Her Answer, ib. Don John of Austria wou'd marry her, 458. Another Treaty with her comes to nothing, 488. A long Letter of hers to Q. Elizabeth, 489, 490. Her Liberty oppos'd by the [illegible] of the English Party, 496, 497. Her good Promises, 497. Makes Propositions for her Liberty, 499. Remov'd to other Keepers, 501. Deals with the Pope and Spaniards, ib. She is accus'd of Babington's Plot, 515. A Commission to try her, 519, 520. Her Trial, 521——525. Sentence pronounc'd against her, 525. How she bore the News, 528. The Sentence condemn'd, 529, 530. Her Behaviour at her Execution, 534, 535. Her Death, 535. Her Body translated to Westminster, 643.

of

Mary Grey, a Lady of the Royal Blood, her mean Marriage, 384.

Masques frequent in K. James's Court, 685.

Massacre of Paris, 444. Excus'd to Q. Elizabeth by the French King, 446.

Maurice, Count of Nassau, chosen Governor of the United Provinces, 541. Gains the Battel of Newport, 597. Will not wear his Garter and George, and on what account, 69[illegible]. Oppos'd by Barnevelt and the Remonstrants in Holland, 71[illegible]. [illegible] an early stop to them, and disbands [illegible] ib. His Death, 789. Comparison between him and Henry IV. 790.

Maximilian, Emperor of Germany, the State of his Affairs on K. Henry VIII's Accession to the Throne, 5. Enters into a League with Lewis XII against Pope Julius II and joins with him in summoning a General Council, 6. Abandons the French King and the Council, 11. His Confederacy with Henry VIII. and on what Terms, 13. Comes to Henry VIII's Camp before Terouenne, wears St. George's Cross, and receives his Pay 100 Crowns a day, 6. Leaves the English Camp in Discontent, 17. Renews his League with Henry VIII. ib. Flatters Henry VIII with hopes that he will resign the Empire to him, 25, 28. He will not trust Cardinal Wolsey, 26. His double Dealing with Henry VIII. 28. Makes League with France, 29. Writes to the Pope to be moderate about Indulgences, ib. And to the Lateran Council, ib. His Character, 3[illegible]. He was never crown'd, ib. He wrote his own History, ib.

Maximilian II. Emperor of Germany, his Death and Character, 456.

Maxwell, Earl of, driven from the Borders by the Lord Dacres, 31[illegible].

Mayne, Duke of, proclaim'd Lieutenant General of the Crown of France against Henry IV. 556.

Mechlin taken and plunder'd by the English, 476.

Medicis, Alexander of, Son of Lorenzo Duke of Urbin, made Duke of Florence by the Emperor Charles V. 139. Murder'd by Lorenzo, and how, 209.

Medina Celi, Duke of, beaten by the Netherlanders at Sea, 446.

Medina Sidonia, Duke of, made General of the Spaniards at their projected Invasion, 545. His Fleet destroy'd by the English, 546, 547, 548.

Melancthon Philip, embraces Luther's Opinions, 38. Brought to the Diet at Spire by the Duke of Saxony, 96. And to the Diet of Ausburg, 129. He disputes with [illegible] Sent for by Francis I. 184. And Henry VIII. 187. Writes to K. Henry for a perfect Reformation, 227.

Mendoza, the Spanish Ambassador, commanded out of England by Q. Elizabeth, and why, 497. Publishes a Poem on the Spaniards Victory in 88. before their Armada was defeated, 548.

Merchants sent Gunpowder to Spain in time of War, 569.

Merveille, Francis the F's Agent at Milan, the History of his Murder, 269.

Mexico discover'd and conquer'd by the Spaniards, 34.

Middlesex, Earl of, Lord Treasurer, question'd in Parliament, 735.

Mildmay, Sir [illegible], his Saving of the [illegible] with the French in their Negotiations, 691.

Ministers deluded by a Maid pretending to be possest, 432.

Mint, the Profit it brought in to Edward VI. 313.

Mitchel, Sir Francis, his unlawful Practices, 656. His Punishment, ib. The Form of his being degraded, 657. A wretched Justice of the Peace at Clerkenwell, 731. He and his Clerks live among Brothels, subsist by Pensions for Connivancy, ib. His shameful Punishment, 734.

[illegible], Abbot, the Pope's Nuncio to England, refus'd to be admitted by Q. Elizabeth, 388.

Mompesson, Sir Giles, a Justice of Peace, his unlawful Practices, 656. He flies, ib. Degraded of his Knighthood, 657. His Crimes, 731. Is the Marquis of Buckingham's Creature, 734.

Monasteries ruin'd by Cardinal Wolsey, and for what, 60, 61. The King advis'd by him to dissolve more, 102. Three suppress'd by Henry VIII. 178. Speeches for and against suppressing them in Council, 180. Visited by Cromwell, an account of the Visitation, and its Censure, 186. The lesser suppress'd by Act of Parliament, 191. Vast Numbers suppress'd, 194. Murmurs at it, ib. More suppress'd, 216. The greater suppress'd, 217. The Number of the whole, 218. Settled on the King by Act of Parliament, ib. The Monks begin to flourish in Q. Mary's Reign, 354.

Money paid to the King not lost, 55. Carry'd out in time of War excus'd, ib. Coin'd in such small Pieces that it soon wore out, 56.

Monluc, Reflections upon his History by the Lord Herbert, 248.

Monson, Sir Thomas accus'd of Witchcraft, 644. Committed to the Tower, 645. Try'd for the Murder of Sir T. Overbury, 702.

Monson, William his Brother, committed about the Murder of Sir Tho. Overbury, 645.

Monteagle, Lord, the Letter written to him about the Gunpowder Plot from an unknown hand, 6[illegible]. He communicates it to Cecil, and he to the King, ib. Rewarded by the King 676.

Montgomery, Philip Herbert Earl of, K. James his Favourite, 635. Switch'd by a Scotsman, 688.

Montmorency, Anne de, highly honour'd by Francis I. 210. Banish'd his Presence, 227. Taken Prisoner at the Battle of St. Quintin, 355.

Montmorency, Duke of, Ambassador to Q. Elizabeth, made Knight of the Garter, 444. The Honour of that Family, ib.

More, Sir, Thomas, Judge of the Sheriff's Court, 28. Made a Privy Counsellor, ib. Strives in vain to appease a Tumult in London, ib. Chosen Speaker of the House of Commons, 55. Is for a Supply, ib. K. Henry's Ambassador at the Treaty of Cambray, 130. Made Ld. Chancellor, 136. His Speech in the House of Commons about the Divorce, 152. Resigns the Seals, 162. His Character, ib. Refuses to take the Succession Oath to the Heirs of Ann Bolen by the King, and is imprison'd, 175. One of the Nun of Kent's Accomplices, 176. Committed for denying the King's Supremacy, 183. His Conference with the Sollicitor General Rich, ib. His Facetiousness at his Death, 184.

Morton, Earl of, sets the Lord Henry Darley against his Wife the Scots Queen, 403. Persuades him to murder Rizzio, and flies into England, ib. Comes into England and is highly against the Scots Queen, 431, 432. His Ingratitude to the Earl of Northumberland, 445. Made Regent of Scotland, 448. Governs well, ib. Turn'd out of the Government, he resumes it, 462. Retires, ib. Imprison'd, 482. Beheaded, 483.

Morton, Dr. Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, detects the Imposture of a Boy pretending to be possest with a Devil, 710, 711.

Morgan, Captain Thomas, carries over Forces to Holland, against the Duke of Alva, 443. His Death and Character, 557.

Morlaix taken by Sir John Norris, 578.

Morris, James Fitz, rebels in Ireland, 423. Humbled by Sir John Perrot, 437. Lands in Kerry with Spaniards, 464. He is slain, 473.

Motto's. Q. Elizabeth, 378. The English Gentlemen Volunteers in France, 423. The Papists at the Massacre of Paris, 444. Archbp. Whitgift's, 494. Several sent to the Scots Queen, 500. Antonio Perez, the King of Spain's Secretary's, after his Flight to England, 578.

Mountague, Anthony Brown Viscount, his Speech for Popery in the House of Lords, 372. Sent Ambassador to K. Philip, and acts coolly in his Negotiation, 381, 383. His Death and Character, 590.

Mountague, Sir Henry, Lord Chief Justice, made Lord Treasurer, 655. Pays 20000 l. for it, 727. Made Earl of Manchester, ib.

Muley, Hassan, King of Tunis, driven out of his Kingdom by the Pirate Barbarossa, 180. Restor'd by the Emperor Charles V. ib.

Munster, his Heresy, 68.

Munson, Sir William, Admiral, attacks the Spanish Gallies in the Port of Cezimbra, [647.] Takes two Gallies and a Carack, ib.

Munster in Ireland, the first President there, 398.

Murray, James, Earl of, heads the Scots Protestants against Mary the Scots Queen his Sister, 379. Imprisons the Archbishop of St. Andrews for saying Mass, 393. Opposes the Scots Q's marrying the Lord Henry Darley, 397, 403. Takes Arms and is driven into England ib. 403. The first occasion of his Disgust, 402. Rules absolutely in Scotland, ib. Is accessary to David Rizzio's Murder, 403. Hated by the Lord Henry Darly, ib. Conspires with Bothwel to kill him, ib. Goes to France, 404. Made Regent on the Resignation of Mary the Scots Queen, 40[illegible]. Routs that Queen's Army, 411. Calls a Parliament, 412. Comes into England to vindicate himself, ib. Flatters the Duke of Norfolk that he shall marry the Scots Queen, 413. Endeavours to set Q. Elizabeth against her, ib. Persecutes the Queen's Friends, 418. Discovers the Duke of Norfolk's intended Match with the Scots Queen to Q. Elizabeth, 421. He is assassinated, 425. His Character, ib.

Muscovite Ambassador to Q. Mary cast away, 354.

Muscovy, a Passage thither first discover'd by the English, 408. The Original of that Company, ib. The Trade of the English there, 418. A further account of it, 493.

Musgrave, Nicholas, rebels against Henry VIII. and besieges Carlisle, 211. Is routed, ib.

Muskets first invented, 45.

Musselborough, Battel of, 285.

Muster, a general one over all England, 50.

N.

Naunton, Sir Robert, Secretary, first proposes Prince Charles's Match with the Princess Henrietta Maria, 656. Turn'd out of his Office for opposing K. James's assisting the Spaniards with Arms during the Palatinate War, 726.

Naples, besieg'd by the French, 97. The Siege rais'd, 98.

Nassau, the Pleasantness of that Country, 712.

Navarre conquer'd by the Spaniards, and French, 10.

Naw and Curle, the Scots Queen's Secretaries, confess'd she corresponded with Babington, 518.

Neal, Dr. Archbishop of York, diverts King James with merry Stories at Church, 729. Will not let him hearken to a pious Preacher, ib. Complain'd of as a Grievance, ib.

Netherlanders, the Rise of their taking Arms, 416. They continue it, 443. Defeat the Duke of Alva's Fleet, 446. They apply to Q. Elizabeth for Aid, 453. Her Answer, 454. Reliev'd by her, 456. Obtain the perpetual Edict of Don John of Austria, 458. Conclude a League with Q. Elizabeth, ib. They apply to the French King for Protection, and are refus'd, 507. To Q. Elizabeth, and are protected, 508.

Nevil, Sir John, rebels in Yorkshire against Henry VIII. 227. Put to Death, ib.

New Albion, or England, discover'd by Sir Francis Drake, 479. Describ'd 695.

Newport, the Battel of, 614.

Newton, Mr. his Duel with Hamilton about Words spoken against Edward VI. 290. Kills Hamilton, and is cut in pieces by his Friends, 291.

Nicza, in Italy, taken by Barbarossa the Pirate in conjunction with the French, 240.

Nobility, their Petition to K. James against his making so many English men, Scots and Irish Lords, 747.

Nugent, an Irish Judge, hang'd, 481.

Norfolk, Thomas Howard Duke of, retires from Court, and why, 24. He is recall'd, ib. His severe Proceedings with the Citizens of London about Lincoln's Tumult, 28. The Reafon of it, ib. His Death, 62. Vide Earl of Surrey.

Norfolk, Thomas Howard his Son Duke of fent againft the French Party in Scotland, 62. His Evidence in the Caufe of the Divorce, 113. Made Knight of the Order of St. Michael, 160. His Conduct in Ask's Rebellion, 206. Routs Nicholas Mufgrave and his Rebels, 211. Acus'd of ill Defigns, 212. General againft the Scots, but does little, 233. Accus'd by his Dutchefs, 263. Hated by the Proteftants, ib. Committed to the Tower, 264. His Goods feiz'd, ib. His Letter to the King and Council, and his Confeffion, 265, 266. The King's Illnefs faves his Life, ib. Releas'd by Q. Mary, 333. Sent againft Wyat, 341. Flies ibid.

Norfolk, Duke of, fent with an Army to the Affiftance of the Scots Proteftants, 380, 381. Refufes to hearken to a Match with the Scots Queen, 397. Made Knight of the Order of St. Michael, 399. Flatter'd with hopes of marrying the Scots Queen by the Regent Murray, 415. An Offer made to him by the Bp. of Rofs, ib. He declines it ib. Philip II. deals with him to rebel, but in vain, 417. His Match with the Scots Queen treated of formally, 419, 420. Leaves the Court, and why, ib. Returns 421. Sent to the Tower, ib. His Confeffion and Inlargement, 428, Holds a dangerous Correfpondence with the Scots Queen's Agents, 432. Mony fent by his Order to her Party in Scotland, 434. He is betray'd, ib. Denies the Fact, is imprifon'd, and confeffes it, 435, His Trial, 437, 438, 439, 440. No Friend to Popery, 439 Condemn'd to die, 440. His laft Speech and Execution, 440, 441.

Norris, Henry Efq; beheaded on Q. Ann Bolen's account, 195.

Norris, Henry Lord, his Death, [642.]

Norris, Sir John, his Valour in the Netherlands, 460. Takes Mechlin, 476, Beats the Spaniards, 484. His Bravery, 488, 511. He and Sir Francis Drake fet out a Fleet againft the Spaniards at the Charge of the Adventurers, 553. The Expedition not very fortunate, 554. Sent to Bretagne to affift Henry IV. of France, 562. His Acts there, 572. Takes Morlaix, 578. Broatefort, and puts the Spanifh Garifon to the Sword, ib. Sent into Ireland, 587. Does little there, and is thought to favour Tyrone, 588. Impos'd on by him, 590. His Death haftan'd by Grief, 603. His Character, ibid.

North, Council of, its Original, 450.

Northampton, William Par Marquifs of, marches againft Ket and his Rebels, feizes Norwich, 297. Driven out of it, 298. Sent with a fplendid Embaffy into France, 318. His Character, 322. Condemn'd and pardon'd by Q. Mary, 333.

Northampton, Howard Earl of, a Stickler for the Court in Reign of K. James, 680. One of the Plotters of Sir Tho. Overbury's Death, 691, 692, 693. Is a Papift, and procures Favours for them, 694. Builds Northumberland Houfe, ib. His Death and Character, ib.

Northumberland, John Dudley Earl of Warwick created Duke of, 320. His Diffimulation at the Duke of Somerfet's Trial, 322. Hated by the People, and flatter'd by the Nobility, 325. The Temporalties of the Bifhoprick of Northumberland given him, 327. Very bufy on K. Edward's Illnefs, 334. Endeavours to ingage the City for the Lady Jane Gray, 329. Marches againft Q. Mary, 330. His Soldiers defert him, 331. Earl of Arundel's Charge againft him, ib. Proclaims Q. Mary at Cambridge, 332. Arrefted and fent Prifoner to the Tower, ib. He is condemn'd, 334. Dies a Papift 335, Deceiv'd with hopes of a Pardon, ib.

Northumberland, Henry Piercy Earl of, his Ingagements with Mrs. Bolen broke off by Cardinal Woolfey, 122. He arrefts the Cardinal, 147. He folemnly denies any Pre-contract with her, 195.

Northumberland, Thomas Piercy Earl of, rebels againft Q. Elizabeth, 422 Flies into Scotland, and is deliver'd to the Regent Murray, ib. Betray'd by the Earl of Morton, 445. Beheaded, ib.

Northumberland, Henry Piercy, his Brother, Earl of, found dead in the Tower, 504. Why imprifon'd there, ib.

Northumberland, Henry Piercy Earl of, find thirty thoufand Pound, and to be imprifon'd for Life, 642. Lies 15 years in Prifon, 657, 676. Punifh'd thus for hiding his Kinfman Thomas Piercy one of the Gunpowder-Plotters, 719. His Averfion to the Scots, 720. Puts eight Horfes in his Coach in Oppofition to Buckingham's fix, ib.

Norwich, City of, favours Ket's Rebellion, 296. Mayor of affifts at his Councils, 297. Recover'd by the Marquifs of Northampton, ib. The Rebels recover it again, 298. Lofe it to the Earl of Warwick, ib.

November, 5th of, made a Holiday, 676.

O.

OAK of Reformation, Ket's Juftice-Seat fo call'd, 297. Several of the Rebels hang'd on it, 299.

O Donnel rebels in Ireland, 566. Seizes a Caftle, 574. Submits, 588. His Complaint and Demand, 589.

Oglethorp, Dr. Bifhop of Carlifle, crowns Q. Elizabeth, 371. Oppofes the Proteftant Religion, 372. Depriv'd, 376.

Olivarez, King of Spain's Letter to him to let him know that the Match between the Prince of Wales and the Infanta was never intended, 759. Waits on the Prince of Wales to compliment him on his Arrival at Madrid, 764. Endeavours to pervert him to Popery, 765.

Ombler, William, a Yorkfhire Gentleman, rebels againft Edward VI. and is hang'd, 300

O Maden rebels in Ireland, 580, Slain by the Lord Deputy Ruffel, ib.

O Mores rebel againft Q. Elizabeth in Ireland, 445. They fubmit, ib. Rebel again, 450. And again, 460.

O Neal, Shan, rebels, and why, 385. Comes to England to defend himfelf, 391. His barbarous Equipage, ib. He rebels again, 409. Is flain, ib. His Character, ib.

O Rork rebels in Ireland, and on what account, 561. Flies to Scotland, ib. Is deliver'd up by K. James, ib. His Trial, 566. He is hang'd, ib. His Behaviour at Execution, ib.

Orange, Philbert de Chaalon Prince of, takes Rome, 82. Sacks it, ib. Takes the Pope Prifoner, plunders, and releafes him, ib. His War in Tufcany, 139. Kill'd at the Siege of Florence, 245.

Orange, Rene Prince of, routed by a Stratagem of the French, 231. Kill'd at St. Difier, 245.

Orange, William Prince of, takes Arms for the Defence of the Liberty of the Netherlands, 443. In doubt whom to defire Affiftance of, 453. Applies to the Queen of England, ib. Her Anfwer, 454. Deals with the French, 455. Againft the perpetual Edict granted by Don John of Auftria, 457. Invites the Duke of Anjou to come into the Netherlands, 485. His Death, 501.

Ormond, Earl of, fights a Battel with the Earl of Defmond in a private Quarrel, 410. Takes him, and fends him into England, ib. Philip II. deals with him to rebell, but in vain, 417. Reduces his Brothers who had rebel'd, 423. Acts vigoroufly againft the Earl of Defmond when he rebel'd, 474. Defcended from Tho. Becket's Sifter, 495. Made General of the Army againft Tyrone, 603.

Ormond, James, a Baftard of that Family, keeps the Earldome by force, 40.

Ormond, Earl of, thrown into Prifon by King James I. and why, 652.

Offory, Pierce Butler Earl of, his Hatred to the Earl of Kildare, and on what account, 40, 96. Made Deputy of Ireland, 46. Put out, and why, 57. Deputy again, 96. Put out, 181.

Overbury, Sir Thomas, imprifon'd, 643. Poifon'd, ib. Car, Earl of Somerfet, and others queftion'd for it, 644.

Out of Wilfon.

A Creature of Car, afterwards Earl of Somerfet, 691. Diffuades him from marrying the Countefs of Effex, ib. For which fhe plots to deftroy him, ib. Betray'd by Car, and committed to the Tower, 692. How poifon'd by the Countefs of Effex, and her Confpirators, 693 Applies in vain to Car to be releas'd, 694. Dies by Poifon, ib. Branded after his Death, ib.

Owen, of the Owens of Godftow in Oxfordfhire, condemn'd of High Treafon for Popifh Opinions againft Kings, 644.

Oxenham, John his Voyage to America, 478. Taken and executed as a Pirate, ib.

Oxford, Earl of, imprifon'd for Words, 657. Sent to intercept fome Dutch Eaft-India Men, 659. Imprifon'd again for Words, [illegible] His Character, 736. Why imprifon'd, 743. His Death, 790.

Oxford, the Refolution of the Univerfity touching the Divorce, 153. Q. Elizabeth vifits the Univerfity, 569

Oxford erected into a Bifhoprick, 31:

P.

PAGET, Lord, depriv'd of the Garter, on account of his Defcent, 316. Fin'd [illegible], and why, 319. Reftor'd with Honour, 336, 337.

Paget, William, Lord, his Fortune, Death and Character, 393.

Palatine, Elector, and his Electrefs Daughter to James I. crown'd King and Queen of Bohemia, 652. Letters from the German Electors to him to refign the Crown, and their Reafons for it, 653. Routed, and Prague taken, 654.

Out of Wilfon.

Arrives in England, [illegible] Marry'd to the Princefs Elizabeth, Daughter to [illegible] great Pomp, 69[illegible] [illegible] 691. Chofen King of [illegible] to be King haftily, and is [illegible] by the Emperor, ib. His Misfortunes [illegible] 724. A Tragical Story [illegible] ib. The Commons [illegible] vour, 737. His T[illegible] is treating about the [illegible] Depriv'd of his Electorate, [illegible] fer'd to the Duke of [illegible] Proteftant Princes Arguments [illegible] the Popifh for it at the Dit of [illegible] The Emperor's Reply to both, 761. His Children's Title not to be prejudic'd, 76[illegible]

Palmer, Sir Thomas, charges the Duke of Somerfet with treafonable Defigns, 320. Denies it, ib. Owns it and adds to it, 321. Hang'd in Q. Mary's Reign, 332.

Papifts in England rebel againft Henry VIII. 205. A Difpute between them and the Proteftants, 372. Several leave the Kingdom, 376. Their Priefts renounce the Pope's Authority, 377. Foreign Princes mediate for them, ib. They rebel againft Q. Elizabeth, [illegible] And again, 423. Another Rebellion intended in Norfolk, 428. They flight the Pope's Bull againft Q. Elizabeth, ib. Laws againft them, 436. They libel the Miniftry, 446. Laws put in Execution againft them, 459. Their Troubles, 476. Their Priefts hang'd, [illegible] Neceffary to punifh them, 487. New Laws againft them, ib. Grow outragious, 495. Their Contrivances againft Q. Elizabeth, and her Mercifulnefs to them, 497. More Laws againft them, 503. Confultations what to do with them at the Spanifh Invafion, 548. Petition'd againft by the Houfe of Commons, 636. [illegible] ted to pay double Taxes, and why, 651. Offended with K. James's Speech to his Parliament, 673. They contrive the Gunpowder Plot, 674. Severe Laws againft them on its Difcovery, 676. Difarm'd, 690. [illegible] the Spanifh Match, 726. They flourifh, ib. The Parliaments Remonftrance againft them, 739. K. James will not receive it, 741. Releas'd out of Prifon by the King's Order, 751. Foment Divifions among the Reformed in England, 753. A Toleration granted them by the Treaty of Marriage between the Prince of Wales and the Infanta of Spain, 768. The Nature of their Religion incompatible with the Government, ib. Arguments for and againft tolerating them, ib.

Par, Lady Catherine, Widow of the Lord Latimer, marry'd to Henry VIII. 259. Made Regent, 244. Inclines to the Proteftant Religion, ib. Difputes with K. Henry about it, 263. Offends him by it, and is in danger, ib. She regains his Favour by her Prudence and good humour, ib. Marries the Lord Thomas Seymour, 301.

Paris, Bifhop of, endeavours, but in vain, to accommodate the Difference between King Henry and the Pope, 123.

Paris, the Maffacre there, 444.

Parker, Dr. Matthew, preaches before Ket and his Rebels, 298. Is in danger of his Life, ib. Made Archbifhop of Canterbury, [illegible] Of his Confecration, 401. Makes a Royal Feaft on the Queen's Birth-day, 448.

Parliament [illegible] Henry VIII's firft, 6 [illegible] by them, [illegible] His Second, 8. His [illegible]

His fourth, after a long Interval, 55. His fifth, 136. Another, 218. Another 238. Their Acts, ib. They ſettle the Succeſſion, 241, 242. Another, 252. Their Acts, 253.

Parliament, the firſt held in the Reign of Edward VI 289. They proceed in the Reformation of Religion, ib. His ſecond, and their Acts, 310. Another, and their Acts, 323.

Parliament, the firſt held by Q. Mary, 336. Reſtore Popery, 337. They repeal Acts concerning Religion, 338. Her ſecond, 344. Their Acts, ib. Her third, 345. Bloody Acts made by them, 346. They reſtore the Pope's Supremacy, 348. Her fourth, and their Acts, 350, 351. Her fifth and laſt, 335. Their Acts, ib. 356, 358.

Parliament, Q. Elizabeth's firſt, their Acts, 371, 372, 376, 391, 399. Their warm Addreſſes to the Queen to marry, and her Anſwer, ib. 375, 400. Another Seſſion, 436. Their Acts, ib. Another Seſſion, 487. Their Acts, ib. A new one, 501. Their Acts, 503. Another, 526. They petition to have the Sentence againſt the Scots Queen publiſh'd, ib. 527. Another, and their Acts, [illegible]. Another, and their Acts, 602.

Parliament, [illegible] held by K. James, 642. Another, ib. An[illegible] diſſolv'd on a ſudden, 643. Another, [illegible] [illegible] From Wilſon.

Parliament, K. James's firſt meet, 667. Their good Agreement [illegible] him, 673. Their Acts 676. His ſecond [illegible]. Their Acts, 730, 731. [illegible], 735. Their Declaration about the Palatinate, 737. Againſt the Spaniſh Match, 738. Their Remonſtrance to the King againſt Popery, 739. The King forbids it to be preſented, 741. Their Petition upon it, ib. Their Proteſtation of their Rights and Privileges, 748. They are diſſolv'd, ib. Another call'd, 758. Adviſe the King to break the Treaties with Spain, 780. Their Declaration, 782. Their Petition againſt Recuſants, 784.

Parliament, one in Ireland, 182. Settle the Supremacy and Succeſſion, and give Mony to Henry VIII, ib. Another in Ireland, and their Acts, 212.

Parliament Men, to loſe their Wages, if they went home without leave of the Houſe, 23.

Parma, Alexander Farneſe Prince of, Governour of the Netherlands, 463. Prepares to go aboard the Armada to conquer England, 543. His Diſcourſe with Dale Q. Elizabeth's Agent about it, 545. Accus'd of being dilatory in it, 548. Blam'd by the Spaniards, 549. Raiſes the Siege of Bergenopzoom, gariſon'd by the Engliſh, 550. Invades France, 559. Admitted into Paris, 562. His ſecond Expedition into France, 568. His Death and Character, ib.

Parry, William, a Welſhman, ſpeaks in Parliament for the Jeſuits, 501. Accus'd of Treaſon, ib. His Confeſſion, 502. Trial and Rage, 503. He is hang'd, ib.

Parſons the Jeſuit comes into England, 477. His Character, ib. Writes a Book about the Succeſſion, 576. Excuſes the Papiſts ſetting up the Infanta of Spain, 577.

Partridge, Sir Michael, hang'd for the Duke of Somerſet's pretended Plot, 325.

Paul's Steeple burnt, 388.

Percy, Sir Thomas, one of the Yorkſhire Rebels Commiſſioners to treat with Hen. VIII. 207.

Pembroke, William Herbert Earl of, ſuppreſſes a Rebellion in Wiltſhire in the Reign of Edward VI. 292. His Zeal for Q. Mary, 332. Sent againſt Wyat, and ſuppreſſes that Inſurrection, 342.

Pembroke, William Earl of, Favourite to Anne of Denmark, K. James's Queen, 685. Made Lord Chamberlain, and oppoſes the Spaniſh Match, 726.

Pembroke, Henry Herbert Earl of, his Death, [641.]

Perez, Antonio, the King of Spain's firſt Secretary, revolts, 577. His cold Reception in England, 578.

Perrot, Sir John, humbles the Iriſh Rebel James Fitzmorris, 437. Reduces the Oconors, 450. Made Lord Deputy of Ireland, 495. His good Service, ib. Recall'd, 542. An Inquiry into his Life, 567. His Trial and Defence, ib. 568. He is condemn'd, and dies in the Tower, ib.

Peru diſcover'd, 70.

Peterborough, erected into a Biſhoprick by Henry VIII. 218.

Peterborough, Dr. Fletcher Dean of, his Behaviour to Mary the Scots Queen at her Execution, 535.

Peter Martyr, Profeſſor of Divinity in Oxford, his Troubles in Q. Mary's Reign, 336. Is Archbiſhop Cranmer's Second in the Challenge he made the Popiſh Biſhops to defend K. Edward's Inſtitutions, ib. Has leave to depart, ib. Popiſh Barbarity to his Wife's Bones, 353.

Peyto, Peter Cardinal, made Legate in England, in Oppoſition to Cardinal Pool, 355.

Philip, Son of Charles V. born, 83. A Treaty for his Marriage with Q. Mary, 339. Why he marry'd her, ib. Conditions of the Marriage, 345. Arrives in England, and marries her, ib. His bad Character, ib. Beats the French at St. Quintin, 355. Why he ſpar'd the Princeſs Elizabeth of England, 367. Addreſſes to her when Queen, 370. She refuſes him, ib. At which he is diſoblig'd, 373. Attempts to ſteal the Lady Katherine Grey out of England, ib. Returns the Order of the Garter, 383. Is more provok'd againſt the Queen of England, 393. The Riſe of the War between Q. Elizabeth and him, 416. He forbids trading with England, and deals with ſome Lords to rebel, 427. His Deſigns againſt the Queen, 441. Cajoles her, 456. His Deſigns againſt Ireland, 462. He ſeizes Portugal, and by what Title, 484. His Strength, 501. His Vain-glory, 509. Sets out an Armada for the Conqueſt of England, 541. And at the ſame time treats of Peace to amuſe her, 544. Bears the Defeat of his Armada patiently, 549. Pretends to be Protector of France, 557. His Greatneſs, 583. Fits out a ſecond Fleet againſt England, 594. Which is caſt away, ib.

Philips, Robert, impriſon'd for oppoſing the Spaniſh Match, 658.

Philpot, Mr. defends the Reformation in Q. Mary's Convocation, 337, 338.

Phænomena of Nature, a Cenſure of the Reflections made upon them, 719. An Inſtance of the Partiality of ſuch Reflections, ib.

Phyſicians, a College of them erected in London, 56.

Pickering, Sir William, hopes to marry Queen Elizabeth, 383.

Pilgrimage of Grace, a Rebellion againſt Henry VIII. ſo call'd, 205, 206.

Pizarro, Francis, a Spaniard, diſcovers Peru, lands, and making his Advantage of Diſſenſions among the Indians, conquers it, 70. Endeavours in vain to make the Emperor a Chriſtian, ib. His Cruelty and Treachery, 71.

Plague, A great one at Calais, 4. In the French Army before Naples, 98. In the Town of Havredegrace, when the Engliſh had it, 393. A raging one in London, ib. A violent one in London, 641, 664.

Plantagenet, Arthur, natural Son of Edward IV. caſt away in an Engliſh Ship of which he was Commander, 13. Saves himſelf, and is ſent expreſs to Henry VIII. ib. Made Lord Liſle, and ſent with the Order of the Garter to Francis I. 85. Accus'd of a Deſign to betray Calais to the French, 231. Acquitted, ib. Dies of Joy, ib.

Play-houſe in Drury-Lane pull'd down by the Mob, and the Trumpery there torn in pieces, 647. 81 Perſons of Quality kill'd by the Fall of that in Blackfriars, 659.

Plowden, Edmund Eſq; the great Lawyer, his Death and Character, 501.

Poliſh Ambaſſador, his rude Speech to Queen Elizabeth, 600. Her and her Council's Anſwers, ib.

Poll-Tax, raiſed in Henry VIII's Reign, 12.

Pollard, Sir John, choſen Speaker of Queen Mary's firſt Parliament, 337, 350.

Polydore Virgil ſays Francis I. bought a Peace of Henry VIII. 22. Is a long time Priſoner in the Tower, 23. Archdeacon of Wells, 102. A ridiculous Miracle related by him, 215.

Pool, Edmund de la, Son of John de la Pole, or Pool Duke of Suffolk, beheaded, and no lawful cauſe alledg'd for it, 15.

Pool, Richard, calling himſelf Duke of Suffolk, attempts to recover Pampeluna from the Spaniards for the French, 11. Commands 6000 French at the Siege of Terouane, 15. Brings 3000 French to aſſiſt the Duke of Albany in Scotland againſt the Engliſh, 57. Accompanies the French King to Italy, 62.

Pool, Cardinal, writes a virulent Book againſt Henry VIII. and ſends it him, 182. Refuſes to come to England ib. Is deny'd entrance into the Netherlands as the Pope's Legate, 210. Attainted by Act of Parliament, 219. Propoſes a new Creed at the Council of Trent, 257. Zealous for the Papacy there, 259. Q. Mary thinks of marrying him, 339. Loſes the Papacy, and how, 345. Comes into England, ib. How prevented of marrying Q. Mary, 346. His Commiſſion to be Legate here, ib. His Attainder taken off, 347. His Speech to the Parliament about reconciling England to the Papacy, ib. Abſolves the Kingdom. 348. Hated by Pope Paul IV. 351. Made Archbiſhop of Canterbury the day that Archbiſhop Cranmer was burnt, 353. His Legantine Power taken away, 355. Reſtor'd, ib. His Death and Character, 358.

Pool, Henry, Lord Mountacute, beheaded, 216.

Pool, Arthur, try'd and condemn'd for a Plot againſt Q. Elizabeth, 389. Pardon'd by her, ib.

Pope Julius II. his war-like Character, 5, 6. His Wars with the Duke of Ferrara ſupported by the French, ib. Summon'd to appear before a Council to be held at Piſa, ib. Beſieg'd in Bolognia by the French, ib. Is freed, takes Mirandola, 7. Loſes Bononia, and his Army routed, ib. Reſtores the Family of Medicis to the Sovereignty of Piſa, and excommunicates the Council there, ib. They remove to Lyons, and ſuſpend his Authority, ib. He calls a General Council to be held at the Lateran in Rome in oppoſition to that at Lyons, ib. Excommunicates John d'Albret King of Navarre, for joining with the French, 9. Leaves the Venetians, who had aſſiſted him in his Troubles, 11. His Death, 12. Two Letters of his to Henry VIII. about the Diſpenſation of his Marriage, 115, 116.

Pope Leo X. his Treachery, 25. Grants extravagant Indulgences, and perſiſts in it, which is the Riſe of the Reformation, 29. How he diſpos'd of the Money to be rais'd by them, 70. Sells 20 Cardinalſhips, ib. Moſt of his Cardinals for proceeding violently with Luther, 38. Dies of Joy, 45.

Pope Adrian, Cardinal of Tortoſa, Charles V's Preceptor, choſen, 45. He writes againſt Luther to the Princes of Germany, 53. His free Confeſſion of the Papal Errors, ib. He dies, 59. Succeeded by Pope Clement VII. of the Family of Medicis, 59. Complains of the German Princes to Henry VIII. and ſends him a Golden Roſe, 61. Abſolves Francis I. from his Oath to obſerve the Treaty of Madrid, and heads a League againſt Charles V. 76. He writes to him, 79. He is driven into the Caſtle of St. Angelo by the Coloneſi, ib. Threaten'd to be depos'd for Simony, 82. Driven to the Caſtle of Angelo by the Prince of Orange, ib. Taken Priſoner, ib. Releas'd; he implores the Aſſiſtance of Henry VIII. 83. He eſcapes from the Perſon ſet to watch him in diſguiſe, 87. His Difficulties concerning the Divorce, and from whence, 100, 101. His mean Lodging, 100. Commiſſions ſix Cardinals to hear the Cauſe, 100, 107. He approves of the Deſign of diſſolving ſome Monaſteries in England, 103. His Anſwer about Canonizing Henry VI. ib. Grants a Bull for the Divorce, but will not let his Legate part with it, 108. Orders it to be burnt, ib. Falls ſick, ib. He inclines to the Emperor, 107. Makes a League with the Emperor, and will hear the Cauſe of the Divorce himſelf, 120. His Breve to the King upon it, 121. He owns his League with Charles, ib. 129. He crowns the Emperor at Rome, 136. His Anſwer to Henry VIII's Ambaſſador, ib. Is the occaſion of the Loſs of the Liberty of Florence, his native Place, 139. Offers K. Henry a Bull of Diſpenſation to have two Wives, 141. His Anſwer to the Houſe of Lords Letter for the Divorce, 144, 145, 146, 147. Afraid of Henry VIII's Defection, and would retain him, 152. His Letter to the King to take his Queen again, 156. to 158. Cites him to Rome 159. His Interview with the Emperor about Q. Katherine and a Council, 161. His Objections to the Emperor's Reaſon for a General Council, 166. Stil'd only Biſhop of Rome by Henry VIII. 168. Proceeds vigorouſly againſt him, ib. His Interview with Francis I. 170. His Anſwer to Bonner, who brought K. Henry's Appeal to a General Council, ib. Publiſhes his Sentence againſt the King, and pronounces his Marriage with Katherine of Spain valid, 172, 173. His Death, 177.

Pope Paul III. of the Houſe of Farneſe, choſen, 177. Excommunicates Henry VIII. 184. Labours to reconcile him to the Papacy, 196.

196. But in vain, ib. Redresses several Grievances in the Church, 211. Excommunicates K. Henry in Flanders, Scotland, and France, 216. Proposes to call a Council at Trent, 231. Manages it arbitrarily, 251, 252. Orders his Legates not to hasten Reformation, 258. His Instruction to them, 259. Assists the Emperor against the Protestants, 260. Differs with him, 262.

Pope Marcellus, his just Saying of the Papacy, 351. Dies in 22 days, and is succeeded by Pope Paul IV. 351. Hates Card. Pool, ib. Takes away his Legantine Power, 355. Recalls him to Rome, ib. His Letter to Q. Elizabeth, 384. Courts her to send Deputies to the Council of Trent, 386.

Pope Pius V. his Bull against Q. Elizabeth, 427. His Designs against her, 441. Designs against Ireland, 462.

Pope Sixtus V. exhorts the King of Spain to set out the Invincible Armada, 542. Publishes a Croisade against England, 543.

Pope Gregory XIII. raises Forces against Henry IV. of France, and excommunicates him, 562. His Bull fix'd to the Gallows, and burnt by the Hangman, ib. His Present to Tir-Oen, 617. Encourages him by a Bull, 619.

Pope Gregory XV. against the Spanish Match, 659.

Pope Clement VIII. K. James writes to him 666. Requires several things to be set down in the Articles of the Prince of Wales's Match with the Infanta in favour of Popery, 754. Writes to the Inquisitor General of Spain not to let the Prince go thence unconverted, 765. Writes to the Prince, ib. Grants a Dispensation for the Match, 767.

Popery restor'd by Q. Mary's Parliament and Convocation, 337. Banish'd out of England, 372.

Popish Priests, 70 banish'd at once, 497.

Porter, Endimion, one of the Marquiss of Buckingham's Servants, made a Servant to the Prince of Wales, 763. Accompanies him to Spain, ib. His mean Services before employ'd by the Prince, ib.

Portugal, the several Pretenders to that Crown, 484. Seiz'd by Philip II. ib.

Potter, a, sleeps 14 days and nights without once waking, 261.

Poynings, Sir Edward, Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, sent with Forces to the Assistance of Margaret Governor of the Netherlands, 7. Made Governour of Tournay, 17.

Prebendaries of Westminster, two chosen Members of the House of Commons, 337.

Pregent, a Knight of Rhodes, Commander of a French Man of War, his Actions against the English, 10. He lands in Sussex, but is repuls'd, 21.

Priests, Spanish, make the People believe the English were turn'd Monsters since the Reformation, 673.

Presendes, Luys, Charles V's Spy or Agent at Tunis, put to death by Barbarossa, 180.

Printers, Several put to death, 531.

Printing, the Advancement of Learning, 29. The Occasion of Schism, 60.

Proclamations, their Value lessen'd by their Number in K. James's Reign, 667. He would have had 'em of current Authority, 681.

Promoters in Henry VII's Reign punish'd by Henry VIII. 3.

Protestant Religion more safe to any Government than the Popish, and why, 768.

Protestants in Germany, when the Name was first us'd, 97. They give in their Confession at Ausburgh, and have a Disputation with the Romanists, 149. They depart from the Diet in discontent, 151. Meet by themselves, and conclude a defensive League at Smalcald, which was their first Separation from the Church of Rome, ib. The Princes desire a General Council, and sollicite it, 152. They write to Henry VIII and Francis I. ib. They protest against the Coronation of Ferdinand, ib. Conclude a League with the Emperor Charles V. 159. Us'd gently by Ferdinand, Charles's Brother, 177, 186. Henry VIII and Francis I's Embassies to them, ib. They propose a League to Henry VIII. 192. His Answer, ib. Theirs to Charles V. 210. Their Objections to Henry VIII's Reformation, 213. Dispute with the Papists, 226. Charles V's Agreement with them, 243. Protest against the Council of Trent, 251. They desire Help and a Confederacy from Henry VIII. 258. Their Embassy to Edward VI. unsuccessful, 321. They enter into a League with the French King, ib. Q. Elizabeth sends an Embassy to them, 392.

Protestants in France greatly increase, and are severely persecuted, 177.

Protestants in England admitted into Q. Elizabeth's Privy Council, 369. Their Dispute with the Papists, 372.

Protestation of the German Princes and Cities against the Emperor's Order about Liberty of Conscience, 97.

Protestation of K. James's second Parliament of their Rights and Privileges, 747.

Puckering, John Esq; made Lord Keeper, 566. His Death, 596.

Puritans, when the Dissenters first so call'd, 410. Laws against them in Q. Elizabeth's Reign, 436. Oppose Q. Elizabeth's French Match, 486. Therefore hated by her, ib. Oppos'd by Archbishop Whitgift, 494. A Member of Parliament expel'd for reflecting upon them, 636. Who they were that were so call'd, 665. A Conference between them and the Bishops at Hampton-Court, ib. Their Demands for a Reformation and Conformity, 665. Forc'd to leave their Country, ib. Gunpowder Plot father'd upon them by the Jesuits, 676. Would go to New England, but are hinder'd, 694. All that oppose the Arminians so call'd in the Reign of James I. and Charles I. 719. All true Protestants so term'd by the Papists, 753.

Pursuivants, counterfeit punish'd, 595.

Pyrates, French, rob the English, 324.

R.

R*ansom*, a nocturnal one, 355.

Raleigh, Walter, his first Appearance in Arms, 425. First put in Command, 474. Knighted by Q. Elizabeth, 509.

Raleigh, Sir, Walter, sends a Colony to Virginia, 509. Sent to America, 569. His Design fails, ib. His Voyage to Guyana, 584. Sent with the Lords Essex and Howard against Spain, 591. His Actions at Cales, 592, 593. Sent with the Earl of Essex a second time, 597. Left behind, 598. Takes Fyal, ib. Reprov'd by Essex, his Defence, ib. His Quarrel with Essex increases, 599. A Plot said to be his, discover'd, 641. Goes to Guiana, 647. Takes St. Thomas, 648. His Son slain there ib. A Proclamation against him, 649. He endeavours to escape, but is seiz'd, ib. He is examin'd, 650. Beheaded, ib. Wilson's Account of his Plot and Trial, 663. His Employment in Prison, ib. His Plot censur'd, his Hatred to Cecil, ib.

Out of Wilson.

His Voyage to the West Indies, 711. His Designs discover'd to Gundamar the Spanish Ambassador, ib. The Voyage unsuccessful, 713. Complain'd of by Gundomar, and disown'd by the King, ib. His Death and Character, 714. Favour'd by the Prince, and therefore hated by the King, ib.

Randolph, Sir Thomas, his Embassy from Q. Q. Elizabeth to Muscovy, 417. His Success, ib.

Randolph, Col. Thomas, his Piety to his Soldiers, 392. His Actions in Ireland, Death and Character, 409.

Randolph, Mr. Thomas, Q. Elizabeth's Ambassador in Scotland, his Speech to the States, 483. Forc'd to leave Scotland for his Intrigues there, ib. His Death and Character, 565.

Ratcliff, Egremond, Brother to the Lord Sussex, outlaw'd for Rebellion against Q. Elizabeth, 423. Hang'd in Flanders for a Plot against Don John of Austria, 461.

Ravenna, the Battel of, 11. Taken by the French, ib.

Raymond de Cordona drives the French out of Italy in two Months time, 11.

Read, Alderman, sent to the Scots Wars by Henry VIII for refusing to pay the Benevolence, and kill'd, 249.

Reasons against a War with France deliver'd at the Council-Table, 25. For and against a Supply to Henry VIII. 55.

Reformation, the Rise of it, 29, 30. Hinder'd by the Differences among the Reformers, 38. The Progress of it, 96.

Reformation, the beginning of it in England, 136. A Speech in Parliament in favour of it, 137, 138. Goes forward in Parliament, 155, 162, 163. Forwarded, 168, 173, 174. K. Henry's dislik'd by the German Protestants, 213. Carry'd on by Edward VI. 289. Rebellions upon it, 292.

Regians, a Party so call'd in the Reign of James I. 753. Their Principles and Practices, ib.

Relicks, a Catalogue of ridiculous [illegible]

Religion, Alterations in it [illegible] Several made by Q. Elizabeth, 372, 377. [illegible] Advantage of them, ib.

Remonstrance of K. James's second Parliament against Papists, 719.

Remonstrants, Arminians of Holland so call'd, oppose the Prince of Orange, 717. They raise Forces, 718. The Prince of Orange disbands them, ib.

Republicans, a Party so call'd in the Reign of K. James, 753.

Requesens, Don Lewis Zuniga de, Governor of the Netherlands, his Character, 449. Makes several Requests to Q. Elizabeth, but obtains nothing, 452. His Death, 452.

Rhodes taken by the Turks from the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, 51.

Rich, Lord, a pretended Speech of his against the Protector Somerset, 304, 305. [illegible] signs the Seals as Lord Chancellor, 323.

Rich, Robert, created Earl of Clare, 690. The Title chang'd to that of Warwick, ib.

Richmond, Margaret Cou[illegible]

Duke of [illegible]

Dutchess [illegible]

Ridolphi, a [illegible] Queen, endeavours [illegible] Norfolk to rebel, [illegible] get Aid, 434. [illegible] contrive Q. Elizabeth's [illegible] Negotiations [illegible]

Ridley, Dr. [illegible] Charity to Edward VI. [illegible] with him upon it, 322. [illegible] Mary, and for the Lady [illegible] the Crown, 330. Sent to the Tower by Queen Mary, 333. His Dispute with the Papists, 344. Condemn'd to be burnt, ib. Burnt, 352.

Rincon, Anthony, the French King's Ambassador to the Turk, assassinated in Italy, 227.

Riot, one in Northamptonshire about Inclosures, 642. Against the Spanish Ambassador about the Palatinate, 694.

Rizzio, David, murder'd by the Lord Henry Darly, Husband to the Scots Queen, 403. The Story of him reviv'd in England, 748.

Roaring-Boys, or Scowrers, swarm in London in K. James's Reign, 672.

Rochester, John Fisher Bishop of, his Speech in the House of Lords against the Commons medling with the Clergy, 137. He excuses himself, ib. Consents to the King's Title of Supream Head of the Church, 161. Refuses to take the Succession Oath to the Heirs of Anne Bolen, and is imprison'd, 171. One of the Nun of Kent's Accomplices, 175. Made Cardinal, 183. Is beheaded, ib.

Rochford, George Bolen Lord Viscount, Q. Ann's Brother, beheaded, and why, 195.

Rochford, Lady, his Wife, beheaded, and why, 229.

Rogers, Mr. John, his Martyrdom in Q. Mary's Reign, 349.

Romanists, their Obstinacy and Rigour, 149, 151.

Rome taken by the Colonese, 79. Besieg'd by the Duke of Bourbon, and taken by the Prince of Orange, 81. Sack'd, ib.

Rookwood, Ambrose, hang'd for the Gunpowder Plot, 676.

Rory Ogg, rebels in Ireland, and is slain, 460.

Rosse, Lesly Bishop of, proposes to the Duke of Norfolk to marry the Scots Queen, 415, 421. Writes a Book in defence of it, ib. His Negotiations with Spain and France for his Mistress Mary Q. of Scots, 427, 430. His Plot to free her from Imprisonment, 432. Committed to Custody, 434. He refuses to submit to any Examination, as an Ambassador, 435. Answers the Articles brought against him, ib. Banish'd England, 449. Plots new Treasons abroad, ib.

Rufford, Giles Esq; of Buckinghamshire, barbarously murder'd, 450.

Russel, Sir John, a main Instrument of the Duke of Bourbon's deserting Francis I. 58. His Character of Queen Anne and Queen Jane, 199. Made Lord Russel, 212. Routs the Devonshire Rebels, 294.

Russel, Sir Francis, murder'd by the Scots, 505.

Russel, Sir William, Governour of Flushing, suspected by the States, 541. Made Deputy of Ireland, 581. He lets the Earl of Tyrone go when he had him in his Custody, ib. Forces

Hugh

Macguire to raise the Siege of Inniskilling, ib. Misunderstanding between him and Sir John Norris in the War with Tyrone, 588. Takes the Castle of Clohon, and puts the Garrison to the Sword, 590. Recall'd, 602.

S.

SAdler, Sir Ralph, sent Ambassador to Scotland in Edward VI's Reign, 278

St. Andrews, Archbishop of, imprison'd for saying Mass, 393. James Hamilton, Archbishop of, hang'd, 452.

St. Cross, Cardinal of, one of the Pope's Legates at Trent, threaten'd to be thrown into the Adige, if he dissolv'd the Council, 261.

St. Jago taken by Sir Francis Drake, 509.

St. James's Palace built, 161.

St. Leiger, Sir William, the first President of Munster, 398.

St. Michael, the Order of, made contemptible in France, 579.

St. [illegible], Count de, Commander of the French Army, [illegible] by the Duke of Bourbon, 59. Beaten by [illegible] Leyva, and taken Prisoner, 129. Overrun [illegible], 196.

St. Quintin, [illegible] of, 355.

Salisbury, [illegible] Countess of, Grandchild to George Duke [illegible] Clarence, attainted, and why, 219. Her be[illegible] at her Execution, 227.

Salisbury, [illegible] Earl of, made Lord Treasurer, 680. A Stickler for the Court in K. James's Reign, ib. An Artifice of his to convince K. James of his Prodigality, and hinder a vast Sum being given to Carr his Favourite, 688. His Death, 691.

Salisbury, Thomas, one of the Conspirators to assassinate Q. Elizabeth, 516.

Saluzzo, Francis Marquiss of, has his Territories taken from him by the French, 109. Kill'd before Carmagnola, ib.

Sanders's History censur'd by the Lord Herbert, 113. And again, 122, 123. Severs Errors prov'd upon him, 301, 302, 359. He stirs up Fitzmaurice's Rebellion, 464. His miserable End in Ireland, 495.

Sanderson's History condemn'd, 662.

Sands, Sir George, hang'd for Felony, 648.

Sands, Dr. Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge, preaches warily against Q. Mary's Title, 322. Flies to Germany after a year's Imprisonment, ib. Afterwards Archbishop of York in Q. Elizabeth's Reign, 337.

Sandys, Sir Edwyn, a Member of Parliament, his Imprisonment occasions a Tumult in the House of Commons, 658.

San, Joseph, lands with Italians and Spaniards in Ireland, 475. His Cowardice, he yields, ib.

Sanquir, Lord, murders a Fencer, and is hang'd, 688.

Savage, Sir Arthur, his Bravery at the taking of Cales, 593. And at the Siege of Amiens, 602.

Savage, John, undertakes to assassinate Q. Elizabeth, 515.

Savile, Sir John, a leading Man in the House of Commons, how engag'd in the Court-Interest by K. James, 749.

Savoy conquer'd by Francis I. 196.

Say and Seal, Lord, his Character, 736.

Saxony, Frederick Duke of, favours Luther in opposing Indulgences, 19. Nominated to the Empire, and refuses it 33.

Saxony, George Duke of, brings Melancthon to the Diet at Spire, 96. Protests against the Emperor's Liberty of Conscience, 97. Gives in the Confession of Augsburgh to the Diet there, 149. Against electing Ferdinand King of the Romans, 150. Applauds Henry VIII. in his Design of the Divorce, ib. Head of the League at Smalcald, 151. Will not let the Swiss enter into it, because they were Zuinglians, 152.

Saxony, John Frederick Duke of, Son of George, receives Proposals for a Council from the Pope, 167. His Answer, 168. Takes the Field against the Emperor in defence of the Protestant Religion, 260. Is proscrib'd, ib. His Forces, 261. Retires to his own Country, 262.

Saxony, Maurice Duke of, a Protestant, sides with the Emperor against the Protestants, 261. Invades Saxony, 262.

Saxony, Elector of, puts the Imperial Ban in execution against the King of Bohemia, 722.

And is for saving his Electorate, when he had been a great Instrument of his Ruin, 763.

Scots War between Henry VIII. of England, and James IV. of Scotland, 17, 18.

Scots, Divisions in their Government, 20. Their Affairs 50, 51, 57, 62, 63. They demand the Princess Mary in Marriage for their young King James V. ib. The Answer King Henry made them, ib. Their Affairs, 55, 96, 161, 166, 176. A War with them, 232. Homage prov'd to be due from their King to the Crown of England, ib. Beaten by Sir Tho. Wharton, 232. Beaten at Mussleborough, 285. The Protestants in that Kingdom first raise Troubles there, 379. Demand Aid of the English, ib. They insult their Queen 393. They seize and imprison her, 404. They talk high of their Liberty, 431. Miserably divided, 442. The Pope's Brief against them, 626.

Scots Men croud to England, and are advanc'd by K. James, 664. Enrich'd by him, 673. Quarrel with the English, and the English with them, 674. Enrich'd by K. James, 681.

Scot, Walter of Buccleugh, very troublesom on the Borders of England, 425. His Castles destroy'd by the English, 426.

Scripture, Canon of, determin'd by the Council of Trent, 259. Tradition made equal to it, ib.

Scroop, John, Lord one of the Yorkshire Rebels Commissioners to treat with Henry VIII. 107.

Seas, Narrow, have been time out of mind under the Jurisdiction of the English, 35.

Seaton, George Lord, sent Ambassador in the Name of the Scots Queen to desire Aid of the Duke of Alva, 426. His Speech to the Duke, ib. He deceives the Netherlanders, 427.

Sebastian, Don, King of Portugal, his Treaty of Commerce with Q. Elizabeth, 437. His Expedition to Africa, 462. Slain there, ib.

Seldom's Flock out of Holland, 477. Some put to death 494

Selden, John Esq; try'd in K. James's Reign for his History of Tithes, 650. Committed to the Sheriff of London, 657.

Seminary Priests their treasonable Tenents, 476. A Proclamation against them, 566.

Sepusio, John, crown'd King of Hungary at Buda by the Sultan himself, 135. Excommunicated by the Pope, 163. Own'd by Henry VIII. 173.

Servantes, Bastails of, 144.

Sessions, a satyrical one at Court, 729.

Seymour, Mrs. Jane, marry'd to Henry VIII. 191. Her Character, 196.

Seymour, Sir Edward, made Earl of Hertford, 212. Vid. Hertford, Earl of.

Seymour, Henry Lord, is commanded to observe the Prince of Parma at the Spanish Invasion, 543.

Seymour, Sir William, marries the Lady Arabella, Stuart, related to the Royal House of Stuart, 702. Flies for it, ib. Returns, and is pardon'd, 703. Made Marquiss of Hertford, ib.

Sforza, Maximilian, restor'd to the Dutchy of Milan by the Holy League, 11. Driven out by Francis I. 25. He submits to him, and accepts of a French Pension, ib.

Sforza Francisco, agrees to pay Henry VIII Tribute, if he help'd him to recover Milan 25. Restor'd by Charles V. 45. Joins with the French, and his Dutchy given to the Duke of Bourbon, 69. He is driven out of Milan, 70. He takes Arms against the Emperor, ib. Contracted to the King of Denmark's Daughter, and restor'd to his Dutchy, 135, 136. His Death, 196. He is said to be descended from Mutius Scævola, ib.

Shaxton, Dr. Bishop of Salisbury, made so by Anna Bolen's Interest, 195. Resigns his Bishoprick on account of the six Articles, 220.

Sheffield, Lord, kill'd by a Butcher in Ket's Rebellion, 298.

Sheffield, Douglas, the Earl of Leicester's reputed Wife, ill us'd by him, 457.

Sheppard expel'd the House of Commons, for reflecting upon the Puritans in James I's Reign, 656.

Shirley, Sir Anthony, made Knight of the Order of St. Michael by Henry IV. 579. Oblig'd to resign the Ensigns of the Order by Q. Elizabeth, ib.

Shirley, Sir Robert, returns from his Embassy to Persia, 643.

Shrewsbury, George Talbot Earl of, invest Therouane, 13. Beats the French in a Skirmish, 16. Active against the London Rioters, 28. His Evidence in the Cause of the Divorce, 113. His dangerous Loyalty, 106. His Conduct in Ask's Rebellion, ib.

Shrewsbury, Francis Talbot Earl of, relieves Haddington, and offers the English and Scots Battel, 291. Destroys Dunbar, ib.

Sidney, Sir Henry, made Deputy of Ireland, 398. His Actions there, 409. Returns to England, 439. Made Deputy again, 455. His Saying when he left Ireland, 463.

Sidney, Sir Philip, sent Ambassador to the Emperor Rodolph, 456. His Exploits in Holland, 511, 512. His Death and Character, ib.

Simier, the Duke of Anjou's Agent to Q. Elizabeth, hates Leicester, 463. Commanded by the Queen, 486.

Skiffington, Sir William, made Deputy of Ireland, 151.

Sky seems to burn, 452.

Sleidan, the Historian, Envoy from the German Protestants to Henry VIII. 251.

Smith, Sir Thomas, sent Ambassador to France by Queen Elizabeth to demand Calais, 416. His Reply to the Chancellor about it, ibid. Sends a Colony into Ireland, 445. 'Tis unfortunate, ib.

Smith, Thomas, a Merchant, sent Ambassador to Muscovy, 642.

Somerset, Henry Fitz-Roy Duke of, Henry VIII's natural Son by Elizabeth Blunt, Daughter of Sir John Blunt, his Character, 66.

Somerset, Edward Seymour, Earl of Hertford, made Duke of 275. Lord Protector, 275. His Letter to the French Nobility about a Marriage between Edward VI. and their Queen, 278. His Character, 279. He enters Scotland, 281. His Answer to the Earl of Huntley's Challenge, 282. His Message to the Scots Governour on the Treachery of his Men, 283. The Order of his Battel, 284. Obtains a Victory over the Scots at Mussleborough, 285. Takes several Towns, 287. His Reward at his Return, ib. Puts out Injunctions for Reformation in Religion, 289. Vindicated with reference to his Behaviour to the Lord Thomas Seymour his Brother, 301. He did not quarrel with him on his Wife's account, ib. Condemn'd for pulling down Churches to build his own House call'd Somerset-House, 303. The Earl of Warwick raises a Faction against him, ib. Carries off the King, 304. The Lords require him to leave the King, 306. A Guard set upon him, 307. Sent to the Tower in triumph by his Enemies, ib. Twenty nine Articles presented against him, to which he subscribes himself guilty, 308, 309. Loses his Office and Estate, 309. Restor'd to Favour, ib. False Rumours against him, 320. Accus'd of ill Designs, and seiz'd, 320. Several Witnesses appear against him, 321. His Trial and Defence, 322. Found guilty, ib. He is beheaded, 324. His last Speech, ib. 325. His Character, 325. Belov'd by the People, ib.

Somerville, a Papist, his wicked Designs, 505. Strangles himself, ib.

Soubise, the Duke of Rohan's Brother, a French Refugee, stil'd a notorious Rebel by Camden, 659.

Southampton, Henry Earl of, accompanies the Earl of Essex in his second Expedition against Spain, 597. His Arraignment with the Earl of Essex, 633 — 637. Restor'd to Liberty and Blood, 664. His Character, 736. Why committed, 748. His Death, 789.

Southampton propos'd as a Mart for Cloth, 317.

Spalato, Archbishop of, comes into England and turns Protestant, 646. Made Master of the Savoy, 649. And Dean of Windsor, ib. Returns to Rome, 659, 706. Procures the MS. of Father Paul's History of the Council of Trent to be sent to ABp. 707. Proceeded against in the Inquisition at Rome, 708. Dies there, and his Body is burnt, ib.

Speech, one in the House of Commons in the Reign of Henry VIII. against the Abuses of the Clergy, and in favour of the Reformation, 137, 138. Against throwing off the Pope's Supremacy, 170. For it, 171. H. VIII's last Speech in Parliament, 253. Governor of Scotland's against the English after the Battel of Mussleborough, 287. A pretended one of the Ld Rich's against the Protector Somerset, 304, 306. Mr. Stadlow a

 Lon-

Londoner's for him, ib. The Duke of Somerset's last Speech on the Scaffold, 324, 325. Dr. Weston's against the Reformation, 338. Q. Mary's to the Londoners on Wyat's Insurrection, 341. Lady Jane Grey's last Speech, 343. ABp. Heath's at Q. Elizabeth's Accession to the Crown, 369. Mr. Gargrave Speaker of the H. of Commons to Q. Elizab. about her marrying and the Queen's Answer, 375. Mary Queen of Scots to Sir Nich. Throgmorton, Ambassador in France, and Sir Nicholas's Answer, 386. Lord Keeper Bacon's to the Queen to marry, 399. The Queen's sharp Speech to the Parliament in answer to that and others, 400, 401. Michael Hospital, Chancellor of France, to the English Ambassador Sir Thomas Smith about Calais, and Sir Thomas's Answer, 406. The Lord George Seaton's to the Duke of Alva to desire Aid for the Scots Queen 426. Lord Burleigh's to a Scots Ambassador, 482. Randolph, Q. Elizabeth's Ambassador in Scotland, to the King and States, 483. Q. Elizabeth's to the Parliament about publishing the Scots Queen's Sentence, 526. Another to the same purpose, 527, 528. Q. Elizabeth's to the Parliament, 576 Polish Ambassador's, 600. K. James's tedious one to his first Parliament, 668, to 673. About the Union of the two Kingdoms, 678. About the Common Law, 682. Sir Frances Bacon's against Car's Friends in the Starchamber 700. K. James's to that Court, 706. K. James's to his second Parliament, 730. To excuse Grievances, 732.

Spes, Monsieur de, the Spanish Ambassador, publishes Libels against Q. Elizabeth, 417.

Spencer, Lord, reprimanded for petitioning K. James against the Scots and Irish Lords made by him, 656. His good Character, 737. His Quarrel with the Lord Arundel in the House of Lords, ib.

Spinola, his Death, 648.

Spinola, an Italian, in Edward VI's Service, his Bravery against the Devonshire Rebels, 295.

Spinola's Successes against the K. of Bohemia, 655. The number of his Army, 722. Besieges Bergenopzoom, 759 Forc'd to raise the Siege, ib.

Squire, Edward, arraign'd for Treason, 611.

Studlow, Mr. George, a Common-Council man of London, his Speech in favour of the Protector Somerset, 306.

Stafford, Henry, imprison'd, releas'd, and made Earl of Wiltshire, 2.

Stafford, Thomas, lands and surprizes Scarborough in Q. Mary's Reign, 354. Hang'd, ib.

Stafford, William, tempted by the French Ambassador to kill Q. Elizabeth, 533.

Stanhop, Sir Michael, beheaded for the Duke of Somerset's pretended Plot, 325.

Stanley, Sir Edward, his Valour, 512.

Stanly, William, his Treason to Q. Elizabeth, 540. Deserts with his Regiment to the Spaniards, ib.

Star, a new one, 446.

Stukly, Sir Lewis, Sir Walter Raleigh's Keeper imprison'd for consenting to his Escape, 650. Dies mad, 654

Stilyard, Company of Merchants of, dissolv'd 326.

Stink at Oxford Assizes kills the Judge, Sheriffs Justices of the Peace, Jury, and 300 People, 459.

Store, Jacob's, the Story of it, 664.

Storm, a violent one, 488

Story, Mr. a Member of the House of Commons, his Forwardness, 351.

Story, Dr. John, a Civilian, hang'd for Treason against Q. Elizabeth, 437.

Strangers, a Tumult against them at London, 28. Laws concerning them, 56.

Stuart, Henry, marries Margaret Queen Dowager of Scotland, Sister to Henry VIII. 95.

Stubs, John, of Lincolns Inn, writes against Q. Eliz. French Match, 486. Severely u'd, 487.

Stukeley, Thomas, his Information of the French Designs against Calais, 320. Suspected to be a Traitor, 321. Committed to the Tower, 322. Why he rebel'd in Ireland, 430. Goes to the Pope, 431. Made a Marquiss by the Pope, 462 Sent with 800 Italians to invade Ireland, ib. How disappointed, ib. Follows Don Sebastian to Africa, and is slain there, ib.

Sturton, Lord, hang'd in Q. Mary's Reign for a barbarous Murder, 354.

Sturton, a Bastard of the Lord Sturton's Family, betrays two Forts near Bologne to the French, 300.

Sudle, Thomas, Lord Seymour Baron of, his Quarrel with his Brother the Duke of Somerset, 301. Marries Q. Catherine, Par, ib. The Story of his falling out with his Brother on his Wife's account prov'd a Fable, ib. Many Crimes laid to his Charge, ib. Has a fair Trial, 302. Attainted by Parliament, ib. Beheaded ib.

Succession, Oath to the Heir of Ann Bolen by Henry VIII. requir'd by Act of Parliament, 175.

Suffolk, Charles Brandon Duke of, his Actions at the Royal Justs, in honour of the French Queen, 21, 22. He marries her as was pretended without her Brother K. Henry's Knowledg 22. Is easily pardon'd, ib. He retires from Court, 24. Passes over to Calais with an Army against the French, 57. His Actions in France, ib. 58. He comes within 11 Leagues of Paris, ib. His Evidence in the Cause of the Divorce, 113. Made Knight of the Order of St. Michael, 160. Marches against Dr. Mackrell and the Lincolnshire Rebels, 205. His Death, 251. Two of his Sons die of the Sweating Sickness, 319.

Suffolk, Henry Grey, Lord Marquiss Dorset created Duke of, 320. His Character, ib. Refuses to find the Duke of Somerset guilty, 322. Made Guardian of his Daughter Lady Jane Grey, 330. Takes away the Regalia from her, 332. Takes Arms against Q. Mary, 340. Is seiz'd and sent to the Tower, 341. Beheaded, 343.

Suffolk, Frances Dutchess of, her Misfortunes and Death, 394.

Suffolk, Earl of, accus'd of Bribery when he was Lord Treasurer, 649. Fin'd 30000 l. 652. Receiv'd into Favour again, 623. Remitted to 7000 l. 654. Sir Edward Coke's Pleadings against him, 705.

Supremacy, the King's, over the Church, the Rise of, 85. Speeches for and against it at the Council Table, 170, 171. Enacted by Parliament, 178. And again, 290. Settled on Q. Elizabeth, 372, 391.

Surrey, Thomas Howard Earl of, quarrels with Fox Bp. of Winchester and why, 4. Sent to raise an Army against the Scots, 12. K. Henry's Saying of him to the Scots Herald, 16. Beats the Scots at Flodden Field, 17. The Particulars of that Action, 18. He challenges the Scots King, ib. Whom he fights and kills in Battel, ib. Created Duke of Norfolk, 20. Vide Duke of Norfolk.

Surrey, Thomas Howard his Son Earl of, active against the London Rioters, 28. Draws his Dagger on Woolsey, 40. Made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 41. His good Government, 46 Made Admiral to Charles the Vth Emperor of Germany, and his Patent for it, 48. Insults the Coasts of France, 49. Sacks Morlaix, and convoys the Emperor to Spain, 50. Sent with Forces against the French in Picardy, ib He acts against the Scots, 57, 62. Is Duke of Norfolk by the Death of his Father, ib. Vide Duke of Norfolk.

Surrey, Henry Howard Earl of, his Friendship with Henry Fitz-Roy Duke of Somerset, Henry VIII's natural Son, 68 His Vein in Poetry, ib. Imprison'd for eating Flesh in Lent, 238. Governour of Boulogne, 254 Falls into disgrace, ib. His Troubles and the occasion of them, 263. Committed to the Tower, 264. Offers to fight Sir Richard Southwel one of the Witnesses against him in his Shirt, ib. His Sister, one of the Witnesses against him, ib. His Trial and good Defence, ib. He is beheaded, 265.

Sussex, Earl of, raises a Faction in the Court of Q. Elizabeth against the Earl of Leicester, and why, 398. Sent to the Emperor to treat of a Match between the Queen and the Archduke, 407. His Success, ib. 408 Examines the Earls Westmorland and Northumberland about their Rebellion, 422. Suppresses it, ib. His Expedition into Scotland against the Borderers, 425, 426 His generous dealing towards Leicester, 463. His Death and Character, 493. His Countess founds Sidney Sussex College, 557.

Sweating Sickness, 28, 99. Again, 319.

Swedes recover their Liberty, 57.

Synod, a National one in France against Pope Julius II. 6. Of Dort, 719.

T.

TAmworth, Mr. Q. Elizabeth's Ambassador to Mary the Scots Queen, his Talkativeness, 398. Refuses to give her Husband the Lord Henry Darley the Title of King, ib.

Tomse, Mr. his Motion in the House of Commons in favour of Q. Catherine, 158.

Termes, Marescal de, routed and taken Prisoner by Count Egmont, 357.

Ter-Oen routs the English, 612. Truce made with him by the Earl of Essex, 615. He breaks the Truce, 617. The Pope's Present to him, ib. His Insolence, 619 In great Perplexity, [651.] Craves Pardon, and absolutely submits himself. [ib.]

Terouane, the Siege of, 15, 16. Surrendred to K. Henry VIII. 16. He razes it, ib.

Thames, an unusual flowing in it, 452. Very low, 570. Guesses at the Cause of it, ib.

Theodore Joannides, Son of John Basilides Emperor of Russia, his Opinion of the English Traders, 493.

Thomas, Valentine, hang'd after Q. Elizabeth's Death for a Conspiracy against her, 641.

Thomond, Obrian, made Earl of by Henry VIII. 238.

Thomond, Obrian Earl of, plots against Q. Elizabeth, repents, confesses, and is pardon'd, 430.

Throgmorton, Sir Nicholas, Ambassador in France, his Servant sent to the Gallies, 379. His Answer to Mary Queen of Scots in vindication of Q. Elizabeth, 385. Taken Prisoner in the Civil Wars of France, 391. Roughly treated, 392. Sent to Scotland to [illegible] the Release of Q. [illegible] Cause, 405. His Success [illegible] the Duke of [illegible] Scots Queen, 41[illegible] 419.

Throgmorton, [illegible] Q. Elizabeth, 4[illegible]

Throgmorton, [illegible] on. 497, 498. [illegible] and denies it at the Gallows, [illegible]

Thuanus, his Censure of [illegible] VIII's [illegible] off from the [illegible]

Tichborn, Chedick, of Hampshire, one of the Conspirators to assassinate Q. Elizabeth, 516.

Tilney Charles, one of the Conspirators to assassinate Q. Elizabeth, 516.

Tilts, Tournaments, and other Exercises at Tournay, in honour of the Princes Margaret, Governor of the Netherlands, 17. In honour of the French Q. Mary, Sister to Henry VIII. at Paris, and the Conditions of them, 21, 22. At London to entertain the Queens of France and Scotland, Henry VIII's Sisters, 27. Noble ones in Spain, 33. Proclaim'd by Henry VIII. and Francis I. all over Europe, to be held at their Interview in Picardy, 35. Those at the Interview, 36.

Tindal, Mr. first translates the Bible into English, 152. He is burnt, 203.

Titles, of Honour conferr'd on Englishmen and Scotsmen by Foreign Princes, 595. The Validity of those Titles consider'd, 596.

Tobacco, first brought into England, 509.

Tonstall, Dr. Cuthbert, Bishop of Durham, committed to Prison for opposing K. Edward VI's Reformation, 289. Accus'd of endeavouring to raise a Rebellion, 323. And depriv'd, ib. Restor'd by Q. Mary, 333. By Act of Parliament, 344.

Tournay taken by Henry VIII. and fortify'd, 17. Deliver'd up to the French King for a Sum of Money, 32.

Tournhoult, Battel of, 597.

Trade, an Intercourse of with Sweden settled, 313.

Trade to Flanders, the yearly Amount of it, 395. To Muscovy, the Original of it, 408, 418. Of Bays and Says first brought into England, 416. A Treaty concerning it with the King of Portugal, 437. Renew'd, 456. That to Turkey, first establish'd, 464. To Barbary first establish'd, 510. And that to the East-Indies, 540.

Tradition, made equal to Scripture by the Council of Trent, 259.

Traitors, their unhappy end, 491.

Treaty of Cambray between the Emperor and French King against the Venetians, 5.

Treaty between the French and Scots Kings against Henry VIII. 12.

Treaty for the Holy War between the Pope, Emperor, Kings of England and Spain against the French King, 12.

Treaty of Peace between Henry VIII. and Lewis XII. 19, 20. Of Marriage between Lewis XII. and the Princess Mary, 20.

Treaty of Henry VIII. with the Duke of Milan, 25. Between Charles King of Castile, afterwards Charles the Vth, and Francis I. 26. Between Charles and Henry VIII, ib. Between Henry VIII and Francis I. against the Turk, 31. Of Marriage between the Princess Mary and the Dauphin, ib. Of the Affairs concerning the Admiralties of England and France, 32.

Between

Between Charles V. Emperor of Germany and Henry VIII. against Francis I. 44. Treaty of Windsor between Charles V. and Henry VIII. 47. Of Marriage between Charles V. and the Princess Mary, ib. Between Charles V. and the Duke of Bourbon, 58. Between England and France, 69. Treaty of Madrid between Charles V. and Francis I. for the French King's Delivery, 71, 72, 73, 74. Between the Pope, French King, and other Princes, against Charles V. called the Clementine League, 76. Three between Henry VIII. and Francis I. 80, 84. Treaty of Cambray manag'd by Ladies, 130. The Treaty concluded there between Charles V. and Francis I. 130, 131, 132, 133, 134. Of Peace with Scotland, 176. Between Henry VIII. and Charles V. 236, 237. Between K. Henry and the Earl of Lennox, 243. Between Charles V. and Francis I. 246. Between Henry VIII. and Francis I. 255. Treaty between Edward VI. and Henry II. the French King, 310, 311, 312. Treaty of Marriage between Q. Mary and Prince Philip of Spain, 339. Of Peace between Q. Elizabeth and the French King Henry II. 374. Between Q. Elizabeth and the Scots, Protestants, 380. Between the Queen, the Scots, and the French, 382. Between the Queen and the French Protestants, 390. Between the Queen and Charles IX. the French King, 394. Between the Queen and Sebastian King of Portugal, 437. [illegible] between Q. Elizabeth and Charles IX. [illegible] Between the Queen and the Netherlanders, 458. Of Trade with the Turks, 464. Of Trade between Q. Elizabeth and the Duke of Anjou, 484. Between Q. Elizabeth and Henry IV. 561, 568, 574. Another with him against Spain, 594. With the States of Holland, 610. Between England and Spain at Bologne in France, 621. Concerning Reprisals between the French and English 624. With the Danes, [648.]

Treaty of Marriage between Charles Prince of Wales, and the Infanta of Spain, 757.

Treatys, a Caution to the English concerning them, 255.

Trent, a General Council first propos'd to be held there, 231. It opens, no body pleas'd with it, 240.

Tumult of Apprentices of London. 19. Another rais'd by Dr. Bele and Lincoln a Broker against Strangers, 27. Another in the Country, 67.

Tunis taken by the Pirate Barbarossa, 180. And by the Emperor Charles V. ib.

Turkey Company first establish'd, 464.

Turks, a League against them by Maximilian the Emperor, Charles King of Spain, and Francis I. the French King, 29. Between Henry VIII. and Francis I. 31. They beat the Hungarians, 178. Besiege Vienna, and raise the Siege, 135. 300000 invade the Empire led by Sultan Solyman, 159. An Envoy from the Grand Seignior to K. James I. 648, 650.

Turin taken by the French, 197.

Turner, Ann, hang'd for Poysoning Sir Thomas Overbury, 645. Her wicked lewd Correspondence with the Countess of Essex, to gain the King's Favourite for her, 687. Her Lewdness, ib. She invents a Paint for Women, 688.

Tyrone, Eustace Oneal, made Earl of by Henry VIII. 230.

Tyrone, Hugh, made Earl of by Q. Elizabeth, 410. Murders Hugh Gavelock, is pardon'd, 561. His Character, ib. His Quarrel with Henry Bagnall, 574. Is wounded in opposing Macguire an Irish Rebel, 575. His feign'd Submission and Insolence afterwards, 581. Breaks out into Rebellion, and takes Black Water Fort, 587. Promises to submit, but his Letters miscarry, ib. Proclaim'd a Traitor, ib. His Strength, ib. Submits to Sir John Norris, 588. His Remonstrance, ib. And Demands, 589. Sollicites Aid from Spain, 590. Is pardon'd and prevaricates, ib. And rebels, ib. Desires a Truce, 603. Submits to the Earl of Ormond, having lost Black Water Fort, Comes to England to wait upon K. James, 664.

V.

Vandre Mark, William Lord, a Netherlander, driven out of England, seizes the Brill, 443. And other Towns from the Duke of Alva, ib.

Vane, Sir Ralph, hang'd for the Duke of Somerset's pretended Plot, 325.

Vanity of Fops in K. James's Reign, 716.

Varax, Count, defeated and slain by Count Maurice of Nassau at the Battel of Tournhoult, 597.

Vaux, Lord, permitted by K. James to transport 4000 men into the Netherlands to serve against the Hollanders, 753.

Vaux, Guido, one of the chief Conspirators in the Gunpowder Plot, 674. Found in the Cellar where the Powder was hid, 675. His Impudence and Obstinacy, ib. He's hang'd, ib.

Venice, State of, inlarge their Territories, 3. A League against them, ib. Submit to Pope Julius II. 6. They join with the Pope against the French, ib. The Pope leaves them. 11.

Vere, Sir Francis, made Governor of the Brill, 524. His Character, ib. And Actions, 297.

Vere, Sir Horatio, sent to the Assistance of the King of Bohemia, 654. K. James stands bare to him, 659. The small Number of Forces he carry'd with him, 722. His March, ib. His Bravery, 723.

Vienna besieg'd by the Turks, and the Siege rais'd, 135.

Villiers, George, knighted and made Gentlemen of the Bedchamber, 644. Master of the Horse, 645. Knight of the Garter, ib. Viscount Villiers, 646. Earl of Buckingham and Privy Counsellor, 647. Marquiss of Buckingham, 648. A Book dedicated to him by King James, 651. Marries the Earl of Rutland's Daughter, 653. Quarrels with some Lords in Parliament, 656. Reconcil'd by the Prince, ib. Crosses over to France with the Prince, 659. K. James's extreme Familiarity with him, 697. An odd Letter of K. James's to him, ib. By whom set up against Car, ib. Why call'd Steeny by K. James, ib. When first receiv'd into favour by the King, 698. His Descent, ib. Favours heap'd on him, 780. His Pride, 720. Made Marquiss, 726. See Buckingham Marquiss of.

Virginia so call'd by Sir Walter Raleigh in honour of Q. Elizabeth, 509.

Vives, Ludovicus a learned Spaniard, sent for by Cardinal Woolsey to be Professor of Eloquence at Oxford, 62.

Ulster, Herald at Arms, first settled for Ireland, 319.

Union between England and Scotland set on foot by K. James, 673. Commissioners appointed to settle it, ib. Arguments for it, 676. And against it, 677. King's Speech about it, 678. Parliament decline it, 679.

Universities, Foreign, their Opinion about the Divorce, 140, 151. Read in the House of Commons, 152. A Dispute in Parliament which shou'd be nam'd first, Oxford or Cambridge, 657. That of Dublin erected, 566.

Vorstius, an Arminian, chosen Professor of Leiden in opposition to the Orthodox, 715. Oppos'd strenuously by K. James, ib.

W.

WAad, William, Esq; sent Envoy to Philip II. is deny'd Audience, 497. His Conference with the Spanish Secretary, 498.

Wales, Charles Duke of York created Prince of, 646. Gains several Victories at Tournaments, 653. Hurts himself by a Fall leaping over a Wall, 654. Crosses over to France 659. His Return from Spain congratulated, ib. People against his Match with Spain, 738. Pulpits ring against it, 752. Articles of the Marriage long a settling, 753. The Pope requires several things in them in favour of Popery, 754. K. James's Instructions to his Ambassador Digby about the Match, 754, 756, 757. The Articles of the Treaty, 757, 758. Goes to Spain in Person, 763. His Adventures at Paris and Bourdeaux, ib. His Arrival at Madrid, and Reception there, 764. Visited by the King privately, and then rides in state to Court, ib. His Reception by the Queen, ib. He sees the Infanta, 764, 765. English Noblemen wait on him at Madrid, 765. Endeavors us'd in Spain to pervert him to Popery, ib. The Pope's Letters to him to the same purpose 766. The Answer he is said to have written to him. 767. Question'd whether genuine or not, ib. His and Buckingham's Letter to K. James, to know how far they may ingage for his acknowledging the Pope's spiritual Power, ib. A Dispensation for the Match come from Rome, 767

Wales, a short account of its History, 189. Laws concerning it, ib. Speech of a Welch Gentleman to Henry VIII. in favour of that Principality, 190. United to England, 191.

Walloy, Sir John, goes with 6000 Men to the Assistance of the Emperor Charles V. against Francis I. 240.

Walsingham, Sir Francis, Q. Elizabeth's Ambassador to the Scots K. James VI. his Conference with him, 492. Discovers Babington's Conspiracy, 516, 517. His Policy in it, ib. Tax'd by the Scots Queen at her Trial, defends himself, 523. His Death and Character, 569.

Ward, Mrs. a famous She-Jesuit, sends abroad 200 Woman to preach by the Pope's Indulgence, 729.

Warder, Thomas Arundel of, made a Count of the Empire, 595. His Honour not admitted in England 596.

Ware, Lord de la, sailing to Virginia, is poison'd in the Voyage, 649.

Warham, William, Archbishop of Canterbury, retires from Court in Discontent, 23. Recall'd, 24. He complains of Cardinal Woolsey to the King, 33. The Kings Answer ib. Has the Cause of the Divorce debated before him in the King's Presence by the Doctors of both Universities, 107. His Evidence in the Cause of the Divorce, 113. His Death, 163. He gave Credit to the Nun of Kent's Prophecies, 176.

Wars, Civil, in France, first broke out, 389. The Second, 410. The Third, 415.

Warwick, John Dudley Earl of, Lieutenant-General against the Scots in Edward VI's time, 270. His Character, 280. His Bravery in Scotland, 281. His Answer to the Earl of Huntley's Challenge, 282. Marches against Ket and his Rebels, 298. Takes Norwich from them, ib. Routs and reduces them, 299. Raises a Faction against the Duke of Somerset, 303. Who sends him to the Tower, 307. He pretends to be reconcil'd to him, and marries his Son to the Duke's Daughter, 309. Made Lord Admiral, ib. Murmurs against him, 312. Created Duke of Northumberland, 320. See Northumberland, Duke of.

Warwick, Ambrose Dudley Earl of, made General of the Forces sent to the assistance of the French Protestants, 390. Forc'd to return to England, 392. His Death, 559.

Warwick, Rich Earl of, his Character, 739.

Wentworth, Lord, surrenders Calais to the French, 356. His Death, 561.

Westminster-Abbey made a Bishoprick, 218. A Collegiate Church, 385.

Westmoreland, Charles Earl of, rebels against Q. Elizabeth, 422. Flies to the Netherlands, ib. His miserable End, 501.

Weston, Sir Richard, his Character given by Wilson, 721. Of the Spanish Faction, and Popishly affected, 725. Chosen by the Commons to carry their Petition of Grievances to the King, 743.

Weston, Dr. Dean of Westminster, and Prolocutor of Q. Mary's Convocation, his virulent Speech against the Reformation, 338.

Weston hang'd for the Murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, 644.

Whale, a great one taken, 452.

Wharton, Sir Thomas, with 3000 men, routs an Army of 15000 Scots that invaded England, 233.

Wharton, Lord, his Success against the Scots, 286.

Whitehall given to Henry VIII. by Cardinal Woolsey, 129, Rebuilt by Henry VIII. 166.

Whitgift, Dr John, Archbishop of Canterbury, opposes the Puritans zealously, 494. Dies of Grief, that K. James found fault with some things us'd in the Liturgy, 642. His Moderation towards Puritans, and good Character, in opposition to Dr Bancroft, 665.

Wight, Isle of, vain Attempts upon it by the French, 250.

Wikes, a Fanatick, sent to Bedlam for denouncing Judgments against James I. 651.

Will, a Probat of one cost a 1000 Marks before the Reformation, 138.

Williams, Sir William Fitz, made Deputy of Ireland, 437. His Actions there, 450. Sent again, 542. Destroys the Spaniards that were driven ashore in Ireland at the Invasion, 548. His ill Conduct occasions a Rebellion, 550, 561. Recall'd, 581.

Williams, Sir Roger, fights a Duel with a Spanish Captain in the face of two Armies, 484. A bold Adventure of his, 511. His Rashness in France, 562. Prais'd by Henry IV. 568. His Death and Character, 587.

in

Williams, Dr John, made Bishop of Lincoln, and Lord Keeper, 651. His short Harangue to the Parliament, 7[illegible]. See Lincoln, Bishop of.

Willoughby, Sir Hugh, an Adventurer, frozen to Death, 408.

Willoughby, Peregrine Bertie Lord, his Death, [643.]

Wilson, Arthur, Esq; his Life and Reign of James I. 661. His Picture drawn by himself, ib. His Birth and Education, and the Foundations he went upon for his History, ib. His Death, and Anthony Wood's Character of him, 662. His Character of several Noblemen, 736.

Winchester, Marquiss of, his Death great Age and Progeny, 445.

Winchester, Richard Fox Bishop of, quarrels with the Earl of Surrey, 4, 13. Recommends Wolsey to the King, 14. He retires from Court, 14. His Saying to the King, and the King's Answer, ib. He is recall'd, ib.

Windsor, Edward, Brother to the Lord Windsor, one of the Conspirators to assassinate Q. Elizabeth, 516.

Winfield, Sir Richard, his ridiculous Negotiation with Maximilian to make Henry VIII. Emperor of Germany, 25. His Letter to the King when he was Ambassador in France, 34.

Wingfield, Sir Robert, Captain of Edward VI's Guards, seizes the Person of the Duke of Somerset, Lord Protector of the King and Kingdom, 307.

Winter, Captain William, fails with a Fleet to Scotland, to assist the Protestants, 380. One of the Ambassadors sent to France to demand Calais, 406. Seizes a vast sum of Money belonging to the Spaniards, 416.

Winwood, Sir Ralph, Ambassador to the States General from K. James, his Remonstrance about the Arminians, 713. And Protestation, 715.

Woad, forbidden to be sown in some places, and why, 520.

Wolsey, Thomas, recommended to the Favour of Henry VIII. by Bishop Fox and Sir Thomas Lovell, and on what account, 14. His Speech to the King before his Advancement, ib. He afterwards forgets his Friends and Relations, 15. All Court made to him; he accompanies the King at the Sieges of Terouane and Tournay, 15, 17. His ill Advice, 17. He is made Bp. of Tournay, ib. Bishop of Lincoln, 20. Courted by Francis I. the French King, 22. Made A. Bp. of York, 23. Caress'd by the French King, and why, ib. Is made Cardinal, and farms the Bishopricks of Bath, Worcester, and Hereford, at easy rates, ib. Made Lord Chancellor, ib. His Pride and Vanity, ib. 24. The whole Administration left to him, ib. His Ascendant over the King, ib. Incens'd against Francis I. about the Bishoprick of Tournay, ib. Is for breaking with France, ib. He addresses himself to Maximilian the Emperor against the French King, ib. His private Negotiations for himself, 25. Suspected by the Emperor Maximilian, 26. His Justice and good Qualities, 27. He is brib'd by Francis I. to his Interest, 30. His Speech to the King, and the King's Saying of his Conduct, ib. He persuades the King to restore Tournay, ib. His Reasons for it, ib. He has 12000 Livres yearly of the French King for it, 32. His prodigious Pride and Power, ib. And arbitrary Proceedings, 33. The Archbishop of Canterbury complaining of him, he grows more moderate, ib. Gain'd by Charles V. in hopes of the Papacy, at which he aims, 34. Orders the Preparations for the Interview between the King of England and the French King, ib. Hearken to a Proposal for the surrendring Calais to the French King, 35. Hates the Duke of Buckingham and Earl of Surrey, and why, 40. Charles the Vth refers his Difference with Francis I. to him, 43. He goes over to Flanders in order to end it, but to no purpose, ib. He gives Sentence against Francis I. 44. His State, ib. Pretends to the Papacy, 45. And is disappointed, ib. His Policy, 46. How he manag'd the Parliament and Convocation, 55. He is check'd by the House of Commons, 56. Pretends again to the Papacy, and is again disappointed, 59. Made Legate for Life, ib. Colleges founded by him, 60. He ruins several religious Houses, and for what Reasons the Pope and King consented to it, 60, 61. He is generally curs'd, and provokes the People to an Insurrection, 66, 67. The King's Letter to him, ib. His great Wealth, ib. Builds Hampton-Court, and gives it to the King, 68. Ten thousand Ducats a year given him by the Clementine League, 77. Sent Ambassador to France, 83. His Business, 84. The King writes him a Letter of Thanks with his own Hand, ib. Occasions the King's pretending to Church-Supremacy, 85. His Spite to the Emperor, and Treachery to Clarencieux King at Arms, 90. Mistrusted by the King, ib. His Interest declines, 91. Check'd by the King for signing a Warrant to execute the Earl of Kildare without his Knowledge, 96. His Advice about the Divorce, 99. His Commission to hear the Cause of the Divorce, 101, 107. Advises the King to dissolve Monasteries, and under what pretence, 102. His Intrigues for the Papacy, 106. His underhand dealing with the King, 121. Hated by Mrs. Bolen, ib. His Disgrace, Indictment and Condemnation, 123, 124, 125. Articles exhibited against him in Parliament, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129. Falls sick in Despair, 129. Gives the King Whitehall and Hampton-Court, ib. Is pardon'd, ib. His vain Attempts to recover the King's Favour, 147. He is arrested, ib. His last Speech, Death and Character, 148.

Wotton, Dr. Nicholas, Dean of Canterbury and York, sent Ambassador to Charles the Vth about the Lady Mary's having Mass said in her House, 317. Edward VI's Instructions to him, ib. 318. His Fortune, Death and Character, 408.

Worcester, Somerset Earl of, sends his Daughter to Brussels to be bred a Nun, 654. Reprimanded by K. James, ib. Of the Spanish Faction, and Popishly affected, [illegible]

Watson, Dr Ambassador to the Emperor, 277. His Instructions, [illegible]

Wyat, Sir Thomas, ri[illegible] Q. Mary, 340, 341. Is join'd by the [illegible] against him, 341. Marches to [illegible] Refus'd Admittance, surrender[illegible] Accuses the Marquiss of Exeter, [illegible] the Lady Elizabeth, 343. D[illegible] Execution, ib.

Y.

Y*Ear*, the Admirable 1588. 542.

Yelverton, Sir Henry, Attorney General to K. James, a Man of Honour, 734. Grateful to his Patron Car, ib.

York, Charles Prince, created Duke of, 642. Prince of Wales, 646.

York, Rowland, his leud Character, 540. Brings up Bullying and Duelling in England, ib. His Treason to Q. Elizabeth and the States of Holland, ib. His miserable end in the Netherlands, ib.

York, Edmund, his Nephew hang'd for a Plot against Q. Elizabeth, 582.

Youghall, Mayor of, hang'd, and why, 474.

Z.

Z*Uinglius*, Ulricus, appears in Switzerland for the Reformation, 37.

FINIS.

00035263

TT a 3 vol. 2
352363
O
936.2
Her/Com
Herbert, Edward
Complete History of England
B 567 15/5 4/17/-

Digitized with financial assistance from Observer Research Foundation on 01 June, 2019